> I am sure that Wilson is right. Apart from the question of self-acknowledged responsibility, this does not conflict with the conclusions of Hirschfeld but carries them still further.

But it is hardly consistent with Farson's earlier comment about Druitt playing cricket only hours after committing a savage murder.

In his concluding chapters, Farson elaborates on Sir Melville Macnaghten's words: 'From private information I have little doubt but that his family believed him to have been the murderer'. Farson discusses this in regard to William Druitt, Montague's brother, a solicitor from Bournemouth who testified at Montague's inquest. Farson writes:

> We may suppose that William, who represented the family, believed that his brother committed the murders. But . . . why? The suicide in the Thames is no evidence in itself. Yet at the very point where the evidence might seem weakest, I can see its strength. William must have had proof of Montague's guilt. Furthermore, this proof must have been conclusive; William was not searching for notoriety, on the contrary, and he would hardly have drawn attention to his suspicions without good reason. Equally the police would not have accepted his statement without proof.

We must remember that Sir Melville Macnaghten's notes did not express the opinion of the police as a whole. For police, Farson should substitute 'Macnaghten'. Secondly, as Macnaghten's official notes show, he did not accept the statement that the family believed Druitt was the Ripper. He merely reported their suspicion, which in itself was meaningless. Many families had suspicions about certain of their members, as the Yard Suspects file proves. That did not make them all Jack the Ripper. And thirdly, if the police had had proof, as Farson alleges, Macnaghten certainly would have included it in his notes.

Farson quotes the letter found in Druitt's pocket after he was dragged from the Thames, and which was read out at the inquest:

> Since Friday I felt I was going to be like mother and the best thing for me was to die.

But this does not support the case against Druitt, it weakens it. Would a man who had committed five brutal murders accompanied by horrific mutilations over a period of ten weeks sit down and write, several weeks after the final murder, that he had been feeling apprehensive about his state of mind since Friday? The idea that he had not become just a little worried about his behaviour between 31st August and 9th November is almost comic.

In the revised edition of his book Farson admits the possibility that Druitt did not commit suicide but was murdered by his family. His reasoning, in part, is sound. Druitt's pockets were filled with stones. A swimmer is not likely to choose death by drowning, and a person who cannot swim would have no need to weight his body. But Farson harps back to the fictitious connection with the Minories and quotes a correspondent as saying:

> I would say that they [Druitt's family] overpowered him—drugs? injection?—they had medical knowledge and so presumably access to 'knock out drops'—and then carried his unconscious body to the Thames and then heaved his stone-laden body into it. (Minories to Thames—200 yards?) Justice was done if not legally.

Yet as we have seen, Druitt was in no way connected with the Minories. And if he had been, No. 140 where Farson says Druitt lived is considerably more than two hundred yards from the river; it is nearer nine hundred. Though the reasoning that Druitt was murdered is sound, it is hardly credible that his own family could have been responsible. Even if the Druitts had certain knowledge that Montague was a desperate maniac, and had been responsible for the Jack the Ripper murders, surely the last thing they are likely to have done is murder him. If they had taken any action it would have been to place him in an asylum like his mother. So, if his family did not murder Druitt, who did?

Sickert said from the beginning that Druitt had been a scapegoat, but he did not know how he had been selected. If this was true, those involved in the cover-up would have been questing for a likely candidate on whom to place the blame for the murders. And Druitt, alone in London, nervous and unhappy, would have been an ideal choice. Of course, it would have been hopeless bringing him to trial—conviction would have been impossible, and the accompanying publicity highly dangerous. But if he committed suicide, and a note was found on his body expressing fear for his sanity, then the case would be well and truly sewn up.

The Honourable Society of the Inner Temple have records to show that Druitt kept up his chambers at No. 9 King's Bench Walk until his death. This is confirmed by the Post Office Directory of London. It is almost certain that if he was murdered, he was taken from this address to the Thames. King's Bench Walk runs right down to the Victoria Embankment. But without solid facts all this is speculation, with little more validity than Farson's writing about Druitt. If Druitt was a scapegoat, he must have been set up. Someone somewhere along the line must have chosen him. If Sickert was right in his suggestion, there had to be a link between Druitt and the other sides of the case. But where?

There is a series of links that taken singly could be dismissed as coincidence. Combined, they form a pattern which is undeniable:

(1) Michael Harrison has found that Prince Eddy's tutor, and later governor, Canon John Neale Dalton, was educated at the same school at Blackheath where Druitt became a master. Whether Dalton continued his association with the school, and indeed exerted any influence there, it is impossible to say. Once again, it is only possible to speculate that if he did he could have been responsible for one of the most baffling aspects about Druitt's tragic life, his mysterious dismissal from the school. Druitt taught there for at least five years, and was dismissed shortly before his death. No one has been able to find out why.

(2) Thomas Toughill, who has developed his own theory about the identity of the Ripper, has established another connection, albeit an indirect one, between Druitt and Eddy. Druitt's brother was in the same regiment as the artist Frank Miles—and Miles' brother was Eddy's equerry.

(3) Having established Miles as a second link between Druitt and Eddy, we find that Miles lived in Tite Street, Chelsea—and that across the road, at No. 9, lived Sir Melville Macnaghten, the man responsible for connecting Druitt's name with the Ripper case.

(4) Next door to Miles at No. 28 Tite Street lived the artist Whistler, Walter Sickert's erstwhile mentor whom Sickert visited regularly.

(5) At No. 16 Tite Street lived the homosexual Miles's former lover, Oscar Wilde—and Wilde was another close friend of Sickert whom Sickert often used to visit.

(6) Hesketh Pearson pointed out in his biography of Wilde that another distinguished visitor used to call on Wilde at Tite Street—Eddy's father, the Prince of Wales. Parties were held at Wilde's house at which Sickert, Eddy's father and Miles were among the regular guests.

(7) Macnaghten was a likely guest at these same parties, though this is not definite. As well as his link with Sickert at Tite Street, Macnaghten and Sickert were fellow-members of the Garrick Club.

(8) Yet another fact connects Druitt with the Royal Family. After the notorious Mordaunt divorce scandal in which the Prince of Wales was implicated in 1860, Lady Mordaunt was conveniently certified insane and placed in an asylum where she spent the rest of her life. Whether she was really insane is open to some doubt, but the fact remained that her incarceration was fortunate for the Prince of Wales. The records of the Lunacy Commission show that only about twelve lunatics in the whole country were of sufficient importance or interest to warrant regular reports. Tracing the records through the years, one fact cannot be missed: two names appear regularly together in that small list of inmates—Lady Mordaunt and Mrs Ann Druitt, Montague's mother.

(9) Another interesting connection between Druitt and Eddy is via Eddy's best friend James Kenneth Stephen, whom Harrison named as the Ripper. Stephen's brothers were both barristers like Druitt. Harry Lushington Stephen was at No. 3 King's Bench Walk (Druitt was a few yards along at No. 9) and Herbert Stephen was immediately opposite Druitt's chambers, at No. 4 Paper Buildings.

(10) The Stephen brothers were cousins of Virginia Woolf, a close friend of Sickert's.

(11) The Stephens were all patients of Sir William Gull, the man Sickert names as the prime mover in the Ripper case.

(12) Druitt was surrounded by people who had close links with the account of the Ripper murders told by Sickert. The twelfth link takes us beyond the civilized purlieus of King's Bench Walk and Paper Buildings into No. 9 King's Bench Walk itself. Several solicitors and barristers shared No. 9 King's Bench Walk with Druitt—one of whom was Reginald Brodie Dyke Acland, the brother of Sir William Gull's son-in-law.

(13) Dyke Acland's father, Sir Henry Wentworth Acland, was Honorary Physician to Eddy's father and a close friend of Gull.

(14) Acland was also a friend of Holman Hunt, the Pre-Raphaelite painter—whose studios had been at Cleveland Street.

(15) The final link is the vital one. The solicitor who instigated the second part of the Cleveland Street cover-up, Edward Henslow Bedford, lived at No. 9 King's Bench Walk, the same address as Druitt. Law Society records show that Bedford practised at the address between 1867 and 1898, and subsequently at 52 Arbour Square, Whitechapel, close to the police station. During his time at King's Bench Walk he was twice in partnership, but between 1879 and 1898, the period during which Druitt shared the address, he practised alone. The building is not vast; it is a three-storey, flat-fronted house; Bedford and Druitt would undoubtedly have known each other well.

It seems beyond coincidence that the man who played a major role in the second part of the cover-up should live at the self-same address as the person used as a scapegoat in the third part. Bedford was in the best possible position to evaluate Druitt, bring him to the notice of those in charge of the cover-up, and also set up his murder.

To sum up: an amazing set of facts, all of which can be verified by documents open to the public, not only confirm Druitt was a scapegoat by linking him with every aspect of the case. They also provide definite links between every part of Sickert's narrative, parts which until now have appeared unconnected. Druitt, Eddy, the Prince of Wales, J. K. Stephen, Sir Melville Macnaghten, Sir William Gull and all the goings-on at Cleveland Street are linked together, just as Sickert claimed. And as final establishment of his credentials, Sickert himself has links with all of them.

CHAPTER NINE

All Roads lead to Dorset Street

Apart from the curious fact that Inspector Abberline was in charge of both the Ripper case and the Cleveland Street brothel case, other incidents link Cleveland Street—and indeed the Royal Family—with the East End murders.

The importance of one connection between the Royal Family and Jack the Ripper has so far been missed: Queen Victoria was passionately concerned about the Ripper murders. This was not, however, a concern stimulated by a monarch's conscientious desire for law and order. Victoria had a special interest. In a year when murder was commonplace throughout England, she took an active interest in the first Ripper murder and ordered the Prime Minister to take steps that would prevent a sequel. Only a person with some inside knowledge can recognize in a single killing the beginning of a series—especially if the second murder has not yet occurred. In a telegram to Salisbury, sent after Kelly's murder on 9th November, Victoria reminded him: 'You promised me when the first murder took place to consult your colleagues about it'.

As this indignant memorandum indicates, unless the Queen instructed her Prime Minister to take personal action over every murder that occurred in England—which she did not—then Victoria knew Nichols's killing was the first of a series the moment it happened. Had she urged action after Chapman's death her concern would have been understandable, for by then it was obvious that a pattern of murder was developing. But murder was so common in Whitechapel in 1888 that her pecific concern with Nichols indicates a deeper knowledge.

Murder was so much a part of life in the East End that when a woman called Emma Smith was attacked by three men and stabbed to death on Easter Monday, 1888, the newspapers did not bother to report it. Two witnesses who testified at Kelly's inquest said they had heard the cry, 'Murder!' but it was such a common cry in the neighbourhood they both ignored it. There were about five hundred inquests into unexplained deaths in the Whitechapel district alone in 1887, the year before the Ripper murders. Cullen wrote:

> In scanning the press for this period one is astounded by the number of reports of women who had been beaten or kicked to death, jumped on until they were crushed, chopped, stabbed, seamed with vitriol, eviscerated, or deliberately set afire. In the preceding year thirty-five murders were recorded in the Home Counties alone (seventy-six murders if one includes infanticides), and of this number only eight convictions were secured, the majority of these crimes remaining unsolved forever.

Crime comes in waves, and 1888 was the crest of the wave for crimes of violence, especially in the East End where they happened every day. Unless Sickert's story is correct it is hard to explain Queen Victoria's preoccupation with Nichols's murder. At the time the Queen started demanding action it was an apparently unremarkable murder with nothing to distinguish it from a dozen others in Whitechapel that year. Only later did it turn out to be the first by Jack the Ripper.

A further provable connection between the murders and Cleveland Street was mentioned by Sickert himself. Fifty yards from the hovel where Marie Kelly was murdered stood Providence Row Women's Refuge, run by nuns. This was the East End convent from which Sickert said Kelly had first been brought to Cleveland Street. One of the founders and a leading committee member of Providence Row was a solicitor called Edmund Bellord. He was a partner in a firm of estate agents called Perkins and Bellord, whose offices were at none other place than Cleveland Street. They owned much of the property in the area—including, incidentally, Lord Salisbury's house in near-by Fitzroy Square.

Perhaps the most important connection between the West End and the East End was that mentioned by Marie Kelly herself. At her inquest the man she had been living with, Joe Barnett, said 'When she left Cardiff she said she came to London. In London she was first in a gay house in the West End of the town. A gentleman there asked her to go to France. She went to France but she told me as she did not like the part she did not stay there long. She lived there about a fortnight.'

Though many authors have dismissed this as fantasy on the part of Marie Kelly, it is nevertheless remarkably consistent with the story told by Sickert. Not only does it seem inescapable that the gay house in the West End was Sickert's studio in Cleveland Street, Sickert also said he had taken Kelly to Dieppe, which would account for her trips to France with 'a gentleman'.

Sickert maintained that his personal involvement in the case ended at Cleveland Street, but that he knew who the killers were, the motive for the killings and how they were carried out. He believed four of the Ripper victims knew each other, though he did not produce any evidence in support of this claim. Eddowes, he said, was murdered only because she was mistaken for Kelly. He did not know why. He said the four companions, Kelly, Chapman, Stride and Nichols, were blackmailing someone connected with the events in Cleveland Street, though once again he left a gap in the story by not explaining who. The blackmail drew attention to the whores and brought about their murder.

No theorist has suggested any of the victims knew each other, let alone hinting at an association between four of them. Their bodies were found over a wide area encompassing Whitechapel, Spitalfields and Aldgate. There certainly appears at first glance to be nothing to connect them, except that they were all prostitutes. But if any of the victims did know each other, it would shed completely new light on the case. . . .

The first observation—and even this seems to have eluded previous writers—is that although the victims' bodies were found over a large area in three different districts, they all lived in one tiny part of Spitalfields. This degraded neighbourhood included Dorset Street, which was known as the most evil road in London, along which policemen would walk only in pairs, White's Row, Fashion Street, Flower and Dean Street and Thrawl Street. They were all short roads; the longest (Fashion Street) was only a hundred and eighty yards long, and Dorset Street was little more than a hundred yards long. This is the picture:

DORSET STREET. Annie Chapman lived in a common lodging house at No. 35. Marie Kelly lived thirty yards away on the same side of the street in Miller's Court, which was part of No. 26. It was disclosed at Kelly's inquest that before moving to Miller's Court she had lived at another common lodging house in Dorset Street. Exactly where is not known. As well as living so close to each other, Chapman and Kelly both frequented the same pub, the Britannia on the corner of Dorset Street and Crispin Street. This new evidence has not previously come to light because at Chapman's inquest the pub was referred to as the Ringer's, and at Kelly's it was described by its correct name, the Britannia. As Caroline Maxwell's previously unpublished statement, given in full in Chapter 4, shows, the Britannia was owned by a Mrs Ringer and known to the locals as the Ringer's.

FASHION STREET. Catherine Eddowes often lodged at No. 6. Stride sometimes stayed at a lodging house in the same street, but which number is not known. Fashion Street was fifty yards from Dorset Street.

FLOWER AND DEAN STREET. Mary Nichols lodged for a time at a house called the White House. This was only yards away from No. 32 where Stride often dossed. A short way along from No. 32 was Eddowes's main address, No. 55. Flower and Dean Street was less than a hundred yards from Dorset Street.

THRAWL STREET. Nichols's chief address was at No. 18. This was near No. 6, the address of Eddowes's sister, whom Eddowes often used to visit. Thrawl Street was a hundred and eighty yards from Dorset Street.

Considering that there were 233 common lodging houses in Whitechapel, Spitalfields and Stepney from which Jack the Ripper could have selected his victims, it must surely be significant that he killed women from addresses so close to each other. Even without further evidence, it seemed a strong possibility that the victims knew each other. But there was still more evidence to come.

Timothy Donovan, deputy of the common lodging house at 35 Dorset Street, told the Chapman inquest that Annie Chapman had lived there for the four months prior to her murder, except for the last week, during which time he had not seen her until the Friday evening. He had known her about sixteen months.

The address of victim number three, Elizabeth Stride, has always been reported as Flower and Dean Street, and it was disclosed at her inquest that she had also lodged in Fashion

Street. She had in fact dossed in both these streets, but that was only part of the story. The house reported to have been Stride's regular address was No. 32 Flower and Dean Street, but Elizabeth Tanner, deputy of the common lodging house at that address, told Stride's inquest:

'I have seen the body of the dead woman at St George's Mortuary and I recognize it as that of a woman who had lodged in our house on and off for the last six years.' (My italics.)

From this statement it is plain that Stride spent little of her time at this address. The view is strengthened by the dialogue which followed between Coroner Wynne Baxter and Mrs Tanner:

CORONER Who is she [the deceased]?
TANNER She was known by the nickname Long Liz.
CORONER Do you know her right name?
TANNER No.

Most of the Spitalfields lodging houses were appallingly overcrowded, but if Stride had been a regular lodger at No. 32 Mrs Tanner would have known her name. If Stride was not in fact living where until now it has been assumed she was, what was her address? The answer is to be found in another part of Widow Tanner's evidence:

CORONER Do you know any of her male acquaintances?
TANNER Only of one.
CORONER Who is he?
TANNER She was living with him. She left him on Thursday to come and stay at our house, so she told me. [My italics].

The man Stride had been living with was a waterside labourer called Michael Kidney. That she had spent most of her time with Kidney, and not at either Flower and Dean Street or Fashion Street, was borne out by Kidney's testimony:

> I have seen the body. It is Long Liz. I've known her for about three years and she has been living with me nearly all that time. I left her in Commercial Street as I was going to work. I expected her to be at home but when I got home I found she had been in and gone out. She was subject to going away whenever she thought she would. During the three years I've known her she has been away from me altogether about > five months. I've cautioned her the same as I would a wife. It was drink that made her go. But she always came back again. I don't believe she left me on Tuesday to take up with any other man. I think she liked me better than any other man. I didn't see her again until I identified the body in the mortuary.

Kidney's testimony shows us how Stride's address has gone down on historical record as 32 Flower and Dean Street. When the Ripper struck her down she just happened to be in the midst of one of her bouts of drunkenness which took her off to that address. And the temporary doss house she drifted into was put down as her permanent abode. These were the days before the precise methods advocated by Conan Doyle in his Sherlock Holmes stories had been adopted by the real police; when names, ages and addresses were regarded, with a certain contempt, as mere formalities. But names, ages and addresses can and do catch murderers.

Long Liz Stride was apart from Kidney for only five months in three years, and that five months consisted of odd jaunts into a drunken independence. Most of the time between 1885 and her death she was living with Kidney. But where did they live? Several writers have coupled the information about Stride's contact with Flower and Dean Street with the fact that she cohabited with Kidney, and concluded that they lived together in Flower and Dean Street. This is incorrect. One vital fact that was revealed at Stride's inquest has not so far been noted. The Daily News of 6th October gave Michael Kidney's address as 35 Dorset Street, the self-same lodging house where Annie Chapman had lived for four months prior to her death. This was the house where Elizabeth Stride had lived with Kidney. This was the house from which she had decamped a few days before her murder, just like Chapman. Both victims had lived at the same house, and both had kept away from it in the days leading up to their deaths.

A report in the secret Home Office file, recording Coroner Baxter's summing-up at the Stride inquest, confirms this conclusion: 'For the last two years the deceased had been living at a common lodging house in Dorset Street, Spitalfields, with Michael Kidney, a waterside labourer'.

Suddenly we find that three of the four Ripper victims whom Sickert claimed knew each other all came from Dorset Street. Two of them were living at the same house. Two frequented the same pub. The evidence that they knew each other seems over-

Nichols Stride
Chapman
Kelly
Eddowes

whelming. The fourth victim whom Sickert said was part of the same circle, though she was murdered nearly a mile away in Buck's Row, lived less than a hundred yards from the others, and doubtless frequented the same pub. Sickert's version of the East End murders was beginning to have real meaning. In a metropolis the size and character of the East End it is inconceivable that a random killer could have cut down, in places up to nearly a mile apart, four women who just happened to know each other. It is clear that whatever Jack the Ripper's motive, he (or they) knew the identity of the victims. It is not surprising so few writers have made this point: most theories are based upon the idea of a maniac perpetrating random murders.

Another factor vital to Sickert's story is that the Ripper's intended final victim was Marie Kelly. In 1867 there were an estimated 80 000 prostitutes in London. If anything this figure had increased by the eighties. Out of 80 000, Jack the Ripper killed five. Can it have been an accident that two of his five victims, the last two, were called Mary Ann Kelly? The odds against this happening by accident are astronomical, even though Kelly was a fairly common name. In addition, the real Kelly and the victim who merely used the name were the only Ripper victims to receive facial mutilations. Despite her fondness for the French version of her name, a fantasy perpetuated on her death certificate, the real Kelly was not known by many people in Dorset Street as Marie Jeanette. As the evidence of her inquest shows, she was known by some as Mary Jane, by others as Mary Ann. Can it be coincidence that Catherine Eddowes, who lived only fifty yards from the real Kelly, used the name Mary Ann Kelly? Eddowes often called herself Kelly because she lived with a man called John Kelly.

This must surely be the explanation lacking in Sickert's story, the reason why Eddowes was mistaken for Kelly and died in her place.

When Eddowes was dead the Ripper did not strike again for six weeks. She had called herself Mary Ann Kelly, and the killers thought they had the real Kelly. The details of her murder, like the mysterious facial mutilations, support this idea, as will be shown in Chapter 10. When the mistaken identity was realized Kelly was done to death and the Ripper murders were brought to their final, horrid crescendo exactly thirty-nine days after the death of Eddowes. This, too, will be seen to have significance.

All Ripper roads lead to Dorset Street. Dorset Street leads inexorably back to Cleveland Street. An elderly nun at the Roman Catholic convent in Harewood Place, W.1, only a few minutes' walk from Cleveland Street, had an interesting story to tell when the BBC interviewed her in 1973. In 1915 she had been a novice at Providence Row, directly opposite the pub where Kelly and Chapman had rubbed shoulders daily. She clearly remembered an old nun who had been there at the time of the Ripper murders telling her that 'if it had not been for the Kelly woman, none of the murders would have happened'.

CHAPTER TEN

The Masonic Killers

The suggestion that Freemasons were behind the Jack the Ripper murders was first laid before the public in Butchery, the third episode of the BBC series on the Whitechapel Murders. Scriptwriters Elwyn Jones and John Lloyd attributed the idea to their fictional policeman Detective Chief Superintendent John Watt. In so doing they unfortunately distorted the truth for the purpose of dramatic impact. Barlow and Watt's dialogue on the Freemason idea was separated by three episodes (or three weeks) from Sickert's story, which was told by his son in Episode Six. There was every indication that the Sickert account and the accusation of the Freemasons were unconnected. In fact the indictment of the Masons was an integral part of Sickert's story. It was purely as a result of a comment by Joseph Sickert that researcher Ian Sharp went to the London Library in St James's Square one afternoon in January 1973 to see if there was any traceable connection between the world's most mysterious society and its most mysterious series of murders. The evidence he uncovered should have appeared as corroboration of Sickert's six-minute narrative, or at least allied to it. Jones and Lloyd chose instead to include it in their script as a separate line of inquiry, and the true import of Walter Sickert's story was lost. Barlow and Watt's examination of the Masons was of necessity restricted to a few minutes. This brevity, and the fact that the idea was presented as just another theory bobbing on a sea of speculation, showed the idea badly. It came over as unlikely as Donald McCormick's complicated theory that a member of a Russian sect called the Chlysty might have felt impelled to kill and mutilate whores, and as insubstantial as Robin Odell's suggestion that the Ripper was a Jewish ritual slaughterman inspired by the rigid doctrines of the Talmud to rid the world of the taint of harlotry.

Had the Freemasons theory been anchored in a serious attempt to explain who the killer or killers were, and why the murders should have been perpetrated by Masons, it would have been meaningful. But as jetsam the idea floated across our television screens and for most of us sank into the Sargasso of forgotten ideas, the crowded oblivion where all but the most memorable of television's welter of communication is consigned.

Sickert's story also suffered because of the format of the series. Viewers had never before seen such a hybrid programme, where facts mingled inextricably with fiction. They knew Barlow and Watt were figments of a writer's imagination; many people wondered if their investigation was enriched with imaginary pieces of evidence. For all these reasons, and the fact that the series was broadcast in midsummer when both stations, faced with a much depleted audience, have made a practice of churning out their dross, Jack the Ripper went with a whimper rather than a bang. Jones and Lloyd turned their six scripts into book form, and The Ripper File was published in March 1975. But still the Freemasons idea was separate from the Sickert narrative, and it was no more deeply investigated than it had been on television.

Walter Sickert's assertion that the murders were masterminded by a group of extremist Freemasons and perpetrated according to Masonic ritual is in fact a sensational idea. If true, it would knock eighty-five years of theories out of joint. Like the rest of the Sickert story, however, it took the form of a bald statement, and the painter produced no shred of evidence in its support. If Sickert had been lying this one statement would have been his undoing. But, unsubstantiated as the idea was, it became the strongest proof in the investigation so far that he had spoken the truth. The evidence produced by Ian Sharp and myself shows that the murders were indeed Masonic. Once again, a single truth seems to wreck all other theories about the murders, for no previous suspect except Prince Eddy himself was a Mason. And the case against Eddy, as has been explained, was quite without foundation.

Researching the mysteries of Freemasonry is an exacting and difficult task, but it is possible. There have been enough reliable exposures of the secret brotherhood to enable a conscientious researcher to build up a clear picture of its activities. Before examining the undeniable connections between Masonry and Jack the Ripper, it is helpful to know something of the background and nature of Freemasonry.

It is a worldwide secret society which originated in England in the Middle Ages. It developed alongside several other guilds or incorporated crafts. The dearth of highly skilled craftsmen in the building industry imposed upon stonemasons in particular a need to move about the country in order to earn a living. Masons had to go where the work was. They travelled from place to place to assist in building the magnificent cathedrals and abbeys whose advent closed the door on the Dark Ages. Their craft was jealously guarded against interlopers. Apprenticeships were hard to obtain, and rigorous when achieved. Masons rapidly came to realize that the itinerant nature of their livelihood made them particularly vulnerable, and to protect themselves from exploitation they formed themselves into a sort of primitive trade union. It was a time when a number of professions were setting up guilds, and like the real trade-unions five hundred years later, none of them was national. Each guild was limited to a city or borough, and the stonemasons organized themselves at a local level into 'Lodges'. An idiosyncrasy of the masons which had an important effect on their evolution was that employers as well as employees were granted membership of the Lodges. Because the masons were migratory a greater degree of national unity was achieved within their guild than in those of other professions. This ensured greater uniformity in working conditions between one district and another, and as the strength of the masons grew in comparison to other professions, so did their determination to remain dominant. Because a mason could not work all his life in one place, and because each Lodge was constantly welcoming masons from other areas, the esoteric aspect of the craft was developed. Lodges all over the country agreed to adopt secret signs, passwords and handshakes so that a mason coming to a strange place could be recognized by his brothers as a genuine craftsman.

As the centuries passed the free and accepted masons, or freestone masons, evolved from a guild into a social organization. Lodges were set up abroad, notably in France. Eventually representatives of other skilled professions, and later still senior members of any middle and upper class professions, were permitted into the fraternity. By the eighteenth century Freemasons were, in practice, linked to their skilled predecessors only in name and in the form of their ritual. They had become a quasi-religious secret society, membership of which was extremely difficult to achieve, and highly desired by those who could not gain admittance. Brothers helped each other in business and on the social ladder. In many professions it became common for a Freemason to be given promotion purely because he was a Mason. The practice survives today.

Imagination and myth had by this time insinuated themselves deeply into the society's everyday working, and its actual origins became obscured by a fabulous tale of a heroic birth thousands of years before. Freemasonry's beginnings are now variously attributed by initiates to the days of the Roman Empire, to the Pharaohs, the Temple of Solomon, the Tower of Babel and even to the building of Noah's Ark. Of all the myths woven into the background of Freemasonry, the building of Solomon's Temple is the most sacred. On that great event much of Masonry's secret ritual is based.

In its own words Freemasonry is 'a peculiar system of morality, veiled in allegory and illustrated by symbols'. It proclaims itself as an organization founded on the practice of social and moral virtue.

Even though an initiate is bound by an oath of secrecy that imposes death on the betrayer, in its lower degrees Freemasonry is arguably quite respectable. It must be admitted that Masons as a body are among the most generous donors to charity. Several writers have claimed that one cannot be both a Freemason and a Christian, and until 1975 a Roman Catholic suffered excommunication for joining the fraternity because the Vatican proscribed Freemasonry and regarded it as 'subversive and anti-clerical'. Now, under certain circumstances, it is possible for a Catholic to obtain permission from his bishop to become a Mason, although Catholics in general still eye the brotherhood with deep suspicion. Despite this, it is not until a Mason is initiated into the higher degrees that he becomes truly pagan.

As Masons progress into higher degrees, their god undergoes a basic alteration. No one can become a Freemason unless he professes to believe in one Supreme Being. Freemasons call him the Great Architect, who created the universe with one sweep of his compasses. Combined as he is in the early degrees with an oath to honour the precepts of the Bible, this god is the benevolent counterpart of Jahweh and Allah; under any name he is the god of love, the Almighty Father. Degree by degree the personality of this godhead changes imperceptibly, until in the highest degrees the strange god of the Freemasons is revealed as Jah-Bul-On. This weird entity is a composite personality comprising Jahweh, the god of the Christians and Jews; Osiris, the mummy-like god of the dead in Ancient Egypt; and Baal, the pagan god whom the Israelites identified with the devil. Hence, while Masons will profess they worship only one god, they have attributed three personalities to that god, one of which is diabolical. While it is inaccurate to call advanced Freemasons devil-worshippers in a strict sense, they nevertheless accord this devil great importance in the governing of the universe, they treat him as an equal of the Christian God and they do pay him homage. This religious ambivalence was used against the Masons in the second part of the nineteenth century when Leo Taxil, a Frenchman since denounced as a liar, claimed to have definite proof of Masonic devil-worship. Whether or not Taxil's 'proof' was genuine, his claims were based on fact. Albert Pike, the great Masonic authority of the nineteenth century and Grand Commander of the Southern Jurisdiction of the Supreme Council at Charleston, USA, wrote in 1873 when he gained sufficient seniority to learn of Jah-Bul-On that he was disquieted and disgusted by it:

> No man or body of men can make me accept as a sacred word, as a symbol of the infinite and eternal Godhead, a mongrel word, in part composed of the name of an accursed and beastly heathen god, whose name has been for more than two thousand years an appelation of the Devil.

Yet this is exactly what advanced Freemasons are made to accept, and this is the deity they worship.

At the lowest degree, that of the Entered Apprentice, an initiate swears on pain of death and ghastly mutilation to obey not only the precepts of Freemasonry but also those of the Bible and the laws of the land in which his Lodge operates. The further he progresses through the hierarchy, the more the laws of the Bible and society are discarded and the more sacred become the laws of Masonry. Having passed what is known as the Royal Arch, a Mason owes allegiance only to his brother Masons.

An illustration of this progression from being a member of society to one independent of society's laws appears in the following. It is an extract from the oaths taken at two degrees, that of the Master Mason, the highest of the lower degrees, and that of the Royal Arch Mason, the first step in the long climb up to the ultimate degree, the thirty-third.

In a Master Mason's initiation ceremony he swears that the secrets of another Master Mason, 'given to me in charge as such, and I knowing them to be such, shall remain as secure and inviolable in my breast as in his own, when communicated to me, murder and treason excepted; and they left to my own election. . . . '

Thus, up to and including the degree of Master Mason, an initiate has the right to act as a normal responsible member of society and report to the authorities any Mason who may be engaged in murder or treason. But beyond the Royal Arch this is no longer true. In the initiation ceremony of a Royal Arch Mason he promises 'that a companion Royal Arch Mason's secrets, given me in charge as such, and I knowing them to be such, shall remain as secure and inviolable in my breast as in his own, murder and treason not excepted. . . . '

This fundamental change between the degrees alters a Mason's entire standing in society. Now he is accorded more immunity than a king or president. William Morgan, an American Mason who wrote a book called Freemasonry Exposed, published in 1826, declared:

> The oath taken by Royal Arch Masons does not except murder and treason; therefore, under it, all crimes can be perpetrated.

The full truth is more disturbing than this, for in the same oath the Royal Arch Mason swears > that I will aid and assist a companion Royal Arch Mason, when engaged in any difficulty, and espouse his cause, so far as to extricate him from same, if in my power, whether he be right or wrong . . .

Thus, when a Freemason passes the Royal Arch he is not only prohibited on pain of death from exposing a fellow-Mason involved in treason or murder, he is also compelled to assist him in covering up his crimes.

Sir Charles Warren, Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police at the time of the Ripper murders, was one of the country's leading Freemasons. In 1861 he passed the Royal Arch, and from that moment on was under compulsion to assist any senior Mason in escaping punishment for the worst crimes he might have decided to commit. In the twenty-seven years between his passing the Royal Arch and the Whitechapel Murders, Warren became not only one of England's highest-ranking Masons, but one of the most powerful in the world. He was District Grand Master of the Eastern Archipelago; three Lodges in South Africa were named after him; and in England he was the founder of the Quatuor Coronati Lodge of Masonic Research and Past Grand Sojourner in the Supreme Grand Chapter.

Only his supremacy in Freemasonry explains his appointment as Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police in 1886, and also the mysterious fact that his dismal failure in that office, recognized by the Government, Press and public, was awarded not with disgrace but a knighthood. 'Thus', wrote Warren's grandson, Watkin Williams, > in receiving the decorations of G.C.M.G. and K.C.B. while still only a Regimental Lieutenant-Colonel, Warren established a record which was never before attained and can seldom since have been equalled, even during the days of the Great War.

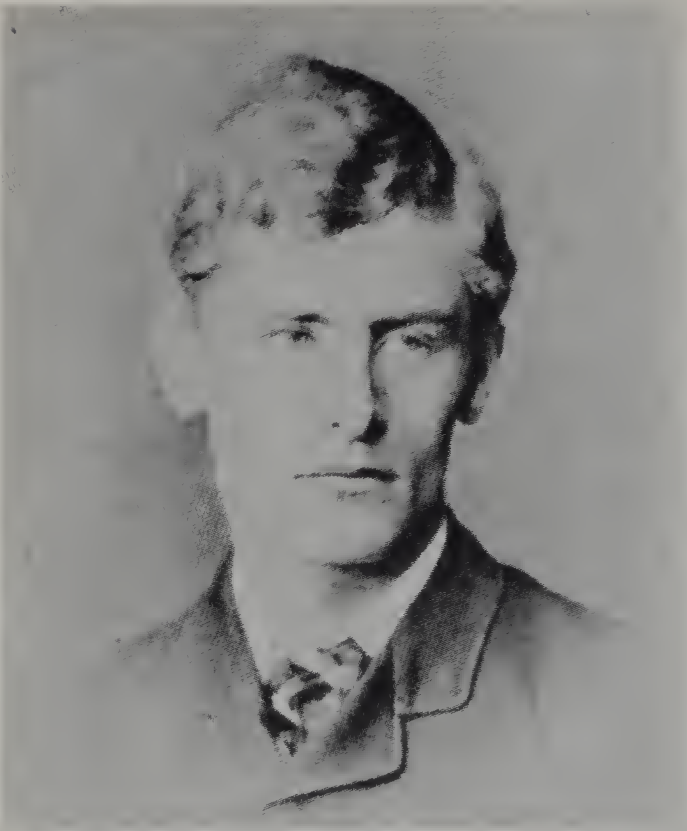
All that for being the worst police commissioner in the history of Scotland Yard!

But did Warren fail in his duty? Although from every normal viewpoint he did, there is just one way in which his apparent incompetence could have been a dramatic triumph worthy of a knighthood. If the Whitechapel Murders were committed according to Masonic ritual—and it will presently be shown that they were—then Warren served the Freemasons to perfection in concealing facts. In the light of the evidence contained in this chapter, it is even conceivable he was appointed Commissioner purely to assist in the cover-up of the murders. Several of his actions while in office support this suggestion. The first was that he forced non-Mason James Monro, head of the C.I.D., to resign just before the Whitechapel Murders began. The second was that he appointed high-ranking Mason Sir Robert Anderson as Monro's successor on the eve of Mary Nichols's murder. Anderson's strange behaviour on taking office, described fully in the final chapter, also supports this suggestion. The final act on Warren's part which suggests he was appointed purely to protect the Masons during the reign of Jack the Ripper was that he himself resigned and quickly disappeared from the scene only hours before the murder of Marie Kelly. He knew the final murder was imminent. His rapid departure from office certainly ensured that any clues that may have been left were cold before they could be followed up. For Warren did not pass on the message that he was resigning—and so his order that no one should enter the scene of any murder without his permission was not countermanded until the afternoon of the day Kelly died, or about three hours after the police arrived. From 10.45 in the morning until 1.30 in the afternoon the investigating officers kicked their heels outside Kelly's room, waiting for orders from Warren. The Commissioner's conduct during the murders, examined in detail later in this chapter, shows that his sole function was to operate a cover-up. After resigning as Commissioner, Warren threw himself full time into his Masonic activities.

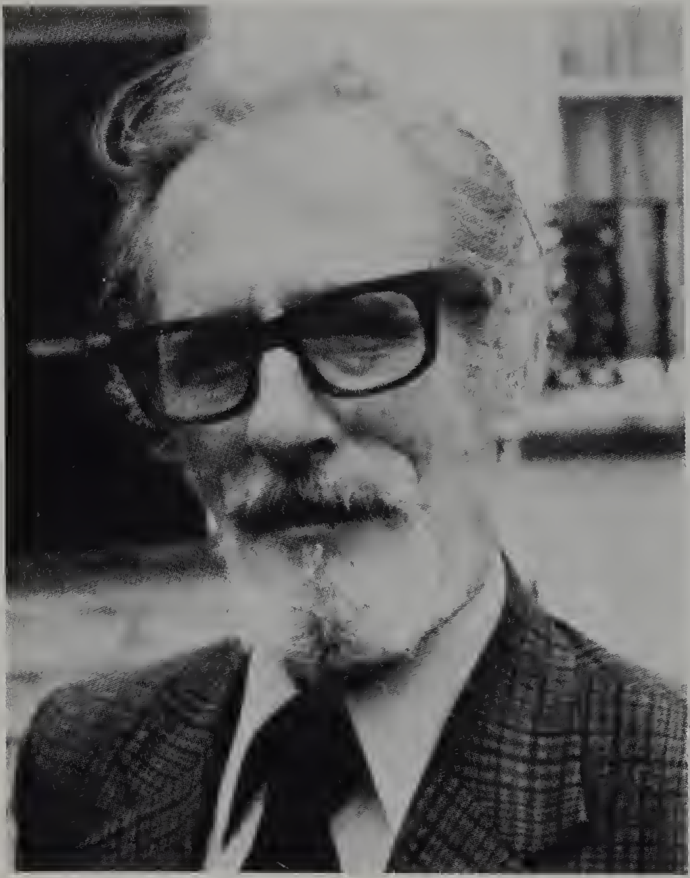
The Whitechapel Murders are not the first killings to have been attributed to Freemasons. There is evidence to suggest that Mozart was poisoned, and several scholars believe Masons were responsible. Mozart was a Freemason, as were most of the Austrian courtiers in the latter part of the eighteenth century. It is known that Vienna's highest Masons were angry at Mozart leaving the brotherhood in his last years. And they were outraged over what they regarded as a betrayal of their secrets in The Magic Flute. There was certainly something suspicious about the composer's death. Although a post-mortem examination is supposed to have revealed no traces of poison, it was reported that the body swelled up after death, which gave rise to speculation about foul play. To this day no one knows where Mozart's body was buried. He was to have been interred in the cemetery of St Marx, outside the walls of Vienna. Unaccountably, the small group of friends who had attended the funeral service turned back at the city gates and did not accompany the body to the graveyard. They all said later that their reason for turning back was that there had been rain and snow. But records at the Vienna Observatory show the day was dry, calm and chilly. And there is no trace of Mozart's grave in the cemetery.

Probably the most notorious murder laid at the door of the Masons was the mysterious slaying of William Morgan, author of Freemasonry Exposed. After desperate attempts by Masons to

The 'Bloody Sunday' riot, Trafalgar Square, November 1887
Photo Radio Times Hulton Picture Library



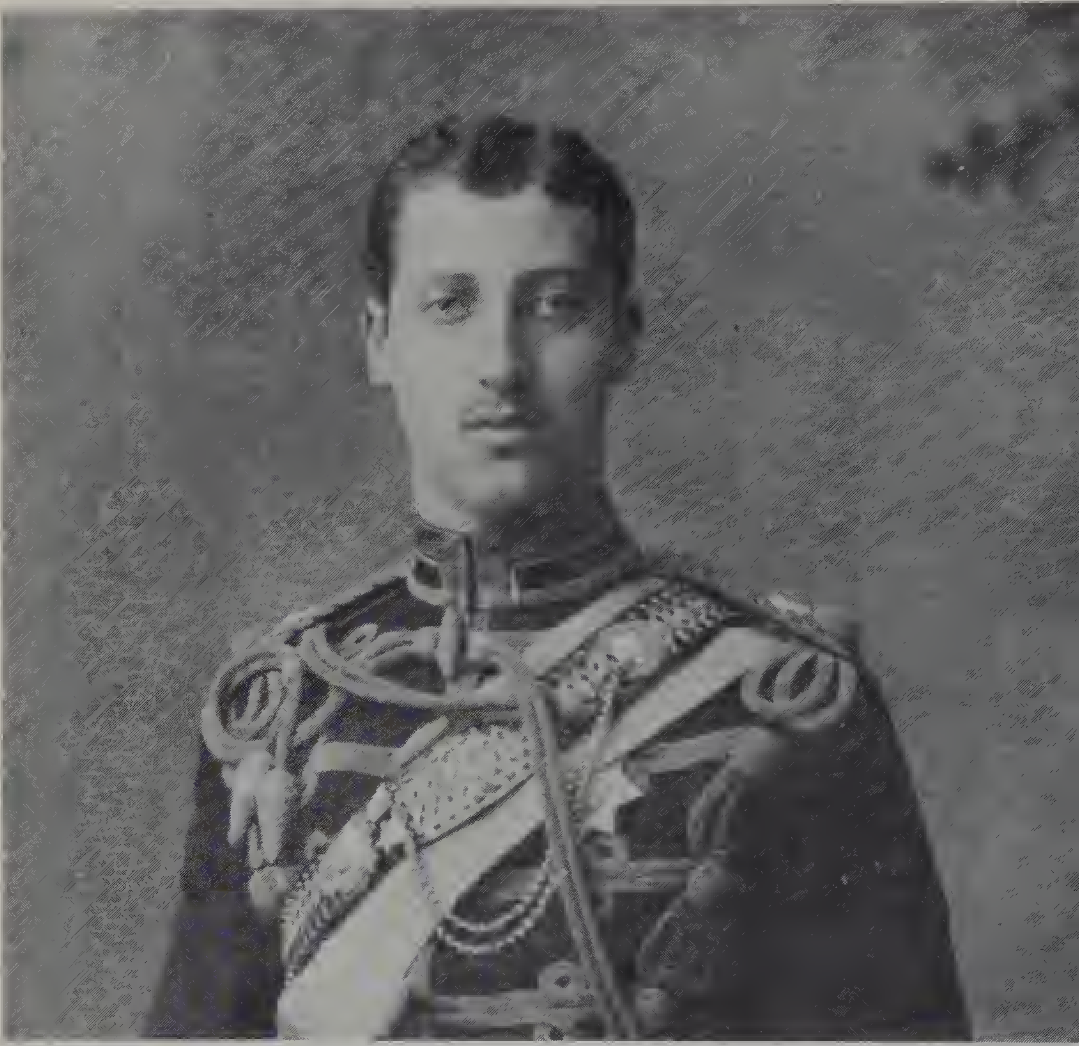
Walter Sickert in 1884



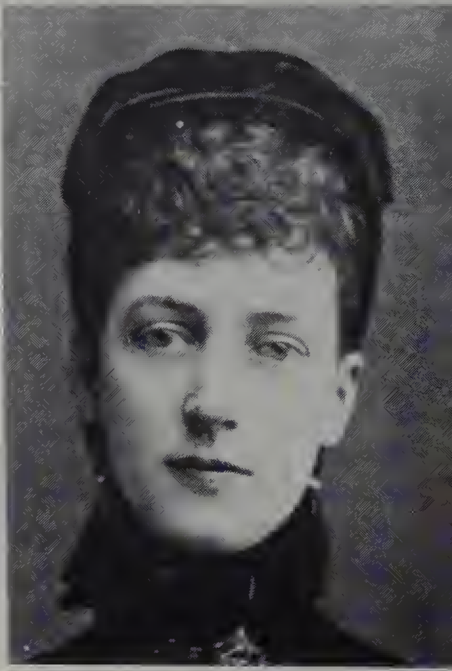
Joseph Sickert in 1973
Photo Harry Jackson

Walter Sickert and his third wife Thérèse Lessore in 1939, three years before he died

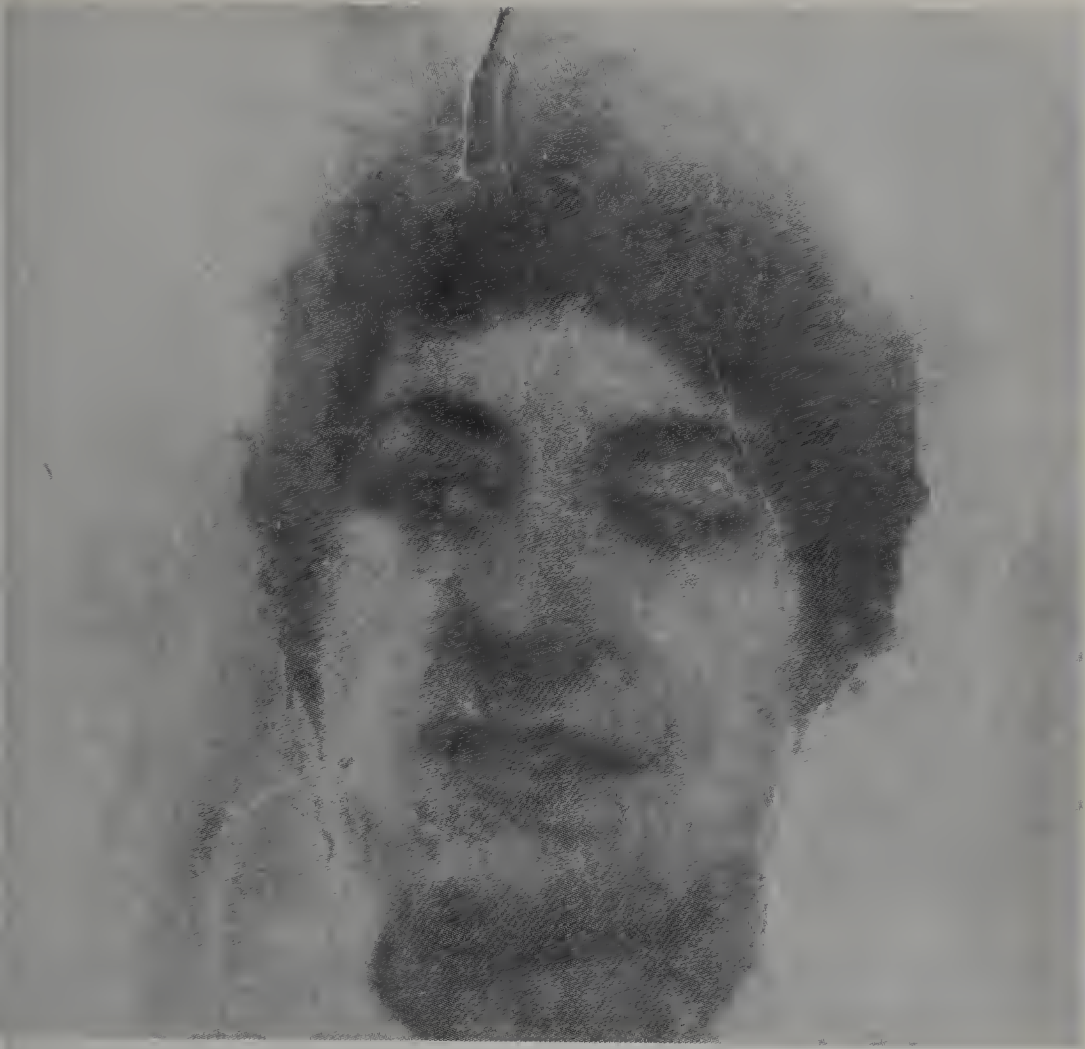
Photo Cecil Beaton



Prince Eddy about 1890
Photo Radio Times Hulton Picture Library

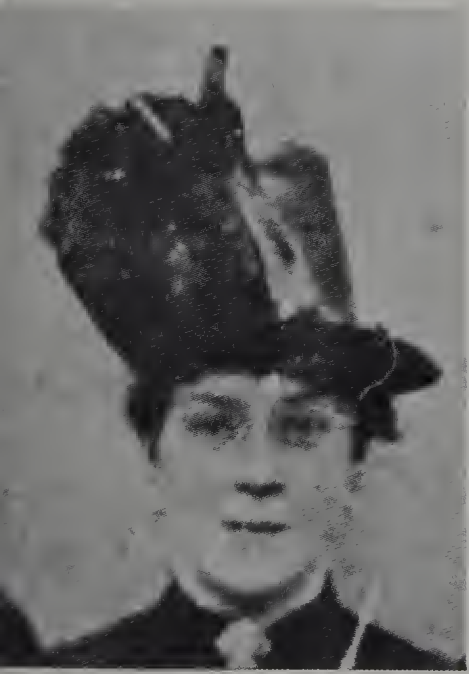


Is the facial resemblance between Princess Alexandra (right) and Alice Margaret Crook (far right) inherited?
See p. 41
Photo Radio Times Hulton Picture Library

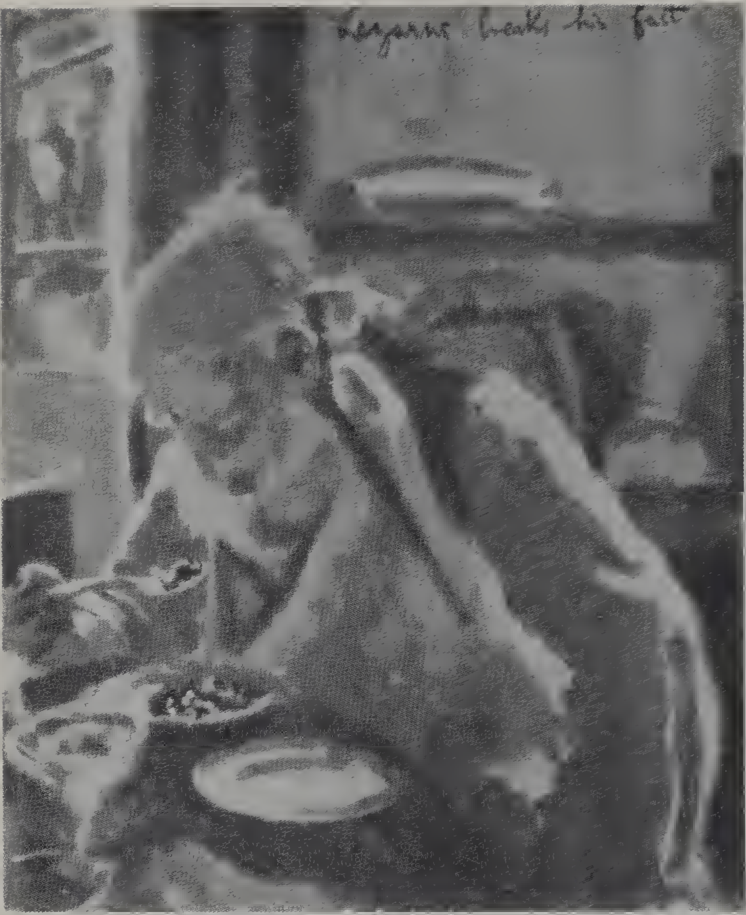


Annie Elizabeth Crook about 1886

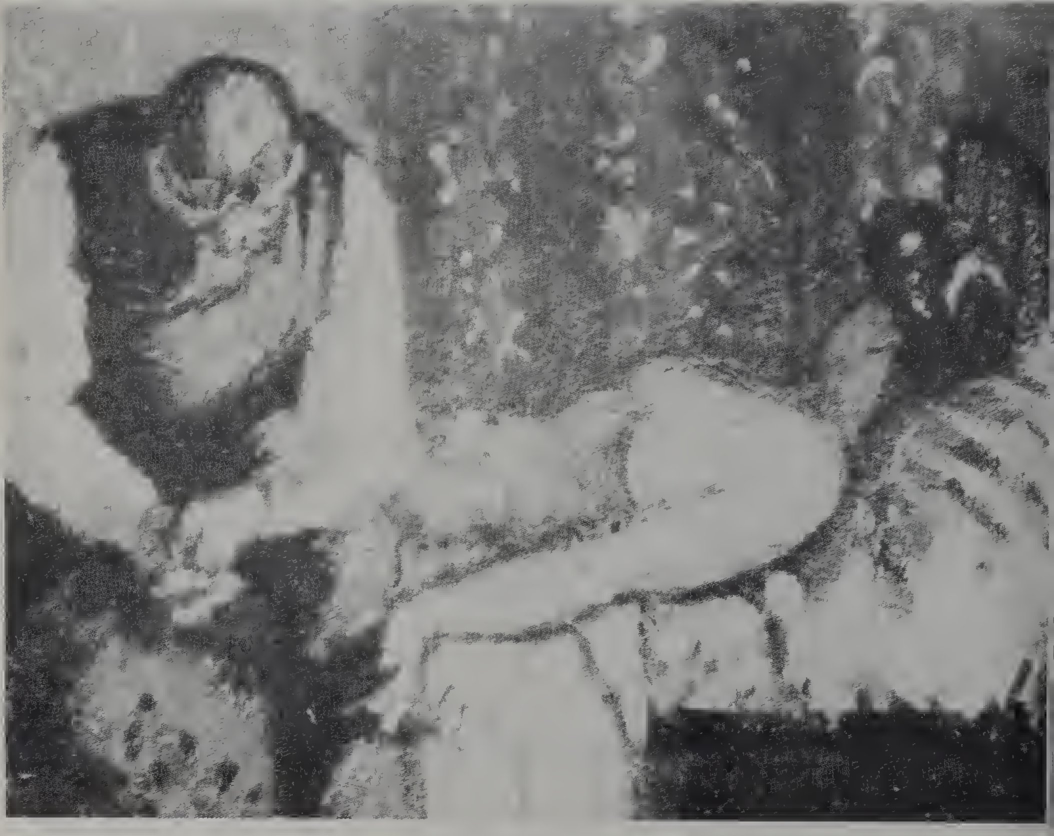
Sickert family photograph



Sickert family photograph



Lazarus breaks his fast



LEFT
Lazarus breaks His Fast
Reproduced by kind permission of Henry Lessore and Mr and Mrs Eric Estorick

Amphytrion, or X's
Affiliation Order
Reproduced by kind permission of Henry Lessore and Neville Clegg

LEFT
The Camden Town Murder
Reproduced by kind permission of Henry Lessore and Arthur
Tooth and Sons

Blackmail, or Mrs Barrett
Reproduced by kind permission of Henry Lessore and William Wallace

The Painter In His Studio (self-portrait)
Reproduced by kind permission of Henry Lessore

Ennui
Reproduced by kind permission of the Tate Gallery, London

La Hollandaise Reproduced by kind permission of Henry Lessore

The Scotland Yard photograph of the mutilated remains of Marie Kelly, referred to in the Macnaghten papers

RIGHT
The Reward of Cruelty, by William Hogarth
Reproduced by kind permission of the Trustees of the British Museum

Lord Salisbury

Photo Radio Times Hulton Picture Library

Sir William Gull Photo Radio Times Hulton Picture Library

Gull's grave at Thorpe-le-Soken

In Loving Memory of
WILLIAM WITHEY GULL WHO DIED
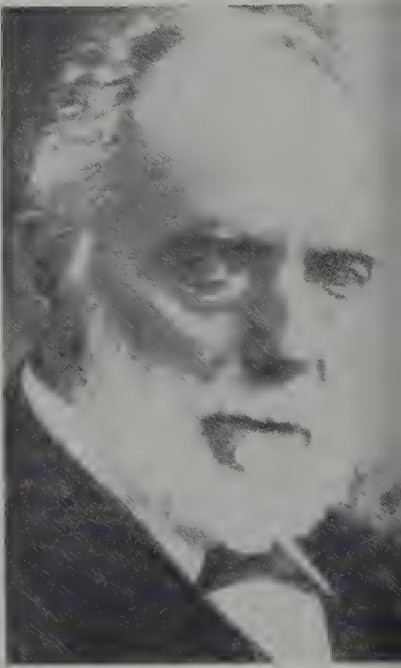
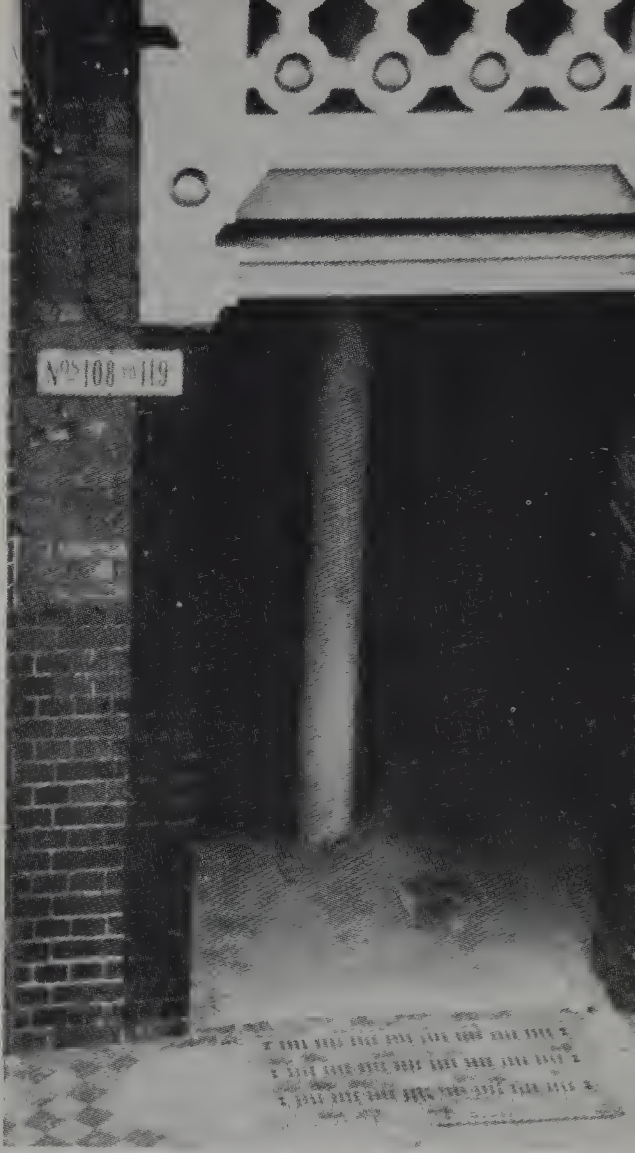
WHAT DOTH THE LORD REQUIRE

Sir Charles Warren



Robert James Lees at the age of eighty-one
Photo Psychic News

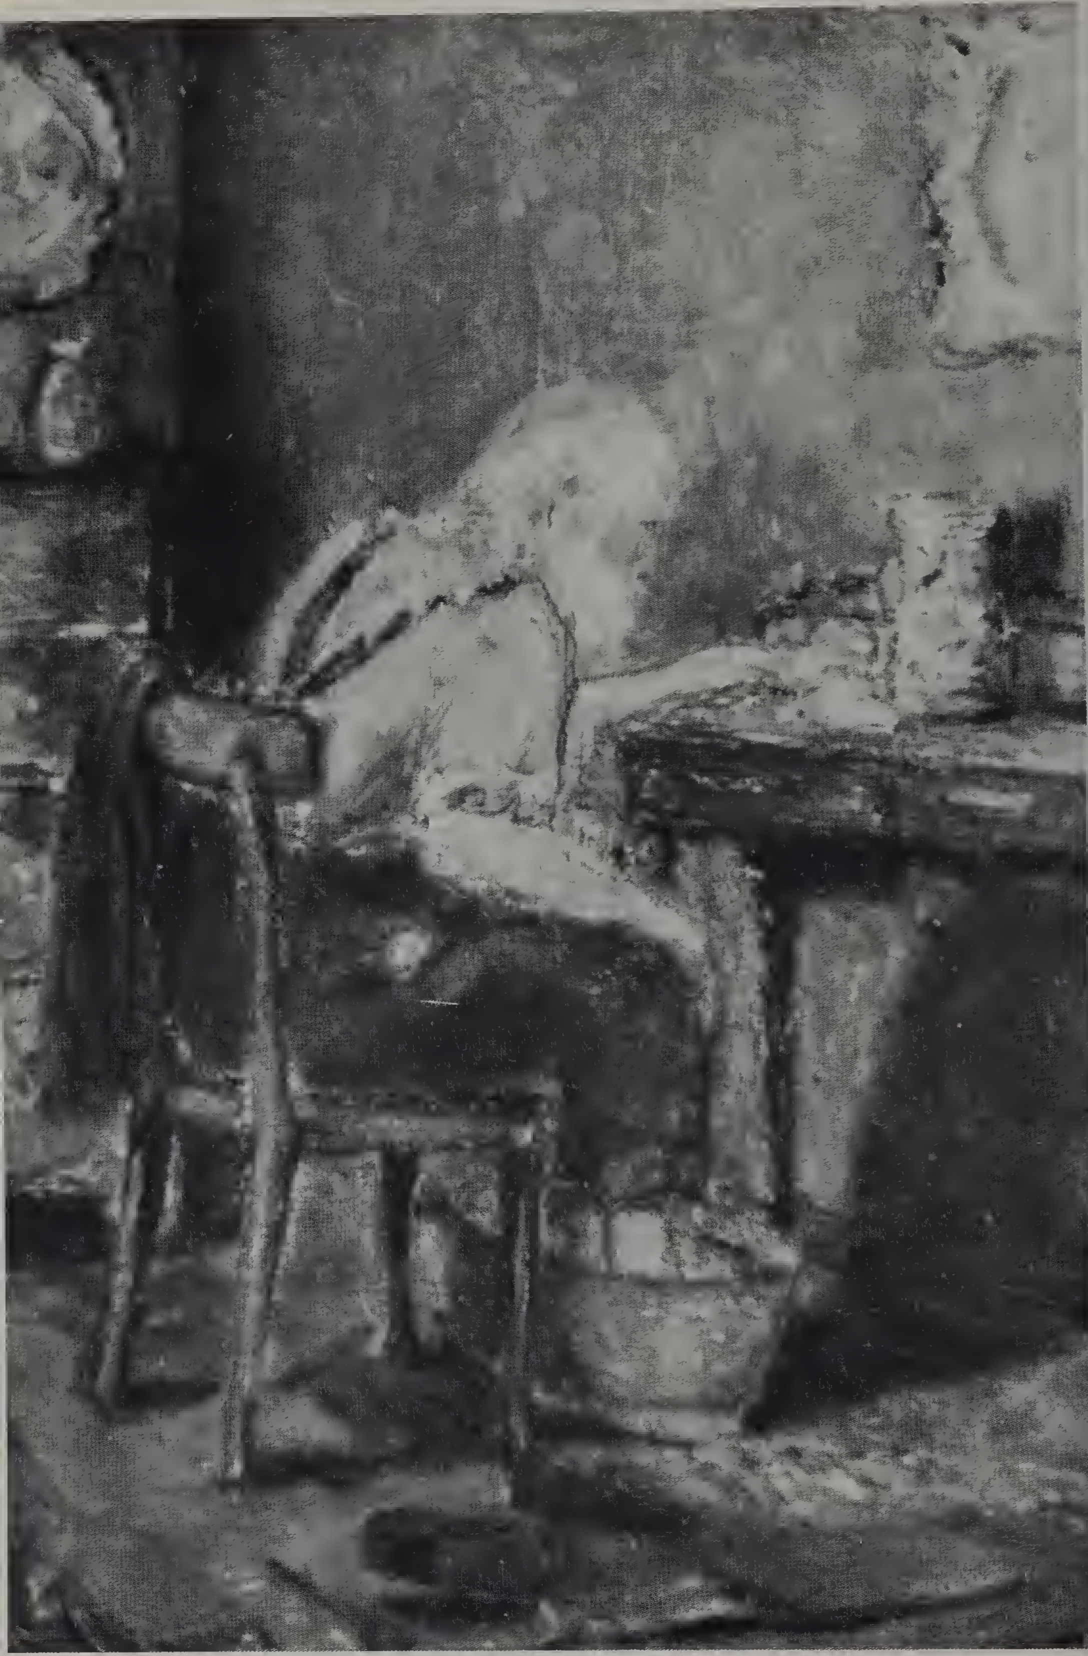
Sir Robert Anderson



Nos. 108 to 119 Wentworth Dwellings, Goulston Street—the scene of the writing on the wall. The writing was found just inside the doorway on the right-hand wall. Until 1975 Ripper experts had assumed this building had been demolished, as the writing had been wrongly reported to have been found at 'Peabody Buildings'. Richard Whittington-Egan discovered the true location during the research for his A Casebook on Jack the Ripper. No photograph of the building has previously been published
Photo Leonard Knight

GERIATRIC DEPARTM
THE MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL

Joseph Sickert pays a sad visit to the tobacconist's shop in Cleveland Street where the whole Ripper episode had its origins. The shop has since been taken over by the Middlesex Hospital prevent Morgan publishing his work—attempts which included imprisoning him on trumped-up charges (shades of Ernest Parke), his rooms being ransacked and papers stolen, and threats to his life by so-called pillars of society—Freemasonry Exposed was finally published. Morgan was soon after kidnapped and done to death, allegedly by Masons. The murder is shrouded in mystery and evidence was frantically covered up (!), but the nationwide outcry against Masons in America, and the rapid rise of a powerful Anti-Masonic Movement seems justified by the evidence of people involved with Morgan.
Photo Harry Jackson



An affectionate portrait of Walter Sickert painted by his son in 1975

Photo Leonard Knight

It is unlikely ever to be known for certain if these two murders were committed by Masons. All that is certain is that both men died untimely deaths, and both had earned the antipathy of the brotherhood. If they were Masonic murders Freemasons in general were not responsible. On each occasion (from what can be gathered so long after) it would have been the work of an extreme Lodge, or extreme members of several Lodges. Though neither crime would have been plotted with the consent of all Masons, every advanced initiate must share the blame. For every Mason who has passed the Royal Arch has willingly helped to create the perfect matrix for crimes of violence. His promise not only to condone but to assist in the concealment of murder, treason and any other crime has brought about the situation where murder can be committed and the murderers go for ever undetected.

The fog of secrecy which envelops Freemasonry makes it virtually impossible to divine any more than the day-to-day workings and the rituals of the society. But a translation of some original documents, allegedly stolen from one of the most influential and highly initiated leaders of Freemasonry in France at the turn of the century, gives an indication of the plans and ambitions of at least some of its leaders. The documents were gathered together and first published in England by Eyre and Spottiswoode in 1920. The so-called Protocols are explicit: absolute power is the ambition, at least of the Freemasons in the highest degrees, and nothing, not even human life, must stand in its way. It would be ludicrous to suggest that these documents show Freemasonry as a whole to be evil, or that Masons are all aiming to take over the world. It has been shown that in the lowest degrees Masons are, on the whole, ordinary law-abiding citizens who have no knowledge of the total allegiance and appalling demands made on initiates to higher degrees. But with such fanatical writings set down as 'protocols' by high Masons, it needs only an extreme or lunatic fringe to take them absolutely literally. Of all the hundreds of thousands of Freemasons in England in the 1880s, there were bound to be these lunatic fringes. And a peculiar sort of lunacy did inspire the Ripper killings. Here, then, are some of the Protocols:

> (1) Our motto must be "All means of force and hypocrisy".
> (2) Only sheer force is victorious in politics, especially if it is concealed in the talent indispensible for statesmen. Violence must be the principle, cunning and hypocrisy must be the rule of those governments which do not wish to lay down their crown at the feet of the agents of some new power.

The second protocol describes almost exactly the dilemma facing Salisbury with the misconduct of Eddy and the blackmail from Marie Kelly and her cronies. He was surrounded by 'the agents of some new power'—socialists, anarchists, republicans—and he dealt with the problem, said Sickert, in just the way prescribed in the protocol. Violence, indeed, became the principle, and cunning and hypocrisy coalesced in a near-perfect cover-up.

> (3) In order to obtain our ends we must have recourse to much slyness and artfulness.

Once again, so much slyness and artfulness has been brought into play on the murderous field of the Ripper that no one has been able to get near the truth working, as all previous investigators have, from the outside. It has taken Walter Sickert, reconnoitring from within the tangled web, to point the way and show that the spider at the centre is in reality a horde of tarantulas.

> (4) The main success in politics consists in the degree of secrecy employed in pursuing it. The action of a diplomat must not correspond with his words. To help our world-wide plan, which is nearing its desired end, we must influence the governments of the Gentiles [the Masonic term borrowed from Hebrew and used to mean non-Masonic] by so called public opinions, in reality pre-arranged by us by means of that greatest of all powers—the press, which, with a few insignificant exceptions not > worth taking into account, is entirely in our hands. Briefly, in order to demonstrate our enslavement of the Gentile governments in Europe, we will show our power to one of them by means of crimes of violence, that is to say by a reign of terror.

The documents containing the Protocols were stolen thirteen years after the Whitechapel Murders, but they were not new even in 1901. Had the reign of terror described in the fourth protocol already happened by the time the documents were stolen? Had it happened in Whitechapel in 1888? The effect Jack the Ripper had on the people of the East End, and indeed on the whole country, has been described with complete accuracy as a reign of terror. And it was brought about by crimes of violence. Was the murder of the five whores perpetrated not only for the motive of self-protection already described, but also to demonstrate the far-reaching power of Freemasonry to initiates the world over?

> (5) We must secure all instruments which our enemies might turn against us. We shall have recourse to the most intricate and complicated expressions of the dictionary of law in order to acquit ourselves in case we are forced to give decisions, which may seem overbold and unjust. For it will be important to express such decisions in so forcible a manner, that they should seem to the populace to be of the highest moral, equitable and just nature. Our government must be surrounded by all the powers of civilization among which it will have to act.

Freemasons are here seen to condone manipulation of the law in order to conceal their own unjust methods. Precisely this attitude on the part of Salisbury and his colleagues made it possible for the blatantly illegal inquest on Marie Kelly to be accepted, and for the perversion of justice concerning the Cleveland Street brothel case to be carried out.

> (6) In politics, governments and nations are satisfied by the showy side of everything; yes, and how should they have time to examine the inner side of things when their representatives only think of amusements? The nation holds the power of a political genius in special respect and endures all its high-handed actions, and thus regards them: "What a dirty trick, but how skilfully executed!" "What a swindle, but how well and with what courage it has been done!"

Here the Freemasonic code applauds the fraudulent and the illegal, providing they are accompanied by guile or audacity, as were the Ripper crimes.

> (7) It is necessary for us to acquire the services of bold and daring agents, who will be able to overcome all obstacles in the way of our progress.

Once more the accent is on the bold and daring, qualities which summarize the Ripper's style and astounded all who heard about the crimes.

> (8) The services of the police are of extreme importance to us, as they are able to throw a screen over our enterprises, invent reasonable explanations for discontent among the masses, as well as punish those who refuse to submit.

Tom Cullen, the BBC researchers and I all arrived at the conclusion that the police had hidden the truth. Sir Charles Warren, described in his biography as a zealous Mason, unquestionably threw a screen over the Masons by erasing the writing on the wall found after the murder of Eddowes, and he invented a reasonable explanation for his *un*reasonable behaviour.

> (9) The grandness of our might will require that suitable punishments should be awarded, that is to say, that they should be harsh even in the case of the smallest attempt to violate the prestige of our authority for the sake of personal gain.

This instruction might have been an exact description of the events in Sickert's story. Kelly and the other whores were operating some sort of blackmail (an 'attempt to violate the prestige of our authority for the sake of personal gain'), and they were indeed harshly punished. Freemasonry also dictates that in certain circumstances a Mason will be buried twice, and that he will die by his own greatest achievement. As will be shown in the next two chapters, this is what happened to two of the men named by Sickert as the Rippers.

The translator of the Protocols claimed they were in the form of minutes which were removed from a large book of notes for lectures. They were signed by Freemasons of the highest rank, the thirty-third degree. Their contents can be misleading. If we dismiss the idea that they are the code by which all Freemasons live (and in all honesty we must dismiss that idea; most Masons do not progress beyond the third degree[1]), we must accept that they were written for a purpose. And even if the writers were themselves insane, they were of such insuperable seniority within the fraternity that some Masons somewhere were bound to be influenced by them.

We learn that Freemasons applaud violence, terror and crime providing it is carried out in a crafty manner. One section of the notes says humour is all-important and the most appalling crimes may be committed under its cloak. The one Ripper letter likely to have been genuine suggests that Jack the Ripper was going about his crimes in just this way, committing ghoulish murders with a Puckish sense of fun. If Masonic supremacy appears in jeopardy, it is re-established by a show of strength, by crimes of violence, perpetrated to demonstrate the continuing power of Freemasons for the benefit of brothers abroad. If the strength of Masons high in the Government was being threatened by the self-interest of Marie Kelly, it is consistent with the Protocols that crimes of violence would have been committed to re-establish Masonic authority in the eyes of Masons everywhere. And Kelly and her confederates would have received the penalty meted out to those who betray the brotherhood. This is exactly what happened.

It is here that the three main aspects of Sickert's story—the knife-edged political situation, the behaviour of members of the Royal Family and the consequent fear of the Masons for their own survival—come together historically. Eddy's father, the Prince of Wales, was installed as Most Worshipful Grand Master of England on 28th April 1875. As the years passed and the political situation in England grew more dangerous to the established order, there is evidence to show that the Prince's Masonic brothers were becoming deeply concerned about his profligate life, which appeared to be growing worse rather than better.

---

[1] Initiates to the third degree are called Master Masons. The name conveys an idea of great seniority. Few Master Masons or Freemasons below the third degree realize that the so-called 'Masters' are no more than pawns in the hands of higher Masons. Fewer still have any idea that the third degree they regard as so advanced is in reality close to the bottom of the Masonic ladder, which stretches up to rarefied heights once a Mason passes the Royal Arch. The humble station of the Master can be judged by the exalted titles bestowed on initiates thirty degrees above him. The highest Masons, who arrogantly call themselves 'the grandest organization in the world', assume such pagan titles as Grand Inspector Inquisitor Commander, Sublime Prince of the Royal Secret and the patently blasphemous Prince of Jerusalem.

In 1881 the Prince received a letter signed 'A Freemason', but which appears rather to be the work of a representative body of Masons of the Grand Lodge. The letter contains a thinly disguised attack on his behaviour and a warning of the dangers he could bring upon the throne and his colleagues in the secret brotherhood. The letter—on the surface warm, friendly and full of admiration—is revealed as a bitterly sarcastic indictment when viewed in the light of the Prince's character. The Prince of Wales's notorious conduct was known all over Europe and America, yet the letter from the Masons refers to his 'pure career' and 'sober and virtuous life'. It says in part:

> In writing, dear brother, I do not address you as a Prince of Wales, for some of our Princes of Wales have been drunken, riotous spendthrifts, covered in debt, and deep in dishonour [a perfect description of Bertie]; but you, dear brother, instead of being such a one, figure more reputably as the erudite member of a Royal Geographical Society, or as a steady fellow of the Worshipful Company of Fishmongers . . .
>
> If Junius[1] were alive today, his pen would not dare to repeat its fierce attack on another Prince of Wales. Junius charged George, Prince of Wales, with quitting the arms of his wife for the endearments of a wanton, with toying away the night in debauchery, and with mocking the sorrows of the people with an ostentatious prodigality. But your pure career, your sober and virtuous life, would win laudations even from Junius's ghost. You are an English gentleman, as well as Prince of Wales; a good and kind husband in spite of being Prince of Wales; with you woman's honour is safe from attack, and sure of protection. The draggled and vice-stained plumes of your predecessors' escutcheons have been well cleaned and straightened by modern journalism, and the Prince of Wales' feathers are no longer (like the Bourbon fleur de lis) the heraldic ornament of a race of princes sans foi, sans moeurs.

The irony is poisonous. If there was one quality of Bertie's which was beyond doubt it was that no woman's honour was safe from his attack. If he had only one unfailing habit, it was quitting the arms of his wife for the endearments of a wanton. Every intelligent person in the land knew of his debauchery. As the sarcasm continued undiluted, the letter took on a warning tone and went on to underline the fact that Freemasonry was more powerful than princes:

---

[1] Junius was the writer of a series of anonymous letters published in Woodfall's Public Advertiser in London between January 1769 and January 1772. He is generally thought to have been Sir Philip Francis (1740–1818).

> Fit were you as profane to make the journeys to the Altar, for fame writes you as sober and chaste, as high-minded and generous, as kind-hearted and truthful. These are the qualities, oh Albert Edward, which hid your disability as Prince, when you knelt bare-kneed in our audience chamber. The brethren who opened your eyes to the light [a reference to the blindfold with which an initiate is 'hoodwinked'], overlooked your title as Prince of Wales in favour of your already famous manhood. Your career is a pleasant contrast to that of George Prince of Wales. Yet because you are as different from the princes whose bodies are dust, while their memories still remain to the historian as visible monuments of shame, I write to you, not as an English Prince, but as brother Master Mason . . .
>
> I do not indeed regard your title of Duke at all in writing to you, for when we find a Duke of Newcastle's property in the hands of Sheriff's Officers, his title a jest for bankruptcy messengers, and the Duke of Hamilton's name an European byword, it is pleasant to be able to think that the Duke of Cornwall and Rothesay [one of Bertie's many titles] is not as these Dukes are; that this Duke is not a runner after painted donzels, that he has not written cuckold on the forehead of a dozen husbands, that he is not deep in debt, has not, like these Dukes, scattered gold in filthy gutters, while deaf to the honest claims of justice.

My italics in this passage indicate the most bitter pieces of sarcasm, for the words used ostensibly to praise Bertie best describe his debaucheries. Then comes the unmistakable warning to change his ways, or else:

> We know, brother, that you would never have voluntarily enrolled yourself in the world's grandest organization, if you had been as these. It would have been perjury if you had done so—perjury which, though imperially honoured at the Tuileries, would be scouted with contempt by a Lancashire workman.

The Prince knew that the greatest threat to the established order, and hence the Masons, was the ordinary working man, whom he was constantly alienating by his anti-social behaviour, and whose consequent resentment was being whipped into hatred by the republicans.

> I write to you as a fellow Master Mason, as to one on an equality with myself, so long as you are true to your Masonic pledge, less than myself whenever you forget it. I address this epistle to you as a fellow-member of a body which teaches that man is higher than king; that humanity is beyond church and creed; that true thought is nobler than blind faith, and that virile, earnest effort is better far than dead or submissive serfdom.
>
> . . . You have joined yourself to the Freemasons at the right moment, for true Freemasonry is about to be more powerful than Royalty. . . . In England, even at this hour, we are—if the organs of blood and culture speak truly—very near forgetting the use of a Queen. . . .

The anonymous writers went on to draw the future king's attention to the Royal Families of Europe so recently overthrown, and to warn him against a similar fate. Throughout the letter, cloaked in the transparent guise of gushing bonhomie, one feeling comes through clearly: the Prince of Wales must cease his dissipated life or the throne will topple, and that poses a threat to the Masons which cannot be countenanced.

Now to the specific connections between Jack the Ripper and Freemasonry. Masonry is based on a peculiar system of ritual and allegory, and at each degree, in addition to bloody, pagan oaths, an initiate is made to perform certain mimes which represent the penalty he is to pay should his oath be betrayed.

In the lowest degree, that of the Entered Apprentice, part of the penalty for revealing Masonic secrets is to have the throat cut from left to right. The 'penal sign' of the Entered Apprentice has thus become a left-to-right movement of the hand across the throat. It has been general knowledge for years that four of the five Ripper victims had their throats cut in just this way. Unfortunately, since 1939 when William Stewart's Jack the Ripper: A New Theory appeared, the facts about Elizabeth Stride have been somewhat confused. Stewart believed there were only four Ripper murders, and somehow he made the mistake that Stride's throat was cut in the opposite direction to the wounds inflicted on Nichols, Chapman, Eddowes and Kelly.

He wrote:

> In each of the Ripper murders the victim was killed by the throat being cut from left to right. This characteristic alone marked the murder of Elizabeth Stride as not being the work of Jack the Ripper.

It is hard to explain how Stewart reached this conclusion, but he was wrong. Two statements in the Scotland Yard file show conclusively that Stride's throat was cut from left to right, just like the other victims, and in the precise manner of the Entered Apprentice Freemason.

The first statement is by Dr Bagster Phillips, who examined Stride's corpse. He said:

> I affirm that she was seized by the shoulders, placed on the ground, and that the perpetrator of the deed was on her right side when he inflicted the cut. I am of opinion that the cut was made from the left to the right of the deceased.

The second and more exhaustive of the two reports is in fact only a copy of a four-page medical report in the Home Office file. The document was written by Dr Thomas Bond, consulting surgeon to the Metropolitan Police's 'A' Division, who performed a post-mortem examination on Kelly's body. It was one of the many pieces of evidence suppressed at Kelly's inquest. In the report, Bond referred to the previous murders. He was including Stride when he stated that

> In the first four [murders] the throats appear to have been cut from left to right.

Thus the first Masonic parallel is noted: all Jack the Ripper's victims were dispatched according to an age-old Masonic ritual.

Another important statement in the Yard file, the contents of which have never been released, is the assertion by Dr Ralph Llewellyn, who examined the body of Nichols, that her throat had been cut after the mutilations to the abdomen. This would be fairly easy for a doctor to determine. Llewellyn's statement raises one vital question. If the severing of the carotid artery was not performed to kill the victim, what possible reason could there have been for inflicting the wound? It is surely inescapable that Nichols's throat wound was inflicted purely for a symbolic purpose. In The Complete Jack the Ripper, Donald Rumbelow put a convincing case for the Ripper victims having been strangled and then mutilated after death. Rumbelow's evidence strengthens the view that the cutting of the throats was for no practical purpose. It is surely significant that the act is such a sacred part of Freemasonic ritual.

In addition, the subsequent mutilations to the victims' bodies were carried out according to Masonic tradition. It is not disputed that these injuries were also caused after death. We have exact details of only three of the five women's mutilations, Chapman, Eddowes and Kelly. The first victim, Nichols, was given no more than a cursory glance by Dr Llewellyn when she was first found, so there is no reliable description of the precise form her mutilations took. By the time Llewellyn examined her fully her body had been stripped and washed by mortuary assistants. Stride's corpse escaped with a slit throat before any mutilations were begun. But the injuries of all three women given the full treatment by the Ripper, and whose bodies were fully examined, bear striking similarities to each other—and extraordinary parallels with the ritual killings of Freemasonry. A contemporary report of Chapman's corpse said:

> The intestines, severed from their mesenteric attachments, had been lifted out of the body and placed on the shoulder of the corpse.

And Dr Frederick Brown said at the inquest on Eddowes:

> The abdomen was all exposed. The intestines were drawn out to a large extent and placed over the right shoulder. A piece of the intestine was quite detached from the body and placed between the left arm and the body.

Under questioning Dr Brown was quite definite on the point that the intestines had been placed on the shoulder 'by design'.

This was definitely Masonic. By far the greater part of Masonic ritual and allegory is based upon the mythical murder by three apprentice Masons, Jubela, Jubelo and Jubelum, of the Grand Master Hiram Abiff, in charge of building Solomon's Temple. Having murdered Hiram the apprentices fled, but they were discovered near the coast at Joppa and they were themselves murdered, > by the breast being torn open and the heart and vitals taken out and thrown over the left shoulder.

This has become the chief instruction for dealing with traitorous Master Masons. The description of Chapman's injuries was the section of his evidence which Dr Bagster Phillips tried desperately to suppress at the inquest (see pp. 108–10).

The incredible part about the Nichols murder was that it was not realized that she had been disembowelled until her body reached the mortuary. It appears that she was not so badly mutilated as the subsequent victims, but, if her vitals had not been thrown over her shoulder, she had certainly been 'torn open' in true Masonic style. And it is interesting that according to Dr Llewellyn, when she was found in Buck's Row her legs were both extended, as if she had been formally laid out.

The one inconsistency is that Masonic ritual specifies 'the left shoulders' and Eddowes's intestines were placed on her right shoulder. The discrepancy might be explained by the fact that Mitre Square, where Eddowes was found, was the most vulnerable of all the murder sites. She was butchered more elaborately than any of the other victims except Kelly, and in less time. The timing of the murder would have meant that not a second could be lost in depositing the body where it was found. In the hurry to arrange the body in a Masonic way it is possible that the point about which shoulder was overlooked. This is especially likely because, according to Sickert, Gull remained in the carriage and the actual arrangement of the corpse on the ground was undertaken according to Gull's instructions by Netley.

Dr Brown told the Eddowes inquest of another deliberate piece of mutilation: 'A triangular flap of skin had been reflected from each cheek . . . ' These two triangles have a precise Masonic relevance. The sacred sign of Masonry is two triangles, which represent the altar top of the Holy Royal Arch.

The similarities between the killing of Marie Kelly and a Masonic ritual murder are striking, as an engraving by William Hogarth shows. The Reward of Cruelty, the final stage of Hogarth's Four Stages of Cruelty series—ostensibly a caricature of the medical profession—in fact shows a Masonic ritual killing in progress, and bears an uncanny resemblance to the mutilation of Kelly. Hogarth was a Mason, and one of the first to expose the fraternity. There are Masonic symbols in many of his engravings, but this particular work was his most frank. Hogarth drew the Masonic parallel in this particular work by depicting the victim formally laid out on a dissecting table with a screw in his head supported by ropes and a pulley. This screw or drill is called a Lewis, and corresponds to the Lewis which supports two of the most important pieces of Masonic impedimenta, the rough ashlar and the perfect ashlar. Now compare Kelly's injuries, as described in The Times, with the fate of Hogarth's victim:

> The poor woman lay on her back entirely naked. . .

Hogarth's victim lies on his back entirely naked.

> Her throat had been cut from ear to ear, right back to the spinal column. . . .

Hogarth's victim has a Masonic 'cable tow' around his neck, which is clearly defined in Masonic ritual as representing the cutting of the throat.

> Her ears and nose had been cut off, and the face otherwise slashed until its features were completely obliterated. . . .

Hogarth's victim is in the process of being facially mutilated. One of the three Masonic killers in the picture is cutting at the eye with a surgeon's knife, which also corresponds to the Eddowes murder where the eyelids were slit.

> The stomach and abdomen had been ripped open. . . .

This is happening in Hogarth's picture.

> The lower portion of the body, including the uterus, had been cut out. . . .

The detail of the engraving is inadequate to tell whether any internal organs are missing (and, of course, a man has no uterus), but the lower portion of the body has definitely been cut out.

Kelly's heart was also cut out, and Hogarth's victim has suffered the same treatment. Finally, in one version of the engraving, the left hand of the victim lies across the left breast, in the same position as Kelly's. This is confirmed by a photograph of Kelly's body in the Yard file. The left arm of Annie Chapman, the only other murder where the killer had time to arrange the corpse as he chose, lay in the same position.

Elizabeth Stride's right arm lay across her breast. One final parallel between the Masonic murder depicted by Hogarth and the butchery of Kelly is that the final Ripper victim had her legs and feet skinned. One of the killers in the engraving is skinning the foot with a sharp scalpel.

Sickert said the murders were carried out by three people. Hogarth depicts three Masonic killers. Freemasons do in fact regard three as the perfect number, and Masonic mimed killings are traditionally carried out by three Masons, in memory of the sacred myth of Jubelo, Jubela and Jubelum. Three years after Kelly's death, in 1891, the Clarence and Avondale Lodge, named after Prince Eddy, was set up at the Masonic Hall at Leytonstone, close to where Kelly was buried.

Most writers have mentioned one curious detail of the murder of Annie Chapman, but it has never been properly explained. Some writers, like Farson who is confused by it, have made no attempt to explain it. Others do not even mention it, and others still, like Stewart, claim implausibly that it had no significance. Farson's feeling about the detail was close to the truth. He wrote:

> Even more bewildering was a curious detail that seems inexplicable, though I cannot help feeling that it has significance: two brass rings, two new farthings, and a few coins were laid out neatly around the feet of the corpse.

Farson was correct in attaching significance to the act, but beyond this brief mention he said no more. The act of placing brass rings and the other items by the body was Masonic, an act of twisted symbolism. Brass is the sacred metal of the Masons because Hiram Abiff was a worker in brass. He supervised the moulding of the two great hollow brass pillars which stood at the entrance to Solomon's Temple, and which have become the symbol of Freemasonry. Two brass rings side by side look exactly like two hollow brass pillars in cross-section. The other more obvious Masonic aspect of the episode is that before a Mason is initiated to any degree he is divested of all metals such as coins and rings.

Here, once more, the cover-up rears its head. The rings were removed shortly after Chapman's body was found, and Coroner Wynne Baxter was told they had been stolen by the killer. This is another point which seems to have escaped previous writers on the Ripper. On page 61 of his book,

Rumbelow wrote:

> As if he was taking part in some elaborate ritual the killer had laid the two rings he had torn from her fingers, some pennies and two new farthings at the woman's feet.

Yet eleven pages later, in summarizing the words of Coroner Baxter at Chapman's inquest, he wrote:

> Two things were missing from the body, he said. Chapman's rings, which had not been found, and the uterus, which had been taken from the abdomen.

These two statements are at variance, yet no writer has so far mentioned the inconsistency, let alone explained it. The first question is, were the rings in reality arranged with the coins at Chapman's feet or was the first statement mistaken?

There was no mistake, as statements in the Press at the time of the murder confirm. The rings and coins were seen and noted by several journalists. The strongest support of this is that they were observed by the first journalist at the scene of the murder, Oswald Allen. In a report that appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette only hours after the murder was discovered, Allen wrote:

> A curious feature of this crime is the murderer had pulled off some brass rings which the victim had been wearing and these, together with some trumpery articles which had been taken from her pockets, were placed carefully at the victim's feet.

How can the subsequent disappearance of these items be explained? The first person on the scene after the police and journalists was Dr Phillips, already shown in Chapter 8 to have been involved in the cover-up. He was eager at the Chapman inquest to conceal the Masonic nature of her injuries. He is the most likely person to have been responsible for eliminating the clue of the brass rings.

Hours after the Chapman murder the Leather Apron rumour first swept London. It is now impossible to trace the actual source of this rumour, as it appears to have been generated spontaneously in several different places around the East End. Intriguingly enough, the most important Masonic vestment is the leather apron. This garment is actually made of lambskin, but Masons always refer to it as their 'leather apron'.

This striking connection between the Whitechapel Murders and the Masons brings us back to the slaughter of Catherine Eddowes in Mitre Square. For in this murder the apron once again appears to have significance. A portion of Eddowes’s apron was cut off by the murderer. It was not torn off in frenzy but removed with a clean cut, calmly and deliberately. Why? If the sole purpose of taking the piece of apron was to wipe blood from the Ripper’s hands or knife, what possible reason could he have had for taking up much valuable time cutting off a section of the garment? Other parts of her copious clothing would have presented a far easier and quicker way of cleaning himself, her voluminous petticoats for example. Once again, the practical explanation does not make sense. There was no practical reason for the act. Therefore we are left with the alternative, that the apron was cut off for a symbolic purpose, just like the cutting of the throats after death, the posthumous mutilations and the careful arrangement of items at Chapman’s feet.

There was even significance in the thirty-nine days that were allowed to elapse between the murder of Eddowes and that of Kelly. Thirty-nine is a meaningful number to Freemasons, arrived at by multiplying the ‘perfect’ number, three, by the favourite’, thirteen. In other words it is the ideal, the perfect number of favourites.

It was the audacious murder of Eddowes above all the others hat gave the Ripper a reputation for having supernatural powers. How could a man waylay Stride shortly before one o’clock, murder her, walk half a mile and find Eddowes, take her to Mitre Square, butcher her, arrange her body in the most meticulous manner and escape undetected, all in forty-five minutes? Sickert’s contention that Eddowes was picked up by he three killers in their carriage, murdered inside it and then placed in the square later, alone seems to answer the problem.

A counter to the carriage argument is that the vehicle would have been heard. This is true, but hearing does not necessarily mean either noticing or remembering. In the early days of Ripper literature the suggestion was made that the murderer was an ‘invisible man’. This meant the sort of person whose presence in the streets would have been so commonplace he would not have been noticed. A policeman, for instance, would have been blotted from a person’s subconscious in this way. The same is true of the sound of a vehicle. Admittedly no one reported hearing a carriage pass the scene of any of the murders. This is because the sound of vehicles passing through the streets late at night was so common in the East End at that time, and so much a part of the general background of living, that no one would have noticed it. As the testimony of witnesses at several of the inquests showed, the streets at all hours of the day and night were bustling with cabs, delivery vehicles and the wagons of market workers and slaughterhouse employees. Buck's Row, where witnesses specifically mentioned they had heard nothing all night, was not only traversed throughout the night by noisy slaughterhouse wagons, it was also next to a railway line. None of these sounds registered in the minds of witnesses, and the noise from the wheels of Netley's coach would have been indistinguishable from the sound of a passing wagon.

Sickert's carriage notion provides a plausible explanation for another baffling aspect of the case, the seemingly inexplicable fact that the killer or killers commanded sufficient confidence in their victims for the women to go willingly with them. After the death of Chapman no tart, however down on her luck, would have gone into a dark square with a strange man. But when the nationwide hue and cry was after solitary Jack, the bestial lurker in the shadows, the last people to fall under suspicion would have been two gentlemen and their driver travelling through the East End in their carriage. The dialogue which would have snared little Eddowes and banished her fears can be imagined:

'Good night to you, madam. This is hardly the time or the place to be alone in these dark days. May we offer you a lift to your destination?'

The cockney tarts who haunted the twilight world of Whitechapel were rarely treated as human beings, let alone as ladies. The problem of tempting the victims inside the coach would have been easily overcome by appealing to their vanity and reminding them of the faceless terror that was stalking the night outside. It would have been a simple irony to convince the women that in entering the carriage they were finding safety from Jack the Ripper. The murders taking place in a vehicle alone explains why so little blood was found at the 'site' of each killing.

Mitre Square was in the wrong direction for Eddowes when she was released from Bishopsgate Police Station after sobering up. Her only reasonable destination at that time of night would have been her doss-house in Spitalfields. That she was planning to go to Spitalfields is confirmed by her own words as she left the police station. At the inquest jailer George Hutt told City Police solicitor Mr Crawford that as Eddowes left him she said, 'I shall get a damned fine hiding when I get home'.

CRAWFORD I gather from that you thought she was going home?
HUTT Yes.

That she eventually finished up in the opposite direction from the way she would have taken to Spitalfields is a good indication that she was taken to Mitre Square. But why? On the face of it, it was the last place a killer would choose. Rumbelow described the 'enormous risks' taken by the Ripper in performing his operation there:

> Mitre Square had three entrances—one from Mitre Street and passages from Duke Street and St James's Place. On two sides of the square there were warehouses, belonging to Kearley and Tonge, with a watchman on night duty. On the third side, opposite where the body was found, there were two old houses, one of which was unoccupied and the other lived in by a policeman. On the fourth side were three empty houses. Every fifteen minutes during the night the square was patrolled by a police constable: at 1.30 a.m. the square had been empty when he strolled through, at 1.45 a.m. he had found a body.

The Times thought that:

> The assassin, if not suffering from insanity, appears to be free from any fear of interruption while on his dreadful work.

Even though the murder did not take place in the square but inside the carriage, Mitre Square still presented an enormous risk during the few brief minutes Netley took to deposit the body. Why was it so essential a spot to lay Eddowes that all these risks were taken?

It will be remembered that according to Sickert the killers thought that in Eddowes they had found Marie Kelly. This was to have been the last murder, and consequently the most overtly Masonic. Mitre Square has strong Masonic significance. In fact it is fair to say it was the most Masonic of all places in London, except for the great hall of the Grand Lodge itself.

The square was literally riddled with Masonic connections. Its name, for a start, was entirely Masonic. Mitre and Square are the basic tools of the Freemason, and they play a large part in Masonic ritual and allegory. They were implements used by the original stonemasons, and in his initiation ceremony an Entered Apprentice is presented with the tools of a stonemason and told by the Master: 'These tools we apply to our morals'. In The Builders, A Story and Study of Masonry, Joseph Fort Newton described the Square as 'a symbol of truth'. The name Mitre Square first appeared in an Ordnance Survey map of 1840. It had been named after the Mitre Tavern, an important meeting-place for Masons in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

Two other important connections exist between Mitre Square and Freemasonry. It had been the scene of a murder in 1530 that in some respects paralleled the mythical murder of Hiram Abiff, the bedrock of so much of Masonry's allegory. Like the murder of Hiram, it took place in a hallowed place, for in the sixteenth century Mitre Square was the site of the Priory of the Holy Trinity. A woman was in the Priory praying at the high altar, just like Hiram in Solomon's Temple before his murder, when she was set upon by a mad monk. He did her to death and later killed himself, by plunging the knife into his own heart. The scene of the murder, the victim at prayer and the subsequent violent death of the killer all correspond to the mythical incident which is the hallowed core of Freemasonic tradition.

This peculiar holiness was consolidated two and a half centuries later when Mitre Square became the meeting-place of Masons belonging to Hiram's Lodge. So strong were its links with Masonry that it continued as the centre of a flourishing Masonic activity well into the nineteenth century. The Mitre Tavern, at the entrance to the square, became the meeting-place of two other Lodges, the Union Lodge and the Lodge of Joppa. The latter is once again closely related to the murder of Hiram, for it was near the coast at Joppa that the three apprentice Masons were found hiding. Evidence that Mitre Square was particularly sacred to Masons is found in the names of the Lodges which met there. Hiram's Lodge and the Lodge of Joppa are more closely bound up with the central theme of Masonry than any of the other Lodges around London in the 1800s. These lesser lodges included such names as the Ark Lodge and the Lodge of Prosperity. Only the most important Lodges met at Mitre Square. Apart from the brethren of Hiram's Lodge and the Lodge of Joppa, however, Mitre Square was still a hive of Masonic activity. A few yards away, the Tailor's Arms in Mitre Street was the rendezvous of the Lodge of Judah.

One of the country's chief Lodges, and almost certainly the one to which Sir William Gull belonged, was the Royal Alpha. It met almost entirely in the West End, and most notably at the King's Arms in Brook Street, Mayfair, close to Gull's residence at No. 74. The lodge had only two meeting-places outside the West End—Leadenhall Street and the Mitre Tavern, providing a direct link between Gull and Mitre Square.

The savage murder of 1530 might almost be considered a link between the killing of Hiram and the murder of Catherine Eddowes. For though the Masonic parallels in the first Mitre Square murder are strong, its details also resemble the fourth Ripper killing. In both cases it was a woman who fell victim to an apparently insane killer, and in both cases the victims were butchered with a knife. There are surely too many points of contact between the murder of Eddowes and the murder of the unknown woman in 1530, and between both these and the mythical murder of Hiram Abiff, for coincidence to be possible. It seems likely that Mitre Square became so sacred a place for Masons because of the 1530 outrage. It was no accident that the killers sheltering under the single identity of Jack the Ripper chose Mitre Square as the venue for their intended final victim's discovery.

Hanbury Street, where Chapman was found, was another important Masonic meeting-place. The Humber Lodge and the Lodge of Stability had met regularly at the Black Swan and the Weaver's Arms, both in Hanbury Street and one on either side of No. 29, where Chapman's body was found.

Finally, the most conclusive proof of all that the murders were Masonic is to be found in following the trail of that missing piece of Eddowes's apron. The cloth, soaked with blood, was found by P.C. Alfred Long, lying in the passage of Wentworth Dwellings, model dwellings in Goulston Street. These dwellings have been wrongly identified by previous authors as 'Peabody Buildings'. Above the cloth, on the wall of the passage, was a chalked message. Until now, the exact content of the message has not been known. The wording has been reported differently in almost every book on the Ripper. But the Private Letter Book of the Metropolitan Police, a collection of confidential letters now at the Public Record Office, contains the original copy of the message. A note from Sir Charles Warren to the Permanent Under-Secretary to the Home Office, Godfrey Lushington, says:

> I send you a copy of the writing on the wall at Goulston Street.

Attached to the letter is a document, photographic copies of which are contained in the Home Office file. It shows the exact wording and layout of the message, and there has been an obvious attempt to copy the handwriting style of the original:

> The Juwes are
> The men That
> Will not > be Blamed
> for nothing

Until the discovery of the writing on the wall, Sir Charles Warren had not ventured into the East End. The news of the message brought him scurrying from Whitehall as fast as a carriage could convey him. Major Smith of the City Police, never on the best of terms with Warren, had already decided to allow courtesy to go by the board. Hearing the news of the chalked message, he authorized Inspector McWilliam to send three officers to Goulston Street to photograph it. At last the Ripper had left a clue.

The murder had taken place just inside City Police territory, but the writing on the wall was within Warren's domain. When the City policemen appeared with their bulky photographic equipment Warren had already arrived. He forbade them to take any pictures, and proceeded with a course of action that has not been properly explained or justified. This was the only real clue ever left by Jack the Ripper. Yet Warren washed it away. He later gave the excuse that he had feared anti-Jewish riots would be sparked off by the reference to 'Juwes'. Even if this were true it does not explain why he would not allow the City men to photograph the message. The pictures could have provided vital evidence, and the writing could have been erased after being photographed. It does not explain why he did not accept the advice of several senior policemen at the scene and have just the word 'Juwes' erased. It does not explain why he did not merely have the message covered with a cloth. It was, after all, in the hallway of a building that could easily have been cordoned off.

What, then, was Warren trying to hide? What possible reason could he have had for so blatantly destroying evidence? The whole episode remains incongruous until we realize there is only one reason why a senior police officer would go to great lengths to defeat the ends of justice. That is when the officer owes allegiance to a master higher even than justice. It has been shown that Warren was one of the world's most advanced and powerful Freemasons. He had long since sworn to assist a fellow-Mason in murder or treason by concealing evidence. This is clearly what Warren was doing in Goulston Street. But what was it in that scrawled message that pointed the finger at a Freemason? The evidence lies in the word 'Juwes'. This was not, as Warren tried to convince critics, and many authors have subsequently averred, a misspelling of the word Jews. For the Juwes were the three apprentice Masons who killed Hiram Abiff and who are the basis of Masonic ritual.

It is impossible to find out if some of the lesser-known people in Sickert's story were Masons. The chief characters certainly were. Warren, Gull, Anderson and Salisbury were all well advanced on the Masonic ladder. Salisbury, whose father had been Vice Grand Master of All England, was so advanced that in 1873 a new Lodge was consecrated in his name. The Salisbury Lodge met at the premier Masonic venue in England, the Freemasons' Hall in Great Queen Street, London.

Can there be any doubt that the Ripper murders, the subsequent cover-up, and also the cover-up surrounding the Cleveland Street brothel case were carried out by a band of extremist Freemasons? Even Lord Euston, the prime mover in the last, brutal part of the Cleveland Street cover-up, was a prominent Mason. And despite the fact that he was known to be a frequenter of the homosexual brothel, his Masonic career flourished in the wake of the scandal. The moral virtue which Freemasons profess to hold sacred was clearly of little importance when Lord Euston was made Grand Master of the Mark Masons. But then his promotion was not in recognition of his morals. It was Masonic blood-money for the service he had rendered in silencing Ernest Parke.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

Sir William Gull

The reaction of most Ripper experts to Walter Sickert's account of the murders is unqualified disbelief. The general feeling was summed up by Colin Wilson, author of A Casebook of Murder, when he wrote after Joseph Sickert's television appearance, 'In my own view, it is the most unlikely story so far'.

Farson and Rumbelow have since made passing references to the broadcast in their books, and have dismissed it on the strength of one fundamental objection. Their main argument against the whole Sickert saga appears to be: Sir William Gull could not have been an active member of the Ripper party because in 1887 he suffered a stroke.

There is a great deal of evidence that vindicates Sickert's accusation of Gull. Before the positive side of the case is explained, however, the sole objection to Gull's participation in the murders can be proved groundless.

The statement which has given rise to the mistaken idea that Gull was little more than a cripple after 1887 is contained in the Dictionary of National Biography. The entry on Gull says in part:

> In the autumn of 1887 he was attacked with paralysis, which compelled him to retire from practice; a third attack caused his death on 29 Jan. 1890.

From this statement it appears impossible for Gull to have been one of the Ripper party, least of all the protagonist. But this reference to Gull's illness is an over-simplification, and other sources provide a more accurate account.

The truth is to be found in the words of Dr Thomas Stowell, who had his information from Gull's own daughter. He wrote that Gull had 'a slight stroke in 1887'. Just how slight that stroke was is shown in the following passage, taken from In Memoriam—Sir William Gull, an affectionate tribute to Gull that appeared shortly after his death:

> He was then [October 1887] at his home in Scotland, intending almost immediately to return to work after his autumn holiday, and while walking alone in the grounds was seized with paralysis. He did not lose consciousness, but fell on one knee and was able to walk to the house with assistance. [My italics]

This was hardly a serious attack, as the Dictionary of National Biography suggests. So mild was the so-called 'stroke' that Gull walked back to his house. Even though he ceased to attend patients in 1887, he still led an active life. His son-in-law, Theodore Dyke Acland, explained in William Withey Gull, A Biographical Sketch, that:

> Sir William took an important part in the public work of his day. From 1856 to 1889 he served on the Senate of the University of London. [My italics]

Gull religiously filled in the forms every year for his professional details to be recorded in the Medical Register. He last appeared in the Register in 1889, so at least until the end of 1888, when the 1889 edition was compiled, he regarded himself as an active medical man. Why then, if he was well enough right through to 1889 still to be serving on the Senate of the University of London, did he relinquish his practice in 1887? Events following Gull's illness are outlined in the 1892 edition of Wilks and Bettany's Biographical History of Guy's Hospital:

> Sir W. Gull had had two or three short illnesses before the one which was the commencement of his fatal malady, but at this time he was well and enjoying himself in Scotland, near Killiecrankie, when he was seized with slight paralysis on the right side and aphasia. This was in October 1887. He recovered in great measure and returned to London, where he remained for some months comparatively well. Friends who then saw him did not discern much difference in his > looks and manner, but he said he felt another man, and gave up his practice. He subsequently had three epileptiform attacks, from which he rapidly recovered, but on January 29th, 1890, he was suddenly seized with an apoplectic attack, fell into a state of coma, and gradually passed away. [My italics]

This passage emphasizes the slightness of Gull's 1887 attack. The observation by Wilks and Bettany that Gull's friends hardly noticed any difference in him after the 1887 'stroke' is another indication of its mildness. Could their statement that Gull 'said' he felt another man suggest he may have been misleading people into believing he was too ill to continue his practice?

The truth about Gull's 1887 illness was that he suffered slight paralysis, not even a stroke in the usual sense of the word. But even assuming his 1887 attack was a stroke as he insisted, it was of such a minor nature that it need hardly have affected his life at all. A stroke is a sudden loss of consciousness, the senses and voluntary motion, caused generally by the rupture of a blood-vessel in the brain. None of these symptoms were apparent in Gull. There are two types of stroke, major and minor. Dr Alan Barham Carter, an expert on this sort of illness and the author of All About Strokes, defines a minor stroke as occurring 'when the damage is small, limited in extent and often reversible so that death of the [brain] cells does not occur'.

Dr Barham Carter explained that a normally strong man can make a complete recovery even from a major stroke, in which brain cells are permanently destroyed. Gull was a more than normally strong man. He has been described by one writer as of medium height, but 'of great strength and vigour', and the Dictionary of National Biography pays tribute to his 'great powers of endurance'. It is surely not hard to accept that an attack as mild as that suffered by Gull would prove a negligible impediment in the life of a man of his exceptional strength. It is important to note that his constitution was not impaired by serious illness. All his life he was remarkably healthy, except for a single attack of enteric fever.

Had Farson and Rumbelow heard the full story they would never have raised Gull's illness as an objection to his taking part in the murders. Neither writer interviewed Joseph Sickert before publishing the criticisms which stemmed from Sickert's six-minute television narrative. With this in mind, they cannot be blamed for drawing the conclusions they did. Not only was a story that defied précis impossibly condensed so that vital details were lost, several aspects of the original account were actually distorted in the miniaturization process. Thus viewers heard:

> She [Marie Kelly] was killed as the last of five women in a way that made it look like the random work of a madman.

Walter Sickert never made this statement. He insisted that all the victims except Eddowes knew each other, that Nichols, Chapman, Stride and Kelly were participating in a sordid blackmail attempt, and that Eddowes was murdered in mistake for Kelly. But the greatest flaw in the broadcast was that it lacked all detail. It was not explained, for instance, that Sickert said the murders, excepting those of Kelly and Stride, were committed in a moving carriage, and hence Gull would have needed to expend relatively little physical effort in his part of the murders. Sickert said Gull first induced unconsciousness in the victims by feeding them black grapes impregnated with poison. Then, as they lay motionless in the carriage, he would perform the Masonic mutilations with the help of Anderson. This means the physical strain on Gull would have been small. John Netley would later undertake the strenuous task of placing the corpses in the street. On more than one occasion he was helped by Anderson, but Gull never left the carriage.

The notion that Farson and Rumbelow have discredited—that of a solitary Gull skulking through the alleys of the East End and alone butchering his victims, then eluding the hue and cry on foot—was clearly farcical. But Sickert never suggested anything like that.

If any doubts remain as to Gull's physical ability to sit in a carriage and perform his Masonic surgery upon four women over a period of ten weeks, it will be valuable to bear in mind the much greater physical and mental effort exerted—not spasmodically as in the case of the Ripper murders, but constantly and under great pressure—by sufferers of one or more major strokes. To repeat: at worst Gull suffered the mildest stroke it is possible to suffer without it passing unnoticed. Dr Barham Carter again:

> Many famous people have had a stroke, but the ones I shall mention here are some of those who have made great contributions to the world after a major stroke, thus showing > that the catastrophe need not be the end of a man or woman's career.

He recalled the major stroke suffered by Louis Pasteur:

> On 29 December Pasteur was able to walk without any support, and after this rather slow recovery came the remarkable future. His energies and enthusiasm seemed to be in no way diminished and he formulated all his famous theories of immunity and vaccination in the years following his stroke.

Pasteur underwent years of intense strain and gruelling work in the course of his revolutionary research, after a major stroke.

Dr Barham Carter described Churchill:

> He made a good recovery from the [major] stroke of 1949 and won the election of 1951, becoming Prime Minister. In spite of a succession of minor strokes in 1950 and 1952 and a bigger one in 1953, he undertook the full duties of his office successfully, and there is nothing to show that at this time he had lost any of his former fire and judgement. In fact at that time he also took the burden of the Foreign Office on his shoulders and was very successful in his decisions concerning our relationship with other countries.

In 1953 Churchill was seventy-nine, eight years older than Gull at the time of the Whitechapel Murders. It is certain that the combined job of Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary takes more physical fitness and strength than performing Gull's alleged part in the Jack the Ripper killings, which were spread over a period of two and a half months. If we accept the fact that a man nearly eighty can be Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary after two major strokes and a succession of minor ones, we must accept that a man many years younger is capable of being a carriage-bound Jack the Ripper a year after an attack so slight he didn't even collapse.

Finally, having been told Sickert's description of the murders, Dr Barham Carter said,

> There is no doubt that a man aged seventy-two, physically strong and active, who has had a minor stroke, could have lived a perfectly normal life and could have committed the Whitechapel Murders in the manner described by Sickert.

Many writers have asserted that Jack the Ripper was a doctor. Of a hundred and three published theories which I have examined, more than a quarter state the Ripper was a doctor or a medical student. Most theorists who believe a medical man was responsible for the murders base their reasoning on the comments of Dr Ralph Llewellyn and Dr Bagster Phillips, who stated at the inquests of Nichols and Chapman that the murderer must have possessed some anatomical knowledge. The opinion was widely accepted, and the suspicion which fell on medical men generally was skilfully evoked by Dennis Halsted in his book Doctor In the Nineties. Halsted was a doctor at the London Hospital at Whitechapel at the time of the murders, and he too described the 'great surgical skill' employed by the Ripper. That medical men were the chief suspects at the time of the killings is confirmed by a file at the Home Office devoted to accusations against doctors and policemen, and by the large number of medical men listed in the Suspects file at Scotland Yard.

Two doctors who examined the body of Eddowes, divisional police surgeon Dr George Sequeira and the medical officer of health for the City of London, Dr William Saunders, were of the opinion that no anatomical knowledge had been displayed. But the view that the murderer did possess some knowledge of surgery is vindicated by the more precise evidence of other doctors.

At the Nichols inquest, Dr Llewellyn said, 'The murderer must also have had some rough anatomical knowledge'.

Dr Phillips said at the Chapman inquest, 'There were indications of anatomical knowledge. The whole of the body was not present, the absent portions are from the abdomen. The way in which those portions were extracted showed anatomical knowledge.'

The Lancet, the journal of the medical profession, made the comment that the murders were 'obviously the work of an expert—of one, at least, who had such knowledge of anatomical or pathological examinations as to be enabled to secure the pelvic organs with one sweep of the knife'.

Dr Frederick Brown, the City Police surgeon who performed the post-mortem examination on Eddowes, was quite definite: 'Anyone carrying out this deed would need a good deal of knowledge as to the position of the organs in the abdominal cavity'.

Brown would not be deflected from his stand by the conflicting opinion of Sequeira and Saunders. Under questioning he continued, 'It would take a great deal of skill and of knowledge as to the position of the kidney to remove it. The kidney could easily be overlooked, for it is covered by a membrane.'

The last comment confirms finally that, whoever was responsible for the Ripper murders, he or they possessed some anatomical knowledge, and probably a great deal.

With this fact in mind several theorists have built up their cases around the understandable notion that a surgeon was responsible. Sickert, however, in asserting that Gull was the chief Ripper, went against the mainstream of opinion, for Gull was a physician. On the surface a physician seems far less likely than a surgeon to have been the perpetrator of the Ripper's lethal surgery, and if Sickert had been spinning a yarn he would have been much more likely to have cast a surgeon as the killer.

As always, Sickert's unlikeliest statements prove true when examined in depth.

Colin Wilson points out in A Casebook of Murder that the French murderer Eusebius Pieydagnelle did not start murdering until his family insisted he give up being a butcher (to which he had been attracted by his fascination for blood) and become a lawyer; while carving up animals his sadistic craving had been entirely satisfied. This wrecks the theories about berserk surgeons. The blood-lust of a mad surgeon would have been satiated in the course of his everyday work.

In reality a physician is a far more plausible candidate for the Ripper, for he would rarely perform any extensive surgery. Even though the killer had surgical skill, it seems clear, even taking into account the unfavourable conditions in which the mutilations were performed, that he had neither the experience nor the training of a surgeon. The member of society whose surgical ability must always rank second only to that of the surgeon is undeniably the physician.

William Withey Gull was born in the parish of St Leonard, Colchester, on 31st December 1816. His father was John Gull, a humble barge-owner on the river Lea. William was the youngest of eight children, two of whom died in infancy. The family moved to Thorpe-le-Soken in Essex in about 1820. Shortly afterwards William's eldest brother was offered a scholarship to Christ's Hospital, but proud John Gull refused to allow it, declaring that none of his children would ever depend on charity.

John died of cholera in London in 1827. Thereafter William's mother Elizabeth brought up the children to the best of her ability and limited means, teaching the three boys and three girls that 'whatsoever is worth doing, is worth doing well'. Young William was educated at a small village school, but insisted all his life that he had received his real education from his mother, a woman of great intellectual power and keen insight.

One of his favourite quotations in early life was:

> If I was a tailor
> I'd make it my pride
> The best of all tailors to be;
> If I was a tinker
> No tinker beside > Should mend an old kettle like me.

The children were given a strict Christian upbringing, Mrs Gull observing all the saints' days, wearing black during Lent and feeding the family fish and rice pudding on Fridays.

In 1832 Mrs Gull moved with her family to Thorpe, an estate near to Thorpe-le-Soken owned by the authorities of Guy's Hospital in London. Adjacent to the estate was the parish of Beaumont whose rector, Mr Harrison, was a nephew of Benjamin Harrison, the Treasurer of Guy's. It seems the rector was deeply fond of Mrs Gull, and one of the many affectionate acts in his selfless and gentlemanly wooing was to welcome William to the Rectory every other day for private tuition. During this secure, happy period in his childhood, William developed a fascination for collecting fauna and flora. The influence of Rector Harrison gradually eroded the boy's adolescent desire to go to sea, and instilled in him a firm ambition to become a doctor.

His motto of later years had not yet found expression in words, but its sentiment was already a living part of his character:

> If thou do'st purpose aught within thy > power
> Be sure thou do it, though it be but > small.

Once he had made up his mind to enter medicine, nothing could discourage him. For a short time he was an usher at a small country school at Lewes, in Sussex. But in 1837, just before his twenty-first birthday, he finally met Benjamin Harrison and was accepted as a pupil at Guy's Hospital. He was given two rooms at Guy's, was paid £50 a year and given every opportunity to study. Determined to succeed and so display his gratitude to Harrison, he applied himself diligently to his studies, and in his first year won every prize available. He graduated as a B.A. in Medicine at the University of London in 1841, obtaining honours in Physiology and Comparative Anatomy, in Surgery and in Medicine.

The following year Gull was appointed to teach Materia Medica at Guy's and was given a small house in King Street, E.C., and a salary of £100 a year. His zeal for medicine brought rapid promotion, as did his decision at this time to become a Freemason. In 1843 he was appointed Lecturer on Natural Philosophy at Guy's. The same year he became Resident Superintendent of a small asylum for twenty insane women, which formed part of the hospital.

Three years later he gained a gold medal in his M.D. degree at the University of London, the highest honour in medicine the University could bestow. For the next ten years at Guy's he was Lecturer on Physiology and Comparative Anatomy. Meanwhile he was elected Fullerian Professor of Physiology at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, he became a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians and Resident Physician of Guy's Hospital.

In 1848 Gull married Susan Ann, daughter of Colonel Lacy of Carlisle, and they had a son, Cameron, and a daughter, Caroline.

Gull's name became a household word after 1871, when the Prince of Wales contracted typhoid while staying at Sandringham. Queen Victoria was adamant that her favourite man of medicine, Sir William Jenner, the Royal Physician, should treat her son, but in the event the unknown Gull was introduced to Princess Alexandra—and Jenner stood by merely as second opinion. The prince recovered under Gull's ministrations, and in 1872 he was created a baronet and appointed the Prince of Wales's regular physician. He later became Physician Extraordinary, then subsequently Physician in Ordinary, to Queen Victoria.

It was said of Gull that 'few men have practised a lucrative profession with less eagerness to grasp at its pecuniary rewards'. That may or may not be true, but Gull left behind him £344 000 plus lands, an estate unprecedented in the history of medicine and a material achievement than can rarely have been equalled by any doctor since. Sir Edward Muir, Serjeant Surgeon to the Queen and President of the Royal College of Surgeons, who died in October 1973, left only £87 000—which is a minute fraction of Gull's fortune, considering the way inflation has eaten away the value of the pound since 1890. The Marquess of Salisbury, a more eminent man than Gull, who was not only Tory Prime Minister but also the latest in the long line of wealthy Cecils who as senior Ministers had played an important part in ruling England since the days of Elizabeth I, left only £300 100 when he died in 1903. By today's standards Gull the barge-owner's son would have been a multi-millionaire.

Gull had definite contact with leading Conservative politicians, being a friend of Disraeli and the most important doctor in England by the time Salisbury was Prime Minister. It is certain he knew Salisbury. Gull's son-in-law, Theodore Dyke Acland, was an intimate friend of the Cecil family and attended both Gull and Salisbury, signing both their death certificates. In his role as Royal Physician, Gull is quite likely to have known of Prince Eddy's illegitimate child.

Surprisingly, there are more people than Sickert who point an accusing finger at Gull when it comes to the East End murders. For instance, in the Chicago Sunday Times-Herald of 28th April 1895 there appeared a story under the heading Capture of Jack the Ripper. It recounted a story told by a well-known London physician, Dr Howard. Howard, his tongue loosened by drink, claimed he was one of twelve London physicians who had sat as a court of medical inquiry and as a commission in lunacy upon a brother physician, who had been responsible for the Jack the Ripper murders. It said:

> Jack the Ripper was no less a person than a physician in high standing and in fact was a man enjoying the patronage of the best society in the West End of London.
>
> When it was absolutely proved beyond peradventure that the physician in question was the murderer, and his insanity fully established by a commission de lunatico inquirendo, all parties were sworn to secrecy. Up to the time of Dr Howard's disclosure this oath has been rigidly adhered to.
>
> He was a physician in good standing, with an extensive > practice. He had been ever since he was a student at Guy's Hospital, an ardent and enthusiastic vivisectionalist.

The report goes on to say that after the inquiry, the unnamed physician was at once removed to a private asylum at Islington, > and he is now the most intractable and dangerous madman confined in that establishment. In order to account for the disappearance of the doctor from society a sham death and burial were gone through.

In true American journalese, the report finishes with:

> None of the keepers know that the desperate maniac, who flings himself from side to side in his padded cell and makes the long watches of the night hideous with his piercing cries is the famous Jack the Ripper. To them, and to the visiting inspectors he is simply known as Thomas Mason, alias number 124.

Allowing for the sensational treatment which any such story was bound to have received in America at that time, there is still a hard core of provable fact. There was, for instance, an asylum at Islington—called St Mary's—but its records have been destroyed.

It is important to note that Walter Sickert never mentioned this newspaper report. He is unlikely even to have known about it. Therefore, if it was referring to Gull, it is completely independent corroboration of his story.

The Dr Howard quoted in the report can only be Dr Benjamin Howard who was listed in the Medical Register in the eighties and nineties. Howard was an eminent American physician residing in London. He qualified as a doctor in New York in 1858, and the Medical Directory shows he often travelled abroad—to Paris, Vienna and Berlin, and especially to the United States, which is consistent with the report that he was in America in 1895. Investigating Howard's background produced a single gleaming fact in the murk of the Ripper case, a fact which yet again stretches the imagination too far to allow it to be dismissed as coincidence. And if it is not coincidence it means Walter Sickert must have spoken the truth. For Dr Howard's London address was the St George's Club in Hanover Square—and the St George's Club ran a hospital at 367 Fulham Road, where Annie Elizabeth Crook died. This new evidence indicates how the Freemasons in charge of the cover-up could have handled the incarceration of Annie Elizabeth. If the physician Howard denounced as the Ripper was indeed Gull, Howard becomes a direct link between Gull and Annie Elizabeth. Howard, almost certainly a Freemason like so many of his fellow doctors, could well have been one of several Masonic members of the St George's Club who connived in Annie Elizabeth's elimination after she and Prince Eddy were parted. As such, Howard would have been an ideal choice to serve as one of the twelve doctors needed to conduct the secret lunacy hearing on Gull—if Gull was the physician he was talking about, and so far it is not established that he was.

As Howard did not name the man he claimed was the Ripper, it is necessary to identify the suspect by taking his statement point by point:

> He was no less a person than a physician in high standing and in fact enjoying the patronage of the best society in the West End of London.

No statement could be more true of Gull. He was Physician in Ordinary to the Queen, and his patients were drawn from the Royal Family and the nobility. Gull himself used to boast that his practice, at 74 Brook Street, Mayfair (the heart of the West End), was probably larger than that of any other physician at any period.

> Ever since he was a student at Guy's Hospital . . .

As has been shown, Gull entered Guy's as a student in 1837. This clue narrows the field enormously, for only a limited number of West End physicians of high standing had studied at Guy's.

> . . . he had been an ardent and enthusiastic vivisectionalist.

Gull was exceptionally outspoken in his defence of vivisection, as his evidence before the Royal Commission on Vivisection in 1875 showed. He was the best-known supporter of the cause in this country, and in 1882 wrote a sixteen-page article in The Nineteenth Century expressing his ardent support of the practice of experimenting on animals. Arguing that 'the good we may obtain to ourselves by physiological experiment should outweigh the immorality of the process', and that 'our moral susceptibilities ought to be bribed and silenced by our selfish gains', he energetically defended the infliction of pain on animals if it resulted in advances in medicine. In answer to a charge that vivisectionist Claude Bernard had invented a stove to enable him to watch the process of 'baking dogs alive', Gull wrote:

> "Baking dogs alive! How horrible and disgusting!" would be a natural exclamation. What purpose could there be in anything so cruel? This we shall see directly.

And he proceeded to justify in the strongest possible terms this and other experiments in the cause of 'human life and the relief of human misery'.

Dr Howard's story mentions that the physician who was Jack the Ripper had a wife who survived him, and there is reference to their one son. Both these facts are true of Gull, who also had a daughter.

Another important point is that the Ripper was described by Howard as a West End physician. Of course, in 1888 there were many West End physicians. But of them all, only one disappeared—ostensibly through his death—shortly after the year of the Ripper. This was Sir William Gull. This fact comes to light in the writing of a man who was, ironically, trying to prove a diametrically opposite viewpoint. William Stewart, in his book Jack the Ripper: A New Theory, wanted to establish that the murderer could not have been a West End doctor. He wrote:

> I have made a complete list from the Medical Register of the practitioners residing in the West End prior to August, 1888, and defined the West End by a square.
>
> At the top left-hand corner of this square I placed Harlesden, at the top right-hand corner Camden Town, at the bottom right-hand corner Charing Cross, at the bottom left-hand corner Hammersmith. In the list of practitioners in this area I included all those who were employed in hospitals. By comparing this list with the obituary of practitioners for the year subsequent to November, 1888, I discovered that no West End doctor's name was missing. In other words all the medical men in the West End who were practising before the murders were alive and practising for at least a year or two afterwards.

Stewart's last statement is wrong, however. As has been explained, Sir William Gull is supposed to have died in January 1890, only fourteen months after the last murder, so he was not alive and practising for a year or two after the murders. There are two possible reasons for Stewart's mistake. The first is that he was careless, the second that for a specific reason he did not include Gull on his first list. The second alternative is more likely, because a repetition of Stewart's exhaustive survey shows that except for the error over Gull, he was entirely correct in his statement. No other eminent West End doctor did die in the two years following the Whitechapel Murders. So Stewart builds up the evidence against Gull even more strongly.

He excluded Gull from his original list because, though he was seeking to prove that no West End doctor was Jack the Ripper, he did not in fact check every doctor, merely every practitioner. As Gull had retired in 1887 he could not be described as a practitioner, and for this reason Stewart did not include him on his first list. Consequently, when he came across Gull's obituary notice he would not have considered it relevant. But even though Gull had retired, he remained a resident of Brook Street, and could still be accurately described as a West End doctor, the description used by Howard.

Thus Stewart carefully exonerated all West End practitioners by his patient research, leaving as suspects a mere handful of retired doctors, including Gull. A more thorough check of obituaries than Stewart undertook, and also a full check of entries in the Medical Register and Medical Directory, shows that of this handful of suspects, only Gull died in the period immediately after the murders. These findings show two things. Combined with the fact that all the details of Howard's story fit him, they show that Gull was certainly the doctor described in the Chicago article as Jack the Ripper. Perhaps more importantly, they show that if the Ripper was a doctor Gull is the only possibility.

Others have accused Gull of being the Ripper. He is the doctor referred to in another accusation—the now famous story of the spiritualist medium Robert James Lees who is supposed to have identified the Ripper by his clairvoyant powers and, after the murder of Kelly, led the police to the home of a West End physician, who was later secretly removed to an asylum.

There are two main objections to this story. The first is that clairvoyance can be of no use in the detection of crime—a view that would be contradicted by the police in Belgium. In the last forty years Belgian medium Gérard Croiset has successfully applied his astonishing powers to many criminal cases. His name became well known in England in 1969 when he was called in by the family of kidnap victim Mrs Muriel McKay. At a time when no one but Mrs McKay's murderers knew her whereabouts, Croiset provided a detailed description of the farm where it was later found she had been held.

The second reason the Lees story has been dismissed is that several commentators have claimed it did not appear in print until 1931. If it had had any foundation in truth, the argument runs, some reference to it would have come to light before then. This objection wilts under the statement that the Lees story first appeared in print thirty-six years earlier than 'Ripperologists' have until now believed. It appeared in the final section of the article in the Chicago Sunday Times-Herald in April 1895. Before Ian Sharp discovered it for the BBC, this article had never been quoted. It does not even appear in the Association of Assistant Librarians' comprehensive catalogue of Ripper literature, Jack the Ripper or The Mysteries of the East End. The Chicago article was omitted from this admirable bibliography only because until 1973 it had lain forgotten since the year it appeared.

Even 1895, seven years after the murders, was not the beginning of the Lees story; it was merely the first time it had been committed to print. The story had wide circulation, in London at least, as early as July 1889—only nine months after the murders. This is confirmed by a note in the Letters file at Scotland Yard. Admittedly this is from a crank who signed himself 'Jack the Ripper', but the writer's state of mind is immaterial. Only his knowledge counts. The contents of the letter show that the story of Lees having helped the police run Jack the Ripper to earth was known forty-three years earlier than critics of the story have stated. The letter, received at the Yard on 25th July 1889, says:

> Dear Boss
>
> You have not caught me yet you see, with all your cunning, with all your "Lees" with all your blue bottles.
>
> Jack the Ripper

For the story to have gained this sort of acceptance as early as

July 1889 means it must initially have been told (or leaked out) a few weeks after the murder of Kelly, which fits in with Lees taking part in the hunt for the Ripper in November 1888, as the story claims.

Despite the fact that the story has since been grossly exaggerated, to the extent that some apocryphal versions refer to more than twenty murders, it is possible to get back to the bare bones. I have studied every available version of the story, removed the inconsistencies and inventions of later writers, and retained only those points which are common throughout. I then compared what was left with the original story told by Lees himself, a very different tale from the one which has come down to us via sensational reporters. The original story comes from Lees's great-niece, Mrs Emily Porter of Wembley, who knew 'Uncle James' extremely well until she was about twenty, when he died. The story he told her tallied almost exacty with the story which remained after the embellishments of sensational writers had been trimmed away.

Lees was a highly respected medium whose clairvoyant powers were so highly developed that at the age of nineteen, it was said, he was called before Queen Victoria to make contact with the dead Prince Albert. Lees later became the leader of the Christian Spiritualists in England. He was a close friend of Disraeli, and accompanied him on his last walk before his death. He ran a spiritualist centre at Peckham, was a leading socialist, and a friend of Keir Hardie, later a leader of the Labour Party.

The original and unembellished story told by Lees was that at the time of the Ripper murders he was at the height of his powers. One day he was writing in his study when he became convinced that the Ripper was about to commit another murder. He went to Scotland Yard but was given little attention because there had been a spate of cranks and theorists assailing the police each day (see Chapter 14). But that night there was indeed a Ripper murder. Lees was so shocked by the accuracy of his vision that on the advice of his doctor he took a holiday abroad. One day, on his return, he was riding with his wife in a London omnibus. Suddenly he began to experience a renewal of the strange sensations which had preceded his former clairvoyant condition. The omnibus ascended Notting Hill. When it stopped at the top a man got on.

Leaning over to his wife Lees remarked earnestly, 'That is Jack the Ripper'.

His wife laughed at this and told him not to be foolish.

'I am not mistaken', he replied, 'I feel it.'

The omnibus travelled the entire length of Edgware Road, turning into Oxford Street at Marble Arch. At this point the man got out, and Lees determined to follow him. About half way down Oxford Street, Lees told a constable of his supernatural knowledge, but again he was met with derision. The policeman even threatened laughingly to 'run him in'. On reaching Apsley House the Ripper, in a nervous state, jumped into a cab and was driven rapidly down Piccadilly. Eventually Lees found a police inspector willing to take him seriously. After the final murder on 9th November Lees concentrated his powers on the vision of the man he had seen. He led the inspector to a West End mansion, the home of one of the most celebrated physicians in London. Once inside, the inspector spoke to the physician's wife. In the course of a searching interrogation she confessed that she did not believe her husband was of sound mind. She had been horrified to note that whenever a Whitechapel Murder occurred he was absent from home. When accused, the doctor admitted that his mind had been unbalanced for some years, and that of late there had been intervals of time during which he had no recollection of what he had been doing. The physician could sometimes be calculatingly cruel, at other times extremely kind. He said that he had on one or two occasions found himself sitting in his rooms as if suddenly aroused from a long stupor, and in one instance he had found blood on his shirt-front, which he had attributed to nosebleed. On another occasion his face had been badly scratched.

Here the Lees story dovetails with the testimony of Dr Howard, for according to Lees the physician was committed under a false name by twelve doctors to a private asylum. To conceal the truth it was announced that the doctor had died. A coffin was filled with stones, and his funeral caused a great stir.

Though Lees did not name the doctor to whom he claimed to have led the police, there are clues in the story that again point directly to Gull. These clues, combined with the fact that Lees was plainly describing the same physician as Howard, who was accusing Gull, make it certain that he too was saying, 'Sir William Gull was Jack the Ripper'.

The clues in Lees's story that point to Gull are:

(1) The route taken by the Ripper in avoiding Lees—

beginning at Marble Arch, going half-way along Oxford Street and back down Piccadilly—traces a wide U-turn with Gull's house at 74 Brook Street almost at its centre. Few doctors who were among 'the most celebrated physicians in London' lived in that relatively small area, which excludes Harley Street.

(2) Another clue is to be found in the timing of the doctor's discovery by Lees. It was shortly after the last murder on 9th November 1888. It is a curious fact that Sir William Gull wrote his will only eighteen days after this date, on 27th November 1888. What prompted Gull to prepare his will at this time is not known. It was more than a year since his stroke in October 1887, and he had suffered no attacks since. In fact, according to his death certificate, he had only two attacks all told, the second proving fatal. Shortly after his recovery from the first seizure would have been an understandable time for his thoughts to turn in the direction of his will, but they did not. Throughout the rest of 1887 and the whole of 1888 he was a perfectly fit man —yet only a few days after the time Lees claimed he had led the police to the Ripper, Gull unaccountably chose to make arrangements for the division of his estate after his death.

(3) A third clue concerns the sham death and burial of the physician in Lees's and Howard's stories. This bogus funeral is supposed to have caused 'a great stir'. Gull's funeral caused so much of a stir that a special train had to be laid on, and mourners included some of the most influential men in London —Lord Justice Lindley, Sir Joseph Lister, Sir Henry Acland and Gull's best friend in later life, Sir James Paget, Serjeant Surgeon to Queen Victoria. Gull was interred near his father and mother at the village churchyard at Thorpe-le-Soken. Country folk from villages as far as twenty miles away tramped to the graveyard on the day of the funeral and lined the route of the coffin from the railway station to the church.

(4) The physician run to ground by Lees was described by him as being sometimes a surprisingly kind man, at other times cold and calculatingly cruel. This sums up Gull's character perfectly. He would alternate between moods of warmth and benevolence in which no kindness was too much, and temperamental sloughs during which he appeared about as human as a pillar of stone. In her book How Charles Bravo Died, Yseult Bridges showed just how callous Gull could be:

> Dr Johnson, a man of middle age who had attained some eminence in his profession, was strictly orthodox in his out> look and methods, and therefore the antithesis of Sir William Gull. The former, for instance, had refrained from telling his patient, "You are poisoned", because he lacked actual proof of it; or, "You are dying", because that was contrary to the ethics of his profession.

>
> But the latter had no hesitation in telling him bluntly both these truths. "On my own responsibility and without previous consultation," he informed the court [Bravo's inquest] "I told Mr Bravo he was a dying man."
>
> Charles . . . was struggling to sit up. "Am I dying?" he asked Sir William desperately.
>
> "You are very ill and in all probability you have not very many hours to live, but of course as long as there is life there is hope."
>
> "Is there really no hope for me?" he asked again, as though unable to accept his fate. Sir William felt his pulse and heart. "There is very little life left in you. In fact you are heart-dead[1] now."

Yet Gull was praised for his kindness to patients and on 31st January 1890 a letter signed 'R.A.' appeared in The Times and described how Sir William had treated a gentleman 'with failing health and fortune'. Gull administered first medicine, which failed to work, and then the sum of thirty guineas. He was renowned for this sort of kindness, but he was widely criticized, too, for the other side of his nature. On one occasion he displayed his inhuman streak in a manner even more overt than that in the Bravo episode. Ironically, the story is recounted in one of the affectionate memoirs of Gull which appeared after his death—In Memoriam, Sir William Gull. He had been attending a poor patient with heart disease and after the man's death he was extremely anxious to perform a post-mortem examination. Permission was granted with great difficulty, but with the proviso that nothing was to be 'taken away'. A devoted sister of the dead man was present during the examination to ensure fair play. Rather than deal with an intensely delicate situation with as much sensitivity as possible, Gull deliberately cut out the dead man's heart before her eyes, put it in his pocket and said, 'I trust to your honour not to betray me'.

So saying, he left with the heart of the speechless woman's brother still reposing in his pocket, and the mutilated corpse lying before her on the dissecting table.

---

[1] This has often been reported as the even more callous: 'In fact you are half dead now'.

Without becoming unduly influenced by Robert Louis Stevenson's Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde, published two years before the murders, it is true to say that the 'split personality' has been recognized by psychiatrists as the not uncommon state now defined as schizophrenia. The malady is prevalent among those who suffer great mental and emotional pressure, though it rarely reaches the proportions described in grim detail by Stevenson. Once in a while, however, such a case does arise, illustrating the fact that the character of the doctor described by Lees is not so unbelievable as many may think. In October 1974 a young husband was jailed by an Old Bailey judge for raping a nurse. The court heard that the defendant was twenty-four, outwardly a normal, happily married man, but that he could 'turn into' a brutal sex attacker. His defence counsel told the court that apart from the indecent assaults he had committed on five women, he was in no way vicious or unpleasant. 'Except when his trouble is upon him, he is a perfectly normal young man. These things are almost outside his control'. Other Jekyll and Hyde cases worth studying are that of Edward Paisnel, the notorious 'Beast of Jersey' and, more recently, that of Peter Cook, the Cambridge Rapist. Paisnel was sentenced to thirty years' imprisonment in 1971 for thirteen sex offences against young children: wearing a grotesque mask and spiked suit he had terrorized the island for eleven years and been obsessed with witchcraft and the atrocities of Gilles de Rais, the original Bluebeard. Despite the evil side of his nature, Paisnel was nevertheless a kind and generous man who loved small children.

As his conduct in the post mortem episode and the Bravo case suggest, Gull was not a conventional man. He regarded himself as a law unto himself. He frequently showed he had little thought for the feelings of others, and did not hesitate to hurt freely. He suited his word to his actions, for one of his sayings was: 'Morals and religion have no true and firm basis'.

It was written of him: 'Of all evils, he looked upon ignorance as the worst'.

This gives some idea how he might have regarded an ignorant servant, Marie Kelly, who dared put his Masonic colleagues and himself in danger with her loose tongue. An arrogant man, he bowed to no higher authority once he had made up his mind. Therefore, once set on disposing of Kelly in whatever way he thought appropriate, he would have let nothing stand in his way. Many thought his strong physical resemblance to Napoleon went beyond outward appearance. It was said of him:

> Having once formed an opinion and determined upon a line of action, he carried it out unhesitatingly, uninfluenced by any thought of consequences. He was unswerving in his ideas of right and wrong, uninfluenced by other people's views and opinions. His insight into truths which lesser minds were blind to see and powerless to grasp, and a life-long experience that his vast capacities generally placed him in the truest relation to things, developed in him an absolute confidence in the infallibility of his own judgement in certain points.

Gull's three 'epileptiform attacks', mentioned by Wilks and Bettany, are significant here. These had nothing to do with strokes. Epileptiform attacks are caused by mental disorder and are characterized by fits, during which the sufferer falls down unconscious and rigid and the jaw is clenched. Following the attack there may be quite a long period of confusion in which the sufferer may wander away and occasionally may be violent, a state that exactly sums up the symptoms experienced by the doctor in Lees's story.

Yet the argument may still be raised that if Lees had really led the police to Sir William Gull's house there would be a record of the events in the secret files. It has already been shown, however, that a cover-up has taken place. Any papers relating to Lees and Gull would therefore have been a vital part of the evidence to be suppressed. This is precisely what seems to have happened. Of all the papers contained in the secret files of the Home Office and Scotland Yard, only one file is incomplete. This is Home Office File A49301, in which it is noted that thirty-three out of fifty-one items were destroyed or missing when the file was put together in 1893. Can it be coincidence that this is the file containing accusations against doctors and policemen?

Two points make the circumstances surrounding Gull's death suspect, points which become understandable when applied to a man who was secretly committed to an asylum when the world believed he was dead. They go beyond showing that the doctor in the Lees and Howard stories was Gull and confirm that everything described in those stories actually happened.

(1) In his last years Gull was attended by three doctors—Dr Hermann Weber, Dr Charles Hood and Gull's son-in-law

Theodore Dyke Acland. While there is no specific law forbidding a doctor from certifying the death of a relative, it is generally considered preferable he should not do so. This is especially true where a patient is being treated by several doctors, only one of whom is related to him, as was the case with Gull. Proper practice dictates that the death certificate shall be signed by a doctor not related to the deceased. This is because it could subsequently be suggested that the patient did not die from the cause stated by the doctor. Relatives are considered more likely to have a motive for falsifying a death certificate than non-relatives. In the case of Sir William Gull, his death-certificate was signed, contrary to good practice, by his son-in-law. The allegations that Gull did not die in 1890 but was placed in an asylum would explain this odd departure from convention.

(2) It was not until late 1888—shortly after the final Ripper murder—that Gull really dropped out of the public eye. This contradicts the myth that he was too ill to take part in public life from October 1887 onward, and places his retirement from society remarkably close to the date Lees led the police to the Ripper. The reason given for his disappearance from society generally during 1889 was that he suffered further strokes that year. This was a lie. His death certificate proves conclusively that he suffered no apoplectic attacks of any kind between the first in 1887 and the second two days before his death. The certificate states under cause of death:

> Cerebral
> Haemorrhage
> Hemiplegia
> 1st attack Oct 10 1887
> 2nd do Jan 27 1890
> Certified by > Theodore Dyke Acland
> M.D.

The known facts do not fit in with Gull being a broken man after 1887. For more than a year after this he was active. Then for no apparent reason (certainly not a physical illness) he did drop out of society, and his death was announced in January 1890. But the facts are consistent with his being under restraint after the last Whitechapel Murder. It would obviously have been too dangerous for Gull's death to have been announced immediately after the end of the murders. The coincidence would have been blatant, and would have been spotted, for instance, by Stewart. A reasonable time lapse had to be allowed lest suspicion fall upon Gull and then, naturally, upon his Masonic colleagues. But his sudden withdrawal from society after Kelly's murder had to be explained. It was consequently announced that he had suffered further strokes, a statement which his death certificate shows beyond doubt was a complete fabrication.

The name under which the physician in Howard's story was certified—Thomas Mason—brings to mind the Freemasonic tradition that in certain circumstances a Mason will die by his own greatest achievement. Gull, said Sickert, was in his element removing the troublesome by certifying them insane. Now there is completely independent evidence that this was the ultimate fate of Gull himself. What more appropriate name for a certified Freemason than Mason, a pun horribly consistent with the humour described in the Masonic Protocols as so essential?

Slowly the evidence builds up. The physician Howard described was undoubtedly Gull. From clues contained in Lees's story it can be seen that the doctor he spoke of was also Gull. That both men independently described different but overlapping episodes in the same drama strengthens this argument. The fact that both stories fit in perfectly with established facts and with Sickert's narrative—again quite separate from the others—and that the details of Gull's last days reported in the past do not fit in with established facts, such as those on his death certificate, adds enormous weight to the case against him.

To secure a conviction in a British court the prosecution must prove its case beyond all reasonable doubt. The densely crowded dock in the trial of Jack the Ripper, however, more realistically requires proof beyond a shadow of doubt. In the case against Sir William Gull we can finally get close to that long-awaited certainty. There is quite independent proof that Lees's story implicating Gull was perfectly true.

This is contained in the writings of an eminent surgeon and Ripper expert, Dr Thomas Stowell, CBE, MD, FRCS, etc. Stowell said he had been told a story by Gull's own daughter, Caroline:

> She was the wife of Theodore Dyke Acland, M.D., F.R.C.P., one time my beloved Chief. I knew them both > intimately and often enjoyed the hospitality of their home in Bryanston Square over many years.

That Stowell was telling the truth in this is borne out by the fact that in his will Dyke Acland directed that Stowell be appointed one of his trustees and executors, and he left him a valuable Pre-Raphaelite painting. Plainly, Stowell was indeed a dear friend of Gull's daughter and her husband. He continued:

> Mrs Acland's story was that at the time of the Ripper murders, her mother, Lady Gull, was greatly annoyed one night by an unappointed visit from a police officer, accompanied by a man who called himself a medium and she was irritated by their impudence in asking her a number of questions which seemed to her impertinent. She answered their questions with non-committal replies such as 'I do not know,' 'I cannot tell you that,' 'I am afraid I cannot answer that question.'
>
> Later Sir William himself came down and in answer to the questions said he occasionally suffered from 'lapses of memory since he had a slight stroke in 1887'; he said that he once had discovered blood on his shirt.

The resemblance between this story and that told by Lees is uncanny. There can be no doubt that they describe the same incident. Admittedly there appears to be a discrepancy in the fact that Lady Gull reacted with non-committal replies and the physician's wife in Lees's story confessed she did not think her husband was of sound mind. But the initial reaction of the wife in the Lees account must have been exactly the same as that of Lady Gull in Caroline Acland's story; Lees described the 'searching interrogation' of the physician's wife, but no interrogation would have been necessary had she been willing to answer questions about her husband. It is also clear that Caroline Acland's account does not tell the whole story. Why did Lady Gull give non-committal replies? If the questions of the medium and the inspector had been so impertinent she would surely have simply thrown them out. If Lady Gull was being non-committal it means she did not wish to commit herself either way about her husband's alleged involvement in the murders. If he had been innocent, the last thing she would have been is non-committal.

Plainly, Caroline Acland knew no more than she told Stowell. She was unaware that her story was any more than an interesting tale about two foolish visitors received by her parents at the time of the Jack the Ripper murders. She loved her father deeply, and even named her son Theodore William Gull Acland, so the last thing she would have wished is to have suggested Gull was the Ripper.

The astonishing aspect of Stowell's article is that he was apparently trying to prove the Ripper was Eddy, Duke of Clarence. He quoted the Caroline Acland story in support of his theory that Gull came by the blood on his shirt by medically examining Eddy after one of the murders. Stowell studied the Ripper case for many years before publishing his findings in The Criminologist in 1970. Though he never named his suspect, except by the letter 'S', it is generally accepted that he wanted readers to think he was accusing the Prince without actually saying so. Interviewed on television, he remained adamant in his refusal to state positively that his suspect was Eddy. Why? Having scattered a plethora of clues pointing in Eddy's direction, there would have been no reason to refuse committing himself—unless in reality he did not suspect Eddy at all. Even more intriguing was the fact that on 9th November 1970, the 82nd anniversary of the murder of Marie Kelly, a letter from Stowell appeared in The Times in which he denied he had said or even thought Eddy to have been the Ripper. Writing this curious, unexplained letter must almost have been Stowell's last act, for in The Times of the following day a brief report announced the death on November 9th of Dr Thomas Stowell. According to his son, Dr Thomas Eldon Stowell, all the papers and notes the old man had built up during a lifetime of studying the Whitechapel Murders were destroyed unread as soon as he had died.

Old Stowell's final emphatic statement that he had not even thought Eddy was the Ripper takes on a new significance when considered in the light of another passage in his article, 'It was said that on more than one occasion Sir William Gull was seen in the neighbourhood of Whitechapel on the night of a murder'. This points the finger directly at Gull, yet Stowell camouflages it with the feeble suggestion that 'It would not surprise me to know that he was there for the purpose of certifying the murderer to be insane'. (!)

In the same article he revealed that rumours had been current at the time of the murders which said positively Gull was the Ripper. Read carefully, Stowell's whole article is clearly intended to create the impression that Eddy was his suspect. But the only evidence he produced pointed the finger at Gull!

Because old Stowell's papers were so unaccountably destroyed, we have no idea where he discovered the evidence which incriminates Sir William Gull. It is implausible to suggest that Stowell invented the evidence, because if he were romancing he would have been far more likely to invent evidence to support his case against 'S'.

There seems to be only one clue as to why Stowell behaved so oddly after discovering evidence against Gull. This is to be found in his will:

> I bequeath my Grand Lodge Masonic clothing to Cheselden Craft Lodge . . . my Grand Chapter Clothing and P.Z. jewel to Cheselden Chapter . . . and the remainder of my Masonic jewels and books to Cornubia Lodge No. 450.

P.Z. means Stowell was a Past Zerubbabel, the principal Freemason among a group of initiates who have all passed the Royal Arch. The important function of a Past Zerubbabel is to perform the final rite in the ceremony of closing a Royal Arch Chapter. The words Stowell would have chanted in so doing might well be applied to his act of trying to conceal the truth about Gull's complicity in the Whitechapel Murders:

> Companions, nothing now remains but, according to ancient custom, to lock up our secrets in a safe repository, uniting in the act of Fidelity, Fidelity, Fidelity, Fidelity.

What more safe repository was there for the Masonic secret Stowell had uncovered about Gull than to lock it up in a veiled accusation of Prince Eddy?

Exactly what motivated Stowell in writing his article it is now difficult to say. Though he appeared to want everyone to believe Eddy was the killer, it seems from the contents of his article and his feeble excuse for Gull's presence in Whitechapel that he could in reality have intended Gull to be implicated, without having the responsibility of pointing the finger himself. In his peculiar, unfathomable way Stowell planted other clues incriminating Gull. The earliest clue suggested Gull did not die when he is supposed to have done, which again supports the three independent claims that Gull was the doctor sent to an asylum under a false name. Stowell told Colin Wilson that he had found in Gull's private papers the information that 'S' had not died of pneumonia as he is reported to have done in 1892, but that he had died of syphilis. This would be truly remarkable, because Gull is supposed to have died two years earlier in 1890, in which case he could have known little about how 'S' died. Was this strange claim by Stowell yet another cryptic accusation of Gull, explaining in his own peculiar way that 'Sir William Gull did not die in 1890'?

A deeper study of Stowell's strange behaviour opens up yet another possibility. His article could have been designed, not to conceal Gull's guilt, but to proclaim it in such a way that he could not be held responsible by his Masonic elders.

In an interview after the publication of his article Stowell explained that he would not name his suspect because he had no wish to embarrass the family of the suspect, to whom he owed so much. Stowell had no known contact with the Royal Family and certainly owed them nothing. But he owed the family of Sir William Gull, in the shape of Caroline Acland and her husband, a great deal. Another point which supports the idea he was pointing a camouflaged finger at Gull is the following statement in his article:

> To support this fantasy [that the murderer was a medical man] it was not unnatural for the rumour mongers to pick on a most illustrious member of my profession of the time—perhaps of all time—Sir William Gull, Bt., M.D., F.R.C.P., F.R.S.

Harrison reacted to this enigmatic statement thus:

> On the contrary, one would have thought that to pick on one of the most illustrious medical men of his day would have been the most unnatural thing in the world.

This assessment is accurate, but it does not go far enough. An exhaustive study of the Ripper case reveals no such rumours as those alluded to by Stowell. Until August 1973, three years after Stowell's article, Gull had not been denounced as the Ripper in public. Only Sickert has done so since. What then did Stowell mean? Having seen the avalanche of discussion and speculation on the Ripper since 1970 it is now difficult to recreate the frame of mind of readers when Stowell published his dissertation accusing 'S'. In November 1970 no mention had ever been made of Prince Eddy or Gull in connection with the Ripper murders. Few ordinary people had heard of either of them. Stowell then made the statement, which is quite untrue, that 'it was not unnatural for the rumour mongers to pick on . . . Sir William Gull'.

The inescapable conclusion is that Stowell, in making a deliberately inaccurate statement about a man who had never been publicly mentioned in connection with the Ripper, was in fact accusing that man. The denunciation of Gull was veiled in Stowell's apparent preoccupation with Eddy only to confuse Stowell's Masonic elders. But anyone with a comprehensive knowledge of the Ripper case would have known instantly that he was accusing Sir William Gull.

A summary of the evidence so far shows Sir William Gull was a Freemason of influence; that he suffered from mental attacks in which he would have behaved strangely and even violently; that many lies have been woven around his death to make it appear natural; that he himself was a weird, unpredictable man; that he was seen in Whitechapel on the nights of the murders; and that by his own admission he had woken up in his rooms to find blood upon himself.

He was indicated as being Jack the Ripper by Walter Sickert, Dr Benjamin Howard, William Stewart, Robert James Lees, Dr Thomas Stowell and even his own daughter Caroline.

Sir William Gull had a personal connection with the whores of the East End. The Dictionary of National Biography makes the passing comment in the entry on Gull that 'He was a close friend of James Hinton'. That innocuous statement hides facts which are crucial when considered in the light of Sickert's indictment of Gull as the whore-ripping East End killer. Gull was more than a close friend of Hinton. Until Hinton's death in 1875 they were lifelong best friends. They were so intimate that in 1878 it was Gull who was chosen to write the introduction to Hinton's biography and collected letters. In this introduction he said 'It is now near twenty years ago that our acquaintance began. Sympathies in common on the nearest subjects of human interest brought us much together'.

It is interesting that Gull chose as his best friend and most intimate confidant a man who was obsessed, and that James Hinton's strange obsession was the prostitutes of Whitechapel. This developed during the year 1839 to 1840 when he worked as a cashier in a wholesale woollen draper's in the heart of Whitechapel. This experience, wrote his biographer Ellice Hopkins, 'came crashing down on his young heart with a most cruel force, and the degradation of women possessed him with divine despair'. All his life, wrote Hopkins, Hinton was 'divinely mad' about the prostitutes.

In 1855 he was a constant companion of Gull, and every morning they took their English constitutional together, 'wending their way, deep in discussion, through the comparatively deserted London streets'. At this time Gull was assistant physician at Guy's Hospital, which is just across London Bridge on the south side of the Thames and within easy walking distance of the East End. Is it conceivable that Hinton, with his all-consuming obsession about Whitechapel and its degraded inhabitants, did not take Gull there many times during those morning walks, to share with his friend those 'nearest subjects of human interest'? He would have taken Gull into the very alleys where the prostitutes slunk drunkenly through the shadows—the very alleys where Jack the Ripper was to destroy those same pathetic women in 1888. For some years before moving to Brook Street, Gull had a practice at 8 Finsbury Square, right on the borders of central London and the East End. He knew the stalking ground of the Ripper intimately, and in all probability he had been given a personal and exceedingly passionate grounding in the lives and characters of the whores of Whitechapel.

How deeply Gull was affected by Hinton's obsession it is impossible to say. Though his motive for becoming Jack the Ripper was Masonic, perhaps there was also in his unbalanced mind an element of what was described in The Times as 'an earnest religionist with a delusion that he has a mission from above to extirpate vice by assassination'.

We shall never know.

In March 1974 I visited Gull's grave in the churchyard at Thorpe-le-Soken, Essex, a grave which he is supposed to share with his wife. By coincidence his headstone bears the same text as the wall of the Working Lads' Institute at Whitechapel where the first two Ripper inquests were held: 'What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?' It was Gull's favourite biblical text. I was shown the grave by an affable verger, a sixty-six-year-old pillar of the Church called Mr Downes. His father before him had been verger there too, and he recalled his father telling him that as a small boy he had walked twenty miles from their home at Clacton with a throng of mourning villagers to be at Gull's funeral.

Downes's comments as we gazed at the grave brought to mind the story of Dr Howard, which said the eminent physician who was Jack the Ripper had been confined in an asylum while a sham death and burial were staged. Downes had no idea why I was interested in Gull, so I was astonished when he said, 'This is a large grave, about twelve feet by nine, too large for two people. Some say more than two are buried there. It's big enough for three, that grave.'

He fell silent a moment or two, then said pensively, 'Burial places for two just aren't normally that big'.

Then, half jokingly, he mused, 'Of course, it's possible somebody else is buried there, without anyone knowing who.'

I pressed him for more information, but he quickly changed the subject. This did not appear to be because he had any sinister knowledge, but because he held Gull in the most profound reverence. Gull is Thorpe-le-Soken's only claim to fame, and Downes did not want seriously to ponder even the possibility that something 'not quite right' may have happened. But even though he knew nothing sinister about the grave, nor of any connection between William Gull and the Ripper, his words were based on an honest man's assessment of a strange phenomenon—a grave for two which is big enough for three.

There is every indication that Gull was the doctor referred to by Howard and Lees and that he was committed to an asylum under the name Mason. Meanwhile a bogus funeral was gone through and a coffin filled with stones was lowered into his grave. But what happened when Gull actually died? Either he was buried somewhere under the name Mason or pressure was brought to bear and he was secretly laid in his rightful grave, taking up the third place in the grave for two.

In later years Gull's most intimate friend and companion was Sir James Paget, another Freemason. Paget was Serjeant Surgeon to Queen Victoria. It will be remembered that in examining the cover-up of the Prince Eddy–Annie Elizabeth Crook episode, it was hard to see how—after her incarceration—Annie was moved from workhouse to workhouse without any of the normal paperwork or removal procedure being gone through. The explanation lies in the convenient presence on the Boards of Guardians dealing with Annie Elizabeth of one

Rev. Henry Luke Paget. The Rev. Paget was one of the elected members of the St Pancras Board of Guardians—to whom Annie Elizabeth was chargeable for the first half of her thirty-one years in workhouses. Only one of the guardians could have arranged for Annie Elizabeth to be moved in such a way that every rule was waived. Paget was Vicar, and later Rural Dean, of St Pancras and went on to become Suffragan Bishop of Ipswich (1906), Suffragan Bishop of Stepney (1909), and Bishop of Chester from 1919 to 1932. More importantly, he was the son of Sir James Paget, one of Gull's best friends. Judging by the example set by his family, and by the more high-ranking members of the Church of England at that time, it is virtually certain he was a Freemason, though the Grand Lodge have refused to allow me access to their records to check this or any other point.

★ ★ ★ ★

Two important points arose in the months after this book was delivered to the publisher. As the typed manuscript was already in the hands of the printer it was impossible to make any changes in the body of the text, so the new evidence has been inserted here, the end of the relevant chapter, at proof stage.

In 1975 Richard Whittington-Egan discovered in a London bookshop a handwritten letter from Dr Benjamin Howard, whose testimony has proved such strong support of Sickert's story. The letter, reproduced in Whittington-Egan's A Casebook on Jack the Ripper, was addressed to The People newspaper, which had published an article based on the Chicago Sunday Times-Herald story. In the letter, Howard denied all knowledge of the report attributed to him, and denied he was even in America at the time the disclosures were said to have been made. Whittington-Egan comments that this denial rules out the Howard story.

On the contrary. Dr Howard would hardly have admitted that he had become drunk and broken the solemn oath binding him to secrecy about the Masonic lunacy commission proceedings. I find it perfectly credible that Howard would deny this betrayal of Masonic secrets most vehemently. And though Whittington-Egan is to be heartily congratulated on his coup in finding the letter, its existence is by no means surprising.

The second point, possibly coincidence but nevertheless worthy of note, could indicate the identity of the police inspector whom Lees led to the Ripper. Lee's family roots were at Bournemouth. When Inspector Abberline retired he moved to Bournemouth. This in itself is hardly startling. Bournemouth was, and is, a favourite town for those planning a comfortable retirement. What is interesting is that Abberline died in 1928, having appointed one Nelson Edwin Lees as his executor. I have been unable to discover if Nelson Edwin Lees was related to Lees the medium. If he was, and it does seem a strong possibility bearing in mind the coincidence of location and the relative rareness of the name, the case in favour of the Lees story is surely conclusive.

CHAPTER TWELVE

John Netley

John Netley, the second member of the Ripper party according to Sickert, is a man without a face. He is the one character named by Sickert who is quite unknown. As such he provides one of the strongest pieces of evidence that the story is true. The whole of Sickert's narrative examined up to this point has been shown to be correct. If the old painter had been lying about those involved in the killings the weakest part of his story is likely to have been that part concerning John Netley, the mysterious figure no 'Ripperologist' had previously heard of.

To recall Sickert's description of Netley and his part in the affair:

He was the young man who first became involved in the case when he regularly picked up Eddy from a prearranged spot and ferried him to his secret meetings with Sickert and Annie Elizabeth in Cleveland Street. Netley was not on the official Palace staff, but he owned his own coach. How he came to know Eddy in the first place Sickert did not explain. At the predetermined spot Eddy would transfer from the royal coach into Netley's vehicle in order to outwit any royal aides who might have happened to be keeping an eye on his carriage.

When Gull and his extreme Masonic colleagues were organizing the elimination of the blackmailing whores Netley was inveigled into taking part in the operation. According to Sickert the coercion was not necessary. Sickert thought he was not too far from the truth in saying that because Netley was a short man—a fact about which he was hypersensitive—he would go to any lengths to boost his ego and reach the state where he felt, not equal to other men, but their superior. He was prepared to take part in any plan, however obnoxious, to further his own ends. He was appallingly ambitious, and though an inveterate womanizer, it was said that he had taken part in homosexual activities with wealthy homosexuals to help him in what he somehow imagined would be his climb to the top. The top of what, Sickert could not imagine. He did not know if Netley was a Mason, but whether he was or was not, he was prepared to do all he could to help the secret brotherhood purely for his own sake. Sickert never ceased to marvel that Netley was quite insensitive to the fact that he was despised by those who used him for their own ends.

He was enlisted by the killers firstly because he was already involved in the case, and secondly because he knew Cleveland Street and the people there. He would be invaluable, they thought, in making the initial discreet inquiries at Cleveland Street and its neighbourhood after the disappearance of Kelly. Thirdly, he was a working-class man, and would be useful and inconspicuous making inquiries, with the aid of a picture of Kelly, in the East End.

During the murders Netley drove the party around the East End in his coach. As he drove the two Masonic murderers carried out their ghastly work in the relative darkness of the vehicle. Later Netley placed the bodies of the victims where they were found. This was true only of Nichols, Chapman and Eddowes; Kelly was murdered in her room and Stride was killed at the spot where her body was found.

Walter Sickert was unclear what happened to Netley when the murders were at an end. All he knew was that the abominable coachman somehow developed the fixation that selling his body to notable homosexuals was no longer the path to power. Perhaps because he had gained an insight into the workings of Masonry, he wanted now to ingratiate himself with influential Freemasons rather than their puppets, the aristocracy. It suited his ends, and he switched his allegiance from Eddy to Freemasonry with as little compunction as he had shown in performing his part in the murders. This loathsome, misguided creature, whose greatest attribute was his inferiority complex, continued a lone campaign against Alice Margaret, the daughter of Eddy and Annie Elizabeth. At the height of the Ripper murders the child was knocked down by Netley's coach in Fleet Street or the Strand, said Sickert. She was nearly killed, but after months in St Bartholomew's Hospital she recovered.

The incident was repeated in February 1892. On this occasion Netley charged along Drury Lane in his carriage just as Alice Margaret was crossing the road with an elderly relative who was helping to bring her up. The child was not so badly hurt on this occasion because she was spun out of the way of the wheels when the corner of the carriage struck her. She was taken to hospital unconscious but released after a day, having been treated for concussion. The elderly woman who had been with her later described the driver of the coach to Sickert. He knew at once it was Netley. It was with grim satisfaction that he recounted to his son that after the coach struck Alice Margaret on this occasion it careered into the kerbstone and the wheel was damaged. Unable to get the coach moving again, and desperate that he should not be apprehended, Netley was seen to jump down from the cab, and in the ensuing confusion he passed through the crowd and fled to Westminster Bridge, several passers-by in hot pursuit. Despite his smallness, however, Netley was fleet of foot, and he threw off his pursuers long before he reached the Thames. Sickert heard later that for some inexplicable reason Netley threw himself into the river from Westminster Pier, where he drowned. That, said the old painter, was the end of Netley, and the final chapter of the Jack the Ripper mystery was closed.

Netley was difficult to investigate. To begin at the beginning, there was no proof that he had even existed.

After six weeks of research, Karen de Groot discovered Netley's birth certificate. He was born in May 1860 in Kensington, and christened John Charles Netley. The certificate showed he was the son of an omnibus conductor, which at least made it likely that he would have become something similar. It was a period when the old song about following in father's footsteps was more apposite than today.

Even though a man may do nothing all his life, one thing is certain: he will leave a record of his birth and a record of his death. John Netley definitely existed. Now it was time to examine the most positive part of Sickert's narrative about Netley, his alleged suicide in the Thames in February 1892.

But according to the records at Somerset House, no John Netley did die in 1892; nor, it was later proved, did such a death occur in 1891 or 1893. And the Thames Police have no record of a suicide for the whole of February 1892.

Nothing appeared that looked anything like an explanation until Karen de Groot found this brief report in The Observer of 7th February 1892:

> Shortly before one o'clock yesterday, attempted suicide from Westminster Pier. A respectably dressed young man took off his boots and coat and hid them under a seat in a waiting room, jumped off the pier and swam for a few yards. Rescued by Mr Douglas, Pier Master, but struggled. Taken to Westminster Hospital. Gave name of Nickley, but refused his address.

This episode tallies so closely with Sickert's account that it seems beyond coincidence. The attempted suicide reported in The Observer occurred at the same place and in the exact month that Sickert said Netley jumped into the Thames. Admittedly the man rescued by the Pier Master gave his name as Nickley and not Netley. But apart from the obvious similarity between the two names, there is also the fact that the name Nickley was false. No one called Nickley was alive at that time—certainly no one that could be described as a young man. Assuming the 'respectably dressed young man' of the Observer report to have been anything between fourteen and thirty-five, I checked the eighty-four registers of births at Somerset House covering every month from 1878 back to 1857, but no one called Nickley was born in those years. The registers almost invariably jump from Nickless to Nicklin. Nor does the name Nickley appear in the Dictionary of British Surnames. The odd behaviour of the young man in giving this false name (so similar to Netley), and in refusing to give his address, is consistent with him having something to hide, as Netley most certainly had. The attempted suicide of Nickley corresponds closely to the reported suicide of Netley; the conclusion that they were one and the same is irresistible. That Sickert imagined Netley had drowned is understandable. This part of his story obviously relies on what someone else had told him. The records of Westminster Hospital, where 'Nickley' was taken, are now lost, so it is impossible to confirm the episode beyond the report in The Observer.

There was still some way to go. It had not yet been shown that Netley was a cab-driver or that he was anything to do with Cleveland Street or the Whitechapel Murders; the two attempts on Alice Margaret's life were equally unsubstantiated; and if Netley did not die in the Thames in 1892, when did he die?

Any record of the two attempts on the child's life seemed non-existent. Police and hospital records—such as had survived two wars—were useless. For a long time it seemed impossible to verify the story of the two incidents, until a copy of the Illustrated Police News of Saturday, 6th October 1888 came to the rescue. It will be remembered that Sickert said the first attempt on Alice Margaret's life took place in Fleet Street or the Strand at the height of the Ripper murders. The report said:

> Shortly after four o'clock on Monday afternoon [two days after the 'double event'] a little girl was run over by a hansom cab in Fleet-street, opposite Anderton's Hotel. The child was placed in the cab and conveyed to St Bartholomew's Hospital in an insensible condition, one of the wheels having passed over her body. From the serious nature of the injuries the little sufferer is not likely to recover.

Once again, though no names are mentioned, the story tallies too closely with Sickert's version of events to be coincidence. The time and place of the accident are exactly right. Sickert claimed Alice Margaret was nearly killed in the collision. This is confirmed by the report. Finally, he said she was taken to St Bartholomew's Hospital, just like the child in the newspaper story.

The gaps were beginning to disappear, but still there was no indication of what happened to Netley after he left hospital following his suicide attempt in 1892.

Here it is interesting to recall the content of the Masonic code, described in Chapter 10. The Protocols declare that a Freemason will, in certain circumstances, die by his own greatest achievement. It has been shown that Sir William Gull, in his element certifying the troublesome as insane on behalf of the Masons, was himself certified and incarcerated under the name Thomas Mason.

By a miracle of research, Karen de Groot discovered that when Netley did die it was in such an 'accident' that he too seems finally to have fallen victim of those he wished desperately to serve. For Netley, whose best achievements on behalf of the Masons were ferrying the Masonic killers around in his coach, and later using his coach in his mistaken attempts at eliminating Alice Margaret, died under the wheels of his own vehicle. The 'accident' did not happen until 1903, but it seems a similar happening occurred about 1897, from which he recovered. The astonishing part of this story is the place of Netley's death. The unlikely notion of a man falling under the wheels of his own coach is difficult enough to accept. When we learn that he died at Clarence Gate, Regent's Park, the memory of the wry Masonic humour that surrounded Gull's removal cannot be erased from the mind.

The story of Netley's death appeared in two local newspapers. The Marylebone Mercury and West London Gazette of 26th September 1903 reported:

> SHOCKING FATALITY IN PARK ROAD
>
> An inquest was held by Coroner Danford Thomas on Wednesday afternoon on the body of John Netley aged 43 years.
>
> Evidence was given to the effect that the deceased was in the employ of Messrs Thompson & McKay, carmen, to the Great Central Railway Company. On Sunday afternoon he was driving one of their pair horse vans along Park Road, Regent's Park, when one of the wheels of the van collided with a stone rest, and he was thrown from his seat into the roadway. As the deceased lay on the ground, one of the horses kicked him on the head and the wheel passed over him. He had no strap round him.
>
> Dr Norris of 25 Park Road said he was called and saw the deceased lying dead in the roadway near Clarence Gate. There were extensive injuries to the head. Death, which was due to fracture of the skull, was instantaneous. The jury returned a verdict of accidental death.

The Marylebone Times of the previous day reported Netley's father as saying he had fallen from a van about six years before, but had fully recovered from the effects of the accident.

That Sickert got the story of Netley's death wrong is stronger support of the fact that he was telling the truth. If Sickert had been a fantasist who had created a sensational story by which to be remembered (hardly necessary for a man acknowledged as the greatest English painter since Turner) then he would have been eager to get details right, and certainly would have used the Clarence Gate death to 'sell' the story.

The truth about Jack the Ripper has already been so obscured by wanton speculation that it is dangerous to depart from certainties. But there are inevitable gaps in the evidence now traceable. For instance, only informed speculation can help to explain Netley's death. If indeed it was Masonic, why would his erstwhile masters have disposed of him at all? The answer to this must lie in Netley's repeated attempts to gain the favour of the Masons by such acts as his attempts on the life of the infant Alice Margaret. His 'help', beyond his part in the Ripper episode, was unsolicited and would no doubt have outraged the Masonic elders in whose name he mistakenly imagined he was working. The fact that in 1903 he was no more than a carman seems to indicate that his fortunes had taken a tumble. Did he too make the fatal mistake of trying to blackmail the Masons with his knowledge of the Ripper murders?

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Yours truly, Jack the Ripper

I'm not a butcher,
I'm not a Yid,
Nor yet a foreign skipper,
But I'm your own light-hearted friend,
Yours truly, Jack the Ripper.

'The above queer verse', as it was described by Sir Melville Macnaghten, was one of the more palatable communications received at Scotland Yard during the Ripper's reign of terror. It is important at this point to take an unbiased look at this welter of correspondence, hurled at the police and Press from all corners of the globe. It has been estimated that Scotland Yard received about a thousand letters a week at the height of the murders. Many were from people with suggestions about how to snare the Ripper. Hundreds more were from cranks who derived a perverted sense of fun from sending crude little notes signed 'Jack the Ripper'.

Almost every theory so far expounded in print has relied to a large extent on several of these letters purporting to be from the murderer. The messages arrived in all shapes, sizes and forms, and from all over the world. Some were in conventional envelopes, some in home-made envelopes, some on postcards, some scrawled on telegram forms. They were in every conceivable style of handwriting, some obviously educated, others by educated people imitating an illiterate style and yet others by genuinely uneducated pranksters. The one factor common to most of the correspondence is the opening address, 'Dear Boss', and the signature, 'Jack the Ripper'.

These were in imitation of the first two missives received. From the fact that the second, a postcard, referred to the contents of the first, a grubby letter, it has been concluded they are of common authorship. The handwriting does differ markedly, but as the second message was received before the first had been published it is almost certain the two pieces of correspondence do come—if not from the same individual, at least from the same group of people.

I have closely examined the contents of the Letters file at Scotland Yard, and feel that only one of the hundreds of letters received is at all likely to have come from Jack the Ripper.

If this is true it cripples many previous theories about the identity of the Ripper, most effectively Harrison's elaborate theory indicting Prince Eddy's tutor, James Kenneth Stephen. Harrison's thesis is built almost entirely upon a comparison of the poetry of Stephen and the 'style' he detects in the so-called Ripper correspondence. He cites as the work of the Ripper poems, postcards and letters which are definitely of different authorship.

Donald Rumbelow was almost at the truth when he wrote:

> Few of the letters signed 'Jack the Ripper' or purporting to come from him, are of any real value—in fact, a ruthless weeding-out process leaves only two.

In fact Rumbelow decided three messages were genuine, but the first two—being from the same source—he counted as one. These are the letter posted on 28th September and the follow-up postcard from the same group of hoaxers received after the double murder. Rumbelow's second vote of confidence goes to the 'From Hell' letter received on October 16th. The first letter is important because it was the first use of the name Jack the Ripper:

> 25. Sept. 1888.
>
> Dear Boss
>
> I keep on hearing the police have caught me but they won't fix me just yet. I have laughed when they look so clever and talk about being on the right track. That joke about Leather Apron gave me real fits. I am down on whores and I shan't quit ripping them till I do get buckled. Grand work the last job was. I gave the lady no time to squeal. How > can they catch me now. I love my work and want to start again. You will soon hear of me with my funny little games. I saved some of the proper red stuff in a ginger beer bottle over the last job to write with but it went thick like glue and I can't use it. Red ink is fit enough I hope ha ha. The next job I do I shall clip the lady's ears off and send to the police officers just for jolly wouldn't you. Keep this letter back till I do a bit more work, then give it out straight. My knife is nice and sharp I want to get to work right away if I get a chance. Good luck.

>
> Yours truly
> Jack the Ripper
>
> Dont mind me giving the trade name.

Then at right angles to the rest of the letter:

> wasnt good enough to post this before I got all the red ink off my hands curse it. No luck yet. They say I'm a doctor now ha ha.

The postcard received after the double murder said:

> I was not codding dear old Boss when I gave you the tip, you ll hear about saucy Jacky s work tomorrow double event this time number one squealed a bit couldnt finish straight off. had not time to get ears for police thanks for keeping last letter back till I got to work again,
>
> Jack the Ripper

The last two sentences are direct allusions to the contents of the first letter, which had not been published by the time this second message was received. Rumbelow believes this is the work of the murderer for the same reason that every major author on the subject has believed the same thing. He wrote:

> The second letter was posted on 30 September, the day of the 'double event'. . . . Details of the 'double event' were not known until they were published in the newspaper on the following day, Monday 1 October, and for twenty-four hours at least they would have been confined to Whitechapel and some of central London. Only the murderer could have known that he had not been able to finish the first victim off and had not had time enough to 'clip her ears'.

Few authors on the subject of the Ripper have paid enough attention to detail. Many have taken the word of previous writers without checking basic facts for themselves. Hence the continuing misunderstanding about the addresses of the victims—resolved in Chapter 9. It has resulted, too, in one of the greatest fallacies concerning the murders—namely that the 'double event' postcard was posted on Sunday, 30th September, when only the killer could have known the details of the murders.

Donald McCormick, Tom Cullen, Robin Odell, Daniel Farson and Donald Rumbelow have all made the misleading statement that the postcard was mailed on Sunday, 30th September. If any one of them had looked at the postmark they would have seen it read, 'OC 1', which meant it could well have been posted on Monday, 1st October, when full details of the double murder were general knowledge. This seems to be confirmed by the records department of the Post Office, who point out that in 1888, as now, there were collections from post-boxes made each Sunday. They say that any letter posted on a Sunday would have been stamped with that date. So if the 'double event' message having been posted on the Sunday as we have been led to believe, it would almost certainly have borne the postmark 'SEP 30'.

The other letter Rumbelow selects is that which was sent to Mr George Lusk, chairman of the Whitechapel Vigilance Committee, which had been set up to patrol the streets after the murder of Annie Chapman. Part of a kidney was enclosed with the letter, which read:

> From hell
>
> Mr Lusk
> Sir
> I send you half the > Kidne I took from one women > prasarved it for you tother piece I > fried and ate it was very nise. I > may send you the bloody knif that > took it out if you only wate a whil > longer
> signed Catch me when > you can
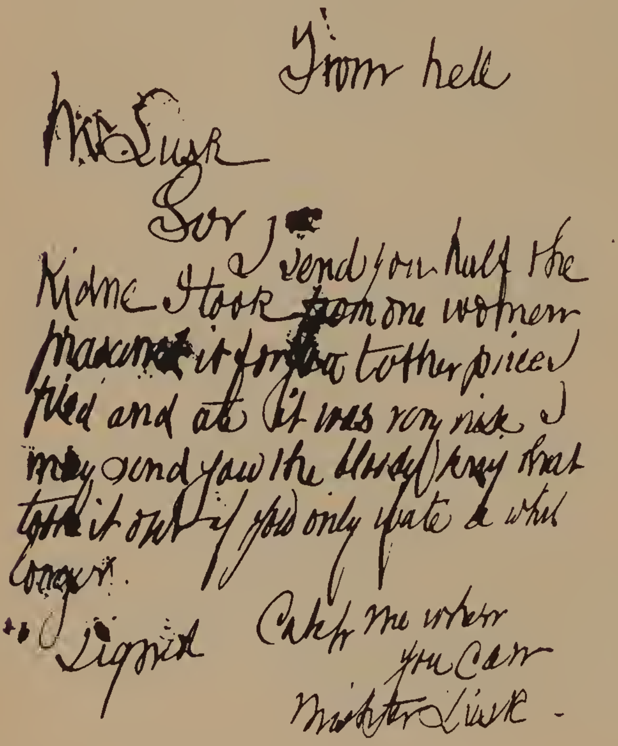
> Mishter Lusk

Note that the one letter claimed to be genuine is not in fact signed, 'Jack the Ripper'. This letter did more than any other to whip up panic in the East End, the reign of terror so sacred to the Masons. I do not believe it to be the work of an illiterate man, although the writer took pains to make it appear so. An illiterate is far more likely to write 'nife' than 'knif', or 'wile' rather than 'whil'. And someone who believes 'wait' is rendered as 'wate' is unlikely to know the sound bludee is rendered as 'bloody', which the writer spells correctly.



From hell

Mr Lusk
Sor
I send you half the Kidne I took from one women
prasarved it for you tother piece
I fried and ate it was very nise I may send you the bloody knif that took it out if you only wate a whil
longer.
signed Catch me when you can
Mishter Lusk

The Ripper's 'From hell' letter

It has been held that the section of kidney enclosed with the letter provides strong evidence that this communication is genuinely from the killer or killers. The first reaction of the Press, before any examination had been carried out, was that the kidney had been taken from a dog, or that the letter was a medical student's prank. What finally convinced many people that the letter must have come from the Ripper, was the reported outcome of the examination of the kidney by Dr Openshaw, pathological curator of the London Hospital Museum. Dr Openshaw was said to have stated that it was a 'ginny' kidney such as would be found in an alcoholic (like most of her class, Eddowes was an alcoholic), that it belonged to a woman of about forty-five (Eddowes was forty-three), that it had been removed in the previous three weeks (Eddowes had been killed two weeks and two days before the kidney was received by Lusk) and that it was in an advanced state of Bright's disease (the kidney remaining in Eddowes's body was in exactly the same state). What seemed conclusive proof that it was indeed part of Eddowes's kidney was the reported fact that two inches of renal artery remained in her body. The renal artery is about three inches long—and one inch of artery was attached to the kidney sent to Lusk.

Anyone convinced the identity of the murderer is revealed in a previous theory has only to eliminate from his mind the 'evidence' of all correspondence except the Lusk letter to see that the case against most suspects is pretty threadbare.

The authenticity of the Lusk letter seems to be confirmed by the findings of Canadian handwriting expert Miss C. M. MacLeod, who wrote in The Criminologist in 1968, 'If there was only one real Jack the Ripper, I should cast my vote for the writer of sample 1 (the Lusk letter)'.

But if this is true who wrote the message? More than one murderer made up the lethal identity of Jack the Ripper. The identity of the writer is to be found in the same analysis of the writing. Miss MacLeod wrote:

> I would have looked for this killer among such men as cab-drivers, who had a legitimate excuse to be anywhere at any time. I should have sought a hail-fellow-well-met who liked to eat and drink; who might attract women of the class he preyed on by an overwhelming animal charm. I would say in fact he was a latent homosexual (suggested by lower-zone strokes returning on the wrong side of the letter) and passed as a 'man's man'; the roistering blade who made himself the life and soul of the pub and sneered at women as objects to be used and discarded.

In saying also that 'This writer was capable of conceiving any atrocity, and of carrying it out in an organized way', Miss MacLeod may be accused of being wise after the event. But her character sketch of the killer based upon his handwriting is remarkable, and banishes all doubts as to the author of the letter 'From Hell'. It is a perfect description of Netley.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Maniacs and Woman-haters

Despite all the anti-social diseases that plague modern society, a cross-section of humanity in any major city is unlikely to reveal great numbers of lunatics, woman-haters or sexual maniacs. Woman-haters especially are almost unknown. In considering Jack the Ripper from a present-day standpoint then, it would seem reasonable to suggest that if a man could be shown to have had a strong hatred of women, on that fact alone he should rank as a major suspect. Much of the sympathy that Michael Harrison's theory has earned is based on the undisputed fact that James Kenneth Stephen hated women. This is one of Stephen's verses:

If all the harm that women have done
Were put in a bundle and rolled into one,
  Earth would not hold it,
  The sky could not enfold it,
It could not be lighted nor warmed by the sun;
  Such masses of evil
  Would puzzle the devil
And keep him in fuel while Time's wheels run.

Because misogyny is today such an unusual phenomenon, it seems plausible to argue that anyone displaying Stephen's disgust with the feminine sex is inescapably a strong candidate for the Ripper. This argument falls down rather badly, however, in the face of evidence contained in the Scotland Yard Suspects file. The file reveals that in 1888 lunatics, sexual maniacs and woman-haters were almost two a penny.

It contains some amazing stories, and provides a rich commentary on the sort of world in which Jack the Ripper operated, and an alarming insight into the sort of effect the Whitechapel Murders had on many minds. A five-page report written in the hand of a man who walked into Scotland Yard on Boxing Day, 1888, is an outstanding example:

> I beg to draw your attention to the attitude of Dr Morgan Davies of — Street, Houndsditch, E. with respect to these murders. But, my suspicions attach to him principally in connection with the last one—committed in-doors.
>
> Three weeks ago, I was a patient in the London Hospital, in a private ward (Davis) with a Dr Evans, suffering from typhoid who used to be visited almost nightly by Dr Davies, when the murders were our usual subject of conversation.
>
> Dr Davis [sic] always insisted on the fact that the murderer was a man of sexual powers almost effete, which could only be brought into action by some strong stimulus—such as sodomy. He was very positive on this point, that the murderer performed on the women from behind—in fact, per ano. At that time he could have had no information, any more than myself, about the fact that the post mortem examination revealed that semen was found up the woman's rectum, mixed with her faeces [this is quite untrue].
>
> Many things, which would seem trivial in writing, seemed to me to connect him with the affair—for instance—he is himself a woman-hater. Although a man of powerful frame, &, (according to the lines on his sallow face) of strong sexual passions. He is supposed, however, by his intimates, never to touch a woman.
>
> One night, when five medicos were present, quietly discussing the subject, & combatting his argument that the murderer did not do these things to obtain specimens of uteri (wombs) but that—in his case—it was the lust of murder developed from sexual lust—a thing not unknown to medicos, he acted (in a way which fairly terrified those five doctors) the whole scene. He took a knife, 'buggered' an imaginary woman, cut her throat from behind; then, when she was apparently laid prostrate, ripped and slashed her in all directions in a perfect state of frenzy.
>
> Previously to this performance I had said: "After a man had done a thing like this, reaction would take place, & he would collapse, & be taken at once by the police, or would attract the attention of the bystanders by his exhausted condition?" Dr D— said "NO! he would recover himself when the fit was over & be as calm as a lamb. I will show you!" Then he began his performance. At the end of it he stopped, buttoned up his coat, put on his hat, & walked down the room with the most perfect calmness. Certainly his face was as pale as death, but that was all.

It was only a few days ago, after I was positively informed by the Editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette" that the murdered woman last operated on had been sodomized—that I thought —"How did he know? His acting was the most vivid I ever saw. Henry Irving was a fool to it. Another point. He argued that the murderer did not want specimens of uteri, but grasped them, & slashed them off in his madness as being the only hard substances which met his grasp, when his hands were madly plunging into the abdomen of his victim.

I may say that Dr Davies was for some time House Physician at the London Hospital, Whitechapel, that he has lately taken this house in Castle St Houndsditch; that he has lived in the locality of the murders for some years; & that he professes his intention of going to Australia shortly should he not quickly make a success in his new house.

Roslyn D'O Stephenson

PS I have mentioned this matter to a pseudo-detective named George Marsh of 24 Pratt St., Camden Town N.W. with whom I have made an agreement, (enclosed herewith) to share any reward which he may derive from my information.

R.D'OS

PPS I can be found at any time through Mr Iles of the "Prince Albert", St Martin's Lane—in a few minutes—I live close to; but do not desire me to give my address.

R.D'OS

Gummed to the statement is a torn sheet of paper dated 24th December 1888 and bearing the words:

I hereby agree to pay to Dr R D'O Stephenson (also known as "Sudden Death") one half of any or all rewards or monies received by me on a/c of the conviction of Dr Davies for wilful murder.

Roslyn D'O Stephenson MD
29 Castle St WC
St Martin's Lane

One can only wonder at the state of mind of the author of this intriguing document. Apart from the dubious content of the accusation, it is full of so many imponderables it is hard to know where to begin in analysing it.

The inconsistencies begin with Dr Roslyn D'O Stephenson (can that be genuine?) being obviously unprepared to give the address of his suspect, because he describes him as 'Dr Morgan Davies of — Street, Houndsditch, E'. Yet later he thwarts his own intentions by explaining that Dr Davies has taken a house in Castle Street, thus filling in his own blank. He then mentions by way of a postscript that he has struck a bargain with a man for whom he clearly has little respect, describing him as he does as a 'pseudo-detective'. He next expresses his desire not to give his own address, but appends an agreement on which his address is written. The address itself is curious, for it also is in Castle Street, but a Castle Street in the W.C. district, not Houndsditch. The agreement attached to the statement is absurd, for it is a promise to pay Dr R. D'O Stephenson money—yet it is signed by Dr R. D'O Stephenson himself! The situation becomes even more intriguing when, several papers down in the file, one discovers another statement, this one by Stephenson's 'partner'. It was made on Christmas Eve. The statement is written by Inspector J. Roots at the Yard, who reports:

> Mr George Marsh, ironmongery salesman (now, and for two months out of employment) 24, Pratt St, Camden Town, came here at 7 p.m. and made the following statement:—
>
> "About a month ago at the Prince Albert P.H., Upper St Martin's Lane, I met a man named Stephenson and casually discussed the murders in Whitechapel with him. From that time to the present I have met him there two or three times a week and we have on each occasion discussed the murders in a confidential manner. He has tried to tell me how I could capture the man if I went his way to work. I simply told him I should go my own way about it and sooner or later I'd have him. I told him I was an amateur detective and that I had been for weeks looking for the culprit. He explained to me how the murders were committed. He said they were committed by a woman hater after the forthcoming manner:-
>
> "The murderer would induce a woman to go up a back street or room and to excite his passion would 'bugger' her and cut her throat at the same time with his right hand, holding on by the left.
>
> "He illustrated the action. From his manner I am of opinion he is the murderer in the first six cases, if not the last one.

> "Today Stephenson told me that Dr Davies of Houndsditch (I don't know the address although I have been there and could point it out) was the murderer and he wished me to see him. He drew up an agreement to share the reward on the conviction of Dr Davies. I know that agreement is valueless but it secured his handwriting. I made him under the influence of drink thinking that I should get some further statement but in this I failed as he left me to see Dr Davies and also to go to Mr Stead of the Pall Mall Gazette with an article for which he expected £2. He wrote the article in the Pall Mall Gazette in relation to the writing on the wall about Jews. He had £4 for that. I have seen letters from Mr Stead in his possession about it; also a letter from Mr Stead refusing to allow him money to find out the Whitechapel Murderer.
>
> "Stephenson has shown me a discharge as a patient from the London Hospital. The name Stephenson is obliterated and that of Davies is marked in red ink. I do not know the date.
>
> "Stephenson is now at the common lodging house No. 29 Castle St., St Martin's Lane, W.C. and has been there three weeks. His description is:- Age 48, height 5 ft 10 in, full face, sallow complexion, moustache heavy—mouse coloured—waxed and turned up, hair brown turning grey, eyes sunken. When looking at a stranger generally has an eyeglass. Dress, grey suit and light brown felt hat—all well worn; military appearance: says he has been in 42 battles: well educated.
>
> "The agreement he gave me I will leave with you and will render any assistance the Police may require.
>
> "Stephenson is not a drunkard: he is what I call a regular soaker—can drink from 8 o'clock in the morning until closing time but keep a clear head.

Despite a marginal note by Roots that Stephenson's agreement is attached, there is no longer any sign of it in the file. There is one last report on this episode, a character sketch of Stephenson by Roots, written after Stephenson's visit to Scotland Yard on Boxing Day. Under the subject heading 'Whitechapel Murders, Marsh, Davies & Stephenson', Roots says:

> With reference to the statement of Mr George Marsh, of 24th inst., regarding the probable association of Dr Davies and Stephenson with the murders in Whitechapel.
>
> I beg to report that Dr Stephenson came here this evening and wrote the attached statement of his suspicions of Dr Morgan Davies, Castle St, Houndsditch; and also left with me his agreement with Marsh as to the reward. I attach it.

> When Marsh came here on 24th I was under the impression that Stephenson was a man I had known 20 years. I now find that impression was correct. He is a travelled man of education and ability, a doctor of medicine upon diplomas of Paris & New York: a major from the Italian Army—he fought under Garibaldi: and a newspaper writer. He says that he wrote the article about Jews in the Pall Mall Gazette, that he occasionally writes for that paper, and that he offered his services to Mr Stead to track the murderer. He showed me a letter from Mr Stead, dated Nov 30 1888, about this and said that the result was the proprietor declined to engage upon it. He has led a Bohemian life, drinks very heavily, and always carries drugs to sober him and stave off delirium tremens.
>
> He was an applicant for the Orphanage Secretaryship at the last election.

The statements were passed to Inspector Swanson but no action appears to have been taken to investigate Dr Morgan Davies (who surely had to be classed as a suspect if the Ripper were still on the loose, however unlikely Stephenson's story), and no further interview with either Stephenson or Marsh appears to have been undertaken. This is odd, especially in view of the fact that from the contents of his own statement and the suspicions expressed by Marsh, Stephenson was more likely to have been the murderer than Davies. Not only was his behaviour before Marsh identical to that which he attributed to Dr Davies, his own statement seems to be strewn with deliberate clues pointing the finger at himself. That his suspect and himself both lived in streets of the same name; that he on one occasion alluded to his suspect as 'Dr D—', which would also fit himself; and that he referred to himself as 'Sudden Death' all support the argument that he would have been investigated if Jack the Ripper had still been at large.

The value of these strange allegations and counter-allegations goes beyond psychological insight into the effect of the Ripper and a behind-the-scenes look at the day-to-day problems of the men at the Yard. The essential fact is that the dozens of papers in the Suspects file indicate the police knew the Whitechapel Murders had ended with Kelly's death on 9th November. This is true, because no allegations after that date were followed up by the Yard. Arrests certainly did not cease immediately. As far as the average bobby on the beat and his superiors at the station were concerned, Jack the Ripper was still at large and might strike again at any time. But the Yard obviously knew something, or they would not have been content to let the allegation reports build up without taking any action to investigate suspects. Farson has suggested that police activity on the case ceased because they knew Druitt was the killer. This is untrue, for the Yard papers show no real investigation into the case took place after the death of Kelly, seven weeks before Druitt's body was found. The allegations against Stephenson and Davies, for instance, were made on Christmas Eve and Boxing Day respectively, and Druitt was not retrieved from the Thames until 31st December. Unless the police already knew who the murderer or murderers were, they would certainly not have received Marsh's statement accusing Stephenson on 24th December and done nothing to investigate it. It appears no steps would have been taken at all, even to obtain a character sketch of Stephenson, if the suspect himself had not turned up of his own accord two days later.

Another woman-hater story emanated from the office of the Chief Constable of Rotherham on 5th October 1888. The Suspects file contains the correspondence received from Rotherham but there are no copies of Inspector Abberline's replies. The content of these can be guessed, however, and the Rotherham letters are what count:

> Sir
>
> I have the honour to inform you that I have just had a visit from a man named James Oliver, residing at 3 Westfield View, Rotherham, a discharged soldier of the 5th Lancers, who is firmly persuaded in his own mind that he knows the perpetrator of the Whitechapel Murders. He was perfectly sober and made his statement clearly and circumspectly and it is of such a nature that I consider it should be laid before you without delay.
>
> He states that there was a man named "Dick Austen" who served with him in R. Troop in the 5th Lancers, who previous to joining the Army had been a sailor, he would now be about 40 years of age—5–8 in height, an extremely powerful and active man, but by no means heavy or stout. Hair and eyes light. Had, in service, a very long fair moustache, may have grown heavy whiskers and beard. His face was fresh, hard and healthy looking. He had a small piece bitten off the end of his nose. Although not mad, he was not right in his mind, "he was too sharp to be right". He used to be very temperate, but sometimes used to get out of bed in the night and walk about the barrack room. He never would say where he came from and often said he had no friends.

He used to sometimes brag of what he had done previously to enlisting in the way of violence but more often of what he could do, "as though qualified to do anything".

While in the Regiment he was never known to go with women and when his comrades used to talk about them in the barrack room he used to grind his teeth—he was in fact a perfect woman hater. He used to say if he had his will he would kill every whore and cut her inside out, that when he left the Regiment there would be nothing before him but the gallows.

He had gone through great hardships and rough times in various parts of the world, having been a sailor in sailing ships, he was a very sharp and witty man and a capital scholar. Oliver believes he could recapture his handwriting. He was most plausible. His hands were long and thin.

He had 12 months for breaking into the Orderly Room and tearing up his defaulter sheets.

He is believed to have drawn his deferred pay (about 24£) and used to say he would make London his home.

He is a man who is most abstemious and will live on dry bread. "He used many a day to save his money and live on what was knocking about in the Barrack Room".

Probably he would always be respectably dressed but more often the description of a sailor than a soldier.

Oliver's idea is that he would probably be working at Docks or on board ship by day—possibly, if the murderer, that he may take short voyages on some vessel and commit the murders shortly before leaving—the dates of the murders tally with this theory.

"He always had revenge against women brooding in his mind."

I have cautioned the man Oliver to say nothing about this, and he tells me that he has not as yet told anyone his suspicions excepting his own wife.

I have also promised him that unless his suspicions prove true, or of material help that his statement to me will be considered in confidence.

I have the honour to be
Sir
Your obedient servant
L. R. Barick [?] Captain, C.C.

At this stage, after only four Ripper murders, this sort of clue was being followed up, as Abberline's report shows:

> Referring to annexed correspondence from the Chief Constable, Rotherham, I beg to report that I have caused an insertion in the Informations asking if anything was known in Divisions respecting Austen giving his description and other particulars . . . but up to the present time with no result.
>
> Perhaps it would be well to ask the Chief Constable of Rotherham, to cause James Oliver to be seen again and requested to furnish the date of Austen's discharge from the 5th Lancers, giving the name of the Station discharged from, and any other information.

A further letter from Rotherham dated October 19th said:

> Sir
>
> I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, relative to mine of 5th instant, and to inform you in reply that I have seen James Oliver this morning, he is unable to state the date or place of Austen's discharge—but as stated in my former letter he is positive that Austen intended to reside in London. Application to the 5th Lancers at Aldershot would produce the date and place of discharge, and should he be entitled to draw any future deferred pay or Army Reserve Pay, his whereabouts could by that means be ascertained—Oliver says several photographic groups of the Troop were taken, he has no copy, but could, if a copy was obtainable, pick out Austen—I should like a copy of some or any of the alleged letters from the murderer, as Oliver, as stated before, believes he could identify Austen's handwriting.
>
> I have the honour to be etc.

The final letter in the episode came from Rotherham on October 24th:

> Sir
>
> In reply to your letter of yesterday's date enclosing Metropolitan Police Notice I have the honour to inform you that I have shown the facsimile handwriting to the man Oliver, who says that it is extremely like that of Austen, especially that of the letter (written with steel pen). That of the post card (written with quill) he does not think so like—although of course it is easy to see they are written by the same person—Austen's signature could of course be obtained from the Troop Pay Sheet of the 5th Lancers even if a large example of it could not be got from the same source.
>
> I have the honour to be etc.

And there the matter ended. No further investigation was carried out into the whereabouts of Dick Austen. In Chapter 8 evidence was produced to show that the truth about the Ripper was suppressed. For the cover-up to have been successful it would have been vital to have the assistance of the man in charge of the investigation, Inspector Abberline. Abberline was clearly not involved in any conspiracy when he first took over the case, for his notes in the Yard file show beyond doubt his untiring efforts to track the Ripper. The files relating to the first two murders, Nichols and Chapman, are crammed with reports. The Stride file is smaller than its predecessors, but still displays a fair amount of evidence that an investigation by Abberline was taking place. Eddowes, of course, was murdered in the City Police district, so her case was not handled by the Yard. But in Kelly's file there is nothing in the way of relevant reports about the murder investigation. Abberline's only contribution to this file is a report of the Kelly inquest, which is meaningless. The file shows that the Yard did virtually nothing to track the Ripper after the third week in October. A study of Abberline's paperwork indicates that it must have been about this time that he was brought into the cover-up. No other explanation justifies the fact that, in the middle of the Ripper's reign of terror, serious police activity simply stopped. Only Abberline's involvement in the conspiracy at the time of the Ripper would explain his reappearance less than a year later to run the Cleveland Street cover-up at police level. It will be remembered that in the Cleveland Street case Abberline deliberately allowed vital witnesses to escape from the male brothel and leave the country, while his men were watching the house.

The day before Kelly died, Warren resigned. Four days later Abberline abandoned the Ripper case. And even though three Ripper-like murders took place in Whitechapel after Kelly's death, Abberline did not return. He knew the Ripper's day was done.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

The Secrets of the Files

When Roy Jenkins became Home Secretary in 1974 he insisted on having personal control over all his department's secret files. Among other changes, this meant that requests from authors and researchers to see closed files would henceforth be examined by him and not, as before, by senior civil servants. His general policy has been to release documents to legitimate investigators, rather than withhold them as was the case before. This attitude, though unpopular among some of the higher members of the Civil Service, is an important step forward. As a result of it, I have been able to examine all the Home Office files on the Whitechapel Murders, which are due to remain closed until 1993.

With both the Scotland Yard and Home Office files in my hands, I at last had at my disposal the material 'Ripperologists' have been speculating about for nearly ninety years. The first point of interest is that Daniel Farson's claim, in the revised edition of his Jack the Ripper, that the Home Office file confirms Montague Druitt as the prime suspect, is wrong. There is no mention of Druitt anywhere in this file.

The early chapters of this book show the immense value of the files in getting the Ripper investigation back to basics. By drawing purely on the reports of policemen engaged on the murder investigation it has been possible to eliminate the distortion which the Ripper story has undergone at the hands of newspapers, film-makers and unreliable authors like Leonard Matters. The files also contain vital information which has been left until now to examine. The widely accepted rumour that they hold the solution to the mystery in any explicit sense is unfounded. There is no dossier, yellow with age and officially stamped, which reveals the identity of Jack the Ripper. The information embedded in the hundreds of secret documents only now available is more subtle than that—but it shows that crucial points in Sickert's narrative are perfectly correct.

Old Sickert provided considerable detail in his tale of the murders, and it will be useful to recall the essence of his account.

Mary Nichols, he claimed, was picked up in Netley's coach, ritually slaughtered as it jogged along the streets of the East End, and then her body was deposited in Buck's Row, where it was found.

Annie Chapman was likewise butchered in the vehicle and carried through the passage of 29 Hanbury Street to the backyard by Netley and Sir Robert Anderson, whose alleged part in the affair is examined in the final chapter.

Elizabeth Stride was a different case. She was drunk, and with a good-natured wave of her arm she walked off along the road when the carriage stopped and Gull offered her a lift. In her alcoholic stupor she was impervious to Gull's gentlemanly appeal to her vanity. Netley consequently parked the carriage in a back street and, leaving Gull alone inside it, he and Anderson followed the shambling form of Long Liz, said Sickert. At the corner of Berner Street Netley accosted Stride and walked with her into the darker areas further along the street, while Anderson kept watch on the opposite side of the road. Time was of the essence, for Stride's refusal of a lift in the carriage and the killers' subsequent action to nail her down had taken up more time than had been allowed for. Somehow the unholy trinity already knew that the woman who was to be their final victim was in the cells at Bishopsgate Police Station, and in common with most drunks arrested by the City Police, was likely to be released any time after midnight. Sickert said Netley went with Stride into the darkness of the yard behind the International Workers' Educational Club at No. 40 Berner Street, threw her down and cut her throat with one slash of his knife. The two men then returned to the carriage and drove on to Bishopsgate Street, now simply Bishopsgate, which they planned to patrol until their final victim appeared from the police station. How the killers knew she was under arrest for drunkenness, the old painter never explained.

By the time the carriage reached Bishopsgate Eddowes (whom the killers believed to be Kelly) had already been discharged, and she was found making her way back to her seedy doss-house in Spitalfields. There was no difficulty in luring her into the carriage, where the devilish work of killing her and Masonically mutilating her was carried out with a vengeance. In the hope that she would not be identified, part of her nose was cut off and her face was otherwise attacked. This, as far as the murderers were concerned, was the final killing—and as far as they knew this victim was the cause of the whole ghastly affair. When the work inside the vehicle was complete Netley drove to Mitre Street and he and Anderson heaved Eddowes out of the carriage and into the nearest corner of Mitre Square, by chance the darkest, where her intestines were thrown in a Masonic flourish over her shoulder.

It was not long before they realized they had eliminated the wrong woman, but they could not strike down Kelly immediately because of the upsurge of panic and vigilance on the part of police and residents that succeeded the double murder. When she was finally found Kelly was approached by Netley, whom she invited to her room. She too was drunk. The final details of Kelly's butchery Sickert never imparted to his son. He had known her as a friend and helper, and even after so long the memory was too painful for him, he explained.

There is evidence to support Sickert's claim that three of the women were not murdered at the spots where their bodies were found. Inspector Spratling's report of the Nichols murder in the Yard file records that he interviewed three people who were in Bucks' Row on the night she was murdered, 'none of whom heard any screams during the night, or anything to lead them to believe that the murder had been committed there'.

This was confirmed by Inspector Helston, who informed The Times on the morning of the murder that 'viewing the spot where the body was found, it seems difficult to believe that the woman received her death wounds there'. Beyond the discoloration ordinarily found on pavements, said Helston, there was no sign of stains. Dr Llewellyn, who was called to Bucks' Row to examine the body of Nichols, noted that there was only a small amount of blood in the gutter—'not more than would fill two wine glasses, or half a pint at the outside'. Rumbelow suggested that the apparent lack of blood may have been attributable to Nichols's clothing soaking most of it up, but the minutely detailed reports of her murder in the secret files provide no evidence to support this theory. It is unlikely that the clothes did absorb much blood. If they had it would have been instantly obvious, and the police would never have speculated, as they did, that the murder had taken place elsewhere. It is true that Inspector Spratling testified at the inquest that he had not seen any wheel-marks in the road, but this does not disprove Sickert's account. There was a day and night traffic in 'knacker's' wagons from the slaughterhouse in Bucks' Row. Presumably if the road conditions were such that they left no marks, neither would Netley's coach.

Annie Chapman was not murdered in the backyard of 29 Hanbury Street, where she was found. This is confirmed in a report by Chief Inspector Swanson in the Home Office file. It referred to a man called John Richardson who at 4.45 on the morning of the murder had gone to the yard and had sat on the steps, close to which the body was later found. Richardson was certain that if the corpse had been there then, he would have seen it. Medical evidence showed that Chapman had been dead at least twenty-five minutes when Richardson went to the yard. Swanson's report reads:

> If the evidence of Dr Phillips is correct, as to time of death, it is difficult to understand how it was that Richardson did not see the body when he went into the yard at 4.45 a.m., but as his clothes were examined, the house searched and his statement taken in which there was not a shred of evidence, suspicion could not rest upon him, although police specially directed their attention to him . . . He [Phillips] was called and saw the body at 6.20 a.m. and he then gives it as his opinion that death occurred about two hours earlier, viz: 4.20 a.m.

Phillips' exact words were, 'I should say the deceased had been dead at least two hours, and probably more'. Annie Chapman was murdered at 4.20 a.m. at the latest, but at a quarter to five her body was still not in the yard at 29 Hanbury Street. Where was it? Only Sickert offers an answer. It has been incorrectly reported by several authors that no blood was found anywhere but immediately adjacent to Chapman's body. The reporter of the East London Advertiser, likely to have been one of the first journalists on the scene, reported that blood was found not only in the passage leading to the yard but also in Hanbury Street itself. This is quite consistent with the body having been carried from Netley's coach into the yard, as is another major point which no one has yet explained. The uterus and its appendages were missing. Was this bloody trophy carried off by a mad lone killer, or was it simply left unnoticed in the place where she was murdered—Netley's coach?

Bearing in mind Sickert's description of the Stride murder, a hitherto unpublished statement recorded in the Home Office file is of crucial importance. A report by Chief Inspector Swanson says:

> 12.45 a.m. 30th Israel Schwartz of 22 Helen Street, Backchurch Lane stated that at that hour on turning into Berner Street from Commercial Road and had got as far as the gateway where the murder was committed he saw a man stop and speak to a woman, who was standing in the gateway. The man tried to pull the woman into the street, but turned her round and he threw her down on the footway and the woman screamed three times, but not very loudly. On crossing to the opposite side of the street, he saw a second man standing lighting his pipe. The man who threw the woman down called out apparently to the man on the opposite side of the road, "Lipski" and then Schwartz walked away, but finding that he was followed by the second man he ran as far as the railway arch, but the man did not follow so far. Schwartz cannot say whether the two men were together or known to each other. Upon being taken to the Mortuary, Schwartz identified the body as that of the woman he had seen and he thus describes the first man who threw the woman down:—age about 30, ht. 5ft. 5in. comp. fair, hair dark, small brown moustache, full face, broad shouldered; dress, dark jacket and trousers, black cap with peak, had nothing in his hands.
>
> Second man age 35, ht. 5ft. 11in. comp. fresh, hair light brown, moustache brown; dress, dark overcoat, old black hard felt hat, wide brim, had a clay pipe in his hand.

Schwartz's statement, which Swanson described as reliable, provides an uncanny parallel with Sickert's version of the murder. Admittedly Sickert did not mention that Netley had called out 'Lipski' a way of insulting Jews that became the vogue after a Jew of that name was hanged for murder in 1887. Nor did Sickert say that Anderson had followed anyone during his wait on the opposite side of the road. In fact he made no mention of anyone passing along Berner Street as the attack on Stride was taking place. Despite these omitted details, however, it cannot be denied that the scene Sickert described was exactly that witnessed by Schwartz. And even taking into account a marginal note on Schwartz's statement, written by Home Secretary Matthews, that 'the police apparently do not suspect the 2nd man whom Schwartz saw on the other side of the street', can there be any doubt that that man was keeping watch precisely as Sickert described? We have no proper physical description of Netley except the word of Sickert that he was short and the evidence of his birth certificate that shows he was twenty-eight years old at the time of the murders. The attacker seen by Schwartz was 'about 30, height five feet five inches', which fits closely.

---

[1] Later reports in the Home Office file make it clear that when the woman's assailant shouted 'Lipski' he was addressing Schwartz and not the man on the other side of the road as Schwartz at first imagined.

Despite speculation by Chief Inspector Swanson that the man Schwartz saw accosting Stride may not have been her murderer, logic shows he was. The man was seen to turn Stride round and throw her down on the footway, on the self-same spot where she was found murdered only fifteen minutes later. It is inconceivable that this man left her and by coincidence another man appeared and carried out the same sort of attack on the same woman at the same place? The timing of the assault witnessed by Schwartz confirms that the scene he saw was the killer in action. At the inquest on Stride at the Vestry Hall in Cable Street, Dr Blackwell said, 'I consulted my watch on my arrival (at the scene of the murder) and it was just 1.10'.

Asked how long Stride had been dead, he replied, 'From twenty minutes to half an hour when I arrived'.

Counting back the minutes from 1.10 when the doctor arrived, we find that death is unlikely to have taken place later than 12.50, which was five minutes after the attack witnessed by Schwartz. According to Blackwell's evidence, the time of death is more likely to have been in the ten minutes preceding 12.50, which sets the murder almost exactly at the time Schwartz saw Stride attacked.

Schwartz's statement provides incontrovertible evidence that Sickert's description of Stride's murder was accurate. There is no possibility of Sickert having adapted his story to fit Schwartz's observations because until now the Schwartz story has never been published. Even though he was the only person ever to witness a Ripper murder taking place, Schwartz was not called to give evidence at the inquest. Here was yet another piece of vital testimony that was suppressed.

Sickert's assertion that Gull induced unconsciousness in four of the victims by feeding them poisoned grapes is another bizarre aspect of the case that connects with previously unknown facts contained in the secret files.

Grapes have an established connection with Jack the Ripper, and have become bound up in the folklore of the case. Cullen quoted the case of an elderly Polish woman called Annie Tapper who told him she had sold a bunch of grapes to Jack the Ripper when she was a girl of nine. Cullen explained the presence of the grapes in the Ripper legend as being based on the 'erroneous' report that grapes had been found clutched in the dead hands of a murder victim. Robin Odell tends to support Cullen's notion that the report of the grapes was incorrect. He told me, 'Most "Ripperologists" follow the line of the inquest on Stride which reported that she had cachous in her hand when found dead, not grapes'.

It is true that at Stride's inquest it was stated that her hand contained cachous. How then did the story about grapes get into circulation? The answer is found in a report which appeared in The Times on Monday, 1st October which said 'In her right hand were tightly clasped some grapes, and in her left she held a number of sweetmeats'. Now it is curious that The Times should have been mistaken in such a detail because in all other respects its minute description of Stride's corpse was totally accurate. In a separate report, the Evening News confirmed the finding of grapes in Stride's right hand, and it even found a witness who claimed he had sold grapes to a man he had seen with Stride. Yet at the inquest Dr Phillips, the doctor who had tried to hide evidence implicating the Freemasons at the Chapman inquest, went out of his way to discredit the reports about grapes being found.

He said, 'I am convinced that the deceased had not swallowed either skin or seed of a grape within many hours of her death'.

But he admitted that stains on Stride's handkerchief were fruit stains.

The existence of the grapes is confirmed by a single statement of fact in the Home Office file. Chief Inspector Swanson wrote:

> two private enquiry men acting conjointly with Vigilance Committee and the press, upon searching a drain in the yard found a grape stem which was amongst the other matter swept from the yard after its examination by the police. . . .

Only the dubious evidence of Freemason Dr Phillips cast the truth in doubt, a truth supported not only by The Times and the Evening News but by the police themselves. As the quote from the Home Office file shows, the evidence of the grapes was literally swept down the drain. We are doubtless close to finding who was responsible when we remember that Phillips was an active participator in the cover-up, and also the person most likely to have removed the Masonic symbol laid out at Annie Chapman's feet.

A Berner Street greengrocer called Matthew Packer was reported in the Evening News as having sold grapes to a man with Stride shortly before her murder. Yet he was not called at the inquest. Why?

The explanation for this perversion of justice has been that Packer's story was probably untrue, that either he or the Evening News had invented it. But this is not so. The Scotland Yard file contains documents that show beyond doubt that Packer was regarded by the police as a key witness and that his claim to have sold grapes to Stride's murderer was being taken very seriously by the authorities. The documents are contained in the slim folder on the Stride murder. The first is a report by Sergeant Stephen White and is countersigned by Abberline and Superintendent Arnold:

> I beg to report that acting under the instructions of Insp. Abberline, I in company with P.C. Dolden, C.I. Dpt., made inquiries at every house in Berners Street, Commercial Road, on 30th ult, with a view to obtain information respecting the murder. Any information that I could obtain I noted in a book supplied to me for that purpose. About 9 a.m. I called at 44 Berner Street, and saw Matthew Packer, fruiterer in a small way of business. I asked him what time he closed his shop on the previous night. He replied, "Half past twelve in consequence of the rain. It was no good for me to keep open." I asked him if he saw anything of a man or woman going into Dutfield's Yard, or saw anyone standing about the street about the time he was closing his shop. He replied, "No, I saw no one standing about, neither did I see anyone go up the yard. I never saw anything suspicious or heard the slightest noise, and knew nothing about the murder until I heard of it this morning."
>
> I also saw Mrs Packer, Sarah Harrison and Harry Douglas residing in the same house but none of them could give the slightest information respecting the matter.

> On 4th inst, I was directed by Inspr. Moore to make further inquiry and if necessary see Packer and take him to the Mortuary. I then went to 44 Berner Street and saw Mrs Packer, who informed me that two detectives had called and taken her husband to the Mortuary. I then went towards the Mortuary where I met Packer with a man. I asked him where he had been. He said, "This detective asked me to go to see if I could identify the woman." I said, "Have you done so?" He said, "Yes, I believe she bought some grapes at my shop about 12 o'clock on Saturday." Shortly afterwards they were joined by another man. I asked the men what they were doing with Packer and they both said that they were detectives. I asked for their authority. One of them produced a card from a pocket book, but would not allow me to touch it. They then said that they were private detectives. They then induced Packer to go away with them. About 4 p.m. I saw Packer at his shop. While talking to him the two men drove up in a hansom cab, and after going into the shop they induced Packer to enter the cab, stating that they would take him to Scotland Yard to see Sir Charles Warren.
>
> From inquiry I have made there is no doubt that these are the two men referred to in the attached newspaper cutting who examined the drain in Dutfield's Yard on 2nd inst. One of the men had a letter in his hand addressed to Le Grand & Co., Strand.

Apart from showing that the police thought of Packer as an important witness (why else would they call on him three times and conduct him to the mortuary?), this report also indicates something peculiar was going on. White was obviously surprised to find that Packer was already at the mortuary and that he was in the company of two 'detectives', when he called at the shop on 4th October. Clearly knowing nothing about the activity of the so-called detectives, White set off for the Mortuary. On the way he met Packer, along with two men who claimed they were private detectives. They then induced Packer to go away with them. From the words White used to describe their egress it is plain he was suspicious of the two men and their unorthodox methods. His suspicion was justified. What sort of detectives take away a witness even before the police running the investigation have interviewed him? On the second occasion when White met the men they claimed again they were private detectives, but refused to let White handle their identity card. Then they made what appeared to be the most outrageous claim of all, that they were taking Packer to see Sir Charles Warren. Who were these men? What authority did they have for carrying on an investigation of Packer independently of the CID and uniformed men? How did they hope to get into the presence of Warren? What possible interest could the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police have had in the evidence of a lowly greengrocer?

Such questions could all be answered by the possibility that the so-called detectives were in fact journalists pulling a fast one over Sergeant White in order to get a good story, and to be first with the news. Such tactics were not unheard of. Just one thing disproves this—the second important document in the Yard file. This is an official statement by Packer, written in the unmistakable spider-like hand of Sir Charles Warren. This is strange indeed. It means Packer was taken to the Yard to see Warren by the two detectives. It must also mean they were not detectives but some sort of special investigators working quite independently of the CID and the uniformed branch. What is more important, they must have been working under the express instructions of Warren himself. For some reason Warren wanted to outwit his own officers, to find Packer and learn exactly what evidence he had before the policemen on the case got a chance to interview him. There are no other statements or reports in the file in Warren's own handwriting. He had taken no other direct part in the investigation except to erase the Masonic writing from the wall on the morning of 30th September. It is important to note that his undercover men were not engaged on the general details of the case. They had just two functions. The first was to pre-empt Packer's evidence about selling grapes to the Ripper. The second was to remove all trace of grapes from the drain in Dutfield's Yard.

If Warren had employed these men in the cause of justice he would have made sure that Packer's evidence was heard. But like Schwartz, the only other really important witness, he was not called at the inquest and his knowledge was suppressed.

Why should Warren have wanted to conceal the facts about the grapes? It has been shown that only evidence that could have helped identify the real killers was carefully and deliberately suppressed during the Ripper inquiries. But what possible use could grapes have been in identifying Jack the Ripper? Though it has never been recognized, grapes were a strong indication of the truth. Unusual in so many respects, Sir William Gull never went anywhere without raisins or grapes. In a letter written eleven years before the murders, and never before

Matthew Packer keeps a small shop in Berner St — has a few grapes in window. black & white
On Sat night — about — 11 p.m. a young man from 25-30 — about 5.7. with long black coat — buttoned up — soft — felt — hat — kind of Yankee hat — rather broad shoulders — rather quick in speaking.
rough voice. I sold him ½ pound black grapes
3d. A woman came up with him from Back Church ~~[illegible]~~ end (the lower end of street —) She was dressed in black frock & jacket — fur round bottom of jacket — a black crape bonnet, she was playing with a flower like a geranium ~~[illegible]~~ white outside & red inside — I identify the woman at the parish mortuary as the one I saw that night —
They passed by as though they were going up Com —
Road, but — instead of going up they crossed to the other

Packer's statement published, Gull incriminated himself. The letter, now in the library of the Royal College of Physicians, says:

> Dear Dr Duckworth
>
> When I read your remarks on my evidence [before the Lords' Committee on Intemperance] I thought you had misapprehended them. I have not a copy of the evidence I gave but what I intended to say was that when fatigued I personally refreshed myself by eating raisins.
>
> I have been in the habit of doing this for many years. I never travel or I may say go anywhere without raisins. They are always in my travelling bag and when in Scotland or the hills they form my luncheon with a biscuit and water. I eat no cane sugar but the sugar of the grape seems to supply the readiest refreshing material of which I have in my own person any experience. I take but little wine but I am not by any means a total abstainer. I believe in the use of wine as I have said in my evidence but I repeat that in my work when fatigued I prefer grapes and raisins and water.
>
> Yours sincerely
> William W. Gull
> 16 Dec 1877

I am not by any means a total abstainer. - I believe in the use of wine as I have said in my evidence but I repeat that in my work when fatigued
I prefer grapes & raisins & water
Yours sincerely
William W Gull
16 Dec 1877

Part of Gull's letter

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

The Third Man

By now it was a far cry from that weird morning in 'Hobo' Sickert's front room when he first divulged the details of his father's rambling saga. A year and a half of energetic research had culminated in a report which showed that the most unlikely story ever told about the Whitechapel Murders was indeed the long-sought solution. Walter Sickert appeared to have been transformed from a dubious story-teller into the one man in eighty-seven years of 'Ripperology' who had spoken the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. It remained only to examine his final statement, the sobering but by now no longer astonishing identification of Sir Robert Anderson as the third man.

Anderson was a Freemason of high standing, and he was appointed Assistant Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police on the very day Mary Nichols was murdered. As explained in Chapter 10, his non-Masonic predecessor, an able and enthusiastic detective called James Monro, had been the butt of an all-out attack from Warren for months. Warren was determined to be rid of Monro. And on the day he succeeded in removing him from office, Mary Nichols was killed.

There is no concrete evidence to incriminate Anderson in the murders. The worst that can be said of him is that he was a liar, and that his behaviour at the time of the murders was highly suspicious. He is arguably the most unlikely of the three men named to have been connected with the Ripper crimes in any direct sense.

His strange conduct began almost immediately after he took over as head of the CID. He stepped on to the scene hours after the death of Nichols, did his new job unremarkably for a week, and the day after the murder of Annie Chapman he left for a holiday in Switzerland—hardly the most responsible action to have taken. The Metropolitan Police area was a seething cauldron of vice and crime. Violence all over England was reaching new and disquieting heights, and in London the situation was critical. In addition to this existing turmoil a cold-blooded killer who even at that stage was regarded as a maniac was on the loose in the East End of London, having struck twice already. Yet Sir Robert Anderson deserted all his new responsibilities to go on holiday! In his autobiography The Lighter Side of My Official Life Anderson gave the reason for his untimely departure as ill-health. If he was so ill that he could not cope with his duties at a time when he was vitally needed, it is surprising he was appointed Assistant Commissioner at all. And it is intriguing that with such a serious incapacity he was able to make the long journey to Switzerland.

One other comment sheds light on Anderson's character but, it must be admitted, by no means incriminates him. When referring directly to the Ripper case he lied outrageously. In his memoirs he stated quite categorically that he knew the identity of the murderer:

> One did not need to be a Sherlock Holmes to discover that the criminal was a sexual maniac of a virulent type . . . and the conclusion we came to was that he and his people were certain low-class Polish Jews. . . . And the result proved our diagnosis was right on every point. For I may say at once that 'undiscovered murders' are rare in London, and the Jack the Ripper crimes are not within that category.

He went on to say that the 'double event' postcard was 'the creation of an enterprising London journalist'. He continued:

> Having regard to the interest in this case I am almost tempted to disclose the identity of the murderer and of the pressman who wrote the letter referred to. But no public benefit would result from such a course, and the traditions of my old department would suffer. I would merely add that the only person who ever had a good view of the murderer unhesitatingly identified the suspect the instant he was confronted with him; but he refused to give evidence against him. In saying he was a Polish Jew I am merely stating a definitely ascertained fact.

In this, we are not only expected to believe the Ripper was known to be a certain immigrant, but that he was in police custody and had even been identified by a witness who had seen him at the scene of a crime. Even the most gullible of readers would find this hard to swallow, and even harder the ludicrous claim that the police's single witness refused to give evidence against the killer. It was no doubt with a philosophic shrug of the shoulders that the arresting inspector watched Jack the Ripper walk free out of the police station!

Three years before he wrote this, Anderson told another story when he reported in his book Criminals and Crime that the Ripper had been 'safely caged in an asylum'. None of the police of the day agreed with either of Anderson's views, as is shown by the wealth of writing on the case penned by policemen of all ranks; none of his claims is supported by a single word in the files of Scotland Yard or the Home Office; none of the so-called 'facts' he claimed were 'definitely ascertained' were ever more than his own airy speculation. Either Anderson was inventing his stories to throw investigators off the scent of the Masons, or he was fantasizing to inflate his own ego. The puerile boast, 'I know who Jack the Ripper was, but I'm not telling!' has been surprisingly prevalent among supposedly mature men. Either way, Sir Robert Anderson, Freemason, one of the most high-ranking policemen connected with the Ripper case, dealt in fiction.

Whatever the truth about Anderson and his connection with the murders, one fact was becoming clear: Sickert had told the truth but not the whole truth. Everything he had said about Prince Eddy, Annie Elizabeth Crook, Sir William Gull and the murders themselves was true. Too many independent facts, and corroboration unhinted at by Sickert, have come to light for this to be otherwise. But he knew too much for his story to end at Cleveland Street, as he repeatedly told his son. It is clear from the depth and accuracy of his knowledge that Walter Sickert knew more than he claimed. To find out exactly how much more he knew, it is helpful to examine some of the least tangible aspects of his story.

One of the minor mysteries of art is contained in the paintings of Walter Sickert. An undisputed master, and regarded by many as the best of only a small group of English painters this century worthy of the name, Sickert produced a tremendous number of works. His output was reportedly 'greater than Constable's and Corot's taken collectively'. The exact number is unknown, as he had four major bases, Dieppe, Camden Town, Venice and Bath, and he was never particular about where he discarded his works. The riddle of his paintings surrounds odd inexplicable details and deliberate inconsistencies they contain, and also the seemingly irrelevant titles of some of his works. These have never been explained. Walter told his son that he had half unconsciously recalled the main events of the murders in some of his paintings, and that he had planted clues in his titles. One example of this, he said, was his picture called Lazarus Breaks His Fast, an impressionist portrait of a man eating black grapes with a spoon. As the only Biblical reference to Lazarus eating (in John XII) refers to meat, why did Sickert fill his plate with grapes? The painter said the picture was a veiled accusation of Gull, who had induced unconsciousness in the victims by feeding them poisoned grapes. This was specialist knowledge indeed, and there is now no realistic way of finding out if the victims were poisoned before being mutilated. The notion is in part supported by Dr Llewellyn, who examined the corpse of Nichols. A report by Abberline in the Yard file says:

> The inspector acquainted Dr Llewellyn who afterwards made a more minute examination and found that the wounds in the abdomen were in themselves sufficient to cause instant death, and he expressed an opinion that they were inflicted before the throat was cut.

Sickert is consequently one of the few who have claimed that the cutting of the throat was not the cause of death, a claim confirmed by the official post-mortem report. Bearing in mind the artist's accuracy in all other points so far examined, and taking into account that the secret file (of which he could have known nothing) contained a medical opinion that at least one of the victims was dead before her throat was cut, it seems likely Sickert was right in his description of Gull's method of killing. There is still one slim chance that the truth might be discovered even at this late date. If the bodies of the victims were exhumed, tests of their bone marrow might possibly reveal traces of the poison. Sickert's specific reference to grapes also ties up with Gull's self-confessed partiality for the fruit; with the grapes found clutched in Stride's dead hand, the existence of which was carefully covered up; and with the story of the greengrocer Packer, which Sir Charles Warren wanted desperately to suppress.

If Sickert's knowledge of the method of the killers is accurate his involvement in the affair must have been much closer than he admitted. Walter Sickert, not Sir Robert Anderson, was the third member of the Ripper party. Psychologically, this explanation is far more consistent with Sickert's compulsion to tell the story before he died, and with his painting clues about the case into his pictures. His story about the motive for the killings, their Masonic significance, and the involvement of Gull and Netley is all true, as has been shown. But a man whose story in reality ended at Cleveland Street could not have had at his fingertips such a wealth of detail about the actual crimes. And he would not have been so obsessed with the case. If Sickert had been directly involved, he had participated in the perfect crime, which might explain his fixation with the case. For in real terms there is no such thing as the perfect crime; if no one is ever caught only the perpetrator knows of its perfection. The pressures on such a compulsive conversationalist as Sickert to reveal his own 'perfect' crime must have been immense. But he knew that if he told the whole truth the perfection would have been shattered by his own implication. Cleverly, he substituted his part in the operation with that of a man he knew was supposed to have been out of the country during much of the Ripper's reign, a man who had no alibi. Anderson's indictment by Sickert, and the peculiar events surrounding Anderson's appointment as Assistant Commissioner, indicate that Anderson was involved in the conspiracy. The fact that as a Freemason he was the man Warren wanted so much as second-in-command for the duration of the Ripper crimes suggests he actively abetted Warren in the cover-up, which was Warren's sole purpose in becoming Commissioner in the first place.

By a coincidence of the sort which abound in Ripper research, two hours after deciding Sickert was deeply involved in the actual murders, I read this passage in McCormick's The Identity of Jack the Ripper:

> Yet another suggestion made is that Walter Sickert, the painter, was Jack the Ripper. The reason for Sickert being suspected is that he was believed to have made sketches and paintings of the Ripper crimes. . . .

Someone had already pointed an accusing finger at Sickert. But who? In the fifteen years that had elapsed since McCormick wrote his book, his notes on Sickert had been lost. But the fact remained that Sickert had been accused for reasons completely unconnected with the unintentional clues contained in the story he told his son.

At the time of the murders Sickert was living in various rooms and lodging-houses all over the East End. This was the period when he was painting his famous music-hall pictures, all set in and around East London. He would go out nightly and pick up women of the streets to pose as his models for the paintings he did of squalid interiors and poverty-stricken inhabitants. At this time he was unable to afford professional models, who would anyway not have possessed the tired and often sagging figures so essential to the harsh truths he was striving to depict. In The Life and Opinions of Walter Richard Sickert, Dr Robert Emmons wrote:

> He used to go nightly to music halls and walk home from Hoxton, Shoreditch, Canning Town or Islington, across Primrose Hill, and so on to Hampstead. He wore a loud check coat, long to the ankles, and carried a little bag for his drawings. One night in Copenhagen Street a party of young girls fled from him in terror, yelling, "Jack the Ripper, Jack the Ripper!"

It is easy to see why such an incident occurred; Sickert bore a striking resemblance to the Jack the Ripper of the popular imagination. In retrospect, we can now see that the universal image of the Ripper was in fact based on the descriptions given by witnesses who saw Sickert at the scene of at least two of the murders. One of the most reliable descriptions of a man seen with a victim shortly before her death, that of P.C. Smith in Berner Street, said the suspect's age was twenty-eight. This was noted by the trained eye of a police constable, who was quite specific in his estimate. In 1888 Sickert was exactly twenty-eight.

In the late eighties, despite his growing reputation as a painter and his large circle or highly placed friends, Sickert spun out his life on a shoestring. Though his clothes were invariably well cut, he did not as yet have the resources to replace them as often as he might have liked. He was nearly six feet tall, and at this stage in his life, according to his friend, the Irish writer George Moore, wore a little fair moustache that was 'a frizzle of gold'. Compare Sickert's appearance at that time with the following description of a man seen with Catherine Eddowes in Duke Street, leading to Mitre Square, shortly before her murder. It is generally regarded as one of the most valuable descriptions of the Ripper. The Times stated:

> He is of shabby appearance, about 30 years of age and 5ft 9in in height, of fair complexion, having a small fair moustache, and wearing a red neckerchief and a cap with a peak.

In all essential details the description fits Sickert. Is it coincidence that another reliable witness, George Hutchinson, who saw a man conduct Marie Kelly to her room, described him too as having a red handkerchief? Remembering that red is an unusual colour for a handkerchief, and that it was even more so in the conservative days of Victoria, one final observation on this point is crucial. Sickert possessed a red handkerchief that, in the words of his friend Marjorie Lilly, appeared to have 'some mysterious connection'. Miss Lilly recalled in her book on Sickert that his red handkerchief > was an important factor in the process of creating his picture, a lifeline to guide the train of his thought, as necessary as the napkin which Mozart used to fold into points which met each other when he too was composing.

The mystery which surrounded Sickert's red handkerchief Miss Lilly never knew. It was closely associated in his mind with two seemingly contradicting ideas—in some vague way with the Church, and more definitely with murder. And according to Miss Lilly, murder to Sickert meant Jack the Ripper. When he was painting his Camden Town Murder series it was never out of his sight. Miss Lilly can remember him while he was painting this series:

> while he was reliving the scene he would assume the part of a ruffian, knotting the handkerchief loosely around his neck, pulling a cap over his eyes and lighting his lantern. Immobile, sunk deep in his chair, lost in the long shadows of that vast room, he would meditate for hours on his problem. When the handkerchief had served its immediate purpose it was tied to any doorknob or peg that came handy to stimulate his imagination further, to keep the pot boiling. It played a necessary part in the performance of the drawings, spurring him on at crucial moments, becoming so interwoven with > the actual working out of his idea that he kept it constantly before his eyes.

It was so vital to him because this was the handkerchief he had worn on the nights he was Jack the Ripper. Unless this is true, that Sickert was the man with the red handkerchief seen by two independent witnesses on the nights of two Ripper murders, what explanation is there for his obsessive connection of the article with murder? Corroboration fell from his own lips, for he told his son that The Camden Town Murder series was based on the murder of Marie Kelly.

Parts of Sickert's character cannot be reconciled to the idea of a man who knew the truth of the Ripper murders but was not personally involved. One aspect is inconsistent even with the man whose interest in the case was passionate, unless that passion were based on complicity. For after a stroke late in his life, Walter Sickert came to think he was Jack the Ripper. Before she had any notion of my thoughts on her old friend, Marjorie Lilly told me,

> After the stroke Sickert would have "Ripper periods" in which he would dress up like the murderer and walk about like that for weeks on end. He would turn down the lights in his studio and literally be Jack the Ripper in word and mood.
>
> All his life he would go out in the middle of the night and, like Dickens, simply walk around the streets of London until morning. He found that the thinking which is so vital for a painter he could best do wandering completely alone through the dark streets of Kentish Town or the East End.

They say, and not without some justification, that a criminal always returns to the scene of his crime. Were Sickert's nocturnal excursions a sort of psychological return to the atmosphere of which he had been so much a part? And after his stroke, when he no longer had the presence of mind or the superhuman control to hide the real truth, did the character of fifty years before become dominant in a mind well known for its tortuous complexity? Miss Lilly refers again and again in her book to Sickert's compulsion, whenever he was walking in London, to dart down dark alleys and explore all manner of unknown passages. This practice gave him just the sort of detailed knowledge of London's geography that has been repeatedly attributed to Jack the Ripper.

Studied in the light of his claim that they contain hidden references to the Ripper crimes, Sickert's paintings are rich evidence of the state of his mind. He used often to give his paintings names which appeared to bear no relation to their content, like several quite different pictures called Jack and Jill. Joseph Sickert says his father used this title because he was remembering the piece of doggeral penned by a frequenter of Cleveland Street, which has been mentioned already:

Jack and Jill went out to kill
For things they couldn't alter
Jack fell down and lost his crown
And left a baby daughter.

That his mind was constantly turning on the Ripper saga and its roots in Cleveland Street is shown most clearly in one particular picture. This is the richest evidence of all that Sickert littered his art with clues about the case. It is a disturbing painting about which he made no comment to his son. It depicts a gaunt Victorian room with a high ceiling. On the wall in the centre of a fireside alcove is some sort of ornament whose definition is indistinct, but which can be nothing other than a death's head. This age-old harbinger of impending doom is gazing down upon a woman dressed poorly in a blouse and long skirt. She is averting her face from its baleful gaze, her hand has been brought to her cheek in despair and a look of anguish is passing across her features. In suggesting that this woman is Marie Kelly with Death staring her in the face, I could justly be accused of allowing my imagination to run riot, except for one thing—the mysterious title of the picture. Like so many of Sickert's titles, it has never been explained. He gave it two names, X's Affiliation Order and Amphytrion. Remembering that an affiliation order fixes the paternity of an illegitimate child, can we escape the conclusion that Sickert was recalling the events of Cleveland Street? And who is X? Bearing in mind Sickert's story about the highest in the land disguising himself as a lesser being, and in that form seducing an ordinary girl and making her pregnant, consider the alternative title of this picture, Amphytrion. The legend of Amphytrion tells how Jupiter, King of the Gods, the highest in Olympus, disguised himself as a lesser being to seduce an ordinary woman, who became pregnant by him.

Old Walter spoke about another picture, which he had given two names. This was a full-face portrait of a square-chinned woman wearing a large hat. It is called Blackmail or Mrs Barrett. No one has been able to explain why it was given either of these titles. Sickert told his son it was a picture of Marie Kelly, and indeed Kelly did have a square chin, and the portrait bears a strong resemblance to drawings of Kelly which appeared in the newspapers after she was murdered. He called it alternatively Mrs Barrett because when she got to Dorset Street Kelly took up with a man called Barrett and was known as his wife. In this Sickert was mistaken, because Kelly's common-law husband was called Joseph Barnett, not Barrett. The painter's intention was nevertheless as he described it. He called it Blackmail because Kelly was the centre of the blackmail involving the royal bastard.

He painted a picture of a line-up of music-hall chorus girls, each with a blood-red dress and some sort of neck scarf. These, he said, represented the Ripper victims. The swirling coloured borders of their dresses represented their mutilations, and the scarves were the wounds in their throats.

The Camden Town Murder series is called alternatively What Shall We Do For The Rent? Once again, said Sickert, these paintings were inspired by Kelly. They show a naked woman sprawled out on a bed. As well as the prostrate nude, a man appears in these pictures. In some of them he is sitting on the end of the bed wringing his hands, in others he stands over the body of the woman. Sickert said he used the alternative title What Shall We Do For The Rent? because Kelly was long overdue with her rent. Her body was in fact discovered by a man sent to collect some back rent from her. The other title, The Camden Town Murder, is more readily understandable. This was a real-life murder which took place in 1907 and in which a woman had her throat cut as she lay in her own bed. While reflecting that the murderer was never caught, it may be interesting to remember Sickert's dictum that a painter cannot paint something of which he has no experience—and the fact that some years after the death of Sickert's second wife, his French cook Marie Pepin unaccountably vanished, and as far as his friends knew was never seen again. The connection between The Camden Town Murder series and Marie Kelly does not end there. According to Robert Emmons, Sickert used to tell people that the model for the series had been called Marie.

It is interesting that Robert Wood, the man who was tried and acquitted of the Camden Town Murder, was a friend of Sickert's, and even acted as his model for the series. It was Wood's friends, doubtless led by Sickert, who hired a solicitor to defend him. By coincidence, that solicitor was Arthur Newton, the same man who had conspired with the Government in hushing up Eddy's connections with Cleveland Street in 1889.

Another picture called Blackmail, this one in pastel, depicts a young woman sitting demurely in a high-backed chair. Her eyes are glazed, the end of her nose appears to be missing and the lack of definition in the lower part of the face renders the mouth almost non-existent. To a far greater extent, this is what Jack the Ripper did to Marie Kelly.

Perhaps a more obvious indication of Sickert's psyche, though, is contained in The Painter In His Studio, a self-portrait. In the foreground is a headless sculpture of a woman, the limbs incomplete. Unlike a real sculpture, however, this piece has not crumbled through the ravages of time. The limbs appear to have been torn or ripped from the torso, as if the woman has been the victim of some vile butchery.

His preoccupation with death is apparent in several works. A good example is Le Journal, which appears to be a straightforward portrait of a woman lying down and reading a newspaper, which she holds in the air above her head. 'That woman is dead', Sickert confided to his son, and pointed out the detail most people miss—that the bottom of the newspaper is partly obscured by the woman's hair. This means she is not reading it at all. It lies on the floor behind her. And, without doubt, she is dead.

In Ennui, a picture within the picture depicts Queen Victoria. What appears to be a bird fluttering near her head is in fact a gull, Sickert told his son.

Even in his later pictures Sickert could not forget Eddy and the events he had set in motion. In 1935 he painted King George V and Queen Mary, a portrait of the royal couple in their car. The front half of the Queen is obscured by the window-frame of the vehicle. This, said Sickert, was in memory of the fact that half of Mary belonged to Eddy (they had been engaged to be married when Eddy died).

The painter displayed his abiding interest in prostitutes in various pictures, painted at all stages in his career. Cocotte de Soho and The Belgian Cocotte are the two best.

Finally, his La Hollandaise, painted in 1905, and another version of Mrs Barrett lead us back to Miller's Court and the nightmare of 9th November 1888. This Mrs Barrett was also based on Kelly, Sickert claimed. It is more disturbing than the versions so far mentioned. The subject is this time shown in profile. Her eyes are sunk in deep black shadow like a skull, and her face is deathly pale. La Hollandaise is an abomination. It depicts a large-limbed nude reclining awkwardly on a bed in a melancholy room. Her face is quite unrecognizable, and the difficulty presented in trying to discern her features is similar to that experienced in studying the Scotland Yard photograph of Kelly's mutilated face. The nose of La Hollandaise seems to have been cut off, like Kelly's, her eyes are blurred and the whole effect is that she has the head of an animal rather than a human. The same nauseating feeling is gained from the picture of Kelly.

Psychologist Dr Anthony Storr, formerly a Harley Street consultant, agrees that Sickert's behaviour in painting clues into his pictures could be consistent with his having taken part in the Ripper murders. 'It is certain', he said, 'that people with guilty secrets do suffer from a compulsion to drop clues, as Sickert claimed to have done in his paintings'.

The two major writers on Sickert, Robert Emmons and Marjorie Lilly, who were both closely associated with him, have each remarked on a strange, morose side to his character which most of the time lay hidden beneath sparkling wit and charm, but which would appear, in the words of Emmons, in flashes of coldness. Referring to one such manifestation of the darker side of his nature, Miss Lilly recalled 'how completely Dr Jekyll had assumed the mantle of Mr Hyde'. Emmons made the comment that 'The serpent lay dormant in the basket of figs'. He went on:

> Sometimes, when a mood of depression or misanthropy caught him, he would remain invisible for weeks at a time, and then suddenly reappear as gay and debonair as ever.

Moving to the documentary evidence against Sickert, two of the best descriptions of the Ripper (P.C. Smith's and Hutchinson's) say he was carrying a parcel. Smith described it as 'a parcel wrapped in newspaper, about eighteen inches long and six to eight inches broad'. Its dimensions preclude it from being a knife, as some writers have suggested. Smith's observations do tie in with Sickert's statement that the murderers tracked down Kelly with the help of a portrait. He omitted to explain, however, where the killers could possibly have come by such a portrait. There is not likely to have been a photograph of Kelly, so it must have been a painting or sketch, probably the latter. Sickert is drawn more definitely into the web when we realize only he would have been in a position to provide a picture of Kelly, probably one sketched from memory. We already know that Sickert had rooms all over the East End at this period, and nightly employed prostitutes as models. The fact that he had not one but several retreats in the heart of Jack the Ripper's territory, and that he was a familiar figure among the East End tarts, would have put Sickert in the best possible position to track down Kelly and her accomplices on behalf of the conspirators.

The parcel was seen for the second time by Hutchinson on the night of 9th November. He described it as 'about eight inches long with a strap round it, covered in dark American cloth'. Because this description naturally inspired the vision of a knife, it has been assumed the parcel Hutchinson saw was narrow. But Hutchinson gave no hint as to the parcel's breadth, so it might just as easily have been six inches wide. This is far more likely, because a thin parcel would not have required a carrying strap. Once again, with Hutchinson's description there is the connection with the artist, for American cloth was used for wrapping pictures. It is true that though P.C. Smith's description does fit Sicket, Hutchinson's does not. It has been unanimously decided the two witnesses had seen different men. But the colourful description Hutchinson provided, regarded by the police as genuine, better fitted a stage villain than anyone in real life. Greasepaint ran in Sickert's veins as surely as blood and oil paint. He loved the theatre, he was a trained actor, and he loved adopting eccentric disguises.

Sickert's story of the murder of Stride by Netley (with Anderson keeping watch on the opposite side of the road) tallies exactly with previously unpublished facts revealed in the Home Office file, except for one point. The description of the man who was standing watch does not fit Anderson. Israel Schwartz, who saw Stride murdered, described the watcher thus:

> Age 35 [Sickert was twenty-eight], height 5ft. 11in. [Sickert was just under six feet], complexion fresh [Sickert had a fair complexion], hair light brown [Sickert's hair was light brown], moustache brown [Sickert had a fair moustache]; dress, dark overcoat, old black hard felt hat, wide > brim, had a claypipe in his hand [According to Marjorie Lilly, Sickert only smoked cigars when she knew him. It is impossible to discover his smoking habits when young].

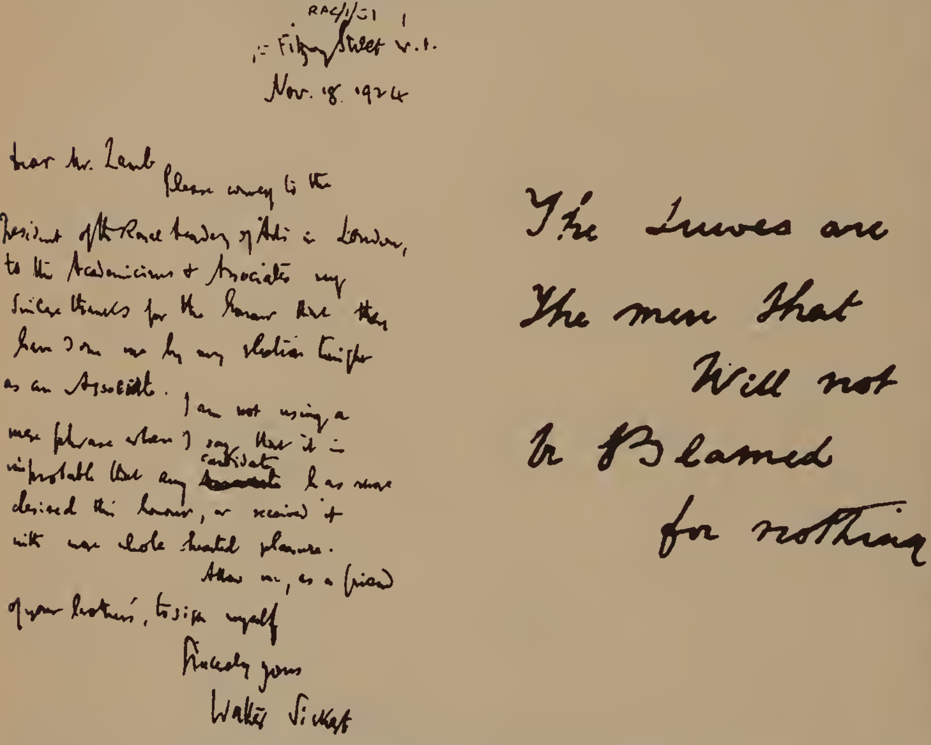
The descriptions do not tally precisely. The age, for instance, is seven years out. In Schwartz's hurry and nervousness he is not likely to have got a clear picture of the man he saw, but one thing he could be positive about, however uncertain the light, and that is the man's height. He said quite definitely that the man he saw was about five feet eleven inches tall, a stature less common in Victorian times than today. This was Sickert's height to within a few millimetres.

The substitution of Sickert for Anderson as the third man resolves several inconsistencies in the Sickert story. It makes sense of Lord Salisbury having entered his Dieppe studio and paying him £500 for a picture for which he might otherwise have received £3. The incident could well have happened. Salisbury used regularly to holiday in Dieppe in the eighties, and Osbert Sitwell referred to the incident in his introduction to A Free House! But when Sickert told the story to Sitwell he did not involve himself in it. He said the subject of Salisbury's generosity was the artist Vollon. Only when he came to disclosing the real background to the Ripper case to his son did he also explain the truth of the Salisbury episode. Until then he had used the amended version in much the same way he had used the veterinary student story. It satisfied his compulsion to talk about the subject, but shed no light on the real facts, which he regarded, even until a few years before his death, as highly dangerous. It is inconceivable that Salisbury would have bribed Sickert into silence. Far more plausible is the idea that the money was payment for his part in the plan, and his assistance in making it work. To be fair, it is likely that Sickert was coerced into helping the Freemasons, and that it was abhorrent to him to have been a party to the destruction of Kelly, whom he had personally brought from the East End to help Annie Elizabeth. But in the words of his son, 'The old man would do anything to get on'. It is certain he would have stopped at little to save himself from the sort of fate that befell Annie Elizabeth. He was, after all, a prime mover in the Cleveland Street episode, and knew far too much to be left alone. There may even have been in one of his acts a peculiar sort of bid for redemption: an attempt to save Kelly. An operation of the sort Gull was executing would never have resulted in such a basic mistake as a confusion of identities, as Sickert claimed happened the night Eddowes died. If the conspirators believed Eddowes was Kelly they had not made an error; they had been deliberately misled. Sickert was the man responsible, and a tardy attempt at saving Kelly seems the only explanation.[1]

Three episodes in particular bear the singular mark of Sickert, and display the same sort of mentality that would plant clues to a murder in works of art. These episodes are the careful placing of rings and coins at Chapman's feet, the writing of the chalk message on the wall and the planting of the grapes in Stride's hand. These acts must have been performed by one of the Rippers; the first, it seems, was removed by Dr Phillips and the last two were both covered up by Warren because they pointed the finger at Masons in general and, in the case of the grapes, at Gull in particular.



RAC/1/S1

15 Fitzroy Street W.1.
Nov. 18. 1924

Dear Mr. Lamb
Please convey to the President of the Royal Academy of Arts in London, to the Academicians & Associates my sincere thanks for the honour that they have done me by my election to-day as an Associate.
I am not using a mere phrase when I say that it is improbable that any ~~[illegible]~~ candidate has ever desired this honour, or received it with more whole hearted pleasure.
Allow me, as a friend of your brother's, to sign myself
Sincerely yours
Walter Sickert

The Juwes are
The men That
Will not be Blamed
for nothing

The writing on the wall in Goulston Street, and an example of Sickert's handwriting

For one of the killers to have written the message on the wall he would have had to have gone east from Mitre Square, because Goulston Street is in the heart of Whitechapel. This is inconsistent with Sickert's report in that Gull would certainly have headed straight back into the West End. But Sickert had various rooms in the East End at this time. After the Mitre Square murder he is likely to have parted from his accomplices and scurried to one of his hideouts. Did he live in Wentworth Dwellings, Goulston Street, where the writing was found? It is impossible to find out. Lodgers' names never appeared in the rate books. But in writing on the wall, 'The Juwes are the men that will not be blamed for nothing', the Ripper was doing exactly what Sickert did later in his paintings. And the careful copy of the writing on the wall in the Home Office file, reproduced (p.260) for the first time anywhere, bears a certain resemblance to Sickert's handwriting.

---

[1] Allied to this is the question of Kelly's rent. The average weekly rent for a man and his family was about 2*s*. 10*d*., yet Kelly's room cost 4*s*. 6*d*. a week—a sum she certainly could not have afforded. Who was paying to keep her in hiding?

Sickert is almost certain to have been the man who arranged the rings and coins at Chapman's feet and who bought grapes from Packer, which he planted in Stride's hand to point a camouflaged finger at Gull. Not surprisingly, on all three occasions his clues were misinterpreted or removed. So he began painting the same sort of esoteric hints into his pictures.

Obviously Joseph Sickert found it impossible to accept that his father was not the knight in shining armour who alone carried the banner of truth to a future generation. He could hardly be expected instantly to believe that the story he has nurtured in secret most of his life missed out on one major point, that Sickert was not a helpless bystander but actually one of the Rippers. He may or may not have killed, but he was an accomplice to the most savage crimes of his generation.

It was in complete innocence, not to say naivety, that one day shortly after I began pondering the old man's entanglement in the actual murders, Joseph Sickert showed me some of his father's belongings. They included a dark brown doctor's bag, which meant a great deal to old Sickert and in which he used to carry his paints. This must have been the 'battered old Gladstone bag to which he was greatly attached', recalled by Marjorie Lilly. A bag just like this one has become woven into the fabric of Ripper lore. Many people who carried such bags at the time walked in danger of being lynched because the populace were convinced from several descriptions of suspected men that the bag was a trademark of the Ripper. Where Sickert came by the bag I have no idea. It was definitely a doctor's bag, divided into numerous compartments for the storage of medicines and surgical instruments. The second item I noticed in the pile of belongings was a small metal case about six inches long and one and a half inches wide. It had a small bloodstain on it. I asked about it and Joseph handed it to me. It contained three surgical knives, razor-sharp.

'I don't know where the old man got those, or even what he used them for', he said ingenuously. 'I think he was given them as a young man.'

The items may have no significance. I merely mention them as extra detail in the abundantly colourful portrait of a near-perfect murderer, which I will leave as it stands, except to repeat one further comment made to me by Walter's own son:

'He was a strange man. He would start weeping for no reason sometimes, terribly moved by something long ago.'

Afterword by Joseph Sickert

When my mother died she was deaf, nearly blind, and paralysed. The deafness she inherited from her father, the Duke of Clarence, whose blood I think of as a taint to our family. Some descendants of royalty have found their ancestry a source of pride. I find mine disgusting. Had I been a plumber descended from a long line of plumbers, I'd have been a far happier man; none of the events so carefully documented by Stephen Knight would have happened. If my mother's deafness was a direct result of Clarence's intrusion into our family, her blindness and paralysis were indirectly attributable to the same cause: they were the after-effects of her encounters with John Netley. Apart from the physical after-effects of the injuries she received on the two occasions Netley tried to kill her, she also suffered terrible stress and nervousness for the whole of the rest of her life. In her teens this tension receded a little but after she was about twenty, with each year that passed she became quieter, more introspective, more nervous of strangers, and more preoccupied with the idea that her life was in danger. I saw my mother slowly destroyed, not only physically but mentally too. Believe me, there is no pleasure or pride in being an illegitimate descendent of the Duke of Clarence.

At last the burden of knowledge I have carried so long has been lifted from me. In a strange sort of way my mother and grandmother have been revenged. Those who caused their suffering are now named. They cannot hide their guilty faces from the world any longer. Though I took a long time to accept it fully, it is true that a truth such as this should be made known to everyone.

Also, the stain is cleansed from the families of men who have been named by various authors in the past as the Whitechapel killer—men like Montague Druitt, J. K. Stephen, Frank Miles and of course the Duke of Clarence. The families of all these people owe their gratitude to Stephen Knight, who has brought the true story to light.

When the author told me his conclusions about my father's involvement in the case I was disturbed. There is no point in denying that I was also angry. I felt he had let me down and betrayed my trust. But later I had to admit that my father must have known more than he told me. It was a fact that I had half realized all along. And possibly one of the reasons I allowed my story to be investigated in the first place was that I hoped new facts might be uncovered that would somehow dispel my worst private fears about my father. In the event the investigation has had the opposite effect and my fears have been confirmed.

I should like to say that my concern all along has been for my mother and my grandmother. The old man was always able to look after himself and I've always thought of him, in a way, as an interloper like Clarence. I did not see all that much of him as a child but we did like each other and I did trust him. If Stephen Knight is correct in his conclusions, and I am forced to admit, reluctantly, that his reasoning is sound, I do not bear my father any malice. As it says in the final chapter of this book, 'it is likely that Sickert was coerced into helping the Freemasons, and that it was abhorrent to him to have been a party to the destruction of Kelly'. Apart from fear for his own life, which I agree could have induced him to participate in the elimination of the five East End women, I think it is more than likely that he received more persuasive threats even than that. How the monsters who masterminded this whole disgusting affair would have worded their insane threats I don't know, but if my father's assistance was so vital to them I can well believe the burden of their message was, 'Help us, Sickert, or we'll not only kill you. We'll kill the child as well.'

None of this justifies, but it might begin to explain why an essentially good man would do what it seems my father did.

Bibliography

BOOKS

Acland, Theodore Dyke
William Withey Gull, A Biographical Sketch (Adlard and Son, 1896).
Anderson, Sir Robert
Criminals and Crime (J. Nisbet, 1907).
The Lighter Side of My Official Life (Hodder and Stoughton, 1910).
Archer, Fred
Ghost Detectives: Crime and the psychic world (W. H. Allen, 1970).
Barker, Richard H. (Editor)
The Fatal Caress and Other Accounts of English Murders from 1551 to 1881 (Duell, Sloan and Pearce, 1947).
Barnard, Allan (Editor)
The Harlot Killer: The Story of Jack the Ripper in Fact and Fiction (Dodd Mead, 1953).
Baron, Wendy
Sickert (Phaidon, 1973).
Battiscombe, Georgina
Queen Alexandra (Constable, 1969).
Besant, Sir Walter
East London (Chatto and Windus, 1901).
Blake, Robert
The Conservative Party from Peel to Churchill (Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1970).
Brewer, John Francis
The Curse Upon Mitre Square A.D. 1530–1888 (Simpkin Marshall, 1888).
Bridges, Yseult
How Charles Bravo Died (Jarrolds, 1956).
Browne, Douglas G.
The Rise Of Scotland Yard: A History of the Metropolitan Police (Harrap, 1956).

Browse, Lillian Sickert (Hart-Davis, 1960).
Buckle, George Earle (Editor)
The Letters of Queen Victoria: Third Series, Vol. 1 (Murray, 1930).
Carter, Dr Alan Barham
All About Strokes (Nelson, 1968).
Crowley, Aleister
The World's Tragedy (Paris, 1910).
Cullen, Tom
Autumn of Terror (Bodley Head, 1965).
Emmons, Dr Robert
The Life and Opinions of Walter Richard Sickert (Faber and Faber, 1941).
Farson, Daniel
Jack the Ripper (Michael Joseph, 1972).
Gaunt, William
The Pre-Raphaelite Tragedy (Cape, 1965).
Griffiths, Major Arthur
Mysteries of Police and Crime (Cassell, 1898).
Halsted, Dennis
Doctor in the Nineties (Johnson, 1959).
Hannah, Walton
Darkness Visible, A Revelation And Interpretation of Freemasonry (Augustine Press, now Britons Publishing Co, 1952).
Harrison, Michael
Clarence (W. H. Allen, 1972).
Hirschfeld, Magnus
Sexual Anomalies and Perversions (Encyclopaedic Press, 1938).
Hyde, H. Montgomery
Their Good Names (Hamish Hamilton, 1970).
Jones, Elwyn, and Lloyd, John
The Ripper File (Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1975).
Lilly, Marjorie
Sickert, The Painter and His Circle (Elek, 1971).
Longford, Elizabeth
Victoria R.I. (Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1964).
MacKenzie, Norman (Editor)
Secret Societies (Aldus, 1967).
Macnaghten, Sir Melville
Days of My Years (Edward Arnold, 1915).
McCormick, Donald
The Identity of Jack the Ripper (Jarrolds, 1959; Pan, 1962; Arrow and J. Long, 1970).
Magnus, Sir Philip
King Edward the Seventh (John Murray, 1964).
Matters, Leonard
The Mystery of Jack the Ripper (Hutchinson, 1929; and W. H. Allen, 1949).

Morgan, William
Freemasonry Exposed (Glasgow, 1836).
Newton, Joseph Fort
The Builders: A Story and Study of Masonry (Hogg, 1917; Allen and Unwin, 1918).
Odell, Robin
Jack the Ripper In Fact and Fiction (Harrap, 1965; Mayflower, 1966).
Rumbelow, Donald
The Complete Jack the Ripper (W. H. Allen, 1975).
Sitwell, Sir Osbert
Noble Essences or Courteous Revelations (Macmillan, 1950).
A Free House! or The Artist as Craftsman, being the Writings of Walter Richard Sickert (Macmillan, 1947).
Sparrow, Gerald
Vintage Edwardian Murder (Arthur Barker, 1971).
Stewart, William
Jack the Ripper: A New Theory (Quality Press, 1939).
Stow, John
Survey of London (1598).
Van Thal, Herbert (Editor)
The Prime Ministers, Volume Two (Allen and Unwin, 1975).
Whittington-Egan, Richard
A Casebook on Jack the Ripper (Wildy, 1976).
Wilks, S., and Bettany, G. T.
Biographical History of Guy's Hospital (Ward Lock, 1892).
Wilson, Colin
A Casebook of Murder (Leslie Frewin, 1969).

DIRECTORIES

Dictionary of British Surnames
Dictionary of National Biography
Masonic Records 1717–1894
The Medical Directory
The Medical Register
Post Office Directory of London

JOURNALS

The Criminologist
Daily Express
Daily News
Daily Telegraph
East London Advertiser
Evening News

Freemasons' Magazine and Masonic Mirror
Freemasons' Monthly Remembrancer Freemasons' Quarterly Review
Illustrated Police News
The Lancet
Marylebone Mercury and West London Gazette
Marylebone Times
The Nineteenth Century
North London Press
The Observer
Pall Mall Gazette
The People
Reynolds' News
The Star
The Sun
Sunday Times-Herald, Chicago
The Times
Truth

PAMPHLETS

The Coming K – – –
What Does She Do With It?

DOCUMENTS

Public Record Office file DPP/1/95 relating to Cleveland Street scandal of 1889.
Scotland Yard files MEPOL 3/140, MEPOL 3/141 and MEPOL 3/142 relating to the Whitechapel Murders.
Home Office files A49301, 144/220 A49301A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, J and K relating to the Whitechapel Murders.
Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion (Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1920).

Index

ABBERLINE, INSPECTOR FREDERICK GEORGE:
  Special Reports by, 48, 50, 56, 73, 77, 249 statements taken by, 66–70 comments on Hutchinson's statement, 113 and Cleveland Street case, 116–17, 142 retires, 210
  and Dick Austen inquiries, 230–3
  and cover-up, 233
  and Matthew Packer inquiries, 241
Abdication by Queen Victoria, speculation about, 89
Aberconway, Dowager Lady Christabel, 45, 122, 128, 129
Abiff, Hiram:
  murder of, 168, 176, 177, 179
  worker in brass, 171
Acland, Caroline: describes Gull's stroke, 181
  Gull's daughter, 188 story told by, 202–4
  friend of Stowell, 206
  indicates Gull as Ripper, 207
Acland, Sir Henry Wentworth, 140, 197
Acland, Reginald Brodie Dyke, 140
Acland, Theodore Dyke:
  Gull's son-in-law, 140
  writes about Gull, 181 attends Gull and Salisbury, 189 attends Gull, 200–1 certifies Gull's death, 201
  friend of Stowell, 202–3, 206
Acland, Theodore William Gull, 204
'A' Division, 60, 73, 167
Albert Edward, Prince of Wales (later King Edward VII): father of Eddy, 17
  relations with Eddy, 22, 24
  involvement in scandals, 26, 85–8, 89 relations with Queen Victoria, 31 contracts typhoid, 35, 188 marriage to Alexandra, 42 friend of Sickert, 80 unpopularity of, 85–8
  criticized for attending Roman Catholic service, 90 and Eddy's proposed marriage, 91 and Cleveland Street scandal, 117 terms of will, 120–1 a visitor to Oscar Wilde, 139–40 links with Ripper case, 141
  and Freemasonry, 163–6
Albert, Prince Consort, 35, 88, 195
Albert Street, Kennington, 122
Albert Street, Whitechapel, 59
Albert Victor Christian Edward, Prince (Duke of Clarence and Avondale, 'Eddy'):
  mentioned, 28, 31, 36, 43, 87, 93, 107, 139, 140, 160, 191, 207, 209, 219, 248, 256, 263, 264
  as Ripper suspect, 15, 106, 152, 204–5, 264
  alleged marriage to 'Alice Mary Cook', 17 and Annie Elizabeth Crook, 19, 23–7, 101–4, 106, 209, 211 relations with parents, 22 and Walter Sickert, 22 and Cleveland Street, 23–7, 92, 95, 101–5, 106, 107–8, 113, 116–21, 211 as father of Alice Margaret Crook, 24, 92, 95, 104–5, 106, 189 christened, 31
  deafness, 41
  hated by Labouchere, 89 importance of behaviour of, 90–2 proposed marriage to Hélène d'Orléans, 91

  and cover-up, 106, 107–8, 113, 116–21
  links with Ripper case, 141
  and Freemasonry, 152, 171
  and John Netley, 211, 212
Alderney Road, Mile End, 62
Aldershot, Hampshire, 232
Aldgate, 37, 59, 144
Alexandra, Princess of Wales (later Queen):
  mentioned, 31, 85–6, 165
  concerned about Eddy, 22 and Sickert, 22, 25, 43, 80
  relations with Eddy, 24
  Gull introduced to, 35, 188
  deafness, 41
  birth, 42
  friendship with Oswald Sickert, 42–3 popularity, 87–8
  death, 121
  papers destroyed, 121
All About Strokes (Carter), 182
Allen, Oswald, 172
Alleys, Algernon, 118
Altona, 42
America, 118, 159, 164, 190, 210
American Exhibition, 59
Amphytrion (Sickert)—see X's Affiliation Order
Anarchists, 160
Anderson, Isabelle Frazer, 122
Anderson, Sir Robert:
  mentioned, 250, 258, 259
  named as third man, 36 alleged part in murders, 37, 183, 235, 238 fabricates details about Ripper, 47 appointed Assistant Commissioner of Metropolitan Police, 157–8, 246
  and Freemasonry, 179
  investigation of, 246–8
Anderton's Hotel, Fleet Street, 215
Anti-Masonic Movement, 159
Apsley House, 196
Arbour Square, Whitechapel, 141
Ark Lodge, 176
Army and Navy Stores, Westminster, 72
Arnold, Superintendent, 241
Ascot, Berkshire, 88
Asia, 54
Asiatics, 59, 81
Association of Assistant Librarians, 194
Atterbury, Bishop Francis, 99
Attorney-General, 112, 117, 120
Austen, Dick, 230–3
Australia, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 226
Australian Broadcasting Commission, 132
Austria, 88, 158
Autumn of Terror (Cullen), 45, 112, 122
Aylesford, Countess of, 88

Baal, 155
Backchurch Lane, Whitechapel, 126, 238
Backert, Albert, 121
Balfour, Lord, 91
Balmoral, 118–19
Baltic, the, 127
Barcelona, 135
Barick (?), Captain L. R., 231
'Barlow, Detective Chief Superintendent Charles', 16, 151, 152
Barnett, Joseph:
  mentioned, 66, 67, 68, 70, 255
  statement of, 67
  evidence of, 143–4
Bath, Somerset, 249
Battersea Park, 126
Battiscombe, Georgina, 86
Baxter, Wynne E.:
  mentioned, 111, 113
  at Chapman inquest, 108, 171–2
  dialogue with Dr Phillips, 108–10
  Kelly inquest wrested from, 110, 111, 112 dialogue with Elizabeth Tanner, 146 at Stride inquest, 146, 147
BBC Television, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 95, 103, 132, 150, 151–2, 162, 194
'Beast of Jersey', the—see Paisnel, Edward Beaumont parish, 187
Beck, Inspector Walter, 66, 70
Becket, Thomas, 29
Bedford, Edward Henslow, 120, 141
Belgian Cocotte, The (Sickert), 256
Belgium, 194
Bellord, Edmund, 143
Berlin, 190
Bernard, Claude, 192
Berner Street, Whitechapel, 14, 37,

57, 58, 61, 62, 123, 235, 238–9, 241, 251
Bernstorff, 42
Besant, Annie, 83
Bethnal Green, 50, 51, 69, 90
Bethnal Green Police Station, 51
Bettany, G. T., 181–2, 200
Bible, the, 154, 155
Billingsgate Market, 67
Biographical History of Guy's Hospital (Wilks and Bettany), 181–2
Bird, Inspector J., 73
Bishopsgate, 67, 69, 235
Bishopsgate Street Police Station, 37, 61, 174–5, 235
Blackheath, 128, 129, 136, 139
Blackheath Cricket Club, 136
Blackmail (Sickert painting)—see Mrs Barrett
Blackmail (Sickert pastel), 256
'Black Monday', 82
Black Swan public house, 177
Blackwell, Dr F., 57, 239
Blandford, Lord, 88
Blandford Square, 73
Blitz, the, 59
'Bloody Sunday', 26, 83
'Bluebeard'—see Rais, Gilles de
Blue Tunicle, 43
Boards of Guardians, 210
Bond, Dr Thomas, 167
Bonner, Paul, 16, 17, 18, 20, 132
Bournemouth, 46, 137, 210
Bowyer, Thomas, 66
Bratton family, 105
Bratton, Frederick, 104–5
Bratton, Dr J., 104
Bravo, Charles, 197–8, 199
Bravo poisoning case, 197–8, 199
Bridges, Yseult, 197
Briggs, 76
Bright's disease, 223
Britannia public house, 69, 145
British Medical Association, 17
British Museum, 16
Brixton, 72
Brook Street, Mayfair, 177, 191, 193, 197, 208
Brooks, Dr, 123
Brown, Dr Frederick Gordon, 61, 168, 169, 185–6
Brown and Eagle, Messrs, 50
Brown, Ford Madox, 95
'Brown, Mr' (Lord Arthur Somerset), 118
Brushfield Street, Spitalfields, 74, 77
Brussels, 85
Bryanston Square, 203
Buchanan, Leone, 132, 133
Buckingham Palace, 104
Buckle, George Earle, 81
Buck's Row, 14, 49, 50, 51, 53, 62, 123, 149, 169, 174, 235, 236–7
Builders, The (Newton), 176
Burke, Thomas, 85
Burns, John, 82
Butchers, 59, 61
Butchery (Jones and Lloyd), 151
Buxton Street, Spitalfields, 59

CABINET, THE, 36, 91
Cable Street, 239
'Cable-tow' (in Freemasonry), 170
Cadwallader, Thomas Walter, 94
Caledonian Road, 78
Cambridge, 23, 199
Cambridge Rapist, the—see Cook, Peter
Cambridge Road, Bethnal Green, 50
Camden Town, 192, 226, 227, 249
Camden Town Murder, the, 255
Camden Town Murder series (Sickert), 252–3, 255
Canada, 64
Canning Town, 251
Capital (Marx), 82
Capture of Jack the Ripper, 189–94
Cardiff, 33, 144
Carlisle, 188
Carmarthen, 67
Carnarvon, 67
Carter, Dr Alan Barham, 182, 183
Casebook on Jack the Ripper, A (Whittington-Egan), 210
Casebook of Murder, A (Wilson), 180, 186
Castle Alley, Whitechapel, 126
Castle Street, Houndsditch, 226, 228
Castle Street, W.C., 226, 227, 228
Catholicism, hatred of, 26, 90–2
Cavendish, Lord Frederick, 85
Cecil family, 189
Central News Office, 53, 64
Champion, Henry, 82
Chancellor, Philip, 17
Chandler, Inspector Joseph, 53, 55
Chapman, 56
Chapman, Annie (alias Annie Siffey):
  mentioned, 36, 177
  murder of, 14, 37, 38, 49, 73,

    74, 77, 123, 136, 142, 174, 212, 221, 235, 247
  involved with Kelly, 34, 144, 150, 183
  file on, 49, 75, 233
  Chandler's report on, 55–6
  injuries to, 55, 166, 168–9, 172
  Abberline's report on, 56
  Swanson's report on, 58
  inquest on, 108–10, 145, 185
  and Dorset Street, 144–5, 147
  arrangement of corpse of, 170–2, 173, 241, 260, 261
  time of death of, 237
Chapman, George, 107
Charing Cross, 192
Charles I, King, 54
Charleston, U.S.A., 155
Cheapside, 72
Chelsea, 139
Chelsea Embankment, 126
Cheselden Chapter (of Freemasonry), 205
Cheselden Craft Lodge, 205
Chester, 210
Chicago, 189, 193, 194, 210
Chicksand Street, Whitechapel, 59
Chief Constable of Rotherham, 230–2
Chiswick, 130
Chlysty sect, the, 151
Christian VIII, King of Denmark, 42
Christian IX, King of Denmark, 42
Christian Spiritualists, 195
Christians, 154–5
Christ's Hospital, 186
Church Passage, Mitre Square, 60
Church Street, Spitalfields, 68
Churchill, Lord Randolph, 88
Churchill, Sir Winston, 184
CID—see Criminal Investigation Department
City of Hereford public house, 95
City of London Police, 37, 56, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 175, 178, 185, 233, 235
City of London Police Detective Department, 59
Civil Service, the, 234
Clacton, Essex, 209
Clarence (Harrison), 87, 102, 116
Clarence and Avondale Lodge, Leytonstone, 171
Clarence Gate, Regent's Park, 216
Clarke, Sir Edward, 86–7
Clerkenwell Green, 72
Clerkenwell Police Court, 78
Cleveland Street, W.1.:
  mentioned, 35, 37, 38, 102, 104, 121, 142, 143, 144, 150, 212, 214, 248, 250, 259
  origins of Ripper case in, 19, 31, 254
  Sickert's rooms in, 22
  tobacconist's shop in, 23, 33, 101, 103, 104
  Eddy's visits to, 24, 26, 36, 105, 106, 211
  Kelly arrives at, 25, 33
  raid in, 27, 34, 96
  Joseph Sickert and author visit, 31 described, 93, 94–5
  Holman Hunt's studios in, 94, 140
  Annie Elizabeth Crook returns to, 99
  Annie Elizabeth Crook disappears from, 101
  Eddy returns to, 107
  concealment of Eddy's connection with, 113
Cleveland Street brothel scandal:
  Eddy linked with, 102, 256
  cover-up of, 107–8, 116, 141, 161, 179, 233, 256
  Eddy 'central participant' in 116
  file on, 116–21
  beginning of, 116
  Abberline and, 116–17, 142, 233
Cleveland Street Infirmary, 98, 99
Cobden, Ellen, 25
Coburg Street, Old Kent Road, 51
Cocotte de Soho (Sickert), 256
Colchester, Essex, 186
Cole, Lord, 87
Coles, Frances, 49, 127
Colicutt, 122, 126
Colindale, 98
Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, 78
Coming K—, The, 88
Commercial Road, 37, 57, 238, 241
Commercial Street, 31, 53, 58, 67, 114, 146
Commercial Street Police Station,
Common lodging-houses, 59, 145–6
Commons, House of, 35, 84
Communism, 82
Complete Jack the Ripper, The (Rumbelow), 91, 167, 171–2
Connell, James, 73

Conservative Club, 82
Conservative Party, 32–3, 84
Constable, John, 248
'Cook, Alice Mary', 17, 18
Cook, Elizabeth, 95–6
Cook, Peter, 199
Copenhagen, 42
Copenhagen Street, 251
Cork, 85
Cornubia Lodge, 205
Corot, Jean Baptiste Camille, 248
Cotman, Dr John Sell Edmund, 134
Court Circular, 118
Cover-up, the, 106–41, 179, 191, 200, 209, 233, 241, 250, 256
Cow and Company, 72
Cow, Douglas, 72
Cowan, Dr, 75, 76
'Cowboys', 59
Cowdry, Mr, 51
Cox, Mary Ann, 67
Crabb, Dr, 75, 76
Cracknell, P.C., 376, 75
Crawford, Mr, 175
Crawford and Balcarres, Earl of, 40
Cream, Thomas Neill, 107
Criminal Investigation Department (CID), 13, 75, 76, 122, 123, 157, 241, 243, 247
Criminals and Crime (Anderson), 248
Criminologist, The, 105, 204, 223
Crispin Street, Spitalfields, 145
Croiset, Gérard, 194
Crook, Annie Elizabeth:
  mentioned, 41, 211, 212, 248, 259, 264
  and Eddy, 19, 23, 24, 25, 43, 90, 91, 92, 106 gives birth, 24, 95, 96 taken away, 27, 31, 33, 92 confined, 28, 35, 92, 97–101, 191 dies, 28, 97, 102, 190
  certified insane, 35 removed from Guy's Hospital, 36 investigated, 92–105
Crook, Alice Margaret:
  mentioned, 19, 37, 93, 96, 104, 105, 263, 264
  born, 24, 95 baptized, 24
  placed in care, 28
  Netley's attempts on life of, 38–9, 212–13, 214–15, 217 bears Sickert a son, 39 marries, 39
  dies, 39
  deafness, 41, 263
  resemblance to Princess Alexandra, 41 admitted to workhouse, 100
Cross, Charles, 50, 51
Crossinghams lodging-house, 55
Crowley, Aleister, 103
Crown, The, public house, 95
Cullen, Tom, 45, 107, 112, 122, 127–9, 143, 162, 221, 240
Cutbush, Thomas, 122, 123, 124, 126, 127

Daily Express, 71
Daily News, 57, 147
Daily Telegraph, 112
Dalton, Canon John Neale, 139
Dandenong, Australia, 130, 131, 132, 133
Davies (or Davis), 33, 67
Davies (or Davis), Dr Morgan, 225–30
Davis, Lizzie—see Mylett, Rose
Davis Ward, London Hospital, 225
Days of My Years (Macnaghten), 121
'Dear Boss' letter, 64, 219
'Dear Boss' postcard, 64, 219
Denmark, 22
Devil, the, 155, 224
Dictionary of British Surnames, The, 214
Dictionary of National Biography, The, 180, 181, 182, 207
Diemschutz, Louis, 57
Dieppe, 25, 28, 38, 39, 41, 144, 249, 259
Dilke, Sir Charles, 89, 90
Director of Public Prosecutions, the, 116, 117, 118–20
Disraeli, Benjamin, 81, 189, 195
Divorce Court, the, 87
Dockers, 84
Doctor In The Nineties (Halsted), 185
Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde (Stevenson), 199
Dolden, P.C., 241
Donovan, Timothy, 55, 145
Dorset, 129
Dorset Street, Spitalfields, 55, 56, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 114, 144–5, 147, 149, 150, 255
Douglas, Harry, 241
Douglas, Mr, 214
Doveton Street, Bethnal Green, 50
Dowding, Lady Muriel, 104
Downes, Mr, 208–9

Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan, 147
Drake, Fanny, 72
Drewery, Lionel, 130
Drewett, Lionel, 129, 130
Druitt, Ann, 130–1, 137, 138, 140
Druitt, Dr Lionel, 129–34
Druitt, Montague John:
  mentioned, 107, 112, 264
  as Ripper suspect, 45, 121, 230, 234
  McCormick's story about, 46
  as scapegoat, 46, 121, 138–41 in Macnaghten notes, 121, 124, 127–9
  death, 121, 137, 138 analysis of case against, 121–38
  birth, 129
  career, 129
  cricketing career, 135–6
  inquest on, 137
Druitt, William, 137
Drummond-Angus, Christine, 43
Drury Lane, 39, 213
Dublin, 84
Duckworth, Dr Dyce, 245
Duke Street, Mitre Square, 175, 252
Duncombe Road, Upper Holloway, 75, 78
Dunk Street, Whitechapel, 59
Dutfield's Yard, 57, 58, 241–3

East End Murderer—I knew him, The, 129–33
East London Advertiser, 21, 30, 237
East London and District Railways, 50
Eastern Archipelago (in Freemasonry), 157
Eagle Wharf, Whitechapel, 50
Eddowes, Catherine:
  mentioned, 174, 222–3, 251
  murder of, 14–15, 36, 37, 38, 49, 56, 59, 63, 123, 144, 149, 162, 173, 183, 212, 233, 235–6, 252
  file on, 49, 59
  appearance and character, 56
  injuries to, 60, 168, 169, 170
  Swanson's report on, 60–3
  post mortem examination of, 61, 185
  background of, 61, 145
  mistaken for Kelly, 144, 149, 183, 260
  inquest on, 168, 169
  arrangement of corpse of, 169, 173, 175 movements before murder, 174–5 links with 1530 and Abiff murders, 177
Eddy—see Albert Victor Christian Edward, Prince Edgware Road, 196
Edward I, King, 112
Edward VIII, King, 23
Egypt, Ancient, 155
Elizabeth I, Queen, 54, 189
Elizabeth, Queen, the Queen Mother, 43
Elthone Road, Upper Holloway, 78
Emmons, Dr Robert, 94, 251, 255, 257
Endell Street, High Holborn, 98
Endersby, George, 94
Engels, Friedrich, 82
Ennui (Sickert), 43, 256
Entered Apprentice degree, 155, 166–7, 176
Epileptiform attacks, 182, 200
Erskine, Lady Sybil St Clair, 102
Esher, Lord, 120
Europe, 64, 82, 161, 164
Euston, Lord, 119–20, 179
Euston Road, 17, 93
Evans, Dr, 225
Evening News, 240–1

FABIAN SOCIETY, the, 83
Fairey, Inspector D., 72
Fairfield Road Infirmary Asylum, Bow, 76, 77, 78
Farson, Daniel, 45, 107, 122, 127–38, 139, 171, 180, 182, 183, 221, 230, 234
Fashion Street, Spitalfields, 144, 145–6
Fell, Mr, 132
'Fell, W. G.', 130, 131–3
Fenians, the, 85
Fiddymont, Mrs, 74–5, 77
Fifth Lancers, the, 230, 232
Finsbury Square, 208
Fisher, Humphrey, 132
Fitzroy Square, 96, 143
Fleet Street, 39, 74, 212, 215
Flensborg, 42
Fletcher, Henry, 94
Flower and Dean Street, Spitalfields, 53, 114, 144, 145, 146–7
Foreign Office, 184
Fosters Street, Bethnal Green, 51
Fountain, P.C. 271A, 73

Four Stages of Cruelty, The (Hogarth), 169
France, 25, 95, 117, 144, 153, 159
Francis, Sir Philip, 164*n.*
Frederick VII, King of Denmark, 42
Free House!, A (Sitwell), 44, 259
Freemasonry, 28–9, 35, 36, 121, 151–79, 183, 188, 191, 202, 205–7, 209, 210, 211, 212, 215, 216, 217, 221–2, 236, 241, 246, 248, 250, 259, 260, 261
Freemasonry Exposed (Morgan), 156, 158–9
Freemasons' Hall, 179
French Government, the, 117
'From Hell' letter—see Lusk letter
Fulham Road, 97, 99, 100, 102, 190
Fulham Road Workhouse, 99

GARIBALDI, GIUSEPPE, 229
Garrick Club, the, 46, 140
Gaunt, William, 94
'Gentiles', 160–1
George and Dragon public house, 95
George, Prince of Wales, 164, 165
George Yard, Whitechapel, 65
George Yard Buildings, Whitechapel, 126
Geringher, Mrs, 76, 79
Gladstone, William Ewart, 32, 80, 84
Golden Jubilee of Queen Victoria, 88
Goodge Street, W.1., 93
Gordon-Cumming, Sir William, 86–7
Gorman, 39
Gould, Maurice, 131–2, 134
Goulston Street, Whitechapel, 60, 61, 177–9, 260–1
Grafton, Duke of, 120
Grand Inspector Inquisitor Commander, 163*n.*
Grand Lodge, 164, 175, 210
Grapes, in Ripper killings, 240–5, 260, 261
'Great Architect of the Universe', 154
'Great Beast', the—see Crowley, Aleister
Great Central Railway Company, 216
Great Eastern Railway, 59
Great Garden Street, Whitechapel, 59
Great Pearl Street, Spitalfields, 69
Great Queen Street, W.C.2, 179
Greater London Record Office, 98
Greek gipsies, 59
Green, Mrs Emma, 50
Greenwich Police Station, 73
Grenadier Guards, the, 84
Grimthorpe, Lord, 123
Groot, Karen de, 95, 213, 214, 215
Guilds and incorporated crafts, 153
Gull, Cameron, 188
Gull, Caroline—see Acland, Caroline
Gull, Elizabeth, 187
Gull, John, 186–7
Gull, Lady Susan, 188, 203
Gull, Sir William Withey:
  mentioned, 93, 211, 215, 216, 248, 250, 259, 260
  performs royal abortions, 28
  and Freemasonry, 28, 35, 36, 177, 179, 188, 207, 209, 216
  certifies Annie Elizabeth Crook, 28, 35 charged with silencing Kelly, 28, 34
  invents Jack the Ripper, 29 introduced to Princess Alexandra, 35
  appearance and character, 35–6, 187
  part in murders, 37, 169, 183, 235, 240, 249 suspected of operating on Annie Elizabeth Crook, 37, 96 specialist in brain diseases, 97 connected with Guy's Hospital, 97–8 links with Ripper case, 140–1, 177
  investigated, 180–210
  retirement of, 180, 182 suffers stroke, 180–4 birth of, 186
  early life of, 186–8 marriage, 188 funeral, 197
  and Charles Bravo, 197–8
  death of, 207
  indicated as Ripper, 207 friendship with James Hinton, 207–8
  and grapes, 243, 245, 249, 260, 261
Gun Street, Whitechapel, 64

Guy's Hospital, 28, 36, 96, 97–8, 100, 187, 188, 190, 191, 208

Hall, S. P., 41
Halsbury, Lord, 91, 118
Halsted, Dennis, 185
Hammersmith, 192
Hamilton, Duke of, 165
Hammond, Charles, 117, 118, 119, 120
Hammond, coroner's officer, 110
Hanbury Street, 14, 51, 53, 54, 55, 61, 62, 74, 123, 177, 235, 237
Hanover Square, 190
Hardie, Keir, 195
Harewood Place Roman Catholic Convent, 150
Harlesden, 104, 192
Harley Street, 197, 257
Harrison, Benjamin, 187, 188
Harrison, Michael, 87, 97, 102, 103, 107, 116, 120, 139, 140, 206, 219, 224
Harrison, Rector, 187
Harrison, Sarah, 241
Harvey, Maria, 70
'H' Division (Whitechapel), 58, 60, 70, 76, 78, 114
Helen Street, Whitechapel, 238
Hélène d'Orleans, Princess, 90, 91, 102
Helston, Inspector, 51, 74, 236
Henderson, Sir Edmund, 83
Hendon Infirmary, Colindale, 98, 99
High Court of Justice, the, 112
High Holborn, 98
Highgate Hospital, 98
Hilton Hotel, Kensington, 64
Hinton, James, 207–8
Hiram's Lodge, 176–7
Hirschfeld, Dr Magnus, 136
Hogarth, William, 169–71
Holiday 73, 19
Holland, Ellen, 53
Hollandaise, La (Sickert), 256–7
Holloway, 73, 76, 77, 79
Holloway Police Station, 75, 76
Holloway Road, 75
Holmes, Sherlock, 247
Holy Royal Arch—see Royal Arch
Home Counties, 143
Home Office, 15, 48, 57, 59, 66, 112, 113, 118, 121, 147, 167, 178, 185, 200, 234, 237, 238, 240–1, 248, 258, 261
Home Rule, 81, 84–5
Home Rule Bill, 84
Home Secretary, 83, 117, 234, 239
Honourable Society of the Inner Temple, the, 138
Hood, Dr Charles, 200
Hopkins, Ellice, 208
Hornsey Road, 75
Houndsditch, 123, 124, 225, 226, 227, 228
House of Commons—see Commons, House of
How Charles Bravo Died (Bridges), 197
Howard, Dr Benjamin, 189–93, 196, 197, 200, 202, 207, 209, 210
Howland Street, W.1., 27
Hoxton, 251
Huguenots, the, 54
Humber Lodge, 177
Humphreys, 65
Hunt, William Holman, 94, 95, 140
Hutchinson, George, 113–15, 252, 257, 258
Hutt, George, 175
Hyde, H. Montgomery, 102
Hyde Park, 82
Hyde Park Police Station, 73
Hyndman, H. M., 82
Hythe, Kent, 103

'I caught Jack the Ripper' (letter to newspaper), 71
Identity of Jack the Ripper, The (McCormick), 45, 250
Idylls of the King (Tennyson), 88
Ifland, William, 64–5
Iles, Mr, 226
Illustrated Police News, 65, 215
Immigrants, 81
In Memoriam—Sir William Gull, 181, 198
Industrial Revolution, the, 54
'Ingleside', 51
Inner Temple, the, 129
Inns of Court, the, 129
International Workers' Educational Club, 57, 58, 123, 235
'Invisible man' theory, 173
Ipswich, Suffolk, 210
Ireland, 26, 33, 67, 81, 84–5, 112
Irish Nationalists, 84
Irish Sea, 33, 84
Irving, Sir Henry, 43, 226
Isenschmid, Joseph, 73–9

Isenschmid, Mrs, 75, 78
Isle of Dogs, 134
Isle of Wight, 80
Islington, 190, 251
Islington Workhouse, 78

Jack and Jill (Sickert), 254
Jack the Ripper (BBC series), 15, 16, 18, 20, 152
Jack the Ripper (Farson), 45, 122, 234
Jack the Ripper: A New Theory (Stewart), 166, 192
Jack the Ripper in Fact and Fiction (Odell), 48
Jack the Ripper, or The Mysteries of the East End, 194
Jah-Bul-On, in Freemasonry, 155
Jahweh, 154–5
'J' Division, 49
Jenkins, Right Hon. Roy, 234
Jenner, Sir William, 35, 188
Jerusalem, 163*n.*
Jewish slaughterman theory, 107
Jews, 62, 64, 123, 155, 178, 179, 229, 247
Johnson, Dr, 197
Johnson, Florence Grace, 122
Joll, James, 82
Jonas, Harry, 18, 19, 20
Jones, Elwyn, 16, 17, 151, 152
Joppa, 168, 176
Journal, Le (Sickert), 256
Jubela, Jubelo and Jubelum, 168–9, 171, 176, 179
Junius, 164
Jupiter, 254
Juwes, 61, 178–9, 261

KEARLEY AND TONGE WAREHOUSES, 175
Kelly, Henry, 67
Kelly, John (Eddowes's man), 61, 149
Kelly, John (Marie's father), 33, 67
Kelly, Marie:
  mentioned, 29, 35, 71, 143–4, 150, 169, 254, 255, 259, 264
  murder of, 14, 36, 38, 49, 65–70, 123, 129, 142, 158, 173, 183, 193, 195, 202, 204, 229, 230, 236, 253, 256
  witness at Annie Elizabeth Crook's wedding, 19 flees to East End, 19, 92, 212 becomes nanny to Alice Margaret Crook, 24 arrives at Cleveland Street, 25, 33 attempts blackmail, 28, 160, 162, 255 threat posed by, 29, 31, 163, 199 background, 33
  search for, 34, 36, 212, 257–8
  Eddowes mistaken for, 36, 37, 175, 183, 235, 259–60
  file on, 56, 233
  inquest on, 110–13, 161, 167
  seen by Hutchinson, 113–14, 252
  and Dorset Street, 145
  intended victim, 149
  injuries to, 166, 168, 169, 170–1
  post mortem examination of, 167
  Sickert's paintings based on, 254, 255, 256–7
  Sickert's attempt to save, 259–60
Kempshott Road, Streatham Common, 72
Kennington, 122, 123
Kensington, 64, 213
Kentish Town, 21, 253
Keylers, the, 69
Kidney, Michael, 146–7
Kidney sent to George Lusk, 62–3, 221–3
King Edward the Seventh (Magnus), 91
King George V and Queen Mary (Sickert), 256
King Street, E.C.2, 188
King's Arms public house, 177
King's Bench Walk, Inner Temple, 129, 134, 138–9, 140, 141
Kirley, Sergeant, 50
Knight, Stephen, 263, 264
Knollys, Lord, 120
Knowles, Emily, 130–1
Knowles, Mr, 129–31, 132
Kosminski, 124

LABOUCHERE, HENRY, 89, 90
Labour Party, the 195
Lacy, Colonel, 188
Lacy, Susan Ann—see Gull, Lady Susan
Lamb, P.C. 252, 57
Lamb Street, Spitalfields, 58
Lambeth Infirmary, 122, 123
Lambeth Workhouse, 51
Lancet, The, 185
Landsbert, Henry, 94
Landseer Road, Holloway, 75
Lang-Lang, Australia, 132

Law Society, the, 141
Lawende, Joseph, 60
Lazarus Breaks His Fast (Sickert), 249
Lea, river, 186
Leader, William, 94
Leadenhall Street, E.C.3, 177
'Leather Apron', 62, 73, 74, 77, 172, 219
'Lees' letter, 194
Lees, Nelson Edwin, 210
Lees, Robert James, 193–207, 210
Leman Street Police Station, 62, 65, 74
Letters file (Scotland Yard), 48, 135, 194, 219
Letter 'From Hell'—see Lusk letter
Lewes, Sussex, 188
Lewis (in Freemasonry), 170
Lewis, Sarah, 69
Leytonstone, 171
Liberal Party, the, 32–3, 84
Life and Opinions of Walter Richard Sickert, The (Emmons), 94, 251
Life Guards, the, 84
Lighter Side of My Official Life, The (Anderson), 247
Lilly, Marjorie, 41, 44, 94, 252–3, 257, 259, 261
Limerick, Marie Kelly native of, 33
Lindley, Lord Justice, 197
Lindner, Henry, 95
'Lipski', 238
Lister, Lord, 197
Liverpool, 134–5
Llewellyn, Dr Ralph, 49, 51, 167, 168, 169, 185, 236, 249
Lloyd, John, 151, 152
Lodge of Joppa, 176–7
Lodge of Judah, 177
Lodge of Prosperity, 176
Lodge of Stability, 177
Lodger, The (Lowndes), 45
Lodger, The (Tate), 45
London (Barker and Jackson), 84
London Bridge, 208
London County Sessions, 122
London Hospital, Whitechapel, 65, 185, 225, 226, 228
London Hospital Museum, 62, 222
London Library, the, 151
London, Tilbury and Southend Railway, 57
Long, P.C. 245A Alfred, 60, 177
Longford, Elizabeth, 92
Lord Chancellor, 91, 117, 118, 120
Lord Mayor's Show, 36
Lords' Committee on Intemperance, 245
Louis, William, 50
Louise of Hesse, Queen of Denmark, 42
Lowndes, Marie Belloc, 45
Lunacy Commission, 99, 100, 140
Lunacy Observation Ward, 100
Lushington, Godfrey, 178
Lusitania, the, 16
Lusk, George, 62, 63, 221, 223
Lusk letter, 62–3, 219, 221–3
Lyceum Theatre, 43
Lyons, Isaac, 94

MacDONALD, RODERICK, 110–13
MacLeod, C. M., 223
Macnaghten, Sir Melville, 13, 14, 45, 46, 49, 121, 122, 127, 128, 129, 137, 139, 140, 141, 218
Macnaghten notes, the, 122–9, 137
MacNamara, Edward, 132
Magic Flute, The (Mozart), 158
Magnus, Sir Philip, 91
Mall, The, 83
Man In The Attic, The, 45
Manor House Lunatic Asylum, Chiswick, 130
Maple Street, W.1., 27
Marble Arch, 73, 196, 197
Mark Masons, the, 179
Marlett, Mr, 78
Marsh, George, 226–30
Marx, Eleanor, 82, 83
Marx, Karl, 82
Mary, Queen, 256
Marylebone, Borough of, 95
Marylebone High Street, 78
Marylebone Mercury and West London Gazette, 216
Marylebone Records Office, 18
Marylebone Times, 216
Marylebone Workhouse, 24, 95, 98
Mason, Thomas, 190, 202, 209, 215
Masonic Hall, Leytonstone, 171
Master Mason degree, 156, 163, 165, 166, 169, 176
Matters, Leonard, 48, 234
Matthews, Henry (Home Secretary), 60, 239
Maxwell, Caroline, 68–9, 145
Maxwell, Henry, 68
Mayfair, 82, 177, 191
McCarthy, John, 66–7, 68
McCarthy, Sergeant, 122–3
McCormick, Donald, 45, 46, 106, 151, 221, 250

McKay, Muriel, 194
McKenzie, Alice, 49, 126
McWilliam, Inspector James, 59, 60, 178
Medical Directory, the, 129, 130, 133, 134, 190, 193
Medical Register, the, 133, 134, 181, 190, 192, 193
Melbourne, Australia, 130, 132
Metropolitan Police, 16, 36, 60, 61, 62, 63, 75, 114, 122, 156, 157, 167, 232, 243, 246, 247
Mickle, Dr, 77, 79
Middle Ages, Freemasons originate in, 153
Middlesex County Records Office, 66
Middlesex Hospital, 93
Midwife theory, 107
Mile End, 62
Miles, Frank, 139–40, 264
Milford Road, Upper Holloway, 75, 76, 78
Millais, Sir John Everett, 95
Miller's Court, 14, 66, 67, 68, 69, 114, 123, 124, 128, 145, 256
Minories, the, 123, 133–5, 138
Mitre Square, Aldgate, 14, 59, 60, 63, 123, 124, 127, 169, 173, 174–7, 236, 252, 260–1
Mitre Street, 175, 177, 236
Mitre Tavern, 176, 177
Mizen, P.C. 55H, 49, 51
Monro, James, 157, 247
Montagu, Samuel (M.P. for Whitechapel), 62
Moore, George, 251
Moore, Inspector, 242
Mordaunt divorce scandal, 87, 140
Mordaunt, Lady Harriet, 87, 140
Morgan, 103
Morgan, Mrs, 103
Morgan, William, 156, 158–9
Morris, Mr, 60
Morris, William, 23, 83
Mowbray, Henry, 94
Moylan, Sir John, 121
Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus, 158, 252
Mrs Barrett (Sickert), 255, 256–7
Muir, Sir Edward, 189
Munich, 42
Myddleton Square, Islington, 18
Mylett, Rose (alias Lizzie Davis), 49
Mystery of Jack the Ripper, The (Matters), 48

NAPOLEON, Gull's similarity to, 35, 200
Neate, Alan, 98, 100, 101
Neil, P.C. 97J, 49, 51
Netley, John Charles:
  mentioned, 93, 174, 237, 238, 250
  Eddy's coachman, 23, 211
  inquiries in East End by, 36
  part in murders, 37, 169, 175, 183, 212, 235, 236, 238–9, 258
  and murder of Stride, 37, 235, 238–9, 258 attempts life of Alice Margaret Crook, 38–9, 212–3, 263
  investigation of, 211–17 character and background of, 211–12
  birth of, 213
  death of, 215–17
New College, Oxford, 129
New Cottage, Buck's Row, 50
New Court, Dorset Street, 70
New Cross Road, 73
New Street, Bishopsgate, 67
New York, 229
Newcastle, Duke of, 165
Newlove, 116, 118
Newton, Arthur, 118, 256
Newton, Joseph Fort, 176
Nichols, Mary Ann ('Polly'):
  mentioned, 145, 247
  murder of, 14, 36, 37, 38, 49, 73, 123, 135, 142, 143, 157, 212, 235, 246
  involved with Kelly, 34, 144, 183
  file on, 49, 56, 233
  Spratling's report on, 49, 236
  injuries to, 49, 50, 166, 167, 168, 169, 249
  discovery of corpse of, 49, 50–1
  Abberline's report on, 50–3, 73, 249
  background of, 51
  inquest on, 108, 185
  Queen Victoria sees significance in murder of, 142–3
Nichols, William, 51
'Nickley', 214
Nineteenth Century, The, 191
Nixon, Richard Milhous, 107
Noah's Ark, 154
Nonconformists, 87
Normandy, 25
Norris, Dr, 216
North London Press, 119
North Wales, 33

Notting Hill, 195

Observer, The, 214
Odell, Robin, 48, 107, 152, 221, 240
Old Bailey, the, 199
Old Kent Road, 51
Old Montague Street, Whitechapel, 51
Old Nichol Gang, 34
Oliver, James, 230–2
Openshaw, Dr, 62, 222
Osborn Street, Whitechapel, 53
Osborne House, Isle of Wight, 80
Osiris, 155
Osnaburgh Street, N.W.1., 17, 103
Ostrog, Michael, 124
Owen, Harry, 69
Oxford, 46, 129, 133
Oxford Street, 196, 197

Packer, Matthew, 241–4, 249, 261
Packer, Mrs, 241
Paget, Rev. Henry Luke, 101, 210
Paget, Sir James, 197, 209, 210
Painter In His Studio, The (Sickert), 256
Paisnel, Edward, 199
Pall Mall, 82, 83, 84
Pall Mall Gazette, 40, 172, 226, 228, 229
Paper Buildings, Inner Temple, 140
Paris, 42, 86, 88, 190, 229
Paris, Comte de, 90
Park Road, Regent's Park, 216
Parke, Ernest, 119–20, 159, 179
Parliament, 84
Parnell, Charles Stewart, 84
Pasteur, Louis, 184
Past Zerubbabel (in Freemasonry), 205
Paul, Robert, 51
Peabody Buildings, 177
Pearson, Hesketh, 139
Peckham, 195
Pedachenko, Dr Alexander, 106
'Penal sign', 166
People, The, 210
Pepin, Marie, 255
Perkins, Bacon and Company, 51
Perkins and Bellord, 143
Petticoat Lane Market, 31
Phantom Fiend, The, 45
Philadelphia, 135
Philadelphia Times, 59
Phillips, Dr George Bagster:
  mentioned, 112
  called to examine body of Chapman, 55 called to examine body of Stride, 57 on Eddowes's injuries, 61 on question of anatomical knowledge, 61, 185 dialogue with Baxter, 108–10 at Kelly inquest, 111–13, 169 on Stride's injuries, 167, 240
  at Chapman inquest, 108–10, 185, 240
  and rings and coins, 172, 260 on Chapman's time of death, 237
  and grapes, 240–41
Phoenix Park, Dublin, 84
Piccadilly, 54, 82, 196, 197
Pieydagnelle, Eusebius, 186
Pike, Albert, 155
Pinchin Street, Whitechapel, 126, 127
Pizer, John, 62, 74
Poland Street Workhouse, 98
Ponsonby, Sir Henry, 89
Poor Law Amendment Act, the, 99
Poor Law Unions, 99
Poplar, Isle of Dogs, 134
Porter, Emily, 195
Post Office Directory of London, 94, 138–9
Post Office records department, 221
Prater, Elizabeth, 68
Prater, William, 68
Pratt Street, Camden Town, 226, 227
Pre-Raphaelites, the, 94–5, 140, 203
Pre-Raphaelite Tragedy, The (Gaunt), 94
Primrose Hill, 251
Prince Albert public house, Brushfield Street, 74, 77
Prince Albert public house, St Martin's Lane, 226, 227
Prince of Jerusalem, 163*n*.
Prince William Street, Liverpool, 135
Priory of the Holy Trinity, 176
Prisoners' Property Store, 124
Private Letter Book of Metropolitan Police, 177–8
Prostitution figures, in nineteenth century, 149

Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, The, 159–63, 202, 215
Providence Row Women's Refuge, 143, 150
Public Advertiser, 164*n.*
Public Record Office, the, 99, 177
Purkis, Walter, 50

QUATUOR CORONATI LODGE OF MASONIC RESEARCH, 157
Queens Head public house, Commercial Street, 114

RACE, INSPECTOR, 122, 124
Racial hatred, 81–2
Rainham Mystery, the, 126
Rais, Gilles de, 199
Rectory Field, Blackheath, 136
Regent's Park, 216
Republicans, 26, 31, 160
Revolution, fear of, 25–6, 31, 81, 82, 83, 91, 160
Reward of Cruelty, The (Hogarth), 169–71
Reynolds' Newspaper, 89
Richardson, John, 237
Ringer, Mrs, 69, 145
Ripper File, The (Jones and Lloyd), 152
Rochester Row Police Station, 72
Rome, 64, 90, 91
Romford, Essex, 114
Roots, Inspector J., 227–9
Rose Hill Road, Wandsworth, 51
Rose, Sub. Inspector, 75
Rossettis, the, 95
Rotherham, 230–2
Royal Academy, the, 42
Royal Alpha Lodge, 177
Royal Arch or Holy Royal Arch, 155–6, 157, 159, 163*n.*, 169, 205
Royal College of Physicians, 188, 245
Royal College of Surgeons, 189
Royal Commission on Vivisection, 191
Royal Court of Denmark, 22
Royal Family, the, 26, 41, 81, 89, 92, 104, 106, 140, 142, 163, 191, 206
Royal Geographical Society, 164
Royal Institution of Great Britain, 188
Royal Marriages Act, 91
Rumbelow, Donald, 91, 167–8, 171–2, 175, 180, 182, 183, 219–21, 236
Russia, 64

'S', 23, 105, 204, 205, 206
St Bartholomew's Hospital, 213, 215
St Catherine's House, 104
St George's Club, Hanover Square, 190–1
St George's Mortuary, 146, 238, 242
St Giles Workhouse, 98, 100
St James's Parish, 98
St James's Place, Aldgate, 175
St James's Roman Catholic Church, Spanish Place, 90
St James's Square, London, 151
St James's Street, London, 82
St Leonard, Colchester, 186
St Martin's Lane, W.C., 226, 227
St Marx Cemetery, Vienna, 158
St Mary's Asylum, Islington, 190
St Mary's Spital, 54
St Pancras Board of Guardians, 41, 98, 210
St Pancras, Borough of, 95
St Pancras Hospital, 98
St Pancras Workhouse, 98
St Saviour's Hospital, 103
St Saviour's Infirmary, 17, 18, 19, 25, 103, 104
Sadler, Thomas, 127
Salisbury Lodge, 179
Salisbury, Robert Cecil, third Marquess of:
  mentioned, 29, 143
  fear of revolution, 25–6, 31, 82, 91, 160
  first Administration, 26 stages Cleveland Street raid, 27 dilemma over Cleveland Street, 28
  and Freemasonry, 28, 35, 36, 160, 161, 179
  and Kelly, 29, 31, 34, 142, 160, 161 character and views, 31–3 and Gull, 34–5, 189
  and Sickert, 38, 259
  plan to rail off Trafalgar Square, 83 second and third Administration, 84 and Cleveland Street cover-up, 117
Sandringham, 188
Saul, John, 120
Saunders, Dr William, 185–6

Schizophrenia, 199
Schleswig-Holstein, 42
Schwartz, Israel, 238–9, 243, 258–9
Scotland, 181, 245
Scotland Yard, 13, 15, 16, 18, 19, 45, 48, 56, 59, 65–6, 71, 75, 85, 111, 112, 113, 118, 121, 122, 126, 127, 135, 137, 157, 167, 170, 185, 194, 195, 200, 218, 219, 224–33, 234, 236, 241, 242, 243, 248, 249, 257
Scots Guards, the, 33, 67
Sealey, Sergeant, 75
Secret signs, 153
Sequeira, Dr George, 185–6
Settlement, Act of, 91
Sexual Anomalies and Perversions (Hirschfeld), 136
Sharp, Ian, 17–20, 103, 151, 152, 194
Shaw, George Bernard, 23, 83
Sherborne Street, Blandford Square, 73
Sherlock Holmes, 147
Shoreditch, 111, 251
Shoreditch Town Hall, 110
Shrewsbury, 104
'Sickert, Albert', 23, 104, 105
Sickert, Johann Jürgen, 42
Sickert, Joseph, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 30, 38, 39, 40, 41, 44, 46, 104, 151, 180, 182, 236, 246, 251, 253, 254, 256, 259, 261–2, 263–4
Sickert, Oswald Adalbert, 42, 43
Sickert, Walter, 17, 19, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 58, 70, 80, 81, 82, 86, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 121, 138, 139, 140, 141, 143, 144, 147, 148, 149, 151, 152, 160, 161, 162, 163, 169, 171, 173, 174, 175, 179, 180, 183, 184, 186, 189, 190, 202, 206, 207, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 246, 248–62, 264
Sidney Street, Whitechapel, 64
Siffey, Annie—see Chapman, Annie Silk-weavers, 54
Simpson, Mrs, 23
Sitwell, Osbert, 44, 80, 259
Sladden, P.C., 117
Slade School of Art, 22
Slaughterers, 59, 61
Smith, Emma Elizabeth, 49, 143
Smith, P.C. William, 251, 257, 258
Smith, Major Sir Henry, 178
Social Democratic Federation, 82
Social reformer theory, 107, 208
Social unrest, 81–5
Socialism, 26, 31, 82, 160
Solomon, King, 154, 168
Somerset House, 18, 129, 213, 214
Somerset, Lord Arthur, 117, 118, 119
South Africa, 157
Special Branch, the, 85
Special Irish Branch, the, 85
Spencer, Martha, 73
Spicer, P.C. Robert, 71–2
Spitalfields, 53, 54, 55, 56, 66, 67, 68, 69, 77, 111, 136, 144, 145, 146, 147, 174–5, 236
Spratling, Inspector J., 49, 51, 236, 237
Star, The, 74
Stead, Mr, 228, 229
Stephen, Harry Lushington, 140
Stephen, Herbert, 140
Stephen, James Kenneth, 107, 140, 141, 219, 224, 264
Stephenson, Dr Roslyn D'O, 226–30
Stepney, 145, 210
Stevenson, Robert Louis, 199
Stewart, William, 107, 166–7, 171, 192–3, 202, 207
Stilson, Inspector, 79
Stonemasons, 153, 176
Storey, Ann, 95
Storr, Dr Anthony, 257
Stow, John, 54
Stowell, Dr Thomas Eldon, 204
Stowell, Dr Thomas Eldon Alexander, 105, 181, 202–7
Strand, The, 39, 212, 215, 242
Strathmore Gardens, Kensington, 133
Streatham Common, 72
Stride, Elizabeth:
  mentioned, 124, 145, 242, 249, 261
  injuries to, 14, 58, 166–7, 168
  murder of, 14, 36, 37, 49, 56–9, 123, 173, 183, 212, 235, 238–41, 258
  involved with Kelly, 34, 144, 183 address of, 145–7
  file on, 49, 56, 233
  Swanson's report on, 57–9
  arrangement of corpse of, 58, 171
  background of, 146–7
  inquest on, 146–7

  and Dorset Street, 147
  time of death of, 239
Strokes, 35, 180–4
Styles, Detective Inspector John, 75–6
Sublime Prince of the Royal Secret, 163*n*.
'Sudden Death', 226
Sun, The, 122, 124, 126
Sunday Times-Herald, Chicago, 189–92, 194, 210
Superintendent Executive, 123
Supreme Being, 154
Supreme Grand Chapter, 157
Surgeon theory, 107
Surgeons, 61
Survey of London, (Stow) 54
Suspects file (Scotland Yard), 48, 71, 72, 137, 185, 224–33
Swallow Gardens, Whitechapel, 127
Swanson, Chief Inspector Donald, 57, 60, 63, 229, 237, 238–9, 240
Swinscow, 116
Sydney, Australia, 132

TABRAM, MARTHA, 49, 65, 126
Tailor's Arms public house, Mitre Street, 177
Talmud, the, 152
Tanner, Elizabeth, 146
Tapper, Annie, 240
Tasmania, Dr Lionel Druitt in, 133
Taxil, Leo, 155
Taylor, Dr J. O., 134
Temple of Solomon, 154, 171, 176
Ten Bells public house, Commercial Street, 68
Tennyson, Alfred, Lord, 88
Thain, P.C. 96J, 49, 51
Thames Police, 59, 213
Thames, river, 46, 54, 121, 122, 124, 126, 128, 137, 138, 139, 208, 213, 214, 230
Their Good Names (Hyde), 102
Thick, Detective Sergeant William, 76, 78
Thirty-third Masonic degree, 156, 162
Thomas, Danford, 216
Thompson, Sir Basil, 122
Thompson and McKay, Messrs, 216
Thorpe, Essex, 187
Thorpe-le-Soken, Essex, 186, 197, 208–9
Thrawl Street, Spitalfields, 51, 53, 114, 144, 145
Thyne, Dr Thomas, 134
Tilbury, 64
Times, The, 57, 65, 81, 170, 175, 198, 204, 208, 236, 240–1, 252
Tite Street, Chelsea, 139–40
Tottenham, 75
Tottenham Court Road, 22–3
Tottenham Street, 27
Toughill, Thomas, 139
Tower of Babel, 154
Trafalgar Square, 26, 80, 82, 83
Tranby Croft scandal, 85–7
Treasury, the, 118, 123
Truman's Brewery, Hanbury Street, 53
Truman, Hanbury and Buxton, 53
'Trunk of a Female', 49
Truth, 89
Turner, Martha—see Tabram, Martha
Turner, William, 216
Tyler, George, 75, 76, 77, 78

UNION LODGE, 176
University of London, 181, 188

VATICAN, THE, 154
Veck, 116–19
Venice, 249
Venturney, Julia, 69
Vestry Hall, Cable Street, 239
Victims file (Scotland Yard), 48, 49
Victoria Embankment, 139
Victoria Home, Commercial Street, 114
Victoria Street, Westminster, 16, 72
Victoria, Queen:
  mentioned, 15, 22, 43, 81, 92, 188, 191, 197, 209, 252
  fury over Eddy's marriage to Annie Elizabeth Crook, 25 unpopularity, 26, 85, 88–9 relations with family, 31 letter to Gladstone, 80
  Golden Jubilee, 85, 88 and Eddy's proposed marriage to Hélène d'Orléans, 90–1
  and Cleveland Street scandal, 118
  and Nichols murder, 142–3 Lees called before, 195 depicted in Ennui, 256
Vienna, 88, 158, 190
Vienna Observatory, the, 158
Vivisection, 191–2
Vollon, A., 259

WALES, 34
Walsh, Inspector, 72
Warren, Sir Charles:
  mentioned, 62
  and Kelly, 66
  appointed Commissioner, 83, 250 and unemployed, 83
  and Freemasonry, 156–8, 162, 260
  and writing on wall, 162, 178–9 resigns, 233
  and Packer, 242–3, 249 and grapes in Stride murder, 242–3, 249, 260 and Monro, 246
  and Anderson, 250
Watergate conspiracy, the, 107
Watkins, P.C., 60, 63
'Watt, Detective Chief Superintendent John', 16, 151, 152
Weaver's Arms, Hanbury Street, 177
Weber, Dr Hermann, 200
Wembley, Middlesex, 195
Wentworth Dwellings, Goulston Street, 177, 261
Wentworth Street, Whitechapel, 79
West, Acting Superintendent J., 76
West Country, the, 136
Westfield View, Rotherham, 230
Westminster Abbey, 43, 72
Westminster Board of Guardians, 98
Westminster Bridge, 39, 72, 213
Westminster Bridge Road, 123
Westminster Hospital, 214
Westminster Pier, 213, 214
Westminster Union, 41
What Does She Do With It?, 89
What Shall We Do For The Rent? (Sickert)—see Camden Town Murder series
Whistler, James McNeill, 22, 139
White, Sergeant Stephen, 241–3
Whitechapel, 13, 18, 33, 34, 51, 64, 65, 66, 75, 76, 79, 110–11, 123, 124, 127, 142, 143, 144, 145, 161, 174, 185, 204, 205, 207–8, 220, 226, 227, 233, 260
Whitechapel Mortuary, 50, 51, 55, 168, 169
Whitechapel Road, 49, 51, 53, 59, 108
Whitechapel Vigilance Committee, 62, 121, 221, 240
Whitefriars Street, City, 51
Whitehall, 16, 25, 178
Whitehall Mystery, the, 126
White House, Flower and Dean Street, 145
White's Row, Spitalfields, 144
Whittington-Egan, Richard, 210
Wilde, Oscar, 80, 139–40
Wilks, S., 181–2, 200
William Withey Gull, A Biographical Sketch (Acland), 181
Williams, Watkin, 157
Wilson, Arthur, 86
Wilson, Colin, 136, 180, 186, 205
Wilson, Mrs Arthur, 86
Wimborne, Dorset, 129
Winchester College, 129
Windsor, 28, 38, 56
Winslow, Sarah, 94
Wiseman, Cardinal Nicholas, 90
Wood, Robert, 255–6
Woodford Green, Essex, 71
Woolf, Virginia, 140
Workhouses, 99–102
Working Lads' Institute, Whitechapel Road, 108, 208
World's Tragedy, The (Crowley), 103
Worshipful Company of Fishmongers, the, 164
Writing on the wall, the, 61, 62, 177–9, 243, 260

X's Affiliation Order (Sickert), 254

'Y' DIVISION, 75
Yellow Palace, the, 42

364.12
KNI

Knight, Stephen
The final solution: Jack the Ripper

	DATE DUE
NOV 10
NOV 27 DEC 22
DEC 22
OCT [illegible]
FEB 9
APR [illegible] 1985

Sickert, a contemporary painter involved in the case, the reports of the on-the-spot investigators, two sets of secret papers supposedly inaccessible to the public until 1992—the Scotland Yard and the Home Office files on the Whitechapel Murders—and the newly opened file on the infamous Cleveland Street Scandal of 1889, Stephen Knight's exhaustively researched study reveals for the first time a truth more terrible than the myth construed to camouflage it. A chilling criminal investigation, a shattering political-historical exposé, Jack the Ripper is destined to be regarded as the final word on the nineteenth century's most vicious and vexing mystery.

Stephen Knight is a journalist who started his own investigations into the Jack the Ripper subject for a newspaper covering the Whitechapel area of London. Now writing for an international travel newspaper, he lives at Ilford, Essex, is married, and has two daughters.

Jacket design copyright © 1976
by Sam Salant

David McKay Company, Inc.
New York

Why did these three men commit the Jack the Ripper murders?

441-BAA-061

IT'S NOT IMPOSSIBLE

Healing from Ritual Abuse and Mind Control

© 2017 by Svali and Hoji

For with men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible. Matthew 19:26

This book is dedicated to:

- The God of all love, mercy and forgiveness. He is good beyond belief, and the reason this book is possible.
- My daughter, Hoji. You bless me so much and I thank God for your courage and faith.
- Jo: You are a general in God's army, and a lover of all that is good. Thank you for showing what Christian love is like.
- Cheri: When you pray, God answers, because you are His friend. Thank you.
- T: You were there during some of the hardest parts of the journey, and showed unfailing faith and courage.
- My children and loved ones still in the cult: I pray for you daily, for your freedom.

Contents

Introduction 3

Chapter One: Essentials to Deprogramming (What Needs to Be in Place Before Starting) 4

Chapter Two: Why Programming Works 8

Chapter 3: Accessing: Why it Occurs, and How to Prevent It 11

Chapter 4: Dealing with Emotions 20

Chapter 5: Presentation Programming 30

Chapter 6: Working with Healing Blockers 38

Chapter 7: Antichristian Programming 45

Chapter 8: Working with Cult Loyal Parts 48

Chapter 9: Helping Spiritual Systems Heal 54

Chapter 10: Helping Littles and Infants Heal 61

Chapter 11: Reprogramming Systems 65

Chapter 12: Suicidality and Self Harm 68

Chapter 13: Working with the Birth Mother 72

Chapter 14: Working with the Core 76

Chapter 15: Building Joy 81

Chapter 16: Relating to Support People 86

Chapter 17: Why People Don't Heal 90

Introduction

This is a book about healing from some of the most difficult traumas a human being can undergo. I wrote the book for one purpose: to help those on the journey realize it is possible to heal and to help those supporting them understand what they are trying to heal from.

I have been on my own healing journey for 27 years. It started when I went for deliverance years ago, and continued during the time when I realized that I was a member of a satanic cult, chose to leave the group, was abused and tortured and forced to recant, and then by God's grace chose to continue to heal from those traumas. I wrote numerous articles that have been published on the Internet and shared with others earlier in this healing journey. Those articles reflected my understanding of healing at that time. This book reflects my understanding in the years since, after numerous access attempts (some successful, many not), and a deepening walk with God, who is my true healer.

I used to be a programmer for a group that stands behind the Illuminati, Knights Templar, Opus Dei, Magnificat, Trinity and the other international occultic organizations (there are twelve in all). In fact, I used to be their head programmer, and ran the programming labs for this organization after Mengele died, when the torch was first passed on to another, and then to me. I developed or helped develop many of the programs discussed in this book or "improved" on those developed before my time. I no longer work for that group, and this book is my restitution. My other restitution is this: I pray that all who were ever programmed by me, or with the technologies that I developed, will be freed and released, in the name of the true Jesus who heals and blesses and forgives. I am forgiven for all that I did, by a God who shows amazing grace and mercy. He has literally held me as I shook and cried and screamed at times, both during the actual traumas, and during the healing of them. He has never left my side, throughout the journey. He never abandons during the journey, even though it can be difficult at times.

Many will ask "Where did you go during the years you disappeared?" I chose to go offline, had no cell phone, and lived with a safe friend during the five years of that part of my healing. I was then tested greatly, and found that God would come through. During this time, one my daughters (Hoji) chose to leave the group as well, in large part due to my testimony for Christ. She remembers (as I do, as well) being there when I was tortured for my faith in Christ, and that I whispered "I forgive you" to her and the others present (leaders of this organization). With this I want to add: "I want you to get free" to each of my loved ones who are still in the group. It really is possible to get free, and this book is my testimony to this fact. May it help and bless those who read its pages.

svali

Chapter One: Essentials to Deprogramming (What Needs to Be in Place Before Starting)

Healing from mind control programming is possible, but it is not easy. One of the most difficult issues that therapists and supporters face is the heartbreak of seeing individuals that they attempt to help break free get accessed continuously while the individual is completely unaware. They must weigh the attempt to help against the possibility of harm, since attempts to heal can be used against the survivor if they are accessed.

Before attempting to heal from occultic programming, it is important to have support in place if at all possible. This is difficult work and having the support that is needed can make a huge difference in success and preventing reaccess. Below are suggestions for finding support.

Safe Support and accountability

First and foremost, it is important to have a safe support person in your life who can provide accountability (i.e. help ensure that you aren't doing missions overseas for three months when you thought you were going to college or working). You will want to have someone you can talk to, vent to, or let your parts out around who will not be a perpetrator to you or them. There are numerous reasons for needing support during healing, but the foundational reason is this: the wounding to the survivor was done relationally, and healing is also done relationally (i.e. the survivor was hurt by people, and the survivor needs people to heal).

I have heard of survivors (with government mind control, not extensive occultic programming) who have been able to heal "solo" but this is extremely rare. While the individual may be able to break programming and become free of access, these individuals may integrate, but do not truly heal, because there has not been the healthy attachment or modeling of healthy behavior that is needed for true relational healing.

Finding safe support may sound simple, but safe support and accountability from a non-dissociative person can be extremely hard to find.

Why is this? One reason is that most programmed survivors will be almost literally surrounded by cult people; and early in their therapy, they will have no idea that this is so. The loving husband who supports your therapy and drives you to sessions may actually be a handler (this was true for me, of my first two husbands). The best friend who is "always there" for you may be a cult sister. Family members are often also members of the group a survivor is trying to leave.

I have had many survivors ask me "If I was in the cult, is it possible that my husband wasn't?" My heart breaks when I hear this question, because almost always, the answer is "no." People who grew up in a cult group that programmed them will not be allowed to choose their own spouse; the cult chooses them.

What about people who "got away" from the group in their teens?

This is another question I have been asked frequently. The history often goes like this:

the survivor remembers being part of a cult group in their early childhood, then believes that they somehow "escaped" when they left home to go to college or got married. In most cases, the belief that the survivor “left” is a cover memory, designed to cover the fact they are still active and doing their cult jobs. Most cult groups have put time and effort into programming members and do not simply let people “leave”. I have also heard many stories of survivors who later in therapy realized that they never did leave, and the husband or partner they “chose” is actually their handler (an individual whose job is to watch them, report on them, and ensure that they are doing their cult jobs).

Another reason it is extremely difficult to find safe support and accountability is the lack of education and unwillingness in the church to provide these things to survivors. This is not a “slam” against churches, but the reality: many survivors report negative experiences if they disclose the fact that they are breaking free from a cult to their church. This can be due to several reasons:

- People in the church don’t understand their authority in Christ, and are afraid of the spiritual warfare that they believe a survivor will bring into the church if they help the survivor
- The church has had previous bad experiences with infiltrators who had jobs of promoting negative perceptions of survivors and creating chaos, division or burnout within the church
- Misunderstanding within the church regarding the need for support and accountability. A survivor may be erroneously seen as “paranoid” or “not trusting God with their safety.” Requests for accountability are misunderstood due to ignorance in the church about how cults work or how access occurs
- Fear of the cult and fear of possible physical retaliation. This fear is reinforced by some very bad teaching about cults and survivors

Realistically, when looking for support and accountability, the survivor may not have many – if any - options. There are very few “safe houses” (and most that do exist have been reported to be infiltrated). Early in their journey, the survivor will want to pray that God does provide this accountability and support.

Ideally, a support person will have the following characteristics:

- They are not dissociative, or are a completely healed survivor. This requires discernment because it is not uncommon for “supporters” or those in prayer ministries who are drawn to work with survivors to be dissociative, and completely unaware of this fact. I have heard of numerous accounts of a survivor’s “support person” learning that they themselves are dissociative, and neither they nor the survivor initially suspected this fact. Survivors should be especially wary of individuals that they feel an “instant connection with” (real friendship takes time). Also, some “integrated” survivors later discover that only the top levels of their systems joined, while deeper levels continued to be cult active. Get to know a person well, and be prayerful, before asking them into a support role.

- Mature. All too often, supporters of survivors have their own unhealed wounds that can negatively impact the survivor. I have heard numerous horror stories of survivors who worked almost as slaves in return for a room in a house; or of emotional abuse (including Christian abuse) in which the survivor was berated for "taking so long to heal" or "not having the faith to integrate quickly" by individuals who did not understand how mind control works or what the process of healing looks like. This can be extremely damaging to a survivor who is already struggling with antichristian programming.

- Have a strong faith. While I have known survivors who worked on healing without Christianity, I personally cannot imagine healing occultic abuse and the demonic oppression that results without going to the real source of healing: the loving God who created us and never abandoned us, even during the worst of the abuse. Anyone who supports survivors of ritual abuse must have a source of strength, joy and spiritual refreshment to help them in the battle against the demonic, or they will burn out. It helps tremendously to help others from the viewpoint of victory; and the Holy Spirit can provide the wisdom, discernment and love that no other source can.

Therapist

During healing, it is also important to have a therapist who is knowledgeable and experienced in dealing with cult programming. Healing work involves coming in touch with deep trauma, including intense emotions and painful memories. A therapist who is warm, has faith that you can heal, and can help support you through this journey can make a huge difference.

Church

Another possible source of strength while healing and deprogramming is a strong, loving church. Some of the best help for healing – and some of the worst spiritual and verbal abuse – comes from churches, which makes it important to find one that is helpful.

Look for a church that is based upon the Bible, and where the people are accepting. People who shun or avoid you because you are a survivor will impede your healing. Does the church have a ministry that helps those recovering from emotional, spiritual or sexual abuse? You may not want to initially disclose that you are a survivor of cult abuse or mind control; instead, you may want to check out their ministry to other issues first.

About Safe Houses

Safe houses are a controversial topic, and for good reason. I lived in the home of an individual who was not dissociative for two years during an intense portion of my own healing journey. While I was not accessed due to 24/7 accountability (which was good) I did endure some verbal and emotional abuse from the woman whose house I lived in. I was expected to cook, clean, help out financially and spend eight hours a day, five days a week journaling as a requirement of staying there, or I would be asked to leave. I did journal and discovered a lot about my parts and their jobs during this time, but at great emotional cost. I am grateful, however, that I had safety during those two years, and do appreciate her allowing me to stay there during this very difficult portion of my journey.

I also stayed at a “safe house” in which I was accessed (by my daughter from another country, who came to live there soon after I entered the house). The house was not safe, because I myself was not yet safe (I was unaware of my deepest double binds, which made me vulnerable to access), and because the other survivors in the house were quite early in their own healing journeys, and so were all also vulnerable to access.

If you are able to stay with a truly safe, non-dissociative friend or pastor who opens their home to you, you are fortunate indeed. But these situations are rare. Some “safe houses” are actually designed to access others attempting to leave the cult, and any survivor who chooses this route should exercise discernment and caution.

Women’s shelters can be a short-term option, but often cult groups will send in a member after the person attempting to escape (this happened to me three times). Also, some women’s shelters are managed by cult personnel for this very reason. Others know that they are not trained to deal with those escaping cult abuse. So pray before seeking safety to help ensure that the situation you are entering into is truly safe.

It is possible to heal without having all four types of support described above; you may only find one, if any, sources of help in your healing journey. If you can find safe accountability, this is the most helpful as you begin healing.

Chapter Two: Why Programming Works

Mind control involves the installation of programs into a person. "Programming" is convincing a person (a part/personality/alter) that he or she have no choice but to perform a particular action, or hold to a particular belief. While it can be helpful to understand what programming is present, an important foundation for healing is to understand why it works. Modern programming is based upon extensive scientific research (by individuals such as B.F. Skinner, Milton Erikson, Mengele and those who followed in his footsteps) as well as the application of spiritual principles that basically "lock it in" after it is installed. In other words, modern programming is a combination of science and spirituality.

Most programming consists of the following components. The length and complexity of each will vary with the skills of the programmers (also known as "trainers" but who are in actuality abusers). The components include:

1. Agreement to installation of the program
2. Participation in a ritual before installation
3. Installation of behavior and beliefs (with concurrent psychological, physical or tech torture)
4. Concurrent installation of command codes and triggers
5. Participation in a ritual after the programming session (sealing ritual)
6. Post-programming bonding session, during which the individual is comforted, and young (infant and child) parts are rocked, held, given bottles of formula or breast fed, and rewarded for "doing well" during the session

Why do people agree to have programming installed?

This often surprises survivors, who initially believe that they were unwilling victims of evil people (which can also be true). The reality is, they are often the willing victims of programmers because they are thinking and acting due to a lifetime of the installation (indoctrination) of false beliefs. This agreement is usually not conscious, since the individual has usually made agreements within their presentation to not remember their own programming.

What kind of false beliefs bring a person to the point of allowing the installation of programming? In most groups, this programming begins in the womb, while the individual is still a fetus. Mengele was the first to truly demonstrate and document the effects of fetal trauma and its role in controlling the individual; over the years, others built upon his work. Today, extensive trauma (torture of the birth mother) carrying the fetus and of the fetus is considered a routine part of programming.

The reasons for prenatal torture are numerous. One of the main goals is to develop in the individual the concept that the world (which they have never truly interacted with yet) is an unsafe place, where bad things happen. Then, when the trainer tells the fetus, “God hates you, that is why you and your mother are being hurt” the fetus will believe this lie and incorporate it into their belief system. This creates a primal belief which causes the fetus (and the core throughout the individual’s lifetime) to mistrust God: The individual believes “God is bad, and He does not protect me from pain.”

This primal belief then leads the fetus to accept the following lies:

- I must protect myself (because God can’t or won’t)
- I must protect my mother

Unfortunately, the fetus is very tiny, and is not God (the only one who can truly protect). This creates a conflict: if God will not protect me and my birth mother, then how do I protect her?

The trainer will then offer the fetus a solution to this dilemma. They will ask the fetus to accept a demon which they tell the fetus will “protect” them from pain, or will stop their mother’s pain. As soon as the fetus agrees (this agreement is monitored both by brain scans and spiritually by the trainer), the torture is stopped, and the demonic enters in.

The demonic will wrap itself around the core, and creates the first dissociation, or split, with the demonic delusion shielding the fetus from its own pain. Most importantly, the fetus has learned to take the role of “God” in protecting itself from the pain of prenatal torture.
This idolatry (being one’s own messiah, and the birth mother’s messiah) causes the construction of a stronghold of beliefs and lies that later in life cause the individual to agree to their own programming. As the fetus grows and is born, they will later learn to “rescue” people they love, such as brothers, sisters, beloved parents and primary trainers they have bonded with.

This belief that the individual is responsible for the welfare and continued existence of others they love is installed repetitively in the womb. Why? Because programming will not hold unless it is agreed with, either consciously or unconsciously. The individual will be taught in set ups that the people they love most will die if they do not keep their programming running, or allow its installation. A critical part of undoing programming is to look at how these foundational lies are installed (that only I can rescue myself and the people I love; God does not care, and won’t), and the traumas that underlie the beliefs.

False Belief Number Two: God Is Weak

Because the Christian God is able to help a survivor heal, the belief is often installed repetitively in the womb that God is not only unwilling, but unable to help the fetus. Setups are done in which the fetus is raped in the womb (with specialized instruments that resemble miniature Q-tip swabs) which causes intense fetal distress (in fact, some fetuses actually curl up and die in the womb from the intense emotional and physical pain that this causes). The fetus may also have its digits (toes, fingers) cut off in the early months of life in the womb, since these will grow back when done during the early months. While the torture is occurring, setups are done in which a false “jesus” comes into the room, and either abuses the fetus, or wrings his hands, declaring “I’m sorry I can’t help you” or even cries, saying he is afraid.

During these setups, the birth mother is also tortured, and the false “jesus” plays out this script with her. This is an important part of setting up early belief systems in the fetus. Since fetal brain waves automatically synchronize with those of the mother, the fetus often experiences emotions that correspond with what the birth mother experiences; her fear, mistrust and fear of a false jesus who rapes and tortures her will be communicated to the fetus, and build up the belief that the Christian God is evil – and too weak to help during painful circumstances.

Chapter 3: Accessing: Why it Occurs and How to Prevent It

Accessing is a serious issue for survivors, so serious, that I am choosing to devote one of the early chapters in this book to this topic. It is important for both survivors and therapists to understand what accessing is, and the steps they can take to prevent it from happening.

What is accessing?

Accessing is the deliberate contact of a survivor by the group (or affiliates) that they left, in order to intimidate and frighten parts into doing their cult jobs. Access may be as short and simple as a single sentence in an email that scares a part into shutting down therapy or withdrawing from healthy support. It can also be more complex, for instance, a survivor returning to a cult facility for hours for reprogramming.

If a person was raised in an organized group, they will have programming put in to make them accessible by the group. This is considered base-level programming to prevent their leaving.

How is accessing done?

Accessing is done by several methods, depending upon the stage of healing and awareness of the survivor.

One misconception people have is that accessing is done by mysterious, scary "bad" people who follow the survivor around and try to harm them when out and about. But the number one person who accesses the survivor is the survivor themself. They will have recontact programming installed that makes them become extremely anxious if they do not have regular contact with their cult handlers.

Cell phones are the number one method of accessing used by the cult. All survivors who have left an organized group will have programming in place to contact cult members by phone, or to receive messages or calls from cult members by phone. The survivor often will have absolutely no recollection that they received a text or message from the cult (this is how the amnesia linked to this programming works).

Who contacts the survivor? In most cases, the person's immediate family will be the members of the group chosen to contact the survivor. This could be a mother, father, aunt, uncle, brother, sister, children or grandchildren, or other family members. Texts back and forth about "family matters" will often have hidden messages or cues within them, reminding the person's cult parts of their jobs, and the programmed threat that goes with them.

- Examples: "Your family really loves you" is a frequent cue to cult-loyal parts to remember that only the cult can love them.
- "I love you and miss you" can be a cue that if the person does not re-contact, that the person's double binds will be put into danger, or tortured.

- "We haven't heard from you in a while" is an even stronger message that the person's cult parts need to contact, or someone they love will get hurt.

Often, cute videos of family members are sent as reinforcements of the fact that if the person tries to break free, or their parts stop doing their old jobs, the people in the video will be tortured. There may be subliminals in the background reinforcing this message on an unconscious level.

The person's cell phone bill will not show the more blatant or direct cult calls or texts, because there are special codes that can be entered in that ensure that the calls are not recorded by the phone company.

To break this re-contact programming, the individual's presentation (parts that live daily life, sometimes called host parts) need to show the programmed parts that it is entirely possible to disobey the programming directives. This involves breaking the program by:

1. Parts realizing there are options besides the directives
2. Parts giving up programmed lies for truth

The presentation parts may want to choose for a period of time to give up phone contact with cult-active associates or family members, until the person is sufficiently healed to be able to relate without being accessed.

If the person chooses to give up their cell phone (which should be done in order to break the programming, at least for a period of time), the group will then attempt to access the survivor by other methods. They will usually go to email or online next, since most people stay "connected" in these ways.

Emails with triggering subject lines from people the individual knows and trusts will appear around this time in healing. This is because most accessing occurs from people the person has known and loved most of their life. The individual has no idea that these members of their family, or church, or group of friends, is a cult member, since they will be amnesic to this fact until the parts begin coming forward and sharing information with them.

Subliminal Programming

Whenever a survivor uses technology such as a smart phone, goes online, plays video games, or watches current TV programs, they will be fed subliminal messages and images designed to fire off their NWO and other programming. These subliminals are part of Project Alexis, which was designed to prepare the world for the rise of the NWO. The images are fed at a speed of .03 microseconds (faster than conscious sight can see), with extremely rapid audios paired as well.

Once a survivor of cult programming signs into their email address, or visits Facebook, or signs into Amazon, or any other sites online, the subliminals linked to their profile will begin automatically feeding through their browser (there is no "safe" browser or operating system that can prevent this). Images of family members being hurt, and other distressing events, will be flashed by faster than the survivor can visually process. Ads with cues and triggers will also be displayed, and the individual may be completely unaware of this fact until they begin healing and working towards co-consciousness.

It becomes a "catch 22" in many ways: the emails, texts and subliminals frighten parts into not disclosing about family members, and the person is left wondering why their parts are not talking to them, or sharing much in therapy. The failure to disclose and amnesia keep the survivor in constant contact with cult members, while they are completely unaware of this fact. As a result, their cult parts continue to do their jobs, while the person's presentation has no idea that this is going on.

If a person chooses to give up their cell phone, and to go completely offline (or only limited online use with full accountability, i.e. someone watching while they check their bank statement, etc.) then the attempts to access by other methods will escalate.

Common forms of attempted access throughout the process of breaking free, and particularly at this point will include visual triggering by a visit from a family member if the individual is still in contact, or the cult placing someone who looks very similar to a double bind in view of the person. This could be a child who looks very much like a beloved child or grandchild standing next to the survivor at a store; or individuals who look just like a family member showing up when the survivor is in a public place. These are meant as nonverbal warnings: "If you don't obey us, this person will get hurt." These double bind lookalikes may also quickly sign messages to the survivor that they may be amnesic to (such as “help me” or “save me”) in order to trigger their recontact programming.

Cards by postal mail with threats may arrive; or voice mail messages with triggers may be left on a message machine. If the person has international presentations, mail addressed to the name of one of the other presenters, or a child or loved one from the other countries, may show up (i.e. "How odd, this mail came here and I don't know anyone by that name.")

Visual cues may be placed in the survivor's surroundings: a bouquet of flowers that has a special meaning; a special perfume on a card, or a 'gift" of a food that has a specific meaning to another presentation may appear.

If the individual cannot be accessed by other methods, the group will often attempt physical abduction. Often, the survivor will be taken somewhere by someone they know and trust, that they are unaware of as being a cult member, and physical accessing will then occur. If the survivor has too much co-consciousness to allow this, then physical threats and abuse may occur when the survivor is alone or in a vulnerable state.

Along with all of the above, the cult will also attempt spiritual access of the individual trying to break free. Dreams, threats and messages via astral projection may be given while sleeping, or even while awake, through demonic means. It is important that the individual prays about any open doors or parts with double binds that were programmed to stay in contact with loved ones who are cult members in this way.

Why is accessing done?

Accessing is done to make sure that the person's cult parts are continuing to do their jobs and that the presenters continue to remain clueless and amnesic. Continued access will cause continued amnesia and dissociation.

As mentioned previously, these jobs could include "internal", "spiritual" and "external"/"physical" jobs.

Internal jobs

- Making sure that the person's dissociation/amnesia is intact
- Protecting/guarding classified information or parts inside
- Blocking the person's healing
- Undoing the person's work in therapy
- Wearing out helpers
- Sending warfare and division internally and externally
- Participating in full rituals internally and calling on the demonic

External jobs

- Participating in rituals
- Active physical agendas against Christians and those helping survivors break free
- Sabotaging other survivors' safety or healing
- Assignments like research and assassinations
- Training of younger cult members
- Reporting to the cult
- Disseminating misinformation
- Discrediting other survivors and therapists

The person will normally be completely unaware that they have been triggered, or that their cult parts are doing their jobs, until later in healing.

Survivors commonly ask the following question regarding accessing:

If I pray, and ask that my Christian Host or presenters be present, could I still be accessed and unaware of the fact?

Yes. Why? Firstly, because the LORD does not set aside free will in the survivor, including the free will of parts who are still compliant with cult orders or who still want to protect loved ones in the cult way. Also, the Christian host, while a true believer, is often programmed to allow access and may have taken vows of amnesia and access, i.e. the Christian host/presentation is double-minded. Thirdly, the survivor often has a False Christian presentation that takes over the prayer that prays to a false "Jesus" or "God" before the Christian presenters (who pray to the true Christian God) have a chance to pray.

While the Christian presentation can pray, if other cult programmed parts that the Christian presentation is amnesic to rotate out due to a trigger or cue, the person can still be accessed and be completely unaware of this fact.

Here are two examples from real life. At one time, I took an accountability person (another survivor in therapy) with me each time I went to visit my children in another state (there was a custody battle, and at the time, I was only allowed supervised visitation with my children due to the risk of my abducting them in order to get them away from their abuse). Each time, my accountability person and I, as well as trusted church support members, would pray for my safety and ability to stay in my presentation and not lose time during the visitations.

Throughout the visits, I would pray continuously for safety with my accountability friend. On the way home, after each visit, I would thank the LORD with great relief for safety, and the fact that "nothing bad happened" during the visits, and gave praise reports to my church about how the LORD protected me and my friend, and answered our prayers for safety.

It wasn't until years later, and with more healing and deeper internal communication inside, and the amnesia dropping, that I discovered to my great distress that during each visit with my children, I had been accessed, tortured, and reprogrammed during the entire time. My accountability partner had been programmed to not remember these facts either. This is one reason why in general, other survivors do NOT make good accountability for a survivor.

The "safe visits" were actually cover memories that my Christian presentation was told to believe, or my children would be tortured and/or killed. Because I loved my children, there was a huge investment in not remembering, and so I had no idea of what actually happened during the visits. Memories of taking my children shopping were dealt with by cult members placing the items "purchased" in my car, and quick photos during the last hours of the visit were taken, with each photo staged to show different "fun activities" with my children.

In actuality, each visit was re-accessing and reprogramming by the cult, with orders given to not remember the accessing and to come again in several months. The amnesia at the time was complete, with absolutely no hint of what was actually occurring during the visits. My belief that the visits were safe, and that nothing bad had occurred, was real – and mistaken.

Another example:

One survivor who had broken off all contact with her family due to cult memories of them had a short meeting with her brother at a local grocery store. She timed it and had a accountability person come and get her at the end of 15 minutes, to ensure that the meeting was short. She and her brother walked around the store and talked a little. During that meeting, completely unknown to the Christian presentation despite prayer, her brother gave a message to her cult parts. Due to the message, for months her cult parts strongly attempted to sabotage some very important matters for the person. These parts shared what happened only six months later in therapy, after much trouble.

Asking the Christian presenters/Host if the survivor was safe during a time period may not work for several reasons:

- The false Christian Host was the one actually out praying and reporting how the trip went, and the survivor is completely unaware of this fact

- The Christian presentation/Host has been heavily programmed to sabotage healing and keep cult contact up. They will be completely unaware of this fact. The person's day to day Christian presentation/Host may be the most heavily programmed part of the person, and they will not know this at all. The cult will not leave Christian parts unprogrammed; and in fact, will make sure these are the ones that maintain recontact.

How Do You Prevent Re-accessing?

Now that the problem of accessing has been defined, what can the survivor, and their helper do, to prevent reaccessing? Especially with the knowledge that early in therapy, reaccessing occurs in nearly 100 % of survivors? It is very common for survivors to be given cover memories that they "broke free" or that the cult abuse ended earlier in life, while in reality, they have been continuously cult active. It is common for survivors to be reaccessed or have cult contact of some kind, until the amnesia starts coming down.

The cult does not just "let people go" when they become adults, or enter therapy. Instead, the accessing will often increase during this time, as cults or government agencies do not want to lose members.

With this knowledge, the survivor will need to find out which parts are currently in contact with the cult. One way to do so is to give up all phone, email and online activity for a period of time, such as two months. The parts who are currently contacting will probably complain loudly, or the survivor may even become suicidal. The person may become restless and feel a huge urgency that they are "missing something important" in emails or online (the survivor will always have legitimate sounding reasons for continuing online and phone activities, such as checking bank statements and paying bills, but behind these is their programming to recontact running). The Christian presentation, with support, then has the opportunity to bring truth to these parts and help them break out of their cult-trained beliefs.

The desire to stop cult contact must come from the survivor themselves. While it may be obvious to the therapist and others that the survivor is being re-accessed, they will be oblivious to this fact, and will become very angry/defensive/hostile if confronted about this.

It can be helpful to educate the survivor and their parts on why it is a good idea to stop cult (family) contact. Some reasons to do so include:

- The survivor gets hurt

- Loved ones of the survivor get hurt when they are accessed
- Accessing impedes healing, because parts get retraumatized
- It is an extremely poor Christian witness to people who are still in the cult
- It is an extremely poor Christian witness to the survivor's own parts
- It is a lifestyle of extreme duplicity
- The survivor has to actually hurt others during a reaccessing session
- The survivor may be forced to accept agendas against their therapist and other survivors
- Cult loyal parts that recontact will be rewarded for contact, which actually increases the bonding to those reaccessing, making healing more difficult

There are always significant traumas and double binds behind recontact programming, and the therapist will want to help the survivor look at these issues. Cult loyal parts will have difficulty stopping recontact if they believe that failure to do so results in the torture or death of someone they love. This is where the ability to trust the LORD with the safety of double binds is so important.

Saying, "LORD, I give my double binds to you," does not at all ensure that this is being done. Instead, HOW the double binds were installed, and with whom, and the specific vows to protect the double bind will need to be remembered. Often, these vows are elicited by the survivor watching a double bind being tortured; unable to take any more, the survivor will cave and agree to stay in contact. They will have no memory of this event, since they will also agree to forget the event, or else their loved one will be tortured. This is why consistent memory work and dedication to healing and looking at the events that run recontact programming inside are so important.

If the survivor is an international survivor (one who was hosted in several countries as a child and adult) their primary double binds will likely be in another country, and they may be amnesic to them. This will also need to be looked at. Breaking double binds with the American family may not be sufficient to stop re-accessing if there are unconscious double binds elsewhere.

The survivor's first programmer/trainer will often be their primary double bind.

They will often be completely amnesic to whom this person actually is. Their systems will be invested in protecting this person above all others, and so they will disclose other people as double binds first. The true double binds often will not come out until later in therapy.

This is where accountability can help. Until the survivor is aware of and has broken their recontact programming, and has truly dealt with their double binds, outside accountability can help prevent reaccess.

Safe accountability would be either a non-dissociative person or a survivor who has broken their own double binds and recontact programming and is co-conscious with their most loyal cult parts.

Survivors who are in the early stages of healing should never be asked to be accountability for another survivor's safety. They will be completely unaware of the fact that they themselves have a strong recontact agenda, which can include helping other survivors "reconnect" with family (cult) members, or others.

A safe accountability person should be made aware of the survivor's safety plan (any survivor should have a safety plan, if they are serious about stopping re-accessing). This will include awareness of any phone calls and texts made and received, and any online activities of any kind; for instance, the survivor may ask the accountability person to be with them and watching at all times that they go online.

Failure to have accountability jeopardizes both the survivor and others that they could impact. While it can be a "bother" to have accountability, the alternative can be much more painful.

Once the survivor stops Internet, phone and other contact, and has accountability in place, they may actually feel worse for a period of time as they are breaking the programming. The programming is actually being drawn out so the survivor can look at it: they may feel suicidal or depressed, or shaky for a period of time. This will pass as the programming is broken.

Stopping Astral Access

If the cult cannot reach the survivor by physical means, they will attempt to do so spiritually, often through astral projection. These demonic spirits will appear, often in the middle of the night, to the survivor, and will frequently appear as double binds/loved ones. The astrals may appear to be in great distress, and will attempt to "blackmail" the survivor into recontact with messages that the loved one is being tortured, or sobbing that they miss the survivor.

The survivor will need to discover and close the spiritual doors that allow spiritual access. This process will include:

- Finding out which parts inside have the job to maintain spiritual contact with loved ones in the group.
- Why they want to continue this contact
- What these parts believe will happen if contact is stopped.

It is common to feel immense fear at first, at the thought of stopping astral contact, since the rituals and programming done around this is extensive, and starts in infancy. Spiritual parts may attempt to punish the survivor for attempting to stop it, until they become aware of the danger of continuing it.

Once all doors are closed, both spiritually and physically, parts may start feeling safe enough to come out and disclose to the survivor, and heal. This includes getting rid of the demonic spirits that sit within the parts whose job is to maintain astral contact, and resolving the traumas that they have undergone.

Over time, astral contact will lessen as the survivor learns to use their authority to stop the contact. Simply commanding an astral to depart in the name of the true Jesus is sufficient to make it leave; doing this builds faith in the survivor’s parts and witnesses to them over time, and they will be more and more willing to turn to the Christian God instead of to the demonic.

Chapter 4: Dealing with Emotions

One of the most difficult issues for survivors who are trying to heal from cult-related mind control to deal with is emotions. Why is this?

In cases of extensive programming, the individual will have been tortured since they were in the womb, with one primary goal in mind: control of the person. As part of the dissociation, the individual will be taught to "give away" their emotions to demons and parts, whom they are told can "relieve" them of this intense pain.

Many times, controller parts (parts who are in charge over other parts or internal systems) will be highly logical, or be programmed to believe that they are "ascended" (above "mortal" feelings, which are considered base, earth-bound, and physical). The higher-order, or ascended systems in a survivor's psyche will have been taught, and believe since earliest infancy (or before) false beliefs such as:

- They are gods, angels or demons
- They are ascended beings
- They are immortals
- They have overcome their humanity
- They do not feel pain
- They do not have human emotions

This belief is based upon immense emotional and physical trauma. The types of traumas that create this type of belief can include:

- Killing the birth mother when the infant is born – and telling the infant it is his/her fault (this is very common in organized occultic groups, and creates great internal guilt which is used to control the individual, who is told they are a "mother killer" and other equally painful lies)
- Torturing the fetus in the womb, and telling them that the pain they feel is the "pain of mortality" and the only way to escape the pain is to "ascend" (by taking on a demonic or spiritual identity and spirit, which then shields from the emotional and physical pain, but continues the delusion and deception that the individual is an "ascended being" instead of a human being who has been heavily traumatized

The "Difficult Emotions" for survivors

Most presenter parts (the ones who normally enter into therapy) in survivors of mind control will have great difficulty in identifying or expressing their emotions in a healthy way. This is the result of a combination of factors which can include:

- Dissociation of strong feelings (programming to not feel; with a very stoic or numb presentation)

- Role models (parents, trainers, others) who were very unhealthy or abusive in their expression of emotions, and dismissed any expressions of feelings by the survivor throughout childhood (except to punish them)

- Unconscious fear that the emotion will overwhelm the survivor and they will not be able to handle it

Some emotions are particularly difficult for survivors to identify or express in healthy ways. But with healing, emotions do come, often with "flooding" when they first occur, until the traumatic events are dealt with, and the parts that underwent trauma can be comforted.

Anger/rage

This emotion can be difficult for a survivor to deal with, because rage was often "sent" to parts whose job was to torture, punish or kill either external people or internal parts. As a child, while undergoing close quarters combat training, or during martial arts training, they are told to "tap into" the rage to help increase their endurance and ability. Unconsciously, the survivor may associate anger/rage with these activities, and avoid their expression completely in their presentation. Alternatively, the survivor may have a very aggressive/hostile presentation that feels protected from sorrow, loneliness or rejection through responding with anger in situations that trigger these feelings. Either way, many survivors have difficulty processing and expressing intense anger or rage in an appropriate way.

They may fear that they will "lose control" or even "kill someone" if the rage they fear comes forward.

It is important to help the survivor find ways to express the rage that has built up over the years, and develop connections between unfeeling parts and those that feel. This is done over time, with the "non-feelers" gradually developing the capacity to feel, and to comfort the parts that may feel overwhelmed with feelings.

Anger, or any other emotion, often comes in strongly, peaks within two to three days, then gradually begins to subside (the amount of time in the cycle will vary with the survivor, the amount of trauma, and the amount of support available to them). It can help to reassure the survivor that these feelings will NOT last forever, even though tapping into a lifetime of dissociated feeling can seem that way at first.

It can help to develop methods of coping with rage when it occurs. The activities that help most will differ with each person; for some, vigorous physical activity (hiking, running, boxing) or hitting a box with a bat will help. Hitting rocks with a sledge hammer (with goggles and protection worn) can also help. Using a therapy bat, and hitting a bed or other safe object can also help. Others break ice as anger relief. It is important to have some accountability/supervision when first doing anger work because of the amount of emotion (which may seem scary to the survivor) coming out; and the possible need to be "talked down."

In some instances, when a survivor gets in touch with the abuse memories and the associated rage, they may become homicidal for a short period of time. Often, they may verbalize wanting to go find the perpetrator, and do to them what was done to the survivor. It is important to assess the degree of actual risk, and create a safety plan. The survivor needs to realize that going back and hurting perpetrators will place them in extreme jeopardy: they will be immediately accessed and tortured themselves in most cases; or, they will be harmed spiritually should they succeed in hurting the perpetrator.

Forgiveness is an important component of healing, but it cannot be rushed. All too often in Christian circles, there is a rush to put the Band-Aid of the words "I forgive them" without fully processing the extent of the loss the survivor incurred. This includes the rage at God that a survivor feels, because ultimately, they blame Him for what they have been through. This will be addressed further in the chapter on anti-Christian programming.

Guilt

Guilt is an extremely painful emotion for most survivors, for several reasons.

1. It is often installed during prenatal programming, during which the fetus is asked if they want to live, or for the other (implanted zygotes) to live. During the first months of life after conception, the fetus will always respond "yes" – and then the zygote the programmer wished to get rid of is killed. This happens over the succeeding weeks until there is only one embryo left – an embryo that experiences a lot of survivor guilt due to the death of the other embryos in the womb. This prenatal guilt programming was first developed by Mengele, and is one of the foundations on which self-punishment, penance, punisher and other programming is placed.
2. Throughout infancy and childhood, the survivor will have been taught to punish themselves. In a typical setup, if the survivor disobeys or hesitates, they are punished brutally for failure; or, someone they love (a twin, brother or sister, or beloved trainer) is punished for their failure. This causes extreme distress, and the child promises never to fail again. Internalized images of these loved ones are then punished if the child disobeys.

3. The survivor will have blood guilt through participation in rites, rituals and sacrifices throughout a lifetime. If they are a trained assassin, this guilt increases, and the survivor may find it difficult to believe that God could truly forgive them.
4. The survivor, as they recover memories, will eventually remember being a perpetrator, being forced to torture other infants, children, birth mothers, or to participate in other acts such as rape or punishing others. Most organized cult members are able to do at least basic programming on others, since this is a skill taught from earliest childhood in most groups. The survivor will then recover memories of becoming what they hated most – an abuser – and will need to deal with the resulting guilt.
5. If the survivor has anti-Christian programming (and most do), they will have been forced to hurt an actor portraying "Jesus" or to nail other children to crosses, and to do acts that show their hatred of God and Christianity. They are then told, "God can never forgive you, He hates you because you did this" and the child believes this.

The survivor will need to hear frequently that God loves them and forgives them, since they will question this many times. They may have great difficulty believing that someone who has committed the deeds they have committed can ever be forgiven.

Scriptures about the love of God can be helpful (although be aware that these may also have been used in anti-Christian programming), as well as books about forgiveness and grace; being kind to the survivor, and showing/modeling love and acceptance are helpful during this time of emotional struggle. The survivor and their parts will need to come to a point of finally accepting that what God says in His word is true: they are forgiven, regardless of what they have done, in spite of how they feel.

Shame

Shame is another painful emotion that many survivors experience. The survivor may feel shame regarding their sexual abuse, and the terrible forms this can take in occultic and mind control settings (including bestiality, necrophilia, prostitution, child abuse, infant abuse, etc.). They may feel shame because they were unable to fight the programmers; or because they "caved" or gave in to programming, or did things they hated doing.

Shame is the survivor labeling themselves negatively because of what they have done, and what they believe others think about them. Healing takes time, with lots of acceptance, the opportunity to process memories, and the abuse and degradation stopping. Again, providing love and helping the survivor understand they are accepted by others and by God, and that what they did was not their fault, can help. Often, they "caved" under conditions that would be intolerable for anyone; support people showing that the survivor is not judged by them is important to healing.

Rejection

Many survivors experience rejection at numerous levels. They may experience:

- Self-rejection due to terrible wounds in the womb, such as the birth mother being injected with drugs that cause tremendous uterine pain; she will then scream to "get it out!" or something similar, causing a deep rejection wound in the fetus.
- Childhood rejections as part of the abandonment programming designed to bond the child only to those the group wants them to bond to. It is quite common for the parents in host families to reject or ridicule the child, to prevent their bonding with them, which would interfere with the child bonding with the trainers.
- Rejection by members of the group if they try to leave; if the survivor is reaccessed, they will be kicked around, tortured, raped, and told that they are "evil", a "traitor" and other things; members of the group will urinate and defecate on the survivor to show how they feel about them.
- Rejection by Christians who do not understand cult or mind control abuse, find it "scary" and who ask the survivor to leave their church; or who silently shun the survivor.

Rejection is painful, and is a base of recontact programming (i.e. "nobody can love you but the group"). The survivor will need support as they deal with their rejection and abandonment memories, and attempt to work at detaching from the cult, and attaching with non-cult support (which can seem frightening, since they may have no idea of how to do this). Understanding, empathy and caring can help the survivor through this painful time of experiencing the pain beneath their programming. By modeling acceptance, supporters are teaching the survivor how to accept themselves; the love of God is also critical to healing rejection wounds.

Loneliness

Most survivors battle loneliness through much of their journey. They are leaving a group that contains their deepest, most intimate relationships, and attempting to heal in a world that often does not understand what the survivor is going through (unless they are fortunate enough to find a good, knowledgeable therapist or support person).

The deepest loneliness a survivor may face is for themselves. The cult has taken away their history; caused them to dissociate their deepest feelings, and this causes a deep ache for truth and connection with the "real me" inside. Basically, the survivor is lonely for their core, who holds some of the strongest feelings and beliefs inside, and who has been carefully hidden beneath numerous layers of programming and demonic.

Again, a supportive, nonjudgmental relationship is important as the survivor works through the issues surrounding developing healthy, safe support. A real danger when loneliness hits is that the survivor, who misses loved ones in the cult, will rush to make new friends without prayer or discernment first. It is very common for cult groups to "send" friends or romantic relationships to survivors who are attempting to leave the group. They will seem well-meaning, caring, and very supportive of the survivor's healing; but they will often have a job to do in their back parts.

It is also common for survivors to seek friendship with other survivors, but if the other survivors are unhealed (i.e. early in their healing journey and unaware of current cult activity), it is quite common for them to access one another, and pull each other back into cult activity. The survivor should always proceed with caution, and pray for discernment, before befriending another survivor; since they themselves could also be used in this way without conscious knowledge.

Sorrow/grieving

When a survivor breaks free of a cult group, they will go through a period of grieving. This is normal; although the abuse has stopped, they often will not feel "happy" for a long time. This is because they have cut off every meaningful relationship in their life, other than with God, and must take the time to grieve this loss. Yes, the relationships were abusive; yes, these people hurt the survivor. But these people are the survivor's mother, father, brother, sister, children, best friends, and giving up their entire support system is extremely difficult.

The survivor who gets out of a cult knows better than most what Jesus meant by "counting the cost" to become free. They will also face grieving because of threats against the loved ones who did not get out; for many survivors, these threats are communicated through hand signals as people pass by them in a mall; through subliminals online or on their cell phone; through videos of a loved one being tortured sent to their email address, or even direct contact (such as a loved one showing up weeping, who raises their shirt to show the bruises and cuts on their back that they endured because the survivor left).

When the survivor is grieving, it is important to sit with them, figuratively speaking, and let them mourn. They may be numb, in emotional shock, or they may cry nonstop for days at a time. They will want to talk about the loved ones left behind, and need to do this, to process the ending of the relationship as they knew it.

It does not help to continuously point out to the survivor that these people were evil abusers. They know this, deep inside; but they also love these people. This love/hate is what bonded them to the cult and to doing their jobs; and is part of why they dissociated. Bringing down dissociation will involve remembering and grieving for these loved ones left behind. Processing the grief will vary with the individual. Writing a letter to the loved one(s)(that is never mailed); planting a "memorial bush", creating a collage, are all ways some have worked on their grief.

With time, grief does heal, and the survivor will be able to work on developing new relationships. It is important that the survivor allows themselves this time.

Hopeless Despair

Hopeless despair is one of the most painful feelings that survivors can experience. It can be caused by:

- Extreme loss, including seeing loved ones tortured to death because the survivor is trying to leave the group; the programmers then blame the survivor for the death(s)
- Programmed despair (programming to believe that the survivor can never heal; or that God can never forgive them)
- Technology torture: this involves the brain being hit by microbursts of high frequency or low frequency waves in various locations, to stimulate the brain to experience extreme despair
- Core attachment pain coming forward: the realization that the survivor has been abused, manipulated, tortured and betrayed since conception by the people they bonded to most deeply; this creates the despair that it was "all for nothing" that the survivor performed for the group and survived torture over a lifetime (for the love of people that they now realize horrifically abused them)

When the survivor is in hopeless despair, it does not help to:

- quote scriptures at them (although this will help at a future time),
- Tell them to "get their act together" or ask them "where is your faith?" since they already feel bad enough

What does help is to acknowledge to them that you understand that they are in deep pain, and sit with them and synchronize. This is one of the most difficult things a support person can do, since you will want to "rescue" the person from their pain, or feel bad that you can't help them feel better right away. The LORD is the one who will minister to the survivor, as they get in touch with their feelings and they express the feelings to Him.

You can encourage the individual to write a letter to God, expressing to Him how they feel; to pray directly, sharing their despair with Him, and to spend time then asking Him to minister to their pain. The Holy Spirit is able to bring comfort and hope to the hopeless, regardless of the situation that has caused the despair, since Jesus experienced to the full everything – the agony of sin, loss and emotional pain – on the cross to redeem and heal these wounds.

Core attachment pain takes time to work through, and cannot be rushed (please see chapter on "Working with the Core" for more on this topic).

Sexual Feelings

Most survivors will have a lifetime of sexual abuse and programming in their history. Many groups train their toddlers and preschoolers to act as "black widows" who seduce and then kill individuals; or who infiltrate sex parties of the wealthy (where pedophilia is often rampant) to gather information about the participants.

Sexual programming is installed from earliest infancy in most survivors. Programmers will sexually abuse the infants during diaper changes; during bonding times, and will sexually torture the infants while tech stimulating the pleasure centers in the brain to create sadomasochistic parts that enjoy sexual torture.

The infants are stretched with special instruments so by the time they are two, they can accommodate an adult penis without damage. Infants are stimulated to experience multiple orgasms with vibrators as a "reward" for performance.

Everyone the survivor knows and loves has sexually abused them, and this is considered part of a "love" bond, which creates soul and demonic ties. The survivor may never have experienced any relationship in their life that did not involve sexual abuse, and they may have sexual parts come out that "test" the supporter.

Simply put, the survivor has been raised in a highly sexualized environment, and at first, will not understand or know what to do with the feelings that come up. If they are in a truly safe house, the time spent there may be the first days since birth that the survivor has not had sex with someone. In 7 X 7 programming, one of the torture lines will be extreme sexual arousal, designed to cause the survivor to seek out a sexual partner (with resulting reaccessing); or to turn to demonic sex for relief.

Information may have been downloaded to the individual while they were in a sexually aroused state, which is a natural amnesia barrier, since the information can normally only be recovered when the individual is in that state (although with the LORD's help, the information can be recovered without arousal).

How can the survivor cope with feelings that can produce shame in the presentation, possible annoyance in the helper if they attempt seduction, or painful body sensations?
First, it can help to acknowledge that the feelings are there. It is not the survivor's fault that this was installed, and they need to realize that this too can be forgiven.

The survivor will need support as they grieve the sheer extent of the abuse; and with breaking soul ties with former sexual partners. Deliverance from lust and other demonic can help decrease the severity.

If the survivor chooses chastity (recommended for spiritual and safety reasons) they will need to be in prayer over these feelings; they do decrease over time as the survivor chooses to not act out on the feelings. Acceptance of the parts, and helping them to see that it is possible to be loved without automatic sexual abuse is a big component of healing, since it brings new information to these parts, and a new worldview to operate from.

At times, these parts will feel hurt or offended if the support person does not take them up on their offers; after all, this is how people "love" one another in their worldview. With time, patience and caring, they will come to understand that someone can truly care for them without wanting a sexual relationship.

Terror

When a survivor begins to work hard at undoing their programming, often there will be retaliation from internal punishment and reprogramming systems – and they will feel terror. This terror is instilled purposely, from the first tortures in the womb (such as when the trainers cut off fetal digits, which regrow if done early in development) to the most recent access.
The terror is often based upon highly realistic virtual reality, which replays the infant's prime terrors. These include:

- Being dropped rapidly (startle reflex)
- Being skinned alive
- Being burned
- Being drowned/suffocated/buried alive
- Rats chewing on the infant
- Bugs stinging the infant
- Prime bonds (people loved most) are shown falling apart and in agony, or with blood spurting out of their bodies

There are others. Entire terror lines are installed, with the purpose of controlling the survivor. These terrors are often encapsulated in the framework of a "hell" created by the programmers, with different levels playing out different terror scenarios (such as the internal parts being tied to a stake inside "hell level 2" and "demons" which originally were cult actors in infancy, and later are internal parts that took on this identity torturing the survivor by burning them alive).

At base level, fetal and infantile terror drive many punishment and recontact programs. This can be experienced as restless, the feeling that "something is wrong" and if the survivor continues to not recontact, can escalate to panic, then terror. Night terrors are common, since the survivor will be programmed with dreams of punishment and terror if they stop contact, or astrals may come to remind the survivor of the terrible fate awaiting them if they fail to recontact. Core terror (the belief that the universe will fall apart and turn black, and all people the survivor loves will die, and they themselves will be "unmade" if they continue healing) makes it difficult for the survivor to face dismantling deep programmed beliefs and systems internally. The terror was installed for this very purpose.

The survivor will often feel as if they are "losing it", "going psychotic" or "losing their mind, and can't stand a single second more of this" as the dissociated emotions come forward. This is based upon programmed beliefs that if the survivor tries to dismantle their own programming, they will go insane; they may be given drugs, tech torture and setups to "prove" this belief.

They really are not losing their mind, but they will feel this way as the terror hits. It can help to ground the survivor to here and now (feeling the ground beneath their feet, touching something soft, or warm, or cool; hearing music) when terror hits. Getting rid of the demonic that holds the programming in place (by repenting of the rituals and sacrifices performed before and after installation by the survivor to seal it in, and repenting of the agreement for installation) can also help.

Remind the survivor that they survived the event happening the first time, and they can survive remembering. Remind them that if they attempted to "break programming" in the lab (as programmers will tell them to do, in setups designed to make the survivor believe they cannot break programming without trauma), that it was a setup; that now, they have safety, prayer and support that they did not have during the setups.

Terror does decrease over time. The survivor will likely abreact some of the more terror-producing traumas, as internal parts come forward, seeking healing and relief from the awful reality that they experience inside. With support, prayer, and time, the LORD does heal these parts, and the survivor will experience fewer and weaker bouts of panic as they continue to heal.

Chapter 5: Presentation Programming

It is a common misconception that "hosts" or "presenters" have been protected, or have undergone less programming or trauma than other systems. On the contrary, the presentation is often one of the most extensively programmed systems in the survivor of international occultic programming. It can be some of the most difficult programming to dismantle since basically, this involves looking at their own programming.

In most international occultic groups, the child spends the first three years fulltime at a cult facility, being continuously programmed. At age three, the child will also be placed within several host families around the world. The child may grow up with anywhere from four to seven families in different countries, and will spend several weeks, or even a month or two each year, with each family during the next 20 years. School photos are taken, and a cover identity created in the countries which they anticipate the child will be working for them as they grow older into adulthood. The families will be given photos of the child (or a look-alike) in infancy for photo albums.

These host families will have programming to prevent the child and the host parents from bonding with each other, since the child must always maintain their primary bond with the primary programmers. The true host and core will always only be allowed to bond with these programmers.

An example of host families could be one in Germany, one in France, one in Amsterdam, one in the United States, and even one in Israel. Since many occultic groups hate Israel, and a focus of their intelligence efforts is infiltration of Israeli national security, they will attempt as often as possible to place a child within Israel with a trainer who acts as their "aunt" or "uncle." The child rotates between these host families and thus learns to rotate between presentations based upon their current living situation. The child has already learned to never speak any language but that of the host family (on pain of severe punishment), and has already undergone numerous experiences prior to going to a host family to teach them to not bond with anyone except the programmers.

Detachment Training

For example, at age two, the child will be allowed to interact with and bond with a loving woman, who acts as a mother surrogate to the child who is hungry for nurturing by a woman. After several weeks of loving interactions, at some point, the woman will turn around and begin severely abusing the child, such as by pushing them down stairs, sexually abusing them, or other abuse, laughing at the child's display of pain at the emotional betrayal. The child must learn the lesson to never trust anyone, or to bond with anyone other than the primary trainers, or they will be killed.

The host families will also be programmed to reject the child, and/or abuse the child, to ensure that the child does not create a bond that is too strong. The primary bond will always be an unconscious one, that the Christian and cult cover presentations are completely amnesic to: a primary trainer whom they love greatly, since this is the only person they were allowed to love during their early childhood.

MI6 Training

Once the host presentations are in place, the child (by age 3 ½) will undergo training at MI6. MI6 has a special area (known as "Colonel Green's House" after Colonel Green, the founder of MI6) where young children undergo specialized assassin and military training. Again, the child goes there with their class, and is assigned a number. Instead of being called by name, they will be called "42" or a similar number during training and learn to respond to this.

MI6 reserves the Green House for certain groups at specific times, and the trainers during this time are all programmers for the group that work for MI6. The child will perfect previous skills taught to them as a toddler in using a gun; their delta computer system will be built to greater complexity, and their ability to classify intelligence, and store it based upon its classification will be perfected during this time. The ability to use a photographic visual and auditory memory, and download to handlers information obtained while on a mission, is also perfected.

They will perfect basic skills of all operatives, such as following a target, dropping a tail, and blending in inconspicuously in a group.

The terrible punishments used at MI6 (such as the room with walls that move inwards, or the multi-faceted crystal ball in a room with mirrors used when the child is drugged, or the specialized computer system that is used for delta installation) are all used on the child. By the time the child has completed the 3-month training course (which is updated as they grow older), they will have a firm base in military special operations. By age 12, the child will have developed enough skillsets that they will be classified as a military weapon.

Delta Computer Training

Delta training is extensive enough to give it special mention. During delta training, the child will be hooked up to a computer, which it will be taught to emulate while in delta state. The computer speaks with a synthetic, very robotic voice, and the child will do the same. The delta training will encompass high and low delta states, and the child will be taught to classify all cognitive thoughts and experiences according to security levels. Low security levels can be retained as conscious thought; any information classified as mid to high security will be "access denied" to conscious presentation thought, and stored within the deeper delta states of the brain.

The delta computer system will have a ground zero state, with delta controllers and introjected trainers "manning" the computer systems. At ground zero, primary traumas and death state programming are installed, to prevent dismantling of the computer system and to keep the child invested in protecting high-security information.

Psyche, along with Mnemosyne (amnesia) will have the jobs of maintaining the separation between conscious (known) and unknown information. Psyche never forgets, and Mnemosyne never remembers, and both control the flow of information within delta.

Theta Controller Training

As the child reaches late preschool and early school age, they will undergo Galileo training (training in remote viewing, mind reading and thought influencing), in order to provide their handlers with access to buildings and conversations they would otherwise be unable to reach. During a mission, a child will be asked, for example, to go into an office building, and "read" classified or private documents during the night hours and then share what they have read with their handlers.

The child will also have the ability to introject themselves and images or thoughts into other people's dream states. In fact, part of theta assassin training is learning to have the subject dream of their own death. The head theta controller (such as Nemesis) will oversee the others, including Phobos (fear); Thantos (death) and Chaos (insanity). Theta training is aimed at teaching the child to induce each of these states in others using demonic powers developed.

Theta Assassin Training

The higher occultic groups at times attempt to induce death in those that cross them. If a child is sent on a mission, they will have sexual relations with the "mark." At a later time (often days later), the child will be sent back spiritually with a mentor back to the mark, to cause their death while sleeping. This will often begin with a terrifying dream of the individual's death, and many have literally died of fright due to these terrible dreams.

Some of the leaders of top occultic organizations will have theta guards composed of individuals who have completed their theta training (these guards can range in age from 12 years old to 32). The guards sit in front of an office, for example, as a warning to any intruders.

The newer generations of thetas have highly developed "kill" training in the spiritual realm developed from the first weeks of life in the womb on, and are often mentored by groups of very skilled theta trainers to prevent the children from turning on the trainers and killing them. These newer super thetas have poorly developed presentations, and must often live very protected lives away from the public eye.

Secrecy/Amnesia Training

Some of the most important training the preschooler undergoes is secrecy training. The child has bonded heavily to and wants to protect the primary trainers, and so they are told: "If you betray us, we could be killed. The only way to not betray us is to not remember." The child willingly agrees to amnesia, in order to protect the people they love most.

In other secrecy setups, a child will complete a setup "mission" and later is asked if they remembered what happened. If the child answers "Yes" a gun is placed to their head, and they are told that if they remember, the programmer must kill them. They are asked again if they remember (presenters are asked); until the child is either completely amnesic, or is killed (the occultic groups do not allow children who have any memory traces to live; the gun threat is very real).

Another setup is "remember the flowers": the child is taken to a garden at a place where he/she has spent times chatting with their favorite programmer in the past. There is a water pool in the middle of the garden, and during this setup, it is filled with corpses of children the same age as the young child (ages 2 or 3). The programmer cuts a flower, gives it to the child and tells the child to "remember the flowers" (i.e. the dead children who remembered and told others).

There are many, many examples of such secrecy setups, from being buried alive for a day, and the child being told that they will be buried forever if they ever tell (the child is also forced to watch the burial of a child who "told" and several days later help exhume the corpse, as a visual reminder of what can happen); to being buried in a casket filled with bugs, a rotten corpse, or other objects.

The child may be placed in a box with bees that sting them (after going through several weeks of anti-venom therapy previously) as a reminder that "memories hurt."

They are also forced to view the deaths of "traitors" who betrayed the programmers, including crucifixions (the class is marched every three hours past the three crosses for three days to watch the effect on the dying men); and the torture of others who remembered and "told."

Alice in Wonderland Programming

Most members of occultic international groups will have at least one presentation that goes by the name “Alice” for a reason: this is a trigger for Wonderland programming. By age five, the child will be taken to a large estate in France (or, other locations, depending on the group) for Alice in Wonderland programming. This is an elaborate setup, and occurs over the period of a week. The child enters through rooms that reinforce previous training ("control the children”: is recorded and replayed, with pictures of dead children displayed on the walls of the room; mirrors, "remember the flowers" and other triggers). They then enter a "backward world" where everything is backwards (much like the third dimension; this prepares the child for this travel). Alice (representing the presentation main controller who is heavily demonized) guides the child through backwards houses, where people walk and talk backwards (a common cause of childhood dyslexia is the confusion this creates).

The child is then taken to a setup street where things are not backwards, but "crooked" or off slightly, which is even more disorienting. The child must walk with Alice and the Cheshire Cat leading them through houses where things are insanely wrong, where people talk nonsense, and the floors and roofs may be upside down, to teach the child not to trust reality.

Alice then brings the child at last to a place where they see the white rabbit (who represents the primary trainer), and they follow him "down the hole" (representing amnesia) to a room where the presentation stays behind, watching a movie (screen memories); the back parts then take the child's body through the rest of the setup. They enter a garden with animated/demonic flowers that at first talk kindly to the child, but later turn on the child and attack them. Wasps come and sting the child, and the large caterpillar (the guardian of the garden, played by another primary bond) tells the child what to do, and how to escape.

The child then enters a huge maze created from hedges. Soon, they are pursued by the "Jabberwocky" (a demonic presence and strong presentation punisher), and must rely upon their theta skills to run and escape, and even leave the body and fly away. The white rabbit and the Cheshire Cat lead the child to safety, but at times will try to "trick" the child until the child learns to rely on themselves instead of these capricious demonic "helpers."

The child sleeps outdoors, trying to get out of the hedge, and runs across the queen of hearts (a primary double bind, often a twin sister) and her court playing croquet (with the severed heads of human children used as the balls). The queen becomes very interested in using the child's head (the child is constantly called "Alice" throughout the setup, to represent the presentations, since Alice in Wonderland is ultimately presentation programming to remain amnesic and rely on demonic help to do so).

The demonic "Alice" and Cheshire cat help "rescue" the child, who then goes through the "valley of the shadow of death." In the middle is a cottage; it is now nighttime, and the weary child knocks at the door, to be greeted by a kindly woman. The child is fed, sleeps, and is warned to avoid the Jabberwocky, which seeks to kill the child. Once the programming is installed, the Jabberwocky acts as a presentation punisher, punishing the presenters for remembering or disobeying cult directives.

During the night, the kindly woman gets up. The child is awake, vomiting from the effects of a mild poison they were given in the food. The woman calls in her familiars (wolves) and tries to kill the child, who cries out for help to "Alice" and the "Cheshire Cat" to rescue her. A mage also comes and helps rescue the child, who continues the journey, meeting other characters. Finally, the child ends up at the palace of the Queen of Hearts, who demands a sacrifice (the child was already told that the last child to complete the Alice scenarios will be her sacrifice). The children who live watch the final child come in and be sacrificed in a ritual. This reminds them to never be slow or tardy when coming to a "party" (ritual). The "parties" in the Alice in Wonderland books are always referring to rituals.

Alice will go to a tea party, where her “mother” (Nemosyn, a strong amnesia controller) shows up. As the party progresses, one by one, the people at the party are killed in horrendously gruesome ways. The horrified Alice is reminded by Nemosyn that “everything is fine” and is told to “let me take care of everything.” If Alice agrees, Nemosyn then “takes away” the memories of the murders and sacrifices, and the characters are removed one by one. Finally, there are no bodies left, and Nemosyn assures Alice that “nothing bad ever happened.”

Crazy Alice Programming

A subset of the Alice in Wonderland (presenter) programming is the "Crazy Alice" programming, which is meant to warn the Alice controller over the presentation to never allow memories to come up, or they will be labeled "insane" and extreme abuse will occur. This is often the root of insanity fears when a person first starts remembering their past.

In this setup (also in France for some groups), the child (now called "Alice") is taken to a mental institution where the inmates are chained, and who rant, rave and curse at her. She is left there for days, with her only food being rancid water and rotten cabbage. The inmates hurl feces at her, verbally abuse her, and the custodians sexually abuse her while she is chained to the wall because of her "insanity" (remembering).

Because she is "sick", and "mentally ill" Alice is taken regularly down to the basement for "treatment" which consists of electroshocks, drowning, and being held over a rat pit filled with hungry rats that are allowed to bite her feet and ankles. The child is told repeatedly that "remembering" or "telling" will have her labeled "crazy" and that she will be taken to the institution (or one similar) for "treatment." This is part of developing the presenter amnesia and vows to never remember (or seek treatment). During the hospital stay, a team of doctors in white coats walk through the ward and stay with Alice, saying, “Here’s our favorite patient” (the main doctor is the child’s primary programmer). Alice will keep a stuffed rabbit with her (“foo foo”) who at night seems to come alive and sexually abuses her (this is done with a hand puppet). When Alice reports the abuse the next day, the doctors look at her sadly, and insist that she is “sick” and “needs more treatment.”

There is a special room in the “hospital” for the religiously insane, with Bible studies and church meetings, where Alice is raped and abused by the “Christians” in the hospital.

Black Alice Programming

In another version of Alice programming, Alice has a “dark side” that comes out and kills everyone around her in a killing spree. The terrified presenter wakes up to a room full of bloody bodies, and is told that if she ever remembers, the “evil” inside of her will “escape” and she will kill her loved ones. This is a particularly cruel form of amnesia programming.

Wizard of Oz Programming

This programming is also often done first during the preschool years, when the child can most easily internalize the program. The dark core ("Dorothy") is taken to another dimension, with her goal always to return to the Emerald City (representing ascension and the celestial paradise). The programming represents travel through the dimensions, the dangers involved, and the rewards for "ascending."

The goal of Wizard of Oz programming is to remind the child that they must always contact, or return home; and to create great fear of remembering (or, they will be placed in a coma and never wake up, unlike Dorothy in Oz, who woke up from "death" only after returning home.” It also represents the need to “never leave the path” (presenter programming to stay on the path given to them, or disaster results).

Fantasia Programming

Walt Disney was an avowed Illuminist, and his goal when creating Disney productions was to introduce the general public to the occult, especially young children, and to reinforce programming in those raised in the occult.

For instance, animals often "talk" in Disney films, and people can turn into animals, which are actually mage spells. The images are often dark and demonic in the animated movies, and have become increasingly so in recent years.

Disney's favorite film was Fantasia, in which he took classical music that was used to program young children with, and developed highly occultic themes in the cartoons that accompany it. To the untrained eye, Fantasia seems a bit odd; but the individual in the occult understands that the themes of a mage in training ("the sorcerer's assistant) who must turn to his more powerful mentor for help, and the Greek pantheon (in the famous rain sequence), mythology and even the depiction of an occultic ritual and then the famous strains of ave maria (a common programming tune) end the film.

Fantasia is blatant occultic imagery throughout, and was used extensively in the 1950s through 1970s to program individuals with. It was superseded in recent years by movies such as the Matrix, which depicts high-level programming, Labyrinth, and more recently, Frozen.

Helping the Survivor

Because of the early and repeated childhood betrayals, and the fact that the true host and core and core splits will not present early in therapy, the survivor will be very untrusting, and unable to bond normally with, anyone who tries to help them. The most common presentation is "detached", since the parts that can attach are hidden very deeply within and are reserved for the primary programmer only.

While the survivor will not at first present as "needy", the attachment needs are still there, and will drive recontact programming unless the survivor can learn to form healthy, safe attachments. This will be the challenge for both the survivor, and their helpers, since the wounded, angry parts within will often test those they do bond with again and again, once they feel safe within the relationship.

Theta and spiritual attacks are difficult to bear for helpers, but the survivor will be completely unaware that they are occurring. Gently asking, or even confronting, the survivor with what is happening can help. They will need to learn to pray, and ask inside, to find out what is happening with the parts that they are not co-conscious with yet.

Once co-consciousness is established, and the parts come to Christ and the demonic is renounced, the warfare will usually diminish, much to the relief of the survivor and their helpers.

It will take all of the emotional resources the survivor has, as well as outside support, and a strong walk with Jesus, to face the original attachment pains that come up with remembering early childhood, infancy and prenatal events. This is when praying in the spirit, scripture study, journaling and talking with safe support can help tremendously as the survivor grieves the past, and begins to build a life based upon a new foundation.

Presenter programming is based on the desire to "protect" these loved ones through either loyalty, or amnesia, or both.

The survivor who fears facing their past is one who fears betraying those they love; they are often "held hostage" through the group's control of or threatening to harm someone they love, whether a child, a mentee, a cult twin, or another relationship. To break free, the survivor must be shown, and truly believe, that only the LORD can rescue and keep safe these loved ones.

They must also be willing to count the cost of getting out, which is very high: no contact at all with former family, friends or loved ones, since they will all have been programmed to access the survivor. Few are willing to pay this price for freedom, and it is often the unconscious (unknown) love bonds that draw the survivor back in.

Chapter 6: Working with Healing Blockers

There is a specific set of cult loyal parts who have the job of blocking therapy. They do this in order to prevent the survivor from breaking their programming and becoming totally free of cult control, due to their fear that they will no longer be able to see their loved ones, or that their loved ones will be tortured.

Therapy blockers are highly programmed to completely resist therapy, and are extremely bonded to their trainers.

When a survivor of mind control enters therapy, these trainers will be notified (often by the survivor themselves, since they frequently “report in”), and specific programming to block therapy with their current therapist will begin to be put into place. This will be layered in over the generic “no heal” programming that all survivors have installed that prevents unauthorized system access, or any communication between presentation (front) parts and the cult host or systems.

Generic No Heal Programming

When the survivor is an infant, and child, they will be put through mock “therapy” sessions and deliverance sessions in which the “therapist” (a cult actor) kindly asks the child to share information and encourages them to disclose their abuse. Later in the setup, the child is then tortured for talking and disclosing, is raped by the mock therapist, and is “hospitalized” (see the section on Crazy Alice programming) to punish them for “making up” memories that “couldn't possibly be true”. It is the brave survivor indeed who chooses to push past this programming to enter therapy at all, unless they have been sent on a mission for this purpose. In addition to the above, the survivor will see setups in which for every disclosure they make, a loved one is tortured horrifically, sending the message: “if you talk, your loved ones will be hurt.” This basically shuts down healing for many.

More Specific Therapy Blocking Programming

Each therapist has an individual style of working with people, and this is often used against the survivor. Because most survivors are still cult active when they enter therapy, during “tune ups” (reprogramming sessions), the cult will attempt to make the survivor fear disclosure in therapy by doing the following:

- Create a VR of the therapist abusing the client following personal disclosure (shocks, rapes, etc.)

- Have an actor that looks similar to the therapist, trained to use the therapist's favorite phrases to encourage therapy, do mock therapy with the survivor. Each phrase used (over and over) is combined with shock, rape or other torture to the survivor, so when they hear it, they will recoil in pain and disgust.
- Mock therapy in which the survivor is programmed to only talk about certain issues, and they are heavily rewarded for doing so.
- Create a VR of the therapy room, and then have the "therapist" avatar perform rituals there, to convince the survivor that the therapist is "one of us" and therefore not safe to disclose to.

A survivor must overcome an enormous amount of pain and programming to trust a therapist at all, especially since during the time they still have contact with the cult, they and their loved ones will be tortured every time they attempt to heal during reprogramming sessions. If the survivor does choose to trust the therapist, they need to be aware that many people (but thankfully not all) drawn to providing therapy or support for DID, trauma, and ritual abuse are programmed cult members whose job is to access survivors seeking to get out. It is not unusual for the "supporter" to later discover that he/she is actually DID and programmed as well, as time goes on.

This is why choosing a therapist is a matter for prayer, discernment and seeking input from a safe person (if the therapist knows one) regarding who to see.

Because of the above programming, survivors will often attempt to block therapy using different methods. These fears are genuine, justified, and should not be minimized; instead, the survivor needs support and prayer from SAFE people as they work through the issues.

Typical Therapy Blocking Programs

When a therapist works with a survivor, they will see a lot of ambivalence: they want to heal, but part of them is avoiding the healing quite energetically. This can cause a lot of frustration in both the survivor, and the therapist, who over time may begin to wonder "Why don't you just heal???" The survivor will have tremendous internal conflicts between their entire worldview and experience, and the information that a therapist challenges this worldview with. In addition, the survivor will be emotionally invested in saving loved ones, who they believe are being tortured each time they break programming.

This ambivalence and internal conflict can cause the survivor to display any or all of the following programmed responses in therapy:

- Cycling through over and over (rolodexing): this is a symptom of extreme system distress and conflict, as parts of the survivor are attempting to heal and incorporate new information, while other parts are terrified that the programming is breaking. This rapid switching is a sign that internal controllers are trying to stop doing their jobs (including hiding internal pain), are "failing", feeling terror and are attempting to send out a part to present unsuccessfully. Rolodexing can also be a punishment program that causes the survivor to look completely dysfunctional, and be used to reinforce the belief (which is a lie) that the survivor is "going insane", etc. Rolodexing will stop once the "hot topic" in therapy is dropped; this can be an opportunity to journal and work on the topic, since it is obviously important to healing or the system would not respond in this way.

- Only one memory comes up: some survivors go through weeks, months and even years processing only one or two memories that cycle through again and again, even though they recognize they were raised in a cult group. This is a way of blocking therapy, since the survivor never gets past that one memory to do other work inside.

- House that Jack Built: This is a specific form of blocking, in which the survivor cycles through bits and pieces of one memory, and each time, must repeat the same sequence in order before they can add new information to the memory. The survivor will appear to need to completely recount the previous information given before they can look at any new information regarding the memory, which can be wearing on both the survivor and therapist.

- False Christian work: If the survivor is working with a Christian therapist or deliverance ministry, they will pull out their false "god" "jesus" and "holy spirit" to "help" with the healing. They may be praying wholeheartedly, praying warfare prayers, doing daily Bible study, agreeing with the therapist, and reporting visions of "jesus" intervening inside and how "close" they feel to "god" during therapy. The problem is that they are not praying to the real Christian God who has the authority to heal, deliver and bring breakthrough, and this survivor will often leave therapy frustrated, wondering why God doesn't answer in spite of all the praying they are doing. This is heavily linked to anti-Christian programming (please see chapter on this topic).

- False integrations: If the survivor is on a mission to bond with the therapist, learn their techniques, and later report to the cult the therapy methods used, they will want the therapist to feel good about seeing them. This is often accomplished through false integrations, in which dozens, hundreds or more of parts are "miraculously joined together" without any trauma (or memories), and the survivor expresses deep gratitude about the "tremendous healing" they have received. This type of work can also be a response to a huge need to please a prayer or deliverance minister who pressures the survivor to integrate before they are ready. While God can and does the miraculous, most true integrations bring back life history, both good and bad, and resolve core conflicts and false beliefs that fueled the dissociation.

- Therapy sabotage: with this programming, the survivor will be late to appointments, may miss scheduled appointments, may "forget" to pay for therapy, does not do therapeutic homework, and verbalizes wanting to drop out. A subset of this program is distancing the therapist/supporter through methods such as pulling out sexual parts who attempt to "seduce" the therapist; pulling out hostile/rude/unpleasant parts who pick fights or tear the therapist down verbally, and even threaten to sue the therapist if they become desperate.

- Shutdown programming: At times, a survivor who is still in contact with the cult will be given a shutdown/stop healing command. When this is running, the survivor will experience the following:

    a. Is completely unable to communicate with parts inside
    b. Is unable to journal, collage or do artwork
    c. Feels intense anxiety at the thought of doing internal work
    d. Wants to be "normal" and "forget about healing", wants a "real life"

This form of programming is frustrating for both the survivor and therapist, since it seems to be a waste of therapy time working with someone who cannot communicate with parts. To resolve this, the survivor needs to look at where access occurred, how the shutdown command was given (including subliminals or texts online or by phone), and what threats were used to accomplish the shutdown (frequently, this will be a double bind being threatened).

- Pulling out false issues to work on (cover issues): It is common for survivors, especially early in their healing, to work on cover programming only to prevent their going deeper into their system. The survivor may only remember their American host family; or believe that they were only sexually abused, or abused by an organized cult group for a few years, then "let go when they moved away from home" or "married someone outside the group" (which almost never happens in reality).

  The more sophisticated groups may create a whole cover for their agents, such as believing they were raised in the Templar Knights (which was true for these parts – they were actually hosted by a Templar family), while in reality they were raised and programmed during earliest childhood by a different organization, and programmed to infiltrate the Templars. Until the survivor goes past the cover, and is able to work with the true programming and beliefs that run the system, healing will be sporadic and difficult, and they will be vulnerable to reaccess.

The survivor must be willing to pray, fast and go deep inside, journaling and asking the LORD to uncover the truth, regardless of what it is. They must be willing to go "all out" for the LORD, and trust their loved ones in the group to His care, as they go past guardians, system blocks, demonic blocks and learn what is actually inside.

- Doubt: Belief that the survivor will never heal: This is programming designed to knock out the effectiveness of prayer by the survivor and therapist/supporter. This programming will be installed with setups in which the child is told to "heal" or "break the programming" under command – and then experiences horrendous pain and terror (through VR or tech torture). The child in numerous setups is told to "integrate" and again, pain, terror and hopelessness is installed. This is layered in many times over the years. When the survivor does try to heal in therapy, they will often re-experience these feelings of pain, hopelessness and futility regarding healing, or even the possibility of God answering their prayers (see anti-Christian programming for more information on this).

  The survivor will also have been shown videos of individuals in lab settings attempting to break the programming that was installed in them – and the people viewed go insane, or die. They will be shown the readouts for their slow, agonizing death, to instill the belief that the programming can never be broken. In actuality, if that was really true, the programmers would not have to install this false belief. It can help the survivor to understand that their situation is different: unlike the individuals they watched trying to break programming in a facility dedicated to demons, the survivor has a God that loves them and can heal anything, safety, and support that the people they watched did not have.

- Emotional flooding that does not promote healing: Some survivors will present in therapy appearing to be willing to heal, but the instant that any memory comes forward, they will burst into tears and appear to "melt down" for what can amount to the entire therapy session, wailing over their guilt and self-condemnation. While emotions will come with the recall of traumatic memories (and should), seeing hours of therapy "hijacked" by a part crying every time the survivor comes to therapy could be a sign that this is running.

  The supporter or therapist may want to gently confront or challenge this part regarding their job within the system, and see if the survivor is willing to work past this program. The survivor will need to become aware if it is running, and break any agreements to have this part step forward if anything is disclosed. The traumas that created this response will also need to be resolved.

- Child presentation: Normally, the infants and children in a mind-controlled system are heavily protected and guarded, and do not come out in therapy until trust and safety have been established over time. A completely young presentation is highly abnormal, and can be the result of several things:

    a. Programming breakdown: some survivors literally "burn out", especially if they have been heavily used in the field on missions, and too much "wipe out" and other amnesia programming of presenters afterwards can cause a situation in which the adults are too tired/traumatized to present, and children come forward

    b. Mission programming: some survivors are programmed to present with children in order to seem "harmless" and "cute" as they infiltrate a church or therapy organization. This is a programmed-in presentation, with great trauma.

    c. Secondary reward: some systems have been heavily rewarded by abusers for "staying young" and childlike, especially if the main abuser was a pedophile. The survivor may have starved themselves as a child/teen in order to prevent the appearance of breasts and delay the onset of menses, and to keep their childlike physical appearance. This is often a system highly dependent upon others, and they may look to therapists and supporters to "caretake" them as an adult.

- Constant crises with no resolution (burn out the support): This is vicious programming, because the survivor has no idea that this is happening. All they know is that they are in deep distress, and want to pick up the phone and call the only person that can help them (the therapist or support person). There will be crises during the healing journey; but a life of constantly cycling into crisis could be an indication that something is wrong. This type of programming is designed to "burn out" the supporter, who becomes exhausted helping someone who never heals.

- Denial: Every survivor will have some form of denial programming, and parts inside will hold this job. Denial parts are among the most cult loyal, and deeply fear the torture or death of loved ones (including trainers) in the cult. Denial parts will often verbalize the following:

    a. It wasn't that bad

    b. I'm exaggerating things

    c. I'm making this up; I have a creative, sick imagination

    d. I'm not dissociative

    e. I'm just seeking attention

f. This is all for secondary gain; I've been playing with your head

g. I'm a liar

This part will have been heavily programmed since the survivor was in the womb to say these things – and believe them. They are part of the primary amnesia triad for presentations (denial, doubt and despair) that keep the survivor from truly believing their own memories. Healing of denial means finding why these parts (often represented in numerous systems) are so invested in doing their job, i.e. who they are protecting, and why. They will be heavily bonded to a primary bond, and thus will be unwilling (or unable, due to amnesia agreements) to disclose who they are protecting until safety and trust are established with the supporter, and with the true God.

Chapter 7: Antichristian Programming

Because real Christianity is such a threat to cult groups, since it brings faith, love and healing (and therefore, rapid program degradation), they go to extensive lengths to program in false Christianity in the hopes that the individual will never come to a true faith in Christ. This programming is started in the womb, with numerous setups conducted with the birth mother and fetus to begin turning the fetus's heart away from God – and towards Satan.

In a typical setup, an actor dressed as "Jesus" and proclaiming that he is the "son of god", etc. will rape and torture the birth mother, telling her "This is how I show my love for you" and other scripts. The fetus hears and feels the mother's distress, and incorporates the hatred for this "Jesus" that the birth mother feels.

In other setups, the birth mother is tortured, and told to pray to God for help. As she does so, the pain is increased, and continues to do so, until she stops praying, and then "Satan" "rescues" the birth mother and fetus from the pain.

In still other setups, the fetus will see a bright light (held against the abdominal walls) and a voice telling the fetus, "I am God, and I hate you" as electrical shocks are administered. Other similar setups are done, including rape by 'Jesus' of the fetus (with a Q-Tip like instrument inserted into the womb). A false "holy spirit" will descend as well, offering the "way out of the pain."

Once the infant is born, the programming continues, with actors dressed as "Jesus", "the disciples", "Mary" and other biblical figures talking to the infant, abusing the infant, or comforting, depending upon the role. There will usually be two types of "Jesus" portrayed: a punishing, angry, wrathful God and Jesus for the black or cult systems; and a loving, caring, kind "Jesus" portrayed for the white systems, since the programming allows for two paths for ascension: the black path (satanic) and the white path (false Christianity). The presentations are heavily programmed to stay on the "white path" and never stray, or terrible things (abuse, pain) occur. Within the systems, a part called "god" is the judge and metes out punishments or rewards depending upon how well the controllers and parts obey cult directives and rules.

As the child becomes older, the setups become more elaborate; there will be setups in which "Jesus and disciples" are "fishing for men", the child is invited onto the boat, where the nauseating stench of rotten fish fills the boat; the child is repeatedly raped and abused by the false Jesus and disciples, who smell like rotten fish, as they repeatedly tell the child to "become a fisher of men" as they are. This will cause severe nausea and repugnance at the thought of Christianity later in life in the parts that underwent this abuse.

Almost every significant scripture in the New Testament, and many in the Old Testament, are used during these abuse scenarios, causing the parts to eventually recoil in pain, horror and disgust at any mention of Christianity or scripture. This is all hidden in the subconscious; the survivor will have no conscious recall of these memories, and will only know a deep unease and guilt at being unable to enjoy church or sit through a sermon.

Cruz (the cross) is a figure in some groups who exhorts the presentation to stay on the “white path” (cult false Christianity) and to “take up the cross and follow me.” This is a form of false guilt in which the presenters attempt to be their own messiah, or to rescue others, by staying perfectly on the demanding and rigid white path of false Christianity.

Elaborate setups are done with a fake “church” or “bible study” in which the child being programmed goes to church, where the members all then turn on her and abuse her, all the time using Christian phrases, or attempting the “laying on of hands” and “imparting the holy spirit” to her. This is to create a barrier between internal parts and hearing the gospel, which to them means abuse.

Fake witch trials and burning at the stake will be done by “Christians” to cult and spiritual parts, to convince them to hate Christians. “Christians” (cult actors) will come into the nurseries and abuse screaming babies, laughing at their pain as they rape with crucifixes, telling the babies they are showing them the “love of god.”

During yearly events, the higher occultic groups will have events at which real Christians are brought to and tortured or crucified (such as the infamous “Roman games” held each year). These Christians are rounded up from prisons and camps in third world countries under oppressive regimes, and are the main event for one reason alone: Satan hates Christians and Christianity, and takes every chance possible to persecute and kill them.

Children may be forced as part of their “God can never forgive you” programming (meant to create a barrier of guilt between them and God) to wipe out Christian villages in third world countries; or to abduct and sell the children of Christians, or infiltrate Christian churches and seduce the leadership (or their children).

If a member of these groups becomes a real Christian, then there will be extensive programming to destroy the individual's faith. They will be labeled a “traitor” and an “adulterer” or “whore” because they chose Christianity over the group's beliefs (Satan), and the group will go to great lengths to get the new believer to recant. This may include:

- Placing the individual on a cross for days, as they are intermittently raped and tortured. They are told the torture will stop if they recant
- Torturing the individual's brothers and sisters to death in front of them, one by one, telling them the killing will only stop if they recant

- If older, killing the individual's husband and children in various presentations may be done to get them to recant
- Placing them in a room with a false "Jesus" for weeks who abuses and tortures them and tells them he hates them, every time they pray
- Raping the individual with dogs, horses and corpses, with the same message
- Bringing the individual into a room filled with children on crosses, and being told they will all die unless the individual recants.

In circumstances like the above, the individual will eventually be driven to their limit (sometimes after weeks of continuous torture). They will then recant, not from a loss of faith, but sheer emotional exhaustion and overload, and the inability to see more death of loved ones. Once the person recants, the programming to ensure that they believe they can never "come back to God" will start almost immediately. A false "god" and "Jesus", angry and horrified in the setup, will condemn the individual to "hell" for "giving up their faith" in very cruel setups. They will be forced to sacrifice and renew their vows to Satan and the antichrist.

The individual will be forced to torture a Christian to death, and be told, "Now, the Christian God can never forgive you." They will be sent on antichristian missions as described above, to seal the programming.

Can God forgive the believer who recants under weeks of torture such as described above? I believe He does, because He is merciful. The Bible states that if any man sins, we have an advocate with God – His son, Jesus. If anyone confesses their sin, they are forgiven. Recalling memories of torture and recanting can be extremely distressing. It can cause deep guilt and grief. It is important that the survivor comes to realize that there is no sin that God cannot and will not forgive, if they come to Him and ask forgiveness. God knew all of our sins, both past, present and future, when we first came to faith in Him. Nothing in the survivor's life shocks or horrifies Him. Instead, He offers forgiveness for the very worst that mankind can do, against one another, and Himself, because He paid the price in full on the cross.

Chapter 8: Working with Cult Loyal Parts

Without the eventual help of cult loyal parts, the survivor will not be able to break free of the cult. These parts hold a great deal of power in the system, and will include the cult host, internalized leadership councils, and people the survivor loves most on this earth.
The problem with healing for many survivors is based upon this reality. It is often a presenter who enters therapy, due to depression, feeling that "something isn't quite right", cutting, an eating disorder, etc. While the presenter's needs are real, they will have made extensive agreements (during rituals, sacrifices, participating in covenants with demons and loved ones) to never remember their cult abuse, on pain of the death of their loved ones. This means that the presenter who presents in therapy is already heavily invested in never remembering the abuse – and will have extensive amnesia.

If only the presenter(s) appears in therapy, then the amount of healing that can occur will be limited to the presenters.

For deeper healing, word needs to get out to the inner, hidden parts (often called 'back parts", "dark parts", "cult parts") that they can get free – and they need to want this and begin to believe it is possible. This is so important because it is often these parts that run the show for the survivor and during therapy; presenters and other parts will often refer to them as "the bosses", "scary parts", "trainers", "leaders", etc. They have the power within the system to initiate punishment programs to prevent healing (and do), and to either help or hinder healing. The survivor will need support in order to patiently love, communicate with and listen to these parts, because there will be large amounts of programming installed to prevent exactly that. If a "back part" pops out and makes a rude comment, the presentation will be programmed to be absolutely horrified. If parts share about the individual's cult life, the presentation will have been programmed to deny everything, or to believe that they cannot handle hearing about the abuse (which is not true).

Attachment, Bonding and Cult Loyalty

The cult develops loyalty in its members through love bonds. While most books about cults stress the horrific nature of the abuse (and it is), few mention the deep love bonds that develop between members of the group. This bonding is developed in infancy through the manipulation of the infant's attachment needs: the primary trainers will change, rock, soothe and give bottles to the infant, talk lovingly, in order to teach the infant to love them. Since this is the only positive interaction the infant experiences when growing up in a cult facility, the infant will bond deeply to these programmers.

When a survivor enters therapy, and tries to break free, they must break these attachment bonds with the people they love most, or they will be drawn back into the cult. This creates deep psychological conflict for the individual who simultaneously wants out, wants the abuse to stop, and wants to stop abusing others; but who must cut off all contact with dearly loved ones in order to do so.

Cult programmers purposely keep young parts young, in order to continue manipulating attachment bonds for greater control. Breaking these bonds can be incredibly difficult, as the younger parts in the survivor will become angry and upset about not seeing the people they love. These littles are often bonded to a cult "mama" and "papa" who even when they are adults rock them, soothe them, sing to them, and give them candy or bottles. This type of treatment is provided after every programming session, in order to reinforce the bonding to the programmer(s). As the survivor tries to break free, angry littles will come out and say "I want my mama (or papa)" and refuse to have anything to do with anyone else. Young parts who miss beloved adults may hit or yell at support people, blaming these supporters for the fact that the survivor is unable to see the people they are bonded to.

It is important that these younger parts have a healthy, non-dissociative adult and support in their lives that they can bond to. Introducing them to the real Jesus is also helpful, since it will cause them to hesitate to recontact individuals who hate Christianity and Christians, and provides a source of love to attach to.

The number one reason that survivors go back to the cult is the lack of safe support to attach to as they leave the group. The cult loyal parts inside basically think "Why should I give up everyone I love, to live all alone, with no one to love me?" Therapy can be helpful, but traditional therapy is normally one hour a week, which will not offset a lifetime of cult bonding. This is why safe support is so critical for survivors, and is their biggest need. With support, the survivor can tackle the emotional tasks required for healing, including detaching from their abusers.

Cult loyal parts often get a bad "rap" from survivors and others, since they seem to create a lot of "problems". But given safety, support and the chance to receive truth, they will become the greatest force for healing inside, as their deep love and loyalty move from the cult to the Christian God and safe support. These parts, especially the cult host and the core controlling systems, will know the survivor's entire life history and can help keep the survivor safe from access. They will instantly recognize individuals from the cult, can warn the survivor of danger, and will often have a very strong faith and prayer life once they become Christians.

Internalized Loved Ones

When the infant is tiny (or even still in the womb) they will be asked to receive a familiar spirit from loved ones (such as their twin or triplet; their favorite trainers, etc.) They will be told that by receiving the spirit, the loved one can "always be with you" and the infant/child will "never be alone." Fearing abandonment, this sounds good to the child and they agree. This is accomplished through rituals that can include sexual activity, being put to death and resurrected together, or exchanging blood. The familiar spirit is a spirit of delusion that makes the infant/child/adult believe that the internal part is actually the outside loved person.

These internal representations of loved ones are used to control the survivor in various ways.

- If the survivor disobeys the cult, this internal part may be tortured, fulfilling the promise that if the survivor tries to leave or heal, their loved ones will be tortured or killed
- The internal part often holds great control over programming, reprogramming and amnesia systems
- The internal part may seek spiritual (astral) recontact with the loved person if physical access is stopped
- The internal part may be programmed to beg the survivor to "save them" (with tears and cries of pain) by going back to the group, if the survivor tries to break off cult contact.

It is important that the internal parts receive deliverance from the delusional (familiar) spirits and that the original identity of the part is restored, through prayer. The survivor will need to work with these parts, letting them know that they are programmed parts, and are actually part of the survivor and not the outside person. Allowing these parts out to experience current reality can help with grounding them, and bringing truth to them can help them choose to stop doing their old jobs inside.

Children are often programmed in groups of 12 (graded for performance so that individuals of similar ability are programmed together), and view this cohort as their siblings, since they have been raised together and done everything together since earliest infancy. They will have internal representations of these individuals they have closely bonded to internally, and will have great difficulty breaking bonds with these beloved peers. The survivor will need support in grieving the loss when they choose to leave the group, since the friendships and camaraderie experienced on the battlefield and during training and school are deep indeed.

Leadership Councils

The survivor's inside world will reflect the outside world they were raised in. If they were raised in a cult facility, there will be an internal one. If they lived under a cult council's leadership, there will be one internally. There will be internal trainers; internal training rooms and labs; council rooms, and mage councils. The cult hierarchy will be reflected in the individual's system, with the top leaders representing "ascended" or "celestial" beings who have overcome "human mortality."

These parts are heavily invested in the beliefs of the group regarding heaven, hell and ascension. They will believe that all of the torture and abuse they have undergone will be rewarded in a celestial paradise filled with good food, heavenly music, angels and good things. These constructs are installed in infancy, with elaborate staging and actors playing out the roles.

Core Loyalty

The highest parts of a system will be the darkest and most dissociated. Around the core, there may be a deep hatred of all mankind and humanity, with the vow (made in the womb, during prenatal torture) to get revenge on the abusers of the fetus and birth mother (see core programming). The fetus will have agreed to allow Satan (or a spirit representing him) to enter in after extreme trauma, because this spirit promises the fetus that it will help him/her become powerful, and one day wreak revenge on all mankind.

An internal "Satan" will be one of the first core splits (this will also be replicated with a Satan in all the other systems as a major controller), and the child will be highly loyal to him due to this desire for revenge. An internal "god" will also be a primary core split. These first core splits are heavily rewarded, praised and doted on, and will have bonded to the demonic (and in fact, may have had no interaction with human beings). Breaking loyalty at this level involves forgiving the abusers in the womb (by the fetal splits) and forgiving God, since the fetus blames God for the abuse.

Anti-Traitor/Anti-Stranger Programming

All cult groups fear and hate traitors, or members who try to leave, as well as "strangers" or non-cult members. This is reinforced with extensive programming, starting in the womb. A "traitor" will enter the room the birth mother is in, and painfully rape and torture her, telling her "this is what traitors do." This instills in the fetus a deep subconscious hatred of traitors. During infancy, this setup is repeated, with the infant tortured and raped by actors who come into the nursery saying scripts such as "I'm a traitor and I want you to be one too". The traitors smell awful, and the infant is repulsed by the foul smell and abuse, until they are "saved" by the primary programmer(s) who tell them to stay away from traitors.

As the child gets older, the setups become more sophisticated. The child may be "abducted" by traitors, who horrifically abuse the child until the child can escape or is "rescued" in the setup. During military camp training, the child may be captured by "traitors" and interrogated under torture; the child is extensively praised for not disclosing any information. The child is taught to avoid traitors and strangers, with abductions by strangers in setups where the child is raped and abused continuously until they are able to escape and go back to those who “love” them at the facility: their programmers and siblings.

These parts who have been extensively programmed to hate outsiders, and hate themselves if they leave the group, will initially be horrified and angry at the choice to leave. They may act out on self harm and suicide programming, preferring death to life as a traitor. They may attempt to sabotage therapy and support, and will call supporters names (such as “traitor enabler” and worse). It takes time, patience and bringing truth to these parts, and a safe, non-abusive attachment figure for these often young parts to realize that they were lied to.

Twin and Triplet Bonding

Most modern sophisticated groups that use mind control will produce their members through genetic manipulation. The state of genetic engineering is far beyond what the public realizes, and traits such as intelligence, strength, muscle mass, healing ability and pain endurance, spiritual/psychic ability, as well as phenotypes such as hair color and eye color, have been genetically engineered for many decades. G1 was the first group of genetically enhanced individuals produced (in the late 1940’s), G3 (Generation 3) appeared in the late 1950’s, G13 was produced in the mid-1990’s and today I would guess it is near G20. The genes and DNA can be purchased by smaller groups from the larger genetic labs; the largest (and wealthiest) groups have their own genetic labs. Once a new generation is produced, the birth mothers are implanted with multiple zygotes. Only one per birth mother (the strongest) will be allowed to live, but there will be several gene-identical individuals produced who are carried by their own birth mothers. In this manner, identical twins and triplets are produced who were carried in different wombs. These twins and triplets are allowed to bond deeply throughout life, and will often become the deepest love bonds for the individual.

Twins (or triplets) will undergo numerous scenarios in which they “rescue” each other, undergo torture for one another, or even agree to be put to death for the other (and are subsequently resuscitated). This creates a very deep bond. They may be placed with one another in cribs in infancy, and undergo early programming within sight of each other, and be allowed to comfort each other after the programming sessions are over. If an infant becomes a “failure to thrive” (which is very common due to the terrible abuse during the first year) they will be allowed to spend extra time with their twin sibling(s), in order to help restore the will to live. They will be told “Your twin needs you to live or she will have to take all the pain alone” or “Your twin needs your protection or she might die” etc.

Breaking this deep emotional and spiritual bond is difficult, since this is one of the closest relationships the survivor was allowed when growing up. It requires support, understanding and the chance to grieve the loss if there is no contact with the siblings. In most instances, these twin/triplets who are still in the group will be threatened with torture, causing great distress in the survivor who must come to realize that she/he can NOT be a “messiah” or rescue their siblings; that only the Christian God is powerful enough to do so.

Antichrist Programming

One of the deepest loyalty programs within an occultic system will be to the New World Order and the promised “messiah” or the individual the Bible refers to as the “antichrist” (the occultic groups look to him as a savior and leader who will usher in peace and prosperity). The antichrist is referred to by occultic groups as the “Light of the World” (which is also the name of a famous occultic painting created in the mid-1800’s which depicts the antichrist leading the world and men of all races looking towards him).

Antichrist programming in many systems was formerly represented by silvery blue, but since 2000 has been represented by the colors white and gold. Many groups believe that this individual was born in 2000, and will rise to power in the year 2030 (this cannot be verified, since the Christian God is the one in charge of history and is in control of world events). The antichrist represented internally will be a high controller (normally, of the core system), and will rule over the internal celestial city, which is the occultic form to the “new Jerusalem”. This internal celestial city will have a tree of life in its center; a central fountain of life and “living waters” and will have internal alters (for sacrifices). This system will be built upon numerous sacrifices, and will often be quite disconnected from normal emotions or conscience; instead, the “ascended beings” that inhabit it will be in a state of bliss and peace. They will be completely loyal and bonded to the antichrist (called “he who has come”) and will have made vows to serve him. Breaking this programming and the associated bonding and loyalty vows will create spiritual warfare, and requires prayer (and possibly fasting) and support to completely break the loyalty programming.

Chapter 9: Helping Spiritual Systems Heal

When survivors choose to heal, they will eventually meet their internal spiritual parts, which reside within specific systems and structures. These will vary with different groups, but will have the following traits in common:

1. Rituals are done before the programming, during and after the session (including sacrifices).
2. The spiritual parts will be committed to a deity, or believe they are the deity. This is accomplished by having the "deity" (an actor) introduce themselves to the survivor in the womb. After birth, actors dressed up as the deity demonstrate how the part is to walk, talk and act; and perform sacrifices in front of the infant. After sexual abuse with the actor, the demonic spirit then enters the infant. The part that the demon attaches to then believes that they are the entity.
3. This programming is reinforced heavily during early childhood, with role plays, VRs and other setups. This is one reason why international groups prefer to program their infants and children fulltime in facilities (with breaks of a few weeks each year to be hosted by presentation families): it can take years to install and reinforce these structured systems internally.

Theta Spiritual Systems

Theta is a brain wave state that is highly sensitive to the spiritual. When in theta state, a person can more easily see spiritual beings and under their influence, can experience greatly enhanced abilities (such as being able to run at superfast speeds, leap extremely high, and have extremely enhanced eyesight and hearing). Theta state is also used to create parts with specific spiritual roles, which include:

- Theta remote viewing (the ability to leave the body, and enter a building remotely and share information regarding what is seen there),
- Theta killing: these assassins are trained from the time they are in the womb to kill psychically; normally, after a sexual union with the victim. The theta will be sent to have sexual intercourse with the victim, create a soul tie, and later use the soul tie to kill the person demonically. At times, teams of thetas will join together to kill individuals with a strong will to live or who have strong demonic protection themselves.
- Astral communication: thetas can communicate with other thetas by astral projection or inter-psychically.

Thetas can be trained to send the following to others:

- Tremendous fear (Phobos): this includes sending dreams of death or terror
- Death (Thanatos): this is the root of psychic killing
- Revenge: (Nemesis): normally a strong theta controller, Nemesis represents the desire to wreak revenge on mankind (for its mortality) and to destroy others.

Omicron and Mu

These are extremely high and low brain wave states used to increase the receptivity to spiritual attachments. Omicron is extremely painful to maintain and can lead to a death state quickly; and is considered a doorway to meeting "spiritual beings" or "enlightened beings" (which are actually demons). Mu is an extremely low brain wave state (near death) which again allows the demonic easier entrance. It is often used in conjunction with other programming.

Omega Programming

Omega programming is spiritual programming that enhances oracle and mage skills and abilities (mages are occultic practitioners who are skilled in casting spells and power battles). This is also the state in which complete system destruction sequences are often placed. This system believes it is highly evolved and "ascended" and does not feel the body or mortality. It will be heavily programmed with deep loyalty to the group and trainers, and will be programmed to die or cause system shatter if the survivor seriously disobeys cult commands and becomes a security risk. The survivor may literally attempt to "implode" with this programming, and will need support to work through it.

Omega skills are also used to take on the pain for others, such as when a woman is carrying a hybrid (half human, half demonic) child, since this type of pregnancy causes intense torment (and at times, even death) in the carrier. An omega team will help carry the demonic torment, allowing the pregnancy to continue without spiritually destroying the birth mother.

Ancient Spiritual Systems

There are numerous ancient spiritual systems that Occultic groups draw from in their spiritual programming. Some include:

- The Garden of Eden (biblical): the core may reside in this garden setting, which is also inhabited by Lilith, Adam, Eve, the snake and is often where the core resides, insulated from any interaction with outside life. Inside of Eden will be the following structures:

  - The Tree of Life (althea, representing satanic immortality), the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil (false, human logic), and Cruz (the cross, representing false Christianity). These three twine together and run through all systems as a three-fold cord of false logic and belief
  - A waterfall
  - Benches where the core meets with Satan ("god" in the system) for counsel
  - Flaming cherubim (system barrier preventing crossing outside without authorization, or entrance)
  - A recreation of the temple in Jerusalem, with alters for sacrifice and a "holy of holies"

- Babylonian
  Many Occultic groups have access to the scrolls and tablets written by Babylonian mages and wise men (or at least copies), which describe dimensional travel, rituals, shape shifting and other forms of demonic activity. The internal controllers will have the names of Babylonian deities (such as Bel, Ishtar, Ashtoth, etc.) and will have undergone Babylonian pain rituals (golden needles heated and inserted into 1000 nerve points, while the person is suspended), and other forms of training (such as learning to "pass through the fire" in a golden chair without being burned alive).

  The mage craft taught includes how to read magic books (where the pages come alive), how to play demonic chess (with the chess "master" learning how to control the white, and then the black pieces, which become demonically alive). Learning to shape shift (take on the form of a bird or wolf) is rooted in Babylonian mage craft, and students learn the required rituals (that often include learning to create the circles or geometric figures with great care) from mentors, or spiritual "masters".

  The Babylonian parts will often reside in ziggurats or a recreation of a babylonian temple inside.

- Egyptian Programming
  This is similar in some ways to Babylonian programming, but involves the major Egyptian deities (Ra, Isis, Osiris, Horus, etc.). The child will be taken to a recreation of an Egyptian temple, or to the chambers below a great pyramid, where sacrifices are done. The young child is often chained to a statue representing a deity with an attached alter, and left overnight; if the child lives and is not killed demonically, they will have internalized the deity whose statue they were chained to.

These demons often can create great torment for the survivor and others, with parts able to call up clouds of swarming, stinging bees or gnats, or other curses. Helping them involves getting rid of the demonic, breaking soul ties to the human mentor and the demonic, and helping these parts realize that they are part of a human being. Because the demonic pretended to "protect" them for years, giving up the demonic may make the survivor feel vulnerable, until they have learned that the Christian God actually gives greater protection, and without the terrible price that demons exact.

- Indian/Tibetan and Asian
  Most international groups ensure that the individuals they program take part in knowledge gathered from religions around the world. They will be required to learn Sanskrit (which has many ancient rituals described), and other ancient languages, and those well-versed will even converse in these languages. They may meet the "living Buddha" and offer him reverence and sacrifice; and gain demonic power from a large variety of sources. When learning martial arts, they will learn to channel "chi" and other forms of demonic power to do the seemingly impossible feats and enhance their own combat skills.

- Q'bala
  I have addressed the Q'bala in earlier writings. A Jewish form of mysticism, it is used to open up portals for dimensional travel at the points of the sephiroth (i.e. installation of demons). It also drives part of the logic for the delta system, and the tree of life runs through it.

- Druids
  Druids are considered the "tree huggers" of the Occultic world, but they have powerful blood rituals based upon human sacrifice that are far from gentle or kind. The Druid Council runs the U.K., and druids are adept at shapeshifting (into animal or tree form). Druid rituals often involve a child being chained to a tree (large oak) under which sacrifices have been performed, and the tree then rapes and demonically speaks to the child at night.

- Witches, Mages and Warlocks
  These are all different branches of Occultic learning which members of groups go through, with mages considered the most learned of the three (and the most powerful). Mages will often engage in power battles, and spend years mentoring their students in the Occultic rituals required. Mages can also shapeshift (into birds, ravens, or mage wolves), and can send powerful curses, and the most powerful mages will be part of a mage council over an area. Fortunately, the Christian God is able to stop all curses and protect those who turn to His protection, and who renounce all forms of witchcraft, sorcery or mage craft.

- Ascended Masters
  These are considered the highest individuals in the Occultic world, who have passed through horrendous death rituals and have basically "overcome" their "human mortality" through pain that would cause shock and death to those who have not undergone training to endure it; they have also often traveled to the highest dimensions (12th and 13th) in their quest for "enlightenment."

  Basically, these individuals have given over their hearts, minds and souls to be possessed demonically, and use these demonic powers to further the goals of the New World Order and usher in the reign of the antichrist. They will be familiar with working with nephilim and with the satanic agenda to destroy mankind, and will agree with it.

- Demonic parts (Janus, Guardians, Dark Cherubim, shadows, wraiths, residents of hell)

The survivor of international Occultic abuse will have numerous parts inside that have been programmed to believe that they are "demons". These are often young children (ages 1-4) that were taught to act like demons, growl, and given demonic names. The actors who model how to be a "demon" to the child will act in every way as if they are the demon.

  - Janus will be a demonic entity who appears like the Greek Janus, with two faces, one facing inwards (the dark face) and one facing outwards (the white face). Janus acts as a guardian between front and back, along a large porticullis (gate) that separates the two. Both aspects of Janus will need healing and deliverance, since her job was to prevent unauthorized passing back and forth between front and back.
  - Guardians: these will sound like demons and are actually protectors that guard infants, small children, or high-security areas inside. They will attempt to block the survivor or therapists from gaining access until convinced that allowing them in is helpful. It can help if these parts can share how they got their jobs and why they do them, as well as get rid of the demonic attachments that sit on them.
  - Dark Cherubim and angels: most spiritual systems will have a light (white) side, of false Christianity that includes false angels; in the same way, the dark system will have its counterparts, including dark angels, Princes of Hell, Generals of Hell and other parts. Again, these parts have been programmed both prenatally and during early infancy with role models, actors and VRs. Dismantling this is a combination of spiritual deliverance and looking at the setups that created the beliefs.
  - Shadows and wraiths: these are ethereal beings without physical body that have been created through spiritual torture; they may also be “modeled” through movies and VRs to create the internal counterpart. These parts often “follow” and track victims, working with the thetas to search and find those they are to torment or kill.

- Residents of hell: these are parts that were created to inhabit the various layers of hell internally, and will appear like demons, archangels, or other spiritual beings (see punishment programming chapter for more information).

- Celestials

The satanic counterpart of the Christian heaven is “celestial City” and paradise. This is an area where parts who believe they are “ascended beings” who have overcome “mortality” inhabit; and represent the reward for those who help bring in the New World Order.

Celestial City and its counterparts are installed through rituals and large numbers of sacrifices; and the inhabitants will have undergone so much torture and pain that they have completely dissociated their feelings. In the VRs of Celestial City, the inhabitants are programmed with drugs or brain stimulation to feel peace and bliss. These parts will come out declaring great peace and no fear of death (they have all undergone death and “resurrection” within the city) and believe they have “ascended” beyond earthy desires or needs. There is a huge spirit of deception and delusion that must be dealt with, and doing so will cause great anger when the parts realize that they have been deceived, and given their lives and sweat to a lie.

With time, and the chance to grieve, and with faith in the true God, these parts can heal and help the other parts in their healing journey. This takes time, since they have a lifetime of false teaching to work through. They will need time and patience to connect with the other systems, and realize that they are part of a human being.

- Satan

In all occultic systems, Satan (and his representative on earth, the antichrist) will hold primary positions, and will often be among the first core split(s). In many systems, Satan will have his black (punishing) form, and his kind (Lucient) form, with splits for each. The system will often perform sacrifices internally around the clock to the internal Satan, antichrist, and other deities, without the survivor’s conscious knowledge. This can create a tremendous struggle internally, until the sacrifices, hymns of praise and other forms of worship internally stop as the individual begins to allow truth to replace the lies they were raised with.

As the primary punisher, the internal Satan will sit on his throne, and mete out judgments internally (or rewards) based upon behavior and obedience to cult laws and rules. If the individual obeys, they are rewarded (and ascend, enjoying internal bliss and peace); if they disobey, they are punished, and parts will begin descending in the internal “hell” until they “repent” or begin obeying again. The satanic systems will believe as fully that they are going to heaven, and that disobeying cult rules is sending them to hell, as the Christian systems believe in the Christian God and heaven. This can create a great deal of conflict during healing, until the satanic/luciferian systems come to recognize the truth of the Bible, and see how they have been lied to and manipulated by their abusers.

This will cause a great deal of grief. Often, the core is completely bonded to Satan, loves him, and wants to obey him, looking to him as their “father” figure; breaking this bond and the hold that Satan has on the system requires re-bonding to someone who is safe, and learning the truth about Jesus. This part of the system will often be the most hidden and invested in blocking healing, since undoing spiritual programming at this level will often allow massive healing of other systems.

Chapter 10: Helping Littles and Infants Heal

For the survivor to heal, their younger parts (child, toddler, infant and fetal) must also heal. These parts, often called “littles” by survivors, hold a lot of emotional power within the system. Their emotional needs are often what drives recontact programming, and should never be ignored.

The Need for Attachment

One of the greatest needs that littles have is to have a safe attachment figure. If they are not allowed to attach to a safe, non-cult person, their emotional needs will continue to drive them back to loved ones in the cult, where this need will be met.

All programmers understand attachment needs; after every programming session, the programmer will spend time with the infant and young parts inside, holding them, rocking them, giving them bottles and speaking lovingly to them. They realize the powerful emotions that these parts hold, and how important to keeping the programming intact these attachment needs are.

Breaking programming always involves breaking attachments to unsafe (cult) people that the survivor loves. This is one of the most difficult emotional tasks the survivor will ever have to do, and one of the most important for healing. To break attachments to unsafe people, a safe alternative must be presented. While it would be nice to be able to pat the survivor on the back, and tell him/her to “let Jesus be the one you bond to” this is not enough. The survivor was wounded in relationship with a human being, and needs to heal in relationship with one. Offering less is an emotional “copout” but is one that many therapists and supporters take.

Littles will often be direct about their attachment needs. They will ask to be held, rocked, and comforted. The nature of the support relationship will determine the boundaries to be held, but at the very least, the supporter can let the littles know they are cared for, and be given the smiles and looks of “delight” that infants and young children crave. This can promote healing faster than any other intervention offered, since it is attachments to cult people that draw the survivor back.

Guardians and Protectors

Littles and infants will often have highly protective guardians and protectors placed over them, whose job is to ensure that the littles never come out unless called out. Infants are often called out with a special “love name” given them by the trainers. Using this name causes them to immediately come out, expecting treats, petting and loving care.

The guardians and protectors are heavily punished throughout infancy and childhood, until they learn their job and do it well, keeping the infants inside. This is why in most systems with mind control, the littles and infants are never seen in therapy, until a lot of trust has been established over time. It often takes years of trust building with a safe person until these young parts are willing to test the waters and come out.

Systems that do not guard their infants and littles may do so because of complete presentation breakdown (no adults present to protect), or because the group was unsophisticated and heavily rewarded the individual for appearing young and childlike.

In many systems, there is a special guardian such as “Pan” who plays his pipes, and calls the littles to follow after him. He takes them to a special play area, with carousels and fun things to do, which keeps the littles entertained inside – and not presenting. In order to help the littles heal, the help of Pan and other similar guardians needs to be enlisted. Otherwise, the littles will be kept away from therapy, and healing.

Internal Playlands

There are other internal playlands for littles as well. Never-Never Land is a major one, as just described. For the infants, there may be a pirate ship, with fun-loving pirates, cake and ice cream, songs and lots of holding, which the infants love. This can cause them to choose to stay inside the internalized version of the pirate ship, and prevent their presenting (or healing).
It is difficult for littles to give up these internal representations, because they represent memories of fun, loving attention and joy in a life that had very little of these things. After a day of being tortured and programmed, the littles look forward to the fun setups such as Neverland.

There may be representations of the “Lost Boys” inside (beloved brothers and sisters), Wendy, Tinker Bell and other characters. Captain Hook is a powerful punisher inside, who punishes any disobedience to cult programming or attempts to leave Never Land. The goal of this internal world is to provide a place where these young parts live, and never come out – unless they are called out by programmers. In order to help these young parts to heal, they must be offered love and a life on the outside that is better than the virtual world created inside.

The internal carousels, circuses and other areas where younger parts live are all constructed by the programmers for a purpose: to reinforce cult directives, and keep internal reprogramming going with these younger parts. As the individual heals, and the littles step forward, they will have tremendous attachment needs and will want “playtime” with trusted adults.

Helping Littles Heal

In addition to love, younger parts will often want the following:

- Undivided adult attention
- Stories read to them
- Play time, whether playing with a hula hoop, going to a park and swinging, or coloring quietly. Different littles will have different needs, and will enjoy different activities. The main thing is that they will want to do them with you, the supporter, who they have come to trust.
- Most young parts have a good sense of humor, and enjoying teasing adults they trust. This is also part of healing, as they test out boundaries and discover what is okay and not in a normal relationship.
- Treats: the cult often heavily rewards littles who recontact with their favorite candy (such as chocolate) and tell them they are a “good girl” or “good boy”. Littles like treats, and as the survivor heals, they may choose to give rewards to the younger parts for NOT contacting. It is better if treats chosen are different than those the cult uses, since the goal is to not reinforce programming.
- Bottles: the youngest (infant) parts may want a bottle. The survivor may choose to purchase a bottle and give the milk to the infants themselves, or choose a trusted, safe support person to give the bottle. Because giving bottles (and breast) is part of the bonding to programmers, the system may react with panic and anger if the infants begin to go to a “stranger” (non-cult person) for a bottle, since this means the programming is breaking down at a prime level. The infants themselves may react with fear if the internal parts are punishing them for accepting a bottle from an outsider, until the programming to only bond to programmers breaks. Other littles may only want the beloved trainer, and become angry at other parts who bond to a person outside the group. It is important that parts be allowed to express these conflicts, and receive acceptance, to help resolution of the conflicts.

Controllers and Communicators

Because cult children are genetically enhanced for intelligence, it is not unusual for even small infant parts to have at least some speech, and excellent understanding. But because the youngest infants inside may have trouble talking or being understood, there are often special parts known as communicators who communicate for these parts. The communicators for infants are often quite young, and programmed to be completely unemotional as they relay whatever the infants are experiencing. Communicators are often very compassionate and feel protective of the infants that they communicate for, and can become part of the “healing team” to help them heal.

Baby controllers are parts that oversee infant areas (see Pan above). There are other controllers, such as the internalized programmer(s) that the baby bonded to (often called “Papa” or "Mama" by the baby). This controller tells the infant what to do, and carries the baby past internal barriers without the baby getting punished. Once the controllers are willing to help with healing, there is less pain and punishment as the babies come forward to play and bond.

Why Littles Stay Young

Littles are young and stay young inside for several reasons. The primary reason they do so is that they were told to always stay young by their primary loved person (primary programmer) who has told them that they will not be loved if they grow older. As a result, the little makes a vow to the loved person to never grow up, to always stay young, and performs a ritual during which a demon is attached for this purpose. Once the demon leaves, and the vow is broken, and the little is able to come out and experience life, they will begin growing and developing, just as a normal child would (but more quickly). An infant does not take 18 years to "grow up" but instead may become a toddler and preschooler within months of coming out and interacting with a safe support person. This journey of growth is individual for each person. The love of the true (Christian) God is also very helpful in this growth, since the littles will feel safe with His presence nearby: they will feel safe enough to start breaking their programming, and grow up as they realize that God loves them.

Chapter 11: Reprogramming Systems

Reprogramming systems are systems designed to repair programs that begin breaking down, and keep systems and controllers doing their cult jobs. Reprogramming systems are actually specialized punishment systems, since they pull upon trauma to reinforce the programming. The main controllers in reprogramming systems will represent:

- A demonic deity (such as "Saturn", "Prometheus" or "Vulcan") with a familiar spirit attached to the human part. These parts run the reprogramming in different ways.
    - In general, there is a system that runs reprogramming 24 hours a day. This punishment is tied to triads of controllers: an infant, a child, and an older part, and each controller in each system will go through the reprogramming (pain) sequences. This system links to Epsilon (pain holding) system, in order to channel the pain and punishment for the reprogramming sequences.
    - Other systems will perform loyalty system reprogramming and punishments. This includes being pounded with "Vulcan's Hammer" and internal parts having their livers torn out by a large black bird as punishment for disobedience. This program is installed in infancy, when the programmers terrorize the infant with a large bird that claws them and is allowed to peck at them (they wear special goggles to protect the eyes).
    - Another system would punish the white systems and reprograms them in a manner similar to the prior system.
    - The birth mother (see chapter on "birth mother" for more on this controller)
- Other reprogramming controllers will include internalized trainers who are the primary trainers who have programmed the survivors. These trainers act in every way like the outside trainers, and will put the parts on training tables inside, and reprogram them as they were taught to do since early childhood.
- Other controllers include loved ones the survivor is bonded to (who may also be internalized trainers in dual roles). These loved ones are tortured, with screams, internally if the survivor's programming fails.

Most reprogramming systems run on a 24-hour cycle, with each system undergoing reprogramming during a two-hour time period for that day. Some systems work on a 48-hour cycle, but this is unusual. The reprogramming will work in the following manner:

1. The primary controllers for a system (such as the white Minerva or Athena for a presentation system) and the back command controllers (including deep delta for controllers) will communicate back and forth using specialized tones or “calls’ that were installed in the womb and during infancy, and reinforced throughout life. These controllers are doing constant “system checks” with the controllers literally “singing” the tones back if the system is intact. If the system has been breached, or is no longer intact, the tone sung back (or its not being sung back) will represent this fact, and identify the problem (tones are used because information can be packed into each tone, and the brain processes these “calls” or “pings” between systems much more rapidly than conscious thought).

2. If a system call shows distress or faltering, or communicates that directives have been disobeyed, then the system will be reprogrammed. This can take place in several ways:

    a. For the presentations (white), the parts that have faltered or failed may be hospitalized in a re-enactment of the “Crazy Alice” scenes of torture, etc. in an internalized “hospital”. The presentation parts will be escorted by doctors in white coats inside to “be made better” in the script, since any failure is considered being “sick” in the reprogramming script. Any failure of presenter amnesia (bleedthrough) will result in this, as well as any disobedience by presenters to cult commands.

    b. For more serious failures, internal parts may be taken to an internalized training facility that looks like the programming labs they are taken to for “tune ups” (reprogramming done to all cult members at intervals). This facility will be run inside by internalized representations of programmers who put the parts through an entire sequence of programming (shock, torture, tech torture, etc.) to get the part to continue doing its old job

    c. After the reprogramming, a complete system check is done again, to ensure that all parts are singing the correct tones back - and are in compliance.

If the reprogramming systems begin to fail, the parts controlling these systems are themselves tortured, and internal representations of loved ones are also tortured in an “if you fail, then ___ gets hurt” script.

Internal Demonic Activity

Without demonic interference or physical tune-ups, all programming would naturally fail over time. The human brain was not meant to forget, or to be controlled, or to do the things that occultic groups ask its members to do. The natural response is rebellion at the tremendous amount of emotional and physical time and energy required, and to question the motives for the horrendous abuse that cult groups engage in. To prevent this, cult groups rely heavily on demonic delusion to keep programming going.

This is why there are sacrifices and rituals performed before, during and after programming sessions. In addition, certain activities are programmed in to help ensure that the programming will not "fail". This includes:

- The installation of internal altars, and controllers performing sacrifices internally around the clock to maintain the internal demonic controls.
- Sexual activity with demons on the internalized altars, for greater control. All system controllers participate
- Spiritual (astral) contact in order to reprogram parts and influence the survivor to come back to the group, or to punish them for attempting to leave.
- In some groups, there are dimensions used for punishment purposes. If the survivor attempts to stop physical contact, their former handlers or programmers will attempt to astral in and drag them with them, where the demonic punishments cause great misery. This is why it is important to close all doors/portals for spiritual travel and access as quickly as possible.

Chapter 12: Suicidality and Self Harm

Suicide is an issue that comes up frequently for most survivors during the healing process. This is for several reasons:

- The survivor has learned over a lifetime to avoid painful or intense emotions in their presentations, and so has not learned to cope with them in a healthy way. Suicide may seem to be one way to "avoid the pain", and this thinking is aided by the demonic attachments.
- The demonization of parts: demons hate people, and want them dead. When a survivor is healing, and getting rid of the demonic, they realize that they are basically losing their "host". In retaliation, they will put thoughts of suicide in the survivor.
- Programming: most individuals programmed by sophisticated groups will have several layers of suicide/self-destruct in place, designed to "get rid of" the survivor should they become a security risk to the group.
- The survivor may be given a direct command by their group to die, especially if they are truly breaking free. This will be reinforced by the belief that their healing means that others they love are being tortured or killed. In many survivors, loyalty programming includes the willingness to die for the beloved programmers and loved ones in the group, and the desire to die rather than be a "traitor" is installed. This line of programming is activated when the survivor reaches the loyalty systems inside.

All survivors will have programming installed to believe that if they heal, and continue healing more deeply, they will die or suicide. This belief needs to be challenged, and truth brought to the parts that hold this.

A survivor who is doing intense healing work will need to openly discuss the possibility of suicide and what to do with suicidal feelings if they come up, with their therapist or support system. It is usually not a matter of "if" but "when" the feelings will come up, and a safety plan is critical. Talking about suicidal feelings will not "cause" the survivor to suicide, and can be a relief, since the feelings are there anyway.

Suicidal feelings can come at different intensity levels, ranging from a mild "I wish I could go to heaven and be free of all this pain" to an almost uncontrollable desire to self-harm. Any time the survivor shares they are feeling suicidal needs to be taken seriously, assessed, and the safety plan implemented (such as around the clock accountability and/or hospitalization) if the survivor feels they cannot control these impulses.

About Hospitalization

Some (but not all) survivors who are dealing with intense homicidal or suicidal feelings may need to go inpatient for a period of time to deal with the programming. If this is so, it is important to prayerfully consider where to go, since many hospitals have personnel that are mind controlled, and who will want to access the individual. In fact, there is programming installed in most survivors that makes them feel "I need to go to the hospital, I am sick" (part of the Crazy Alice programming sequence) in order to be re-accessed and reprogrammed.

There are some programs that are safer than others for inpatient hospitalization, but the survivor should be aware that even if the hospital itself is fairly safe, there may be other survivors inpatient who may attempt to access the survivor while they are inpatient. This is why in most cases, it is often best to provide around the clock prayerful support and accountability in preference to hospitalization, unless the crisis continues to escalate or becomes life-threatening. It is important to have input from a trained professional therapist if the risk of suicide is high.

Triggers for Suicide and Self Harm

As the survivor is healing, they will encounter various internal and external triggers for suicidality. Common triggers can include:

- Breaching of a highly secure system inside, by the survivor and/or therapist. These systems are often guarded by suicide programming, which can appear like "trip lines", "bombs", or simply guardians and controllers installed with suicide programming that runs with any unauthorized (i.e. someone other than the programmer) access

- Beginning to bond with someone outside the group: cult loyal parts will become extremely distressed as the survivor begins to make friends with and develop emotional attachments with individuals outside the cult group. This activates internal "anti-traitor" programming, in which the survivor throughout their life (in programmed scripts) has chosen to die rather than be a "traitor" (see traitor programming in the cult loyal programming chapter). They are dealing with the deep pain of being unable to see loved ones in the group, and may seek to wreak "revenge" on the parts choosing to leave the group by attempting to kill them through suicide. This intrasystem conflict and hostility needs to be processed and addressed openly, including allowing the cult loyal parts to process their own grieving without judgment (i.e. asking "How can you miss that S.O.B." will not help. Letting the survivor know that you see their pain and they are not alone in it will help more).

- Subliminals: these may come with commands and runes that order the survivor to die (in order to show their loyalty, or to have any hope of "ascension" etc.) When a survivor goes online, or uses a smart phone, they will be subjected to subliminals, and may feel suicidal or extremely depressed afterwards. Often, the subliminals will show loved ones in the cult group being tortured because of the survivor’s unwillingness to obey cult commands. This is one reason why taking a break from going online, and minimizing any required online activity can be helpful, especially earlier in healing.

- Seeing loved ones threatened: if the survivor stops going to rituals or meeting with cult members, the group will eventually send people in public places to use hand signals to sign that they are being hurt and tortured, or will die soon. If the survivor works alone, or can be gotten alone, the loved one may raise their shirt, and show the bruises, cuts and welts from torture endured, with the survivor blamed. This type of interaction will cause intense suicidality, until the survivor has been able to recall who their double binds are, the messages they have been sending, how they are communicated, and then look at the traumas that caused them to take on a rescuer role for the loved one. The survivor will eventually need to come to the realization that it is not their fault if a loved one is hurt, abused or tortured, even if their leaving the group is blamed. The reality is that the loved one would be hurt anyway, as long as they remain in a group that abuses.

Anti-suicide Programming

Because suicidality can be so strong in individuals from organized groups, they may have undergone specific programming to stop or prevent suicide. They don’t want to lose their best agents, but these agents may be dealing with painful traumas and emotions, causing the individual being programmed to give up. This may first be manifested as being a “failure to thrive” in infancy, which is very common in infants raised and programmed in facilities. Over 90% of all highly programmed infants go through at least one, and often several, episodes of failure to thrive (FTT) in which they stop eating, curl up and basically shut down.

The remedy used by programmers is to stop the programming, and let the infant spend bonding time with the programmers and other infants, such as their twins. These other infants can often pull the infant back from death, and help the infant want to live again.

As the individual gets older, specific programming to not self harm and not commit suicide is put in, with heavy rewards and praise for wanting to stay alive.

During especially difficult times (such as the time after attempting to carry a nephilim baby, or the time after a marriage to a principality at age 13, or completing the full rites of initiation into adulthood at age 12 – 13 when numerous sacrifices are done) the individual may again fall into a “spiritual coma” and want to die – and again, is brought out of it by the loving bonding with the people they are closest to. These individuals gather around the spiritually wounded person, and attempt to help restore the desire to live. If unsuccessful, the individual will die; if successful, they will continue living.

The individual will also be programmed with codes to prevent them from committing suicide, with command codes designed to stop them from suicide. These commands will be given in times of the individual feeling deeply suicidal, in order to keep them alive (if they are still active in the group).

Emotions that Can Precipitate Self Harm

During healing, when various emotions come up, certain ones can precipitate suicidal feelings and self-harm more than others. Despair, rage, rejection and feeling abandoned are the primary ones. These are all extremely painful emotions, and the survivor may feel completely overwhelmed and incapable of dealing with them. Healing can include looking at the traumas that caused the feelings, and helping the parts work through the feelings with safe support. The survivor needs to know that suicide is a permanent “non-solution” to a temporary problem: intense feelings. It can help if they come to realize that they will not always feel this way, and that most feelings subside within a matter of days, including the most painful emotions.

Unsafe Behaviors/Risk Taking

When an individual is attempting to avoid feeling emotional pain, they may cope by exhibiting unsafe behaviors. They may go out late at night alone, trawl bars, engage in unsafe sex, or go through multiple relationships quickly with relative strangers. Other behaviors can include driving rapidly on curving roads, or taking other risks with their life.

Some behaviors can be caused by addictions, such as sexual addictions designed to keep the individual hooked to the group. Other causes can be an unconscious desire to suicide, or to re-enact experiences of abuse due to guilt.

Chapter 13: Working with the Birth Mother

In most systems programmed with modern methods, birth mother trauma is a basic foundation for the programming. The internal birth mother is a prime programmed part, and will hold within her all programming scripts, put in with birth mother trauma.

What is birth mother trauma? While the methods will vary some, it involves incredible cruelty to the birth mother carrying the fetus, in order to increase the susceptibility to control.

Not every occultic group does this to their infants. But many groups, especially international groups, will do this in their programming labs. The zygotes are first created in petri dishes, with genetically enhanced material. The birth mothers are then taken to the programming labs, where they are told that they were “specially selected” to “carry a very special baby.” These are healthy, fit young women (ages 18 to 26, on average), who may have been bred for this purpose: to be an incubator for a genetically enhanced fetus. The birth mothers are excited, and shown the “joys” of having a wonderful baby by actors who pretend to be birth mothers who recently had their babies, and hold up the smiling, happy infants. They discuss how wonderful it is to be a birth mother, in order to set up the later betrayal.

The excited mother is implanted with the zygote, and for several days is treated like royalty: the best foods, wonderful treatment, the chance to stroll in a nearby garden, and to chat with the other expectant mothers. But within a week, the trauma begins. The birth mother will be strapped in a chair, and one of her digits (finger joint) cut off, because she “disobeyed.” Over the next few weeks, the birth mother’s life becomes a nightmare, as she is put through the following scenarios:

- Commanded to obey an order, such as to pick up a block, color in a circle, or other commands. Instant obedience is rewarded. She is then given a command that is impossible to obey (such as to climb a high wall beyond her ability), and with the infraction, is tortured, while the programmers tell her and the developing fetus, “disobedience brings pain, while obedience brings joy.”
- She is chained to a wall, and sleep deprived.
- She is brutally raped by people, by animals, by a false “jesus” as programming scripts for the fetus are played out.
- By the end of the sixth month, her toes, feet, fingers and hands will have been chopped off, as well as her nose, for “disobediences”. She is forced to eat food from a dog dish on the floor, and is treated terribly.
- By the end of the seventh month, she is almost unrecognizable as a human being, with > her hair having been pulled out, numerous skinnings, her teeth pulled out, numerous rapes, being sent to "hell" for "punishment" (to install this in the fetus), her nose and ears chopped off, and basically only the torso is left. At this point, the birth mother's mind will have also gone, and she will be in a nearly catatonic state from the despair and torture.

>
> At this point, the fetus's primary programmers will step in, talking to the fetus, telling it things like "I love you" "I can't wait for you to be born", and other scripts to encourage bonding to these trainers. The fetus is experiencing the terror of abandonment by the birth mother in the womb (due to her trauma response), has already experienced numerous rejection traumas (the birth mother being told that the fetus is responsible for her pain as she is tortured, and her then screaming "get it out", "I hate you" or even attempting to beat her womb); this primes the fetus to bond extremely heavily to the primary programmers in the womb to escape the despair of rejection and abandonment.

It may seem incredible that the birth mother does not abort the embryo/fetus with the enormous amount of trauma, but the programming facilities use state-of-the-art technology (at least 50-75 years more advanced than that publicly known), to carefully monitor the vital signs of both the mother and fetus; and to administer medications that prevent contractions and aborting of the fetus.

Fetal Response to Birth Mother Traumas (Love/Hate)

In the traumas described above, the fetus will feel a deep split in the core between love for the birth mother (on whose life the fetus depends, a God-given and natural response for the one who carries the baby), and growing rage and hate towards her due to the rejections. This will cause a primary split in the fetus between parts that love the birth mother ("good babies" labeled so by the programmers and the fetus itself) and those who hate her and want to destroy her ("bad babies" labeled so by the fetus's guilt at feeling this way).

This creates the primary split along which the white and black systems will be created. The fetus cannot deal with and reconcile the emotional overwhelm of its mother being traumatized, and basically programmed to hate the fetus over the course of the pregnancy. This maternal rejection then creates the base foundation for the fetus bonding to the programmers (in desperation to survive emotionally) and being controlled by them.

Internally, the fetus will have created representations of the birth mother. One is the "fantasy mother" that is loving and nurturing, and asks the fetus to forgive it for rejecting it (this is overlaid with VRs over the years) and represents a "good birth mother" to the fetus. The other is a punishing, vengeful, rejecting birth mother who wants to destroy the fetus. This creates the base for omega and other self-destruct programming, since it ties to the core and core splits as a primary trauma.

Finally, the birth mother will be internalized by the fetus (with demonic help) as a victim or torture and brutality, that needs to be "rescued" by the fetus (in a manner similar to setups in which the fetus is told that the birth mother will be "punished less" if the fetus will agree to take some of the pain; the fetus does, and is shocked or hurt, then praised for doing so. This is the base for epsilon, or pain-holding programming.

The template for every major program is installed in the womb in the developing fetus. Because the fetus has no contact with external reality other than the words the programmers use during scripts, there is little "reality check" to the programming sequences, and the fetus will hold the programming using the "magical thinking" that infants often use. There does not have to be any connection to reality in the programming installed prenatally, since there is no external reality to contradict it. This is the goal; to embed lies in the subconscious before the infant is ever born, and to construct a whole paradigm of belief regarding the world during this time.

Birth Trauma and Delusion

Once the infant is born, the birth mother is immediately killed. The infant is then told "you killed her." Because of the fetal rage at rejection by the birth mother, and the desire to destroy her (enhanced by demons the fetus accepts), the infant believes this lie; after all, part of the infant did want her to die.

The internal birth mother is kept intact, as a core controller. This is one of the first delusions: the belief that the birth mother never died, which resolves the subconscious pain and guilt and trauma related to the birth death. This delusion is kept intact using VRs of the birth mother (who was filmed throughout the pregnancy), who alternates being loving and nurturing; or accusing and angry. If the infant obeys the programmers, the birth mother is "happy" and is "not punished" inside; if the infant disobeys, she becomes angry and punishing internally.

When the survivor attempts to leave the cult group, and heal, the group will first attempt to trigger this programming with subliminals of an angry birth mother, or of a birth mother destroying her fetus (causing the internal birth mother to "turn" on the internal fetal parts and attempt to destroy them, in omega programming).

If this does not work, then the group will often find a "body double" of the birth mother, and use this individual to attempt to access the survivor. Due to the unhealed prenatal traumas, the survivor may be susceptible to this access until they have consciously resolved the internal emotional pain, guilt and rage, and the deep abandonment wounds caused by the rejection in the womb.

Birth mother programming is a core level program. While the birth mother internally is not the core, she will sit next to the core, "protecting" her from the realization that the real birth mother is dead (the core does not realize this, due to delusion and the demonic). To heal this level of trauma requires loving, prayerful support, and the chance for the survivor to process the painful emotions associated with the prenatal traumas.

Only the Christian (true) God can heal this level of trauma, which is why prayer, fasting (if there are no medical contraindications) and nurturing support are needed for healing. Fetal parts may come out literally thrashing in anger and pain about their traumas and rejection, and may need to know that they are loveable and loved. Fetuses often "hum" with rage or intense emotions internally, and may come out humming or making other preverbal noises. At first, they may not be able to communicate directly, but will need to communicate through a communicator part.

The internal birth mother will be extremely wounded, extremely demonized (as the fetal parts are, too), and will need love, support and prayer. Over time, as she comes to faith in the real Jesus, she can heal. She will need to process her own feelings of rage towards the programmers, towards God (who she was taught to blame, since He didn't stop the abuse), and the fetal parts inside (who hurt her in VRs designed to increase the system hostility and splits between the birth mother and the fetuses.

Love heals and these parts will need the modeling of what real love looks like, since they have never experienced it themselves. If they are to want to know the Christian God, they will need a safe person who can communicate what His love is like, not in words, but in actions. Gentle grounding, spending time talking and listening to the parts, and other demonstrations of love will mean much more than "Christian lectures" or a gospel presentation. These parts will be quick to embrace Christianity once they experience real Christian love; otherwise, they will stay hidden inside – and make the survivor vulnerable to access.

Core level work cannot be done without loving support. The survivor was hurt horrendously in the womb, and cannot simply fix "themselves" (how they wish they could!). This is a tough journey to help someone with, but is well worth it as the survivor and the core parts begin to "get it" and really heal.

Chapter 14: Working with the Core

Most people who enter therapy for ritual abuse and mind control are looking for relief from their pain: the emotional, physical and spiritual pain that has driven their life since before conscious memory. They may wonder why "it's taking so long" or why they often must battle to undo programming. Finally, near the end of the journey, it starts to all make sense, when they meet the core and the core system.

This is where the most deeply guarded secrets, beliefs and loves are kept. The survivor who "really wants to know" their entire life history, will find this area deeply guarded – because they wanted to hide from themselves this knowledge. For an occultic system, the deepest love (yes, love) and loyalty to Satan and his son (the "antichrist" but called "he who has come", "the light of the world" and other names by these groups) resides. The survivor will find at core level the conflicts that have driven the rest of the system, and impeded healing.

This realization can feel overwhelming, unless there is adequate support in place. To learn how truly dedicated one has been to evil, and the amount of rage and pain the survivor holds towards God and the universe is difficult, to put it mildly. On top of this is the guilt as the survivor not only hears about, but knows and recalls what she/he did to others in that state of pain, over the years as a cult member. The individual doing core work needs a supportive other, including God and prayerful friends, to help pull them through this part of the journey, because the emotions are deep.

Core Trauma and Bonding

The core is the primary controller for the other systems, even if the programming is "non-hierarchical" inside. This young (often aged two) part will run the show, but is kept very young and extremely bonded to Satan. This is accomplished through numerous setups, with a classic one (developed by Mengele) in which the birth mother and fetus are tortured together. The birth mother is told to "pray to God" for help and to make the torture stop. Both she and the fetus scream out to God together – and the pain is made worse.

This creates a tremendous amount of rage towards God in the fetus, who cannot understand why God seemingly did not answer this scream for help in the womb. In response, the fetus turns in anger away from God, and a demonic spirit (Satan or another spirit) enters into the heart of the fetus, promising to allow the fetus to grow big, powerful, and one day get revenge on God and mankind (who the core now hates because of the pain they have endured at the hands of human beings).

This, or a similar setup, is done in which the fetus chooses to turn away from the true God, and sets themselves up (with demonic "protection") as their own "rescuer" from the pain – and is the basis for all later programming to hate God and men (including themselves), which lies in the core system. All core programming in international occultic groups will cause the fetus to turn away from God, hate Him, and choose to rescue itself, with the help of the demonic. This opens the doorway for demonic bonding (the real goal of core trauma and programming) during which the demonic promises the core that it will "take away the pain" if allowed in. The fetus agrees, and dissociation, deception and delusion enter in, including false beliefs about God (the demonic portrays Him as hateful and uncaring), and about the self (the fetus believes that it can "rescue" others by taking their pain, or becoming powerful through allowing demons in). The fetus will be strongly bonded to the demonic, and in many groups, the core and core system surrounding it will only be allowed to interact with demons, and not with human beings.

When the infant is born, and the core (and its system) are out, actors dressed as "demons" and "spiritual beings" with crystal eyes in the masks (to prevent bonding with the human) feed, care for, rock and bond with these parts of the infant. They will sing songs, and tell the infant core that they love her/him. As the infant gets bigger, and develops spiritual abilities, the actors are no longer needed, since the demonic will take the bonding memories the infant has, and begin doing the bonding activities. The infant will actually be lifted up and rocked by the demonic, and the core will believe that Satan (or another spirit) is the only being that truly loves him/her – or has ever loved him/her. The core will have a deep hatred of all humans, which is reinforced with numerous setups.

Anti-Mortal Programming

The fetus in the womb will be told that they are an "immortal spirit" that has been "trapped" in a human, or mortal body, by a cruel God who wanted them to feel the "pain of mortality". The fetus in most groups will have been put through a "seal of mortality" programming session, in which the womb is injected with a drug that causes incredible fetal pain (searing throughout), and both the fetus and mother scream in pain, while the programmers tell the fetus that they are experiencing "the pain of the mortal seal" that "seals" them into a mortal body.

The fetus vows to never re-experience this terrible emotional and physical pain and terror. A demon offers to "take the pain away" and the fetus agrees – giving the pain "away" to the demon, and dissociating from the physical body.

Due to this and other experiences (pain and trauma to the physical body) the fetus and later infant core and systems come to absolutely hate and loathe their "mortal" (lower, descended) body, and will attempt to dissociate. This creates a barrier between the core and lower systems, which the core views as "mortal" and requiring "ascension."

Because the core is programmed to stay inside (unless called out by "Satan") and to never interact with humans, there is very little real world experience to degrade the programming and beliefs of the core. Instead, the core is counseled by demons, and will often live inside within an internal Garden of Eden or similar structure, completely insulated from daily life, which the other parts live.

Yet the core will be quite aware if parts attempt to break their programming (which is viewed as unacceptable "descending") and will immediately call upon system controllers to punish parts attempting to heal.

Hatred of Mortals Programming

In most organized groups, the core will be programmed, along with the core system, to hate all mankind (hate all "mortals"). Satan (or a similar spirit) will pet her, woo her and tell her that she and he will live when all others are gone, soothing the core's terrible fear of abandonment. It is not unusual for the core to have a deep friendship with the demonic, which comes nightly to visit, provides counsel, and promises to "love her always". The core stays young (around age two or so) to please Satan, who has told her that he will not love her any more if she grows older.

The core will have absolutely no memory of the terrible abuse that this spirit exacts from other ("lower") systems, or will not care if she hears, since in her reality, it is "me and Satan" and the rest of the world does not matter.

The core will be programmed to absolutely hate mortal men, with setups in which during prenatal development, "mortals" come and torture her and the birth mother, laughing and raping, etc. As an infant, when the core is out, setups are done in which "mortals" give the infant bottles that cause searing pain and nausea; burn the infant, rape her, torture her, skin her, and tell her "this is what mortals like to do." They will pretend to attempt to "eat" the infant alive, causing great terror, until she is "rescued" by Satan in the setup.

After dozens of experiences like this, the infant core will scream if a human comes near, and calm down only when Satan comes and comforts him or her.

When a survivor is healing, and begins doing core work, it can help to realize that the supporters the survivor is working with may be the first human beings that he or she has ever interacted with (other than during a brief traumatic setup) in her life. The amount of fear and terror that may come forward can be intense; the core may have never seen human eyes looking at her kindly, and must work through this initial terror.

The core will be reluctant to come out, and with good reason. All of her interactions with human beings prior to this point have been intensely traumatic, and she must have time to "test the waters" and ensure that the outside support is safe. She is also deeply bonded to Satan, and will have intense grief and self-hatred at the thought of losing this love object if the survivor continues to heal. The anger and grief will often fuel internal self-punishment to prevent healing, until the core is able to receive enough information from the real world to choose to give up Satan and to allow others to care for her.

Core Controllers and Guardians

Around the core will be splits that are equally bonded to the demonic and with equal hatred of humans (or "mortals"). It is common for several initial splits to occur: the 4 princes of hell and the 7 generals of hell; along with 24 "elders". These surround the internal "Satan" who sits on a "throne" (note: this is also represented in other systems beneath the core system), and these represent core guardians/protectors. Their job is to ensure that the core and the internal Satan (punishing aspect) never fail; while the core bonds to Theo (the loving, "caring" aspect of Satan).

These parts inside have demonic attachments, and constantly perform sacrifices, offer hymns of praise, and stand guard to protect the core from outside influences; they also have sex with outside demons and the core to reinforce programming. The demonic sexual activity and rituals "recharges" the internal programs, and occurs daily.

As the survivor gets in touch with the memories, and the life history (which involves breaking agreements by the core to never share information with other systems and parts; and the parts and systems breaking those same agreements to never hear information from the core and the core system, including repentance from the rites, rituals, covenants, vows to demons and to trainers to never remember these things), emotions will start coming up. The survivor will have already dealt with a significant amount of anger, pain, guilt and terror over the years while doing healing work; but the core layer of these feelings can seem particularly intense due to the fact that the emotions are held by fetal parts attached to the core controllers and parts, and the core.

The deepest layers of rage (including feeling homicidal), despair (and feeling suicidal) and guilt (feeling completely cut off from any hope of God's forgiveness) as well as the feelings of rage against God will come up. Because this conflicts with the survivor's Christianity, these feelings can cause deep discomfort as they come forward; but they must be dealt with, since they have fueled the survivor's base programming their entire life. They are simply out in the open now, and do not surprise God (although their depth and intensity may surprise both the survivor and their supporter(s)).

Core despair can be difficult, and trigger extreme depression and suicidality. The despair of realizing that the core was "tricked' by Satan and the other demons, and that the whole life was built upon lies, can be devastating. This is not something that the person can work out with logic (i.e. "I shouldn't feel this way, because…" or "of course Satan tricks people, he's a liar").

While these things are true, the core and these parts need comfort, and healing attachments to overcome the betrayals and lies of a lifetime.

The core will also battle some extreme delusions as well that will impede healing until resolved. Even though the birth mother is usually killed at birth, the core will not realize or believe this, because there is an internal representation of the birth mother. This is very difficult for the core and the prime splits to deal with, and can cause tremendous pain and grieving. The fetal parts will want to deny that she is dead, and it takes time for these parts to realize the truth.

The primary core terror is abandonment. This is triggered in the fetus by the birth mother losing her mind due to the months of torture she underwent; when her mind goes and withdraws from the fetus, the fetus feels incredible terror. To deal with the terror, the fetus agrees to accept a demon that represents the birth mother; this is a prime dissociation that keeps the whole dissociative reality going inside (see the chapter on the "birth mother" for more information).

Working with the core requires helping the survivor work through this terror of being all alone in the world. This can be accomplished by:

- Praying with (and for) the survivor and helping the core and core splits realize how much the Christian (true) God loves them. This is the primary source of healing, since the original wound was turning away in rage and pain from God and His love. Once the core becomes a Christian, the system can began making better choices. But realize that the core will need discipleship: like any abused child, the core will not at first understand how Christians act, or why talking with demons is unsafe. Patience and role modeling love can help tremendously.

- Loving the survivor, with nurturing, sitting quietly with them in their grief; letting them vent their pain and rage, and not judging them for the process or feelings they are having. Synchronizing with another's pain, especially at this level, can be difficult, and supporters and the survivor will need to build in breaks and joy building to help offset the tremendously draining emotional work required

- Working on building real life, good experiences for the core and the core system, especially with human beings. Whether having a good cup of coffee with core controllers and enjoying a beautiful morning; or holding the hand of a young part that has only experienced torture from humans and showing them that not all humans hurt, this kind of new information will help the whole system heal.

Chapter 15: Building Joy

In order to heal, the survivor cannot simply do trauma work and not have times of experiencing refreshment or joy. Attempting to do a lot of inside work without breaks and joy building will cause burnout, because the survivor will simply not have any "good life" to heal towards. They will become good at "healing" but not at relating to others, or self nurture, and so will bring emotionally unhealed parts together – and continue to distance from caring support. They will also be unable to nurture others in their healing journey, if they have not themselves received safe support and seen caring modeled for them.

So, how does a person working on intense emotions and dealing with terrible trauma build joy, when simply getting out of bed in the morning may seem like a major achievement? Or when depression that feels completely overwhelming hits? This is when the person may need to pace the joy building, and use whatever tools work for them in that moment.

Receiving a hug can build joy on the hardest days. Sharing a prayer request, and seeing the caring in another's eyes can build joy.

Soaking in prayer, and spending time in worship (which is a true "sacrifice of praise" on the hardest days) can build joy and hope. God's love never fails, and He can provide the hope that keeps the individual going on the worst days, when the demonic tries to whisper "you'll never heal, you'll always feel this way." This is a lie, and the victory comes not just from commanding the demonic to leave, but then experiencing the love of God, His comfort, and His reassurances that healing is possible –and is happening. The survivor may need to hear these truths frequently from supporters as well, even daily. The worship time can include listening to uplifting music, and even dance. One of the most meaningful moments in my healing journey came during a time when I was mourning the loss of my husband and adult children, due to my choice to stop all contact since they were all still cult active. As I lay on my bed crying, I put on a worship CD, and began through my tears to worship the LORD, who I knew does love me. I stood to dance. At that moment, I felt the true Jesus at my side, asking "May I have this dance?" He held me in His arms, and we danced together, and I experienced His wonderful love. I have never forgotten this experience and the hope and encouragement it brought me.

Music is especially healing because it ministers to the right brain, where feelings are stored. It can enter in, and bring truth into the emotional parts of the brain, which is why it is important to carefully guard the type of music (or any entertainment) listened to.

Fun activities, such as going to a park, walking on a beach, gardening, flying a kite, playing with a pet, or telling silly jokes are also joy building. Some people enjoy painting and writing, but this should be balanced with "together time" with other people, since having fun is even more so with a friend. Hiking is good for both the body and emotions, as are boating, swimming and other physical activities. One fun activity is rolling down a hill of grass (check for rocks, sticks or doggie deposits first!), or rolling on the floor and humming (an exercise used for brain healing) which usually causes lots of giggling in those who do it. Make a list of the things you really enjoy doing, both quiet and active, and have it available to consider on days when you need to build joy and take a break.

About TV

It can be easy to simply want to vegetate in front of the TV on emotionally tough days, but this should not be your primary relaxation for several reasons. Vegetating is not physically healthy, and being sedentary can increase depression. In addition, TV feeds subliminals constantly, reinforcing programming to welcome Alexis (the calm voice that will help with crowd control) and the New World Order (in fact, the subliminals are part of Project Alexis, or the mind control techniques being used to prepare the general population for the advent of their occultic ruler). All videos, CDs, computer games and other digital media now have subliminals embedded, that are fed at 0.03 microseconds. They are undetectable with ordinary equipment (you can't "stop the video and see the subliminal, because the images will be blurred and fade into the background, and are only visible when the media is moving). The equipment required to view these subliminals costs hundreds of thousands of dollars, which most people do not own.

Pray about your TV viewing, and about how much is appropriate. It can make a real difference in how you feel, whether you are a survivor or not. It is amazing how desensitized our population has become to sex, violence and the occult due to this mind control technology that sits in everyone's living room.

Spending time being nurtured, and nurturing others is joy building. Letting a friend give you a hug, getting a foot rub, or other physical touch (that is nonsexual, with a safe person) is very healing. If you know a Christian massage therapist and can afford it, this is a good way to have safe touch, which is healing. Be aware that any physical contact, no matter how safe, can bring up powerful emotions due to the abuse; this is a chance to work on these issues and feelings.

Taking care of a pet, or helping care for a friend's child, or other ways of giving can also be joy building. Pets love unconditionally, and do require love, attention and care. Be prayerful, and be in a place financially and emotionally to take on this care before getting one.

Praying for others can be joy building. As you minister to others, and intercede, you also experience healing.

Volunteering (at a safe place) is joy building and can help build your personal gifts in a new setting. While your life may have revolved around "doing" for the cult, with talents and skills hijacked by the demonic, this is now a chance to use your abilities, surrendered to God, to help others. Most people who have survived programming by an organized group will have wonderful talents, but may feel ashamed of them. They may wonder, "What kind of life can an ex-assassin have?" or "How can a former cult programmer have a good life in the day-to-day world?" or "What does a former cult geneticist do?" These are understandable questions, but each person will have abilities and talents used in doing those jobs, that can be used to help others once the memories and traumas are worked through. A person may be physically strong who had lots of military training, and so can help cut trees and grass, shovel snow and do repairs for an elderly person.

A person who is highly organized can use this skill to help in a ministry office, or help clean houses for others. A person who enjoys plants can grow a garden, and share the produce with others in need. A person with a background in behavioral sciences can use the skills of being a good listener to help others. This is why it is important to pray, and ask God to show you what your true talents and gifts are, and how to start using them when the time is right.

Giving to others is one of the most joy-building activities possible. It helps to bring meaning to the person coming out of a life of pain, and helps the individual to see that they have real value outside of the group. One caution: it is important to not get into a "works" mentality, which is common when first leaving a group that literally works its members to exhaustion. It is okay to allow yourself a season of rest as you heal, and then to very gradually begin giving. At first, giving may simply be tithing to your church, until there is enough healing to give in other, nonfinancial ways.

Being with Others

It is difficult to heal alone. I have known survivors who attempted to do most of the healing journey "solo" and in most cases, they were either accessed (because the loneliness pulled cult loyal parts back), or they integrated, but never healed relationally. They accomplished the goal of staying away from the cult, but were walking wounded since they never received the nurture and support needed for full emotional health after doing the internal work.

Some survivors may have no other choice, since there is simply no safe support where they live, and they are unable to leave due to finances. There is also a severe shortage of safe houses (the only one I was in was the house of a friend from church, who was the only non-cult friend I had; she kindly allowed me to stay with her during part of my healing journey). I personally do not know of any "safe houses" that are publicly known, and neither do most of the churches and ministries I have contacted over the years.

This is why building safe support is a prayerful journey. Who do your parts tell you is safe? They will know who is unsafe, and you should listen to them. If you feel uneasy around someone, ask inside why. If you feel deep rage towards someone, and have no conscious idea of why, ask inside parts.

Building support might involve asking yourself about Bible Study or church members, who to approach, and how, and how much to share. You should be very cautious if you feel an "instant connection" with someone, since this is often programmed in; you will likely feel most comfortable with people from a similar background as yours, so it is important to check inside regarding what types of interactions you are having, and whether there are any "red flags" that parts see.

In general, you should be the one to approach people for support, and not the other way around. In my personal healing journey, every time someone approached me offering to "help" it was a setup. The safe people I found were because I developed friendships slowly, over time (as in several years), parts watched and evaluated the interactions I had, and decided that they were probably okay.

There are numerous people programmed to be therapists and to offer support to survivors, who are actually mind controlled and unaware. This is why the survivor needs to be cautious when approaching others for support. I have personally seen or lived the following situations:

- A caring survivor who offered to be friends and support (they were cult active)
- A husband who drove me to therapy, was very supportive of healing, and wanted to do "everything possible to help her heal" (he was my handler)
- Ministries that supposedly help survivors that were actually sexually abusing people and verbally berating them
- The offer to stay in a house from a survivor, recommended to me by a large church, who ended up accessing me
- Four therapists who were survivors of mind control (including two who disclosed their own memories of severe abuse and losing time to me, and said "This is normal, don't worry if it happens," and another who kept saying "I feel like I'm going down a rabbit hole" when I shared memories with her. I stopped seeing them).

There are also safe people and ministries out there, and it is important to carefully pray, ask God for wisdom and discernment, before you approach them for support.

Most large churches are infiltrated – but this does not negate the good, sincere, non-cult members of the church who can be good support. Many small churches are also infiltrated as well, so it takes prayer and discernment to know who to reach out to. Prayer ministry at a church can be wonderful, but again, be careful who you allow to "lay hands" on you. I have a somewhat humorous (now) story regarding this. I went for several months to stay in an area where a large mega-church ministry is located, with lots of revival. I wanted healing, and a closer walk with God.

I went with a safe support person to look for housing. The house I had originally arranged to live in did not work out, so my supporter and I prayed for a roommate. Suddenly, a woman sitting next to us said, “Oh, do you need a place to live? I am looking for a roommate”. It seemed like a “miracle”, an answer to prayer. My supporter and I had dinner with her, I felt oh, so comfortable with the woman right away. She was a minister’s wife (he had passed away) and she was in fulltime ministry. But I also started to feel extremely uneasy, especially as her story unfolded; her father had committed suicide, and she herself had some unusual emotional issues. I told my supporter that I believed this woman was unsafe, especially when I learned that she and the other woman who would be living there called another woman who was to room with them, telling her that she couldn’t. In other words, the “we need a roommate” was a manufactured story! My supporter did not believe me and left town. The minute she left, the roommates began accessing and threatening me.

I fled the house and went into a women’s shelter for safety. The next weekend, I saw my former “roommate” in a prayer walk; she immediately came walking towards me, saying, “I want to lay hands on you and impart the Spirit to you!” I began walking away, faster and faster, until she was almost literally running after me. I left the room, and sat next to two people I knew, saying, “I don’t want her to come near me.”

This is an example of situations that can occur, when those in “ministry” are still unhealed and unaware. I did disclose to church leadership about the situation (which is biblical), and chose to leave that area of the country. I did later find true safe support in another state.

Chapter 16: Relating to Support People

For many survivors, it is difficult to build supportive relationships, and relate to people outside of the cult group they were born into. This is true for various reasons. For instance, most survivors of modern mind control by international groups were born into facilities, heavily programmed in the womb and throughout childhood, lived in a barracks-type setting with their age mates (whom they consider brothers and sisters), and bonded to trainers as their primary parental figures. They were allowed to live in families in various nations for only a few weeks a year (and in the past ten years, according to some survivor reports, in some facilities, there is NO presentation programming at all; the presentation itself is completely loyal to the New World Order and their Leader).

Imagine someone raised like this leaving a group, and attempting to live in a “normal” family setting. Instead of going on missions (to assassinate someone), or working in a programming facility or genetics lab, or overseeing the human trafficking trade in a third world nation, which has been 90 percent of their reality prior to leaving the group, the survivor is now asked to go to Bible Studies, smile and “act Christian” in a world that has almost no comprehension of what they have been through (and often makes evident they have no desire to learn about).

It is difficult, to say the least. The skills needed to run missions or labs are very different from those needed to make – and keep – long-lasting, supportive friendships. Issues come up, and the survivor must attempt to learn to live in a society that is as unfamiliar to them as possible. The survivor will be used to eating in group settings or military camps; with others who make coarse jokes and survive the harsh reality with dark humor and bitter cynicism.

While many survivors can be “charming” while on missions, deep down they are not really “warm and fuzzy” people that churches and supporters naturally are drawn to. They are tough, even bitter realists, and are clearly aware of the evil side of humanity. Yet, they are also deeply loyal to and loving of those few individuals they come to trust.

Common Issues with Support Relationships

Many times, those who support survivors of mind control will have problems understanding the survivor, since the world they were raised in is literally so different than normal society. The support person will want to understand, but the relatively insulated world of most support people will not have prepared them adequately for confronting the reality of the evil and brutality that most individuals coming out of mind controlled groups have survived.

It is very common for supporters to wonder why it is “taking so long” for the survivor to heal, and many have very unrealistic expectations of healing. Healing from a lifetime of sophisticated mind control will usually take years (as in five, six, seven or more) to heal; if the survivor is accessed, then the time required for healing increases.

There are no "quick fixes" for survivor issues; but many ministries and supporters want to "hurry along" the process before the survivor is ready. This does survivors a disservice; and those who choose to minister to survivors should be prepared to count the cost, and to be there for the "long haul". It is extremely damaging to abandon survivors in the midst of their healing; this is literally their "worst fear" realized. If you become unable to continue providing support, you should have backup people in place, who can step in and offer the help needed in a crisis.

Survivors will often sabotage their support relationships (see chapter on "Working With Cult Loyal Parts" for more information). They may become hostile, angry and forget to thank you for helping them break free of the cult during the time they are in intense pain and their systems are punishing the crud out of them for trying to leave. The survivor may become extremely irritable, will argue with you, or do everything possible to test the relationship, because they have never been allowed to be honest with someone before in their life and not be abused.

These behaviors are actually a sign that the survivor is beginning to trust the supporter, and the cult loyal and hostile parts are coming out, and "checking things out." But many supporters do not recognize this fact, or are emotionally immature themselves, and may respond back with anger, belittling or abandonment. They may attempt to "preach at" the survivor, instead of loving them. The supporter may ask emotionally devastating questions such as "Where is your faith? Why aren't you healing yet?" when the survivor is trying their best to heal as quickly as possible.

There may be a push for a mass deliverance and "quick integration" in someone who is still early in their healing journey. This will backfire, since the survivor deep down will know that they have not resolved their issues with God, man, or themselves yet, and may feel despair at their inability to "perform" in a Christian manner.

No one pressures the survivor to heal more than the survivor themselves. They need support, not criticism or misunderstanding in the process of healing.

Preventing Support Burnout

Support burnout is an issue for those who help survivors of ritual abuse and mind control. Support means walking with people who are deeply traumatized; operate at a very young level of maturity initially, and who require nurturing and understanding. They also need strong accountability until their systems are inaccessible. These needs can cause burnout in supporters, who may resent the time and effort that helping a survivor requires.

The ideal is for the survivor to have a safe support team that can take turns helping the survivor, which includes a therapist skilled in working with mind control and abuse issues. In reality, this ideal does not exist. The survivor will have to work hard at developing multiple areas of support, to prevent burning out the people who are helping them in their journey.

Avoiding the "Scary" Label

Many churches are frightened about helping survivors of ritual abuse or mind control. The media has done a pretty thorough job of portraying mind control survivors as borderline sociopaths; killers; or crazy people seeking attention, none of which are true. Movies depict the demonic as scary and powerful, with graphic scenes of attacks on "Christians" which have nothing to do with our real authority in Christ. I have literally had Satan appear in the room, and he had to leave quietly with a simple command in Jesus's name; he has no authority at all when a believer stops giving it to him (out of fear or ignorance).

The survivor needs to learn how and when to disclose to their church about their background. In some cases, the right answer may be "never" since many churches are completely untaught regarding how to help survivors. In most cases, the best choice is "slowly". I have seen survivors walk into churches and at the first service they have visited, gone forward to the prayer team and pastors (who are strangers) and announce they are survivors of ritual abuse. In most cases, this does not allow the chance to develop relationship, and instead, the survivor gets labeled negatively from the start.

This can be a form of self sabotage. It is much better to get to know the church and members, participate in Bible studies, and over time slowly share small portions of your background, such as sexual abuse. See how folks react to that. Over time, as they get to know you as a real person, who is willing to pray for them and give back, they may be more able to hear more about your past. In most churches, you the survivor will be the first teacher they have regarding ritual abuse and mind control, and it can be positive if you take time to develop relationships with those you teach.

Those who support survivors will often deal with cult threats, either directly (phone calls, etc.) or indirectly (warfare, messages relayed by the survivor). In most cases, these threats are not acted upon, for a reason: churches and supporters with a strong faith in God will have significant protection. I have heard from numerous cult members who shared that they were unable to kill someone, or fulfill a mission to sabotage a ministry, due to the strong angelic protection that blocked them.

When threats come, give them to God, who can handle it. He is bigger and more powerful than the demonic; and His protection will raise a mighty testimony that can have a "ripple effect" in the spiritual world and impact many for Christ. Satan can threaten all he wants to, but in the end, God wins, every time.

Getting Support for the Supporters

Supporters need support themselves, someone safe they can vent to, ask questions, and help them realize they are not alone in what they are doing. At the very least, every supporter should have a strong church covering, for the spiritual protection this provides, and prayer support for their ministry to survivors. When the going gets tough, the tough ask for prayer support, which can literally "turn the tide" during intense spiritual warfare. Anyone supporting survivors should have their pastor and prayer teams on speed dial on their phones.

Supporters also need spiritually mature mentors they can talk to and get advice about the ups and downs of their ministering to a wounded individual. A mature therapist, prayer team leader, or spiritual parent would be good individuals for this, especially if they also have experience in providing support to traumatized people. Getting a cup of coffee with a mentor, and simply being heard and supported, can go a long way towards preventing burnout. It is never a good idea to try and support survivors of ritual abuse and mind control "solo": at best, the individual burns out, and at worst, may get pulled down or incapacitated spiritually and emotionally. Work with others, and under spiritual authority and accountability; this is a biblical model that is safest.

Another problem with working solo is that the amount of emotional enmeshment that can occur will set the supporter up for sexual seduction. This is more common than most people realize, and can be very damaging for both the supporter and survivor. I have known of marriages broken up and ministries damaged for this very reason.

Chapter 17: Why People Don't Heal

Many, if not all, survivors want to heal. They enter into therapy, begin the hard work, pray, spend their money on therapy and books, journal, join online support groups and "do all the right things." Yet, the survivors struggle. Healing doesn't happen as quickly as they had hoped. Healing is a lot harder than they thought it would be. And some choose to walk away from healing, or stay caught in a perpetual cycle of pain without full healing or integration.

Why is this? Is it lack of desire, or faith, on the part of the survivor? In most cases, no. Then why is it that some people appear not to heal, or to heal very slowly?

There can be many reasons for this apparent lack of progress. In this chapter, I will address some of the major ones, but this is not meant to be comprehensive.

Fear is the number one reason that healing can take so long. This includes the lifelong fear of healing installed with numerous painful setups, in which catastrophic consequences occur if the survivor attempts to break their own programming. This fear can be for the survivor's safety, but most often is for the continued safety of loved ones.

Every survivor of a group that employs modern mind control techniques will have been programmed to protect their closest loves ones, or double binds. Even if they are willing to die to get free, they may not be able to watch those they love die in the process. And these groups will ruthlessly exploit this fear, causing the survivor to attempt to be a "messiah" and "rescue" loved ones by returning to the group, or committing suicide.

Access is the number one cause of a system shutdown, or failure of parts to talk to the survivor who is trying to leave a cult group. As mentioned in the first chapter, this access can include physical access, subliminals, phone texts or messages, videos online, or spiritual access. All it takes is a video (sent by smartphone) of a loved one begging the survivor to save them, or of a torture session with the loved one, for the parts that were formerly working hard in therapy and journaling to stop trying to heal.

Parts may be programmed to believe that they can "never heal" and it is useless to even attempt to do so, in vicious programming loops meant to discourage the survivor. Healing does take time, since the survivor will have numerous parts and years of constant torture, abuse and programming to heal from, with the messages and beliefs embedded in various systems. Working through all the layers and levels can be tiring, and some individuals choose not to pay this price.

A huge cause of failure to heal is the lack of safety and safe support for the survivor. This is the greatest lack of all, since without safety, the survivor will continue to be accessed, reprogrammed and will be unable to dismantle their own programming. If there was more safe, knowledgeable support available for survivors, more survivors would heal. But because most churches lack the knowledge base or willingness to walk with survivors, and offer the emotional support required, many times survivors choose not to take the huge risks associated with healing (the risk of physical torture, or the death of loved ones) in return for weak or nonexistent safety or support.

This is the greatest need for survivors, and the one that is most often unmet. I have prayed for numerous survivors, who have asked me, "Do you know of any safe housing I can go to?" (I do not), or who have asked, "Where do I find safety?" This is a heartbreaking question, and the only response I can give is "Ask God for a miracle; to raise up safety for you where you are, to help you find a safe place to stay." It truly is a miracle when a non-dissociative, non-programmed individual chooses to help survivors. I have known a few in my own life and journey, and they are precious, wonderful and strong people indeed. Not everyone is willing to offer the emotional support, deal with the warfare and provide the prayers that survivors require. But each one that I have known was tremendously blessed by God for what they did.

Some survivors fail to heal because they have a weak walk with God. They may never have had discipleship or support from Christians who can show them the love of God. Their systems may be heavily programmed to reject God, or to embrace a false form of Christianity. I personally believe that only the true God of Christianity can heal a survivor who has lived a lifetime of Occultic abuse and mind control programming. Only He can provide the support, caring and unending love needed, and the forgiveness for what can seem to be an overwhelming amount of evil deeds committed.

I personally believe that we are very close to the "end times" of Revelations, and that the Occultic messiah (or antichrist) is alive. We live in times of great darkness, but also of great revival and breakthroughs. The church is being called to bring revival to the world, and in the process, to help the prisoners break their chains. Satan's army is already in place, awaiting the orders to march. Is the church prepared to help those members of that army that want to break free? The need is much greater than the resources, and this should become a prayer point for every church: to help those fleeing the kingdom of darkness, and its terrible oppression know the love of God and the breakthroughs that Jesus, the true Messiah, can bring.

I have called my ministry Mizpah, or the point of breakthrough and a strong tower for the LORD, for a reason: I want to see churches become part of the breakthrough. Satan is not as powerful as he would like mankind to believe, and I believe the LORD is calling Christians to war. Warfare is not "optional" in these days; to do nothing in these times is to agree with the enemy's agenda.

If you are called to help survivors, pray and get training to do so. If you are not, pray for them and their supporters. Pray that God’s will is done on earth, as it is in heaven, and that He will raise up a mighty testimony to His goodness in the lives of the survivors you support or pray for. Heaven is watching, and waiting, to see what the church’s response to this need is. My prayer is that you will respond, and become part of what is one of the most wonderful ministries possible: sharing the love of God with wounded souls who have never known what real Christianity looks like. May God bless you for reading this book, and caring for those wounded by Satan’s worst blows; and for being part of the healing and restoration process.

Svali Speaks Again

Healing from ritual abuse and mind control

Infant Programming

Tags: healing (3), Mengele, mind control (3), programming (3), ritual abuse (3), SRA (2)

Infant Programming

Mengele's Research

Josef Mengele is considered "the father of modern programming" due to the information and methods that he developed during his infamous end-point experiments on infants, young children and adults inside the Nazi death camps.

Before Mengele, most serious programming was begun at the age of 18 months to two years old, since behaviorists believed that the infant brain was too immature to hold programming or make use of it before that age. Mengele proved with his well-kept records based upon unutterably cruel research done on infants that the most effective programming was done in infancy and in the womb; that infant programming automatically enters into the subconscious and deeper brain, and that the most effective time to create personality splits is during the first six weeks of life. He also proved that infants can see, understand and respond to programming cues and images at this time in life, and can be taught to organize the splits based upon these cues.

An infant can much more easily internalize an external object than an older child, since the infant is basically a "tabula rasa" (the normal early infant state), and the brain is at its peak ability to absorb and process information during the first days of life.

The information that Mengele obtained was combined with data from other behaviorists, including attachment theory, to create programming that is considered "unbreakable." After the second world war, Mengele was often flown to Europe to program infants. He left his personal stamp on many infants and young children programmed by during this time. He was also hired out at times (for an exorbitant fee) to other organizations, but his primary post-war work was continuing his research and programming international occultic agents from infancy.

Mengele ran an infamous (within the occultic world) research center ("the institute") where he employed the top trainers within the 12 societies, who continued his research under his (brutal) supervision on end point trauma (trauma that takes the subject to physical or psychological death) and other traumas, and the effect on the human psyche. The volumes and volumes of carefully documented research data are still held within occultic training libraries, and have been replicated and shared throughout the world. The research that he began is still ongoing, as the search for better, “unbreakable” methods of programming continues. One of the largest research centers for experimental programming is on the West Coast of the United States; the large research facility is underground, and is combined with sophisticated milab (military laboratory) research.

1. Infant Programming

When an infant is born within an international occultic group, it has already undergone significant programming within the womb. Immediately after conception and implantation of the genetically altered embryo (more on genetic research will be discussed later), the oracles place their hands on the womb of the expectant mother, to determine whether or not the embryo should be allowed to live. If yes, the embryo is dedicated to a demonic entity, and continues to grow.

By four months of gestation, early brain waves (delta waves) begin to appear in the fetal brain, and with it, some degree of consciousness. At this time, a primary trauma will often be intentionally engineered, to create the first split. Often, the mother and fetus will be injected in utero with an agent that causes extreme pain, but does not cause labor. The fetus experiences extreme terror, excruciating pain, and will hear the mother screaming “Get it out!” regarding the fetus that appears to be causing her the intense pain in her womb.

This is a primary rejection trauma, and the pain and rejection combined will cause a core personality split. This split is in a deep delta (unconscious) brain state, and the programming begins in earnest immediately afterwards. Headphones are placed on the womb, and for hours, the young fetal splits are exposed to recordings regarding their identity, their wants, their beliefs, and their role in the new world order. This programming occurs during the 16th week of gestation onwards, and the information in the recordings is recorded at the deepest unconscious levels before the infant is ever born.

Secondary, tertiary and other traumas will also occur within the womb, with spiritual ceremonies that dedicate these intra-utero splits to different demonic entities. Before the infant draws his or her first breath, they will have the foundational core splits, their beliefs and identities firmly in place.

These traumas can include the use of electromagnetic waves to cause extreme pain in the fetus; fetal surgery; breaking the arm of the fetus; electroshock, flatlining the mother (to punish the fetus, who is blamed for the mother’s “death” and resultant spiritual pain/anxiety) and other traumas. The mother is carefully monitored with medical intervention to prevent abortion or premature labor, which is the body’s natural response to these types of traumas.

The demonic is used to keep the splits separate, since in nature, the splits would try to rejoin automatically. The demonic creates a deep feeling of terror and re-experiencing of the primary traumas should the prenatal psyche attempt to join together.

Birth Trauma

Upon birth, an infant that is to be used by the group undergoes a very specific trauma. As soon as the infant is born, a group member takes the infant and begins to smother it to death. The infant is asked spiritually, “Do you want to live?” Behind the Father is satan, and the infant is aware within their spirit that if they answer, “Yes” that satan will enter them. This being is hideous and terrifying, and it takes a very strong will to live to respond affirmatively. If the infant responds “No” they are smothered to death. If yes, they are allowed to breathe, and with their first cries in the physical world, satan attaches to the core.

Nannies

When infants are very young, there are caretakers that perform physical care for the infant. These “nannies” or surrogate mothers take care of several infants at a time. While caretaking, they give bottles, rock the infant, and sing songs to them. These songs always contain programming embedded within them; they are songs about various spiritual (demonic) entities and praise to them, or of the joy of the coming order, or other messages. The goal is for the infant to associate caretaking and the relief of physical distress or abandoment feelings with love and loyalty to the order and the beings described. This is a terrible manipulation of an infant’s need to attach to a caregiver, since these early songs are also embedded within the subconscious of the infant.

Helping the survivor

Because the prenatal and birth traumas are so emotionally and spiritually devastating, they will often only come up fairly late in therapy if ever, after the survivor has received help for other later splits. These primary traumas cause intense feelings of grief, rejection and despair, and are often the prime traumas underlying suicide programming. The demonic terror that causes fear of coming together may affect all parts of the systems, causing a prime fear of remembering or coming together for all parts, at an unconscious level.

It takes an experienced prayer minister to help an individual through these types of trauma. The survivor will be understanding that their entire life, even in the womb, was planned and programmed out, and feel intense anger at the betrayal and manipulation it involves. They may direct this anger at God, wondering where He was when this happened; and they may wonder if any part of them was ever not “owned” by the group.

This is where scriptures regarding God’s love for individuals both before and during their creation in the womb can help; as well as praying and asking the Lord to show the survivor what He thought of them at conception. This is needed truth, to counteract a lifetime of being told and believing lies such as that the survivor was always the “Order’s”, since they will have no memories before the prime traumas.

Because the programming and messages are implanted at such a very deep, unconscious level, it can also help to use a digital recorder, and record very specific scriptures and truths to counteract the lies (i.e. “reprogramming” with truth). It may take a significant amount of time to bring truth to these core beliefs, and is one reason that controllers at higher levels in the system may seem so “resistant” to truth: they may have buried at the unconscious, fetal level, prime traumas and programming that counteract other truths brought in.

Some helpful scriptures can include:

Ps.139:13: "For you created my inmost being; you knit me together in my mother's womb."

This verse directly counteracts the lie that the cult "owned" the person from the beginning, and shows who truly gave them life and their individual characteristics, in spite of prenatal programming.

Psalm 51:6. "Yet you desired faithfulness even in the womb; you taught me wisdom in that secret place."

How does the Lord teach wisdom in the womb? Only He truly knows the answer. But He does minister even to the fetus in the womb, as is made clear in this verse. The programming messages are NOT the only things the fetus was aware of before birth.

Isaiah 44:2. "This is what the Lord says— he who made you, who formed you in the womb, and who will help you:Do not be afraid, Jacob, my servant, Jeshurun, whom I have chosen."

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

UHF F/O
BELIEVE

I COULD TELL YOU BUT THEN YOU WOULD HAVE TO BE DESTROYED BY ME

EMBLEMS FROM THE PENTAGON'S BLACK WORLD

TREVOR PAGLEN

"A glimpse of the Pentagon's dark world through a revealing lens – patches – the kind worn on military uniforms."
—William Broad, The New York Times

Praise for Trevor Paglen and I COULD TELL YOU …

“A fascinating set of shoulder patches designed for the Pentagon’s Black Ops programs.”

—Stephen Colbert, The Colbert Report

“A glimpse of [the Pentagon’s] dark world through a revealing lens—patches—the kind worn on military uniforms … The book offers not only clues into the nature of the secret programs, but also a glimpse of zealous male bonding among the presumed elite of the military-industrial complex. The patches often feel like fraternity pranks gone ballistic.”

—William Broad, The New York Times

“A fresh approach to secret government. It shows that these secret programs have their own culture, vocabulary and even sense of humor.”

—Steven Aftergood, The Federation of American Scientists

“Gives readers a peek into the shadows … Department of Defense spokesman Bob Mehal told Newsweek that it ‘would not be prudent to comment on what patches did or did not represent classified units.’ That’s OK. Some mysteries are more fun when they stay unsolved.”

—Karen Pinchin, Newsweek

“An impressive collection.”

—Justin Rood, ABC News

“An art book that presents peculiar shoulder patches created for the weird and top secret programs funded by the Pentagon’s black budget … an achievement.”

—Timothy Buckwalter, San Francisco Chronicle

“I was fascinated… [Paglen] has assembled about 40 colorful patch insignia from secret, military ‘black’ programs that are hardly ever discussed in public. He has plenty of regalia from the real denizens of Area 51.”

—Alex Beam, The Boston Globe

“Some of the worst crimes in the American landscape are hiding in plain sight, and nobody has ever pursued them more thoroughly or explained them more chillingly and engagingly than Trevor Paglen. What he is doing is important, fascinating, and groundbreaking.”

—Rebecca Solnit, author of Wanderlust

“The iconography of the United States military. Not the mainstream military, with its bars and ribbons and medals, but the secret or ‘black projects’ world, which may or may not involve contacting aliens, building undetectable spy aircraft, and experimenting with explosives that could make atomic bombs look like firecrackers. Here, mysterious characters and cryptic symbols hint at intrigue much deeper than rank, company, and unit.”

—UTNE Reader

“Of course, issuing patches for a covert operation sounds like a joke … but truth be told, these days everything is branded. Military symbols are frequently replete with heraldic imagery—some rooted in history, others based on contemporary popular arts that feature comic characters—but these enigmatic dark-op images, in some cases probably designed by the participants themselves, are more personal, and also more disturbing, than most.”

—Steven Heller, The New York Times Book Review

“Trevor Paglen gets into the black heart of America’s black sites. There is no better guide to this great American mystery. What goes on inside these bases will determine the future of warfare—and who we are—for the rest of the century.”

—Robert Baer, former case officer at the CIA and author of See No Evil: The True Story of a Ground Soldier in the CIA’s War on Terrorism

I COULD TELL YOU BUT THEN YOU WOULD HAVE TO BE DESTROYED BY ME

EMBLEMS FROM THE PENTAGON'S BLACK WORLD

TREVOR PAGLEN

MELVILLE HOUSE PUBLISHING
BROOKLYN, NEW YORK

Contents

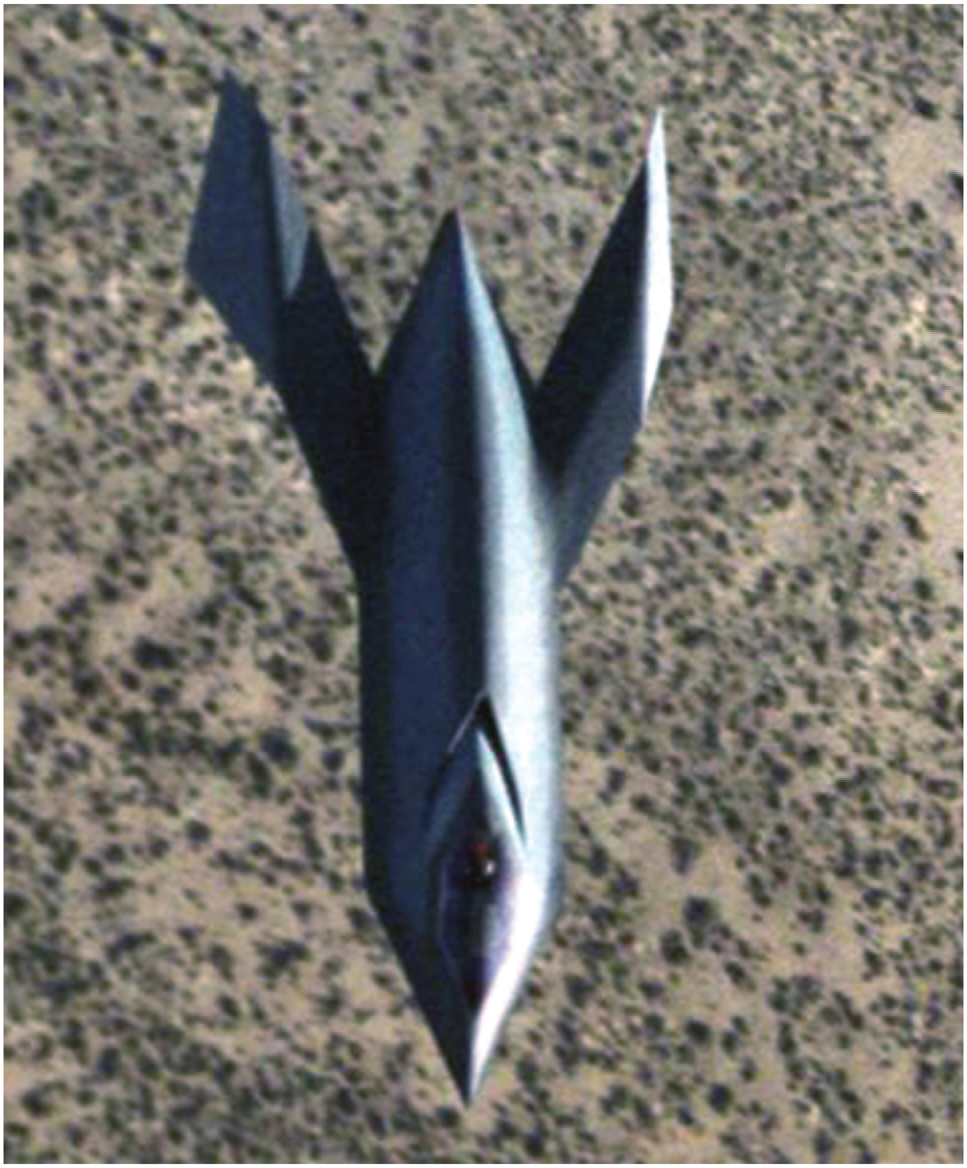
Cover
Title Page
Introduction

- The Patches
    - Special Projects Flight Test Squadron—Wizard
    - Special Projects Flight Test Squadron—Diamond
    - Rat 55
    - Bird of Prey
    - Ghost Squadron
    - G.H.O.S.T.
    - Penser Hors Limites
    - NKAWTG … Nobody
    - Janet Planes
    - A Lifetime of Silence Behind the Green Door
    - Freedomus Ao Anat Cosamus
    - Aerospace Medicine
    - Panther Den
    - Minotaur
    - Northrop Night Stalker II
    - Seekers Flight Test
    - USAF Special Projects
    - Alone and Unafraid
    - Alone and on the Prowl
    - Desert Prowler
    - Sneeky Pete

Global Engagement Military Spaceplane
Space Warfare Center Special Projects Division
If I Tell You I Have to Kill You
Triangulum
Vindicator
Lo Flight Test
Red Hats — More with Less
413th Flight Test Squadron
Project Zipper
Nutcrackers
Ew Directorate
EWAH
Killer Whale
TSSAM
Rangers
Range Patch
4477th Test & Evaluation Squadron — “Red Eagles”
57th Fighter Wing, Detachment 2
Semper En Obscurus
Rapid Capabilities Office
Directorate of Special Projects
Pete’s Dragon II
Don’t Ask — NOYFB
Goat Suckers
F3XP M.A.R.S.
Grim Reapers
Procul Este Profani — Special Projects
Classified Flight Test
Big Safari
Big Safari Program

National Reconnaissance Office “We Own the Night”
Alien Technology Exploitation Division
Catch a Falling Star
Pan
Sensor Hunter
UHF F/O
Unknown Dragon Patch
Nitwits Rubes Oafs, Setec Astronomy
OD-4 / DL and DX
Mission Operations — You Can Run …
AF Tencap Special Applications
NRO — Snakes
NRO — Dragon
Melior
Si Ego Certiorem

Acknowledgements
About the Author
Copyright



Boeing–McDonnell Douglas’ “Bird of Prey” advanced technology demonstrator was first flown in 1996. Its existence was declassified in 2002. Credit: USAF

INTRODUCTION

I began taking patches and military iconography seriously a number of years ago while visiting California's Antelope Valley in the westernmost region of the Mojave Desert. The Antelope Valley is the nerve center of the United States' military aviation industry and home to the Air Force Flight Test Center at Edwards Air Force Base. Made famous by the film The Right Stuff, Edwards is where Chuck Yeager broke the sound barrier in 1947, where Pete Knight pushed the experimental X-15 rocket plane towards Mach 7 twenty years later, and where the space shuttle Columbia landed after its first space flight in 1981. The Flight Test Center's motto Ad Inexplorata (Into the Unknown) speaks to the history of experimental aviation research that defines the region. On that particular day, I was visiting Peter Merlin, an "aerospace archaeologist" with a penchant for tracking down historic aircraft crash sites and a knowledgeable researcher of military aviation history. One of Merlin's particular areas of expertise is the history of "black" (i.e. secret) aviation projects, which is why I had traveled to the Antelope Valley to meet him.

As we sat in his living room, Merlin told me about the history of what people in defense circles call the "black world" of classified projects, and recounted stories of the brief glimpses he'd seen of it. He told me about the time he'd spent standing on a ridgeline in the middle of the Nevada desert looking down on the Air Force's secret base near Groom Lake. He told me rumors and anecdotes about a $300 million CIA-Air Force plane that never got off the ground, about a mysterious "classified demonstrator" flown in the mid 1980s, and about a secret plane called the YF-113G that flew in the early 1990s. The bits of arcana he had picked up in his work were as dizzying in their incompleteness as they were fascinating.

After spending the better part of an afternoon chatting, Merlin motioned for me to follow him upstairs and into his office. There, I found myself surrounded by the refuse, leftovers, and bits of debris that a half-century of secret aircraft projects had left behind. He'd recovered metal shards from shattered stealth fighters by locating the remote sites where they had crashed, and found the in-flight recorder from an A-12 spy plane in a local junkyard. There were mugs, pins, and other memorabilia preserved in frames, glass-enclosed shelves, and well-kept vitrines. "I trust evidence," Merlin said. "People can lie. Evidence doesn't." He handed me a thick folder stuffed with documents. "Here's the Standard Operating Procedure for Area 51," the operations manual for a secret Air Force Base, "most people just assume that everything is classified so they don't take the time to look," he said. Indeed, a few months later, I would obtain my own copy from the ever-helpful staff at the National Archives. "And this," he told me as he opened a notebook filled with scanned images of military patches, "is called 'patch intel.' "

I'd seen some of the images he had reproduced in his notebooks before, lining the walls of test pilot watering holes, on the living room walls of other people I'd talked to, and on the pages of in-house military history publications. They were a part of the military's everyday culture. I'd always found the skulls, lightning bolts, and dragons that adorned these patches to be fairly unremarkable, but Merlin saw something in them that I hadn't noticed—the symbols they contained were far from random. The lightning bolts, he told me, meant specific things in specific contexts; the numbers of stars on an image might represent a unit number or an operating location; the symbols on a patch could be clues to the purpose of a hidden program or a cover story designed to divert attention away from a program. These symbols, Merlin explained to me, were a language. If you could begin to learn its grammar, you could get a glimpse into the secret world itself.

And so I began to collect. When I toured interesting military bases, I took note of the symbols that its personnel wore. I started making sketches of interesting images I'd seen. As I amassed more interviews with military and intelligence-types, I always made a point of asking about patches or other memorabilia that they might have in their possession. If I saw something noteworthy adorning the wall of a bar or the home of a retired NCO, I would ask to take a photo. In many cases, people freely gave me a copy of what they had lying around. I began writing to Freedom of Information Act officers and base historians at different military installations, requesting images associated with obscure programs. Sometimes, this actually produced results. I began to amass more and more images and started to learn how to separate the diamonds from the rough. I had acquired a collector's obsession.

PATCHES

If we, rather arbitrarily, picked a date to begin the story of how patches and icons enveloped so much contemporary military culture, we might choose the summer of 1862.

That summer, so the story goes, the Army of the Potomac's Third Corps commander, General Philip Kearny, came across a group of Union officers lounging under a tree by the road side. Assuming that the wayward men were stragglers from his own command, Kearny, who was a strict disciplinarian, launched into an explosion of expletives and invectives directed at the officers. The men stood at attention, patiently waiting until the commander's vocal chords gave out. When Kearny finished, one of the men raised his hand and meekly suggested that Kearny had possibly made a mistake: the officers didn't belong in Kearny's brigade after all. Realizing his error, Kearny is said to have instantly turned into a model gentleman: "Pardon me; I will take steps to know how to recognize my own men hereafter." Kearny proceeded to order his men to place a piece of red cloth on the front of their caps, so that they might be distinguished from other officers. The enlisted men under his command followed.

The piece of red cloth became known as the “Kearny patch,” and, with it, the modern system of unit insignias was born. In less than a year, Major General Joseph Hooker had ordered the entire eastern army to wear distinctive patches: the First Corps would wear a circle, the Second Corps a trefoil, the Eleventh Corps a crescent, and the Twelfth Corps a star.

As the war spread, so did the system of insignia. The patches began to take on special meanings. When the Twelfth Corps went to Chattanooga to aid the Fifteenth Corps, an Irish soldier from the latter division joined some of the newly-arrived men around the fire. Noticing that the men all wore stars on their uniforms, the Irishman asked if the men were all brigadier-generals. The men from the Twelfth replied that the star was their corps badge, and that everyone wore them. “What is your badge?” they asked. “Forty rounds in the cartridge box, and twenty in the pocket,” the Irishman replied. Soon thereafter, the Fifteenth Corps adopted a cartridge box and forty rounds as its symbol.

The tradition of unit insignia has been with the military ever since. There are now thousands and thousands of patches in the modern armed forces, depicting everything from a soldier’s unit, to the many programs a soldier might be charged with, to his or her role within an organization. There are patches custom-made to commemorate special events, and “Friday” patches (informal, and often more colorful, patches that airmen are allowed to wear on Fridays). Simply put, the military has patches for almost everything it does. Including, curiously, for programs, units, and activities that are officially secret.

The Civil War Era “Kearney Patch” represents one of the earliest American military patches. Photo: T. Glen Larson

THE BLACK WORLD

The easiest way to see the outlines of the Pentagon’s black world is to download a copy of the defense budget from the Department of Defense Comptroller’s web site. Buried in the RDT&E (Research Development, Test, and Evaluation) section is a very long list of peculiar line items:

PROGRAM ELEMENT #0603801F:	SPECIAL PROGRAMS	$317 MILLION
PROGRAM ELEMENT #0207248F:	SPECIAL EVALUATION PROGRAM	$530 MILLION
PROGRAM ELEMENT #0301324F:	FOREST GREEN	[NO NUMBER]
PROGRAM ELEMENT #0304111F:	SPECIAL ACTIVITIES	[NO NUMBER]

And there are many, many more. These line items are an unclassified glimpse at the so-called "black budget," the annual expenditures for classified programs. To get a "best guess" estimate of the black budget's size, you can add up all the line items and compare that number to the budget's published total. If you do so, you'll notice a discrepancy. A big discrepancy—about $30 billion.

This black budget doesn't disappear into a vacuum—it is the lifeblood of the Pentagon's black world.

In defense jargon, the phrase "black world" denotes the collection of programs, people, and places involved in the most secret of military projects. Like the black budget, the black world is as vast as it is secret. It is not so much a world unto itself as it is a world existing alongside and interwoven with the more conventional parts of military and civilian life. Airbases such as Edwards Air Force Base in Southern California have restricted "compounds" where black projects take place. Industrial sites like Lockheed Martin's Skunk Works have cordoned off areas dedicated to classified projects. Deputy directors of various military agencies are charged with overseeing projects whose existence might be kept secret even from their commanders. Black operations are also woven into existing, visible, activities: like a classified payload aboard a rocket launch from Vandenberg Air Force Base. Or the 1990 space shuttle mission STS-36 (piloted by a former deputy chief of the Air Force's Special Projects Office), which is long rumored to have deployed a supersecret stealth satellite, codenamed MISTY, before landing at Edwards Air Force Base.

The black world also has its dedicated bases, such as the Air Force's "operating location near Groom Lake," a Nevada aircraft test site popularly known as Area 51 where the "Special Projects Flight Test Squadron" tests classified airframes. To the north of Groom Lake is the Tonopah Test Range (also known as Area 52), where a squadron of purloined Soviet MiGs once flew, piloted by a unit called the “Red Eagles” under the code name CONSTANT PEG. During the 1980s, Tonopah was also home to operational squadrons of then-classified F-117a stealth fighters, and patches identified their wearers as “Grim Reapers,” “Nightstalkers,” and “Goat Suckers.”

It’s difficult to figure out what goes on behind the restricted airspaces, the closed doors, the cover stories, and the official denials of the Pentagon’s black world. It’s all secret. But from time to time, the black world peeks out into the “white” world, and those paying close attention can get a fleeting glimpse.

Military radio aficionado Steve Douglass got such a glimpse in early 2004 when his scanners recorded an aircraft using the call sign “Lockheed Test 2334” telling an Albuquerque air traffic controller that it would be “going supersonic somewhere above Flight Level 60 [60,000 feet].” When the controller asked for the aircraft type, the unnamed pilot responded that “We are classified type and cannot reveal our true altitude.” A few minutes later, Douglass heard the mysterious aircraft ask for clearance to descend to 30,000 feet and a flight path toward “Las Vegas with final destination somewhere in the Nellis Range,” the giant Nevada military range that is home to Groom Lake and the Tonopah Test Range. “Trip home a bit slower, eh?” said the controller.

Another glimpse had come the year before when U-2 pilots flying missions over Iraq (and possibly even more “sensitive” places) started complaining about mysterious high flying Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs) operating at the same extreme altitudes as their spy planes. Too close for comfort, in the pilots’ collective opinion. When defense industry journalists picked up on the sightings, Pentagon officials seemed to confirm the classified aircraft’s existence, explaining that the enigmatic aircraft bore a family resemblance to another Lockheed UAV nicknamed “DarkStar.”

A search through the published biographies of Air Force test pilots reveals a different kind of peephole into the black world. In open records, we find men like Joseph Lanni, whose resumé says that he commanded a “classified flight test squadron” from 1995-1997, and flew “numerous classified prototypes,” including something called the “YF-24.”

And then, for a different kind of glimpse into the black world, there are the patches and symbols reproduced in this book.

WHY?

If the symbols and patches contained in this book refer to classified military programs, the existence of which is often a state secret, why do these patches exist in the first place? Why jeopardize the secrecy of these projects by attaching images to them at all—no matter how obscure or indirect those images might be? Why advertise the fact that someone might be involved in black projects, even with words like “I’d tell you but then I’d have to kill you,” or “NOYFB” and the like? No doubt, the short answer is itself some sort of variation of “I’d tell you but I’d have to kill you.”

We can speculate about the best answer, perhaps, by looking back to the history of unit insignia. After Kearny first commanded his officers to wear a red patch, and after General Hooker generalized the practice of wearing unit insignia, military commanders are said to have noticed the esprit de corps and pride that the insignias brought to the soldiers wearing them. Insignias became a way to show the rest of the world who one was affiliated with—something similar to a sports fan wearing the colors of their home team. To wear insignia is to tell the world that one is a part of something larger than oneself. In the case of a black unit, wearing insignias that identify oneself as a part of a black unit may actually help to preserve whatever secrets the unit may (or may not) hold. By wearing a patch, its wearer advertises to others around him or her that there are certain things that he or she cannot speak about. His or her membership in the secret society is contingent upon keeping those secrets. We might imagine that wearing a patch that speaks to secrets might be extra incentive for the person wearing the patch to keep silent.

Without a doubt, many members of the black world are proud of the secrets they hold, and of the clandestine work they've done in the military or intelligence industries. But others struggle with the alienation that comes along with not being able to tell friends and family what one does for a living and with having a secret life. Obtaining and maintaining a security clearance for black projects can involve federal investigators combing through one's personal life, uncomfortable polygraph examinations, and even surveillance. A few years ago, I talked to a man who had become frustrated with life in the black world. He didn't like the secrecy, the alienation, the exhaustive and complicated security procedures, and the constant surveillance. He had begun to develop a disdain for his colleagues who seemed to relish that life. When I showed him some of the patches from this book, he was less than enthralled. "I've seen that sort of thing a lot," he said. "Those are gang colors."

NELLIS BOMBING AND GUNNERY RANGE
RESTRICTED AREA
NO TRESPASSING BEYOND THIS POINT
PHOTOGRAPHY IS PROHIBITED WARNING
Restricted Area

The black site at Groom Lake's perimeter is protected by security guards in unmarked trucks.

ABOUT THIS BOOK

A number of disclaimers are in order. First and foremost, this is not a book of military history, and is not intended to be a comprehensive, historical, or even consistent examination of black world heraldry. Serious collectors of militaria and historians of all varieties may find this book to be maddeningly inconsistent, incomplete—even random. The images contained in these pages are often presented without regard for their unit lineages, and without historical context. To make matters worse for the serious aficionado, I have made no distinction between images scanned from "originals" and those scanned from reproductions. Therefore, the images in this book cannot and should not be relied upon as accurate guides to military history.

Instead, readers of this book will find a collection of images that are fragmentary, torn out of context, inconclusive, unreliable, and deceptive. Readers will find, in other words, a glimpse into the black world itself.

THE PATCHES

SPECIAL PROJECTS
FLIGHT TEST SQUADRON

SPECIAL PROJECTS FLIGHT TEST SQUADRON—WIZARD

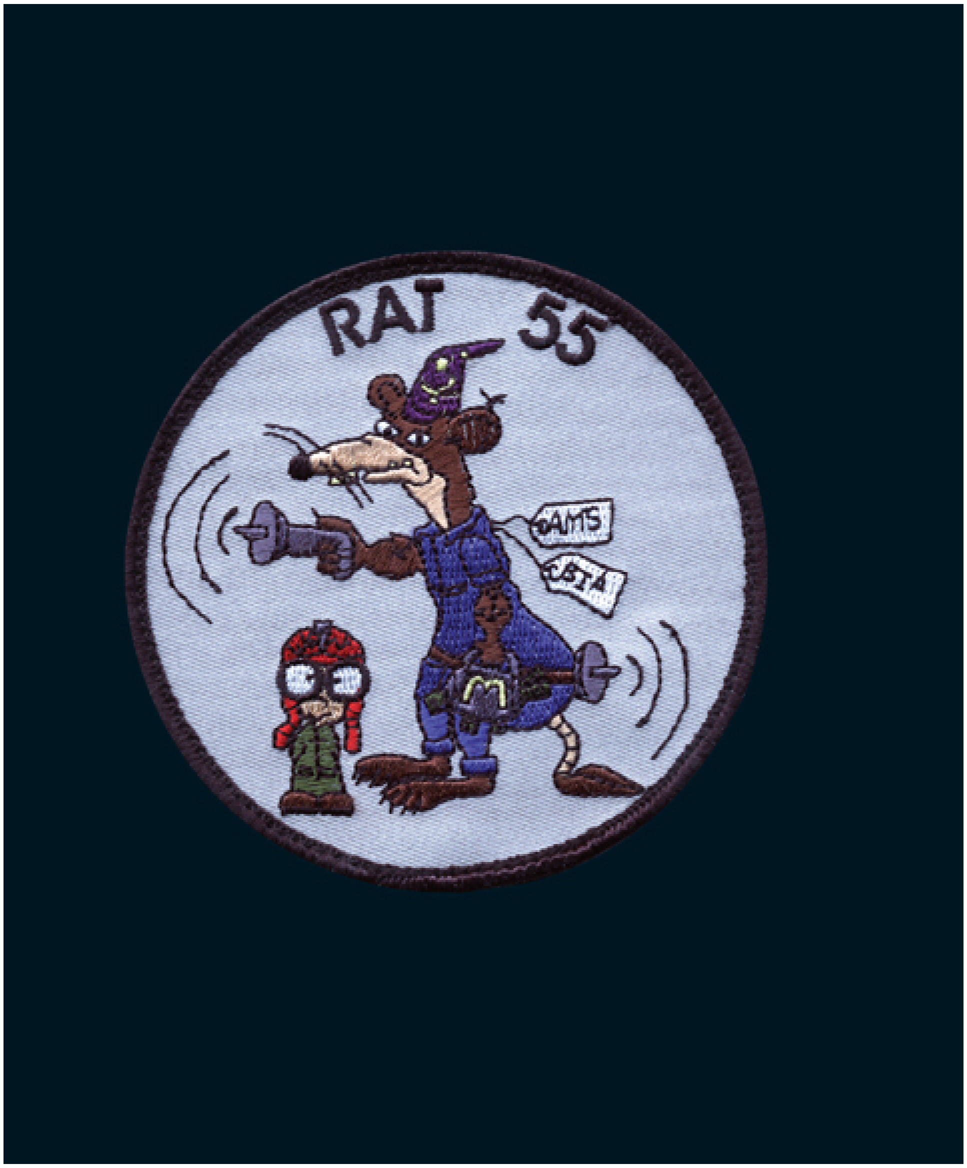
Based at the Air Force's secret base near Groom Lake, Nevada, the Special Projects Flight Test Squadron is the Air Force's only "black" flight test squadron for classified prototype aircraft and advanced concept technology demonstrators.

The squadron's mascot is a wizard. A collection of six stars (5 + 1) on the patch references the unit's operating location: the secret base known as Area 51. The lowercase Greek sigma symbol in the wizard's right hand is the engineering symbol for the unknown value of an object's radar cross section (RCS). The ideal radar signature of a stealth aircraft is zero. While no stealth aircraft has yet achieved this goal, several have come close. On the right side of the patch, the falling globe references the hollow aluminum spheres dropped from the sky to calibrate radar equipment. A sphere of a given size has a known RCS value. Lightning bolts, such as the one emanating from the wizard's staff, seem to refer to electronic warfare. The aircraft in the lower right is probably a generic symbol representing flight testing of advanced aircraft. The sword at the bottom of the image refers to a recently declassified Boeing stealth demonstrator known as the "Bird of Prey": the handle on the sword approximates the shape of the aircraft.

SPECIAL PROJECTS
FLIGHT TEST SQUADRON

SPECIAL PROJECTS FLIGHT TEST SQUADRON—DIAMOND

An older patch associated with the Special Projects Flight Test Squadron. The faceted shape used here may refer to early designs of stealth aircraft.



RAT 55
OAMTS
CSTA

RAT 55

“Rat 55” is the call sign used by pilots flying a highly modified T-43A (the Air Force version of a Boeing 737-200) based at a classified air base in central Nevada. The word “Rat” comes from the airplane’s function as a Radar Testbed and the “55” comes from the airplane’s USAF serial number: 73-1155.

The modified NT-43A is outfitted with radar domes on its nose and tail measuring approximately nine feet long and six and a half feet in diameter and is used to measure the in-flight radar signatures of stealth aircraft.

The NT-43A has been photographed tailing a B-2 stealth bomber over Death Valley and over the Tonopah Test Range in Nevada.

The patch depicts a rat holding a radar in its right hand and another radar dish strapped to its rear-end, both of which recall the radome configuration on the NT-43A. The rat’s hat recalls the wizard figures associated with classified flight test operations in other patches.

BIRD OF PREY

BIRD OF PREY

The Bird of Prey was a highly classified technology demonstrator that first flew at Groom Lake in 1996. Built by a secretive division of McDonnell Douglas (later acquired by Boeing) known as the “Phantom Works,” the aircraft was flown by Boeing pilots Rudy Haug and Joe Felock. Doug Benjamin of the secret Special Projects Flight Test Squadron was the only Air Force pilot to fly the aircraft.

Although the shape of the plane was secret in 1996, the Bird of Prey patch contained an important clue. When Boeing declassified the Bird of Prey’s existence in 2002, it became obvious that the handle of the sword was essentially the same shape as the aircraft. This distinctive sword has since become incorporated into the symbolism of the Special Projects Flight Test Squadron.

CLASSIS
CAECE
DE MULTA NOCTE
NOLI ROGARE

AIR FORCE FLIGHT TEST CENTER
CLASSIS CAECE
NOLI ROGARE
DE MULTA NOCTE
THE GHOST SQUADRON

GHOST SQUADRON

The text on these patches roughly translates as “A Secret Squadron / From Deep in the Night / Don’t Ask Any Questions.” The patches were worn by an obscure unit called the “Ghost Squadron” operating out of the secret Air Force base near Groom Lake. The single star in the Southwest United States presumably designates the group’s operating location.

The Ghost Squadron is a helicopter support, security, and search and rescue team for test squadrons flying classified aircraft.

G.H.O.S.T.

G.H.O.S.T.

One of the more recent patches from the “Ghost Squadron” based at Groom Lake. The design of the skull’s helmet indicates that “Ghost” is a helicopter unit. The footprints on the helmet mark the trace of the “Jolly Green Giant,” a symbol connected to helicopter search and rescue missions. This patch also seems to indicate that “G.H.O.S.T.” is an acronym for the unit. The meaning of the acronym is unclear.

PENSER HORS LIMITES
OPERATIONS GROUP

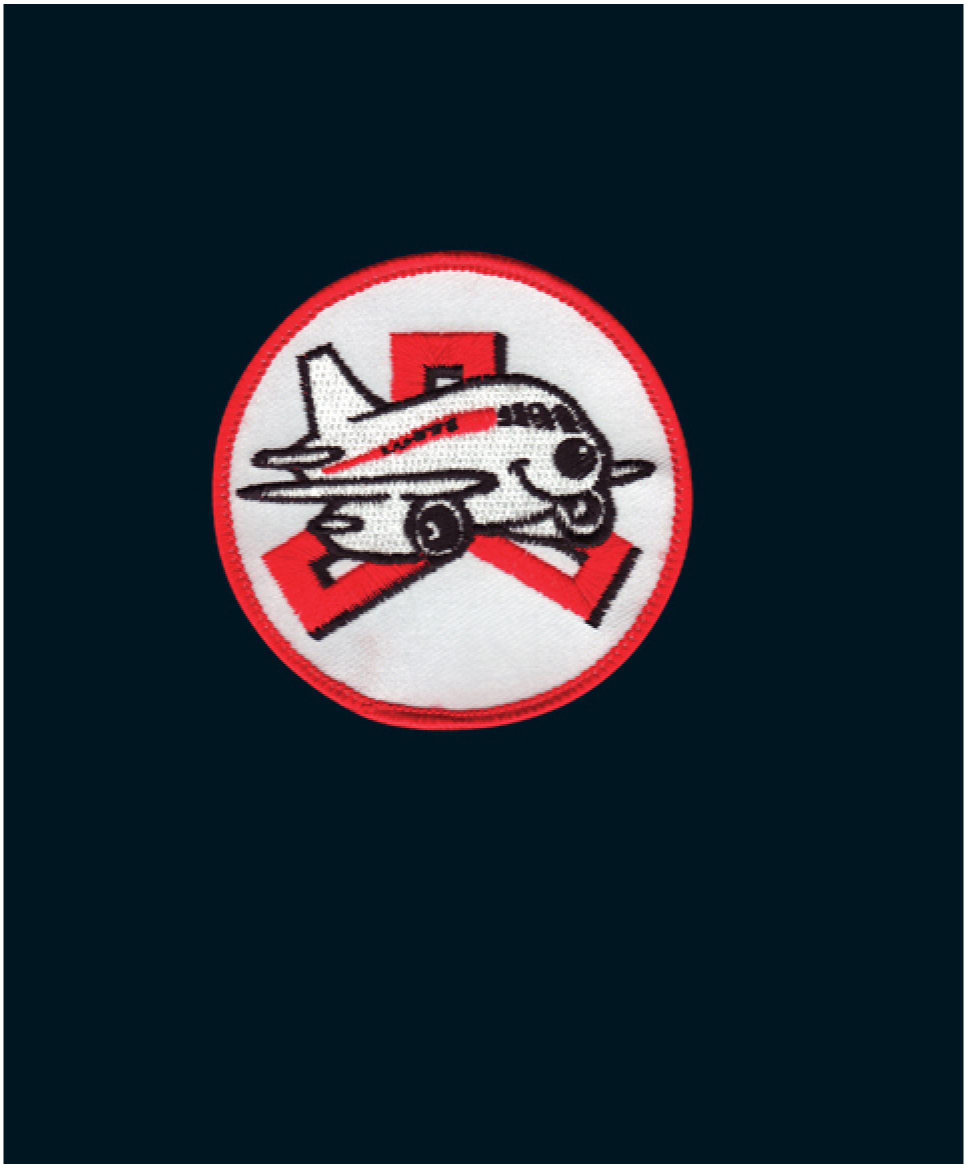
PENSER HORS LIMITES

This patch comes from the Operations Group at Groom Lake. The collection of five white stars and one purple star is a reference to Groom Lake’s nickname, “Area 51,” and here represents the Special Projects Flight Test Squadron. The color purple echoes the colors of other Special Projects Flight Test Squadron patches. The wrench and screwdriver are symbols for aircraft maintenance units and activities. There is also a red star in the bird’s eye, which may reference classified squadrons such as the “Red Hats” and “Red Eagles,” which were charged with flying purloined Soviet MiGs at the secret base. Green footprints on the cloud symbolize the “Ghost Squadron” search and rescue team. Lightning coming from the cloud spells out the letters “EW” for “electronic warfare” and represents EW test units and activities at the base. The red-and-white and blue-and-white streamers on either side of the bird reference the colors of the Janet planes. (See this page.) Penser hors limites is French for “Imagination without boundaries,” or “To think beyond the boundaries.”

NKAWTG....NOBODY

NKAWTG … NOBODY

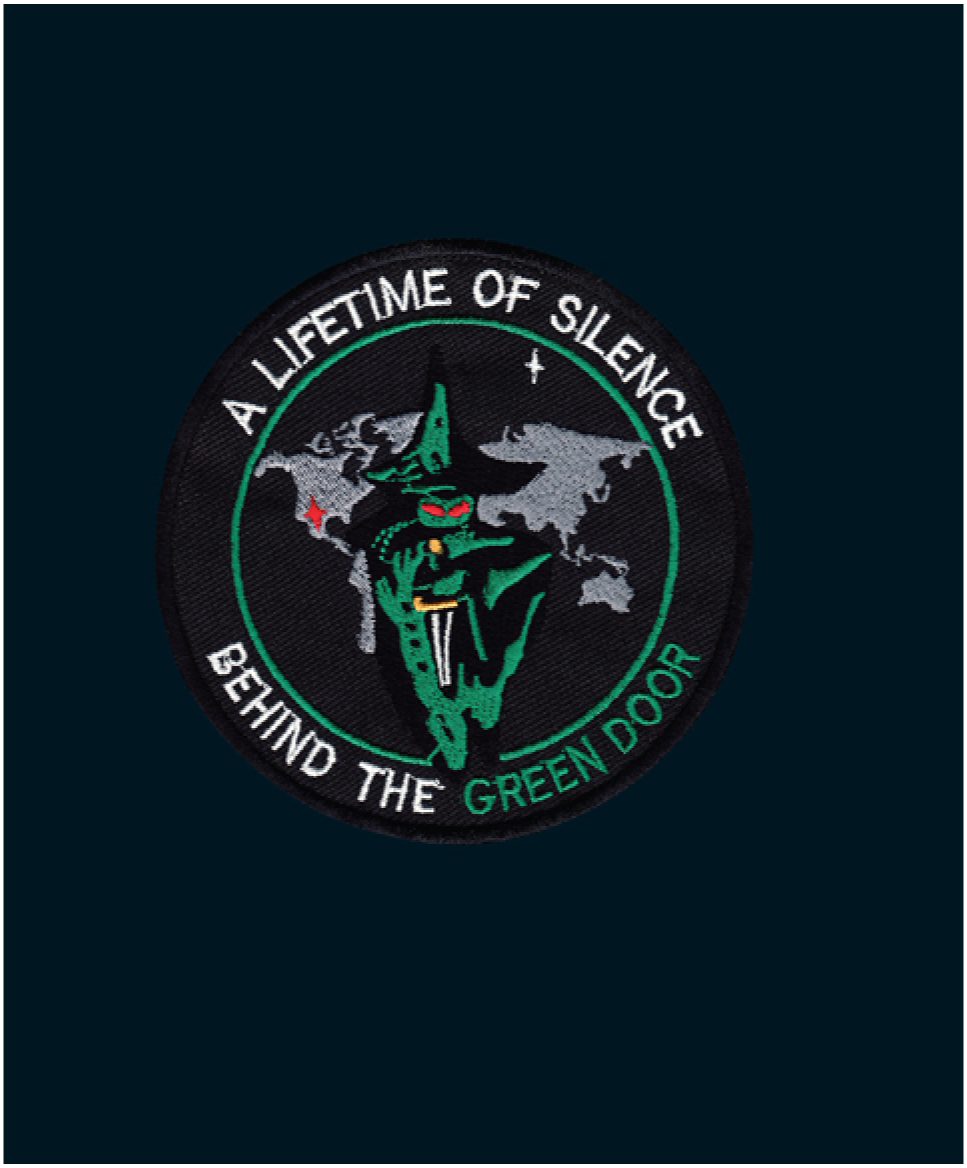
This patch comes from an unidentified air refueling squadron charged with supporting black aircraft projects. The object in the character’s hand is a fuel boom from a tanker aircraft such as a KC-135 or a KC-10. The letters NKAWTG at the bottom of the image refer to the unofficial motto of the Air Force’s tanker units: “No One Kicks Ass Without Tanker Gas.”



JANET PLANES

The white Boeing 737 with a red stripe down the fuselage refers to aircraft known as the “Janet Fleet,” because they use the call sign “Janet” in civilian airspace. The fleet is operated by the Special Project Division of the EG&G company; the company’s logo provides the backdrop for the smiling aircraft shown in the patch. The Janet Fleet shuttles military and civilian workers to and from their jobs at secret military bases such as the Tonopah Test Range and Groom Lake. The Janet Fleet is headquartered at the “Gold Coast” terminal at Las Vegas’ McCarren Airport.

Workers commute from Las Vegas to secret military bases each morning in unmarked 737s.



A LIFETIME OF SILENCE
BEHIND THE GREEN DOOR

A LIFETIME OF SILENCE BEHIND THE GREEN DOOR

The origins and meaning of this patch are obscure. The green figure holding the sword wears the cloak-and-dagger garb often associated with black projects. There is a white star in the northern hemisphere (under the letter "S") and a red star in the American Southwest.

The patch is likely associated with the Air Force Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance Agency, based at Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio, Texas, which perhaps explains the location of the red star. The Air Force ISR Agency's mission is to "Organize, train, equip, and present assigned forces and capabilities to conduct intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance for combatant commanders and the nation." The agency is involved in a number of "black" projects. The white star in the sky most likely refers to projects involving space capabilities and systems.

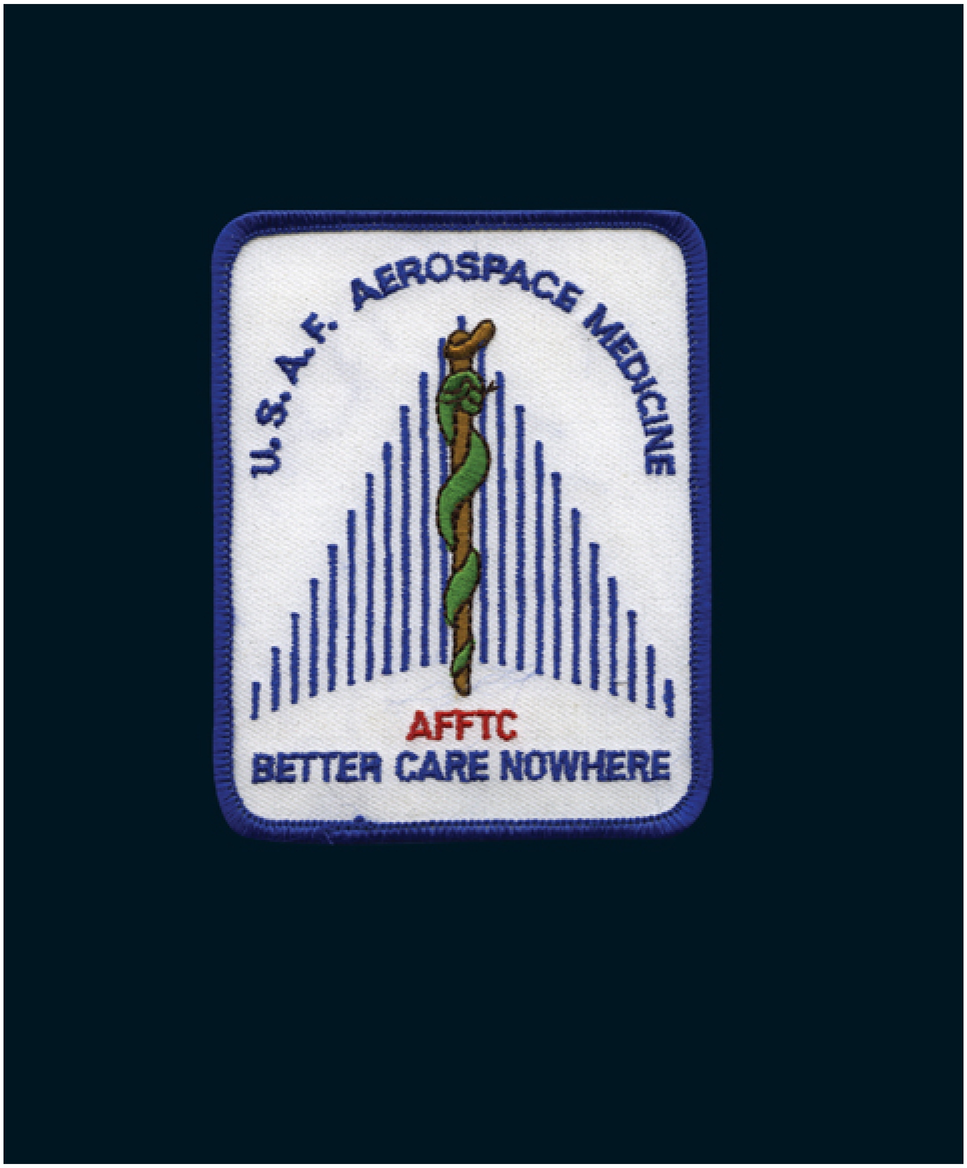
The words "A Lifetime of Silence" no doubt refer to the fact that members of this unit or project cannot speak about what they do. Military intelligence officers have a tradition of working behind locked green vault doors, but the symbol is also widely used in popular culture to designate an inaccessible place.

In Mary E. Wilkins-Freeman's 1917 novel The Green Door, a young girl named Letitia longs to open a mysterious little green door in her house, but her aunt forbids it with the words "It is not best for you, my dear." The 1956 hit song "Green Door" is about a man who couldn't get into a party raging behind a green door. The 1972 pornographic film Behind the Green Door also uses the image to connote an inaccessible place (in the case of the film, a sex theater).

FREEDOMUS AO ANAT COSAMUS

FREEDOMUS AO ANAT COSAMUS

This patch is from an unknown program active at Groom Lake (Area 51) sometime during the late 1990s. The collection of six stars above the eagle's head may represent Area 51 (5 + 1 stars), and the collection of three stars below the eagle might represent "Detachment 3." (Groom Lake is also known as "Air Force Flight Test Center, Detachment 3".) The phrase Freedomus Ao Anat Cosamus is a garbled concoction of dog-Latin and dog-Greek. Although the intended meaning of the phrase is unclear, one might venture the guess "Freedom throughout the cosmos."



U.S.A.F. AEROSPACE MEDICINE
AFFTC BETTER CARE NOWHERE

AEROSPACE MEDICINE

This patch is worn by the aerospace medical personnel assigned to the secret flight test facility at Groom Lake, also known as Air Force Flight Test Center, Detachment 3 (AFFTC Det. 3). Aerospace medicine is a specialized branch of medicine that focuses on the needs of pilots and aircrews.

PANTHER DEN
INFORMATION WARFARE

PANTHER DEN

Panther Den is a Special Access Program (SAP) based at Hanscom Air Force Base in Massachusetts. Managed by the Big Safari project office (pg. 123), Panther Den is charged with overseeing classified information warfare projects. Related to electronic warfare, information warfare involves defending and attacking computer networks and other kinds of information infrastructure.

Projects falling under Panther Den's umbrella include Pirate Sword, Steel Puma, and Project Deborah.

MINOTAUR

Minotaur is a still-classified program undertaken by Lockheed Martin’s Advanced Development Programs division, the Skunk Works. Although Minotaur remains obscure, rumor holds that the airframe shares a “family resemblance” with another Skunk Works program called Minion and may have served as a technology demonstrator for that program.

NORTHROP NIGHT
STALKER II

NORTHROP NIGHT STALKER II

There is no publicly available information about Northrop’s “Night Stalker II” program. The numeral II suggests a “Night Stalker I,” which remains equally obscure.

SEEKERS FLIGHT TEST
2001

SEEKERS FLIGHT TEST

This patch is from the flight test of an unknown aircraft or system conducted by defense contractor Scaled Composites, based near Edwards Air Force Base in Mojave, California.

Scaled Composites became widely known in October of 2004 when the company won the “X-Prize” after launching its “Spaceship One” aircraft to an altitude above 328,000 feet twice in fourteen days.

The company does a significant amount of classified work for the Department of Defense. Job listings on Scaled Composites’ web site indicate that the company prefers to hire workers in possession of a “DOD Secret Clearance.”

USAF SPECIAL PROJECTS

USAF SPECIAL PROJECTS

This unofficial patch was created by the 46th Test Wing, Eglin Air Force Base, in commemoration of multiple Electronic Warfare development programs. When primary responsibility for USAF EW testing was transferred from Eglin to Edwards Air Force Base as part of the Base Realignment and Closure process, the patch also moved to Edwards and became associated with the 413th Flight Test Squadron. While the 413th at Edwards was decommissioned in 2004, the patch is still in use at various locations, presumably in support of new EW capabilities.

IX
Ω
XI
Alone and Unafraid

ALONE AND UNAFRAID

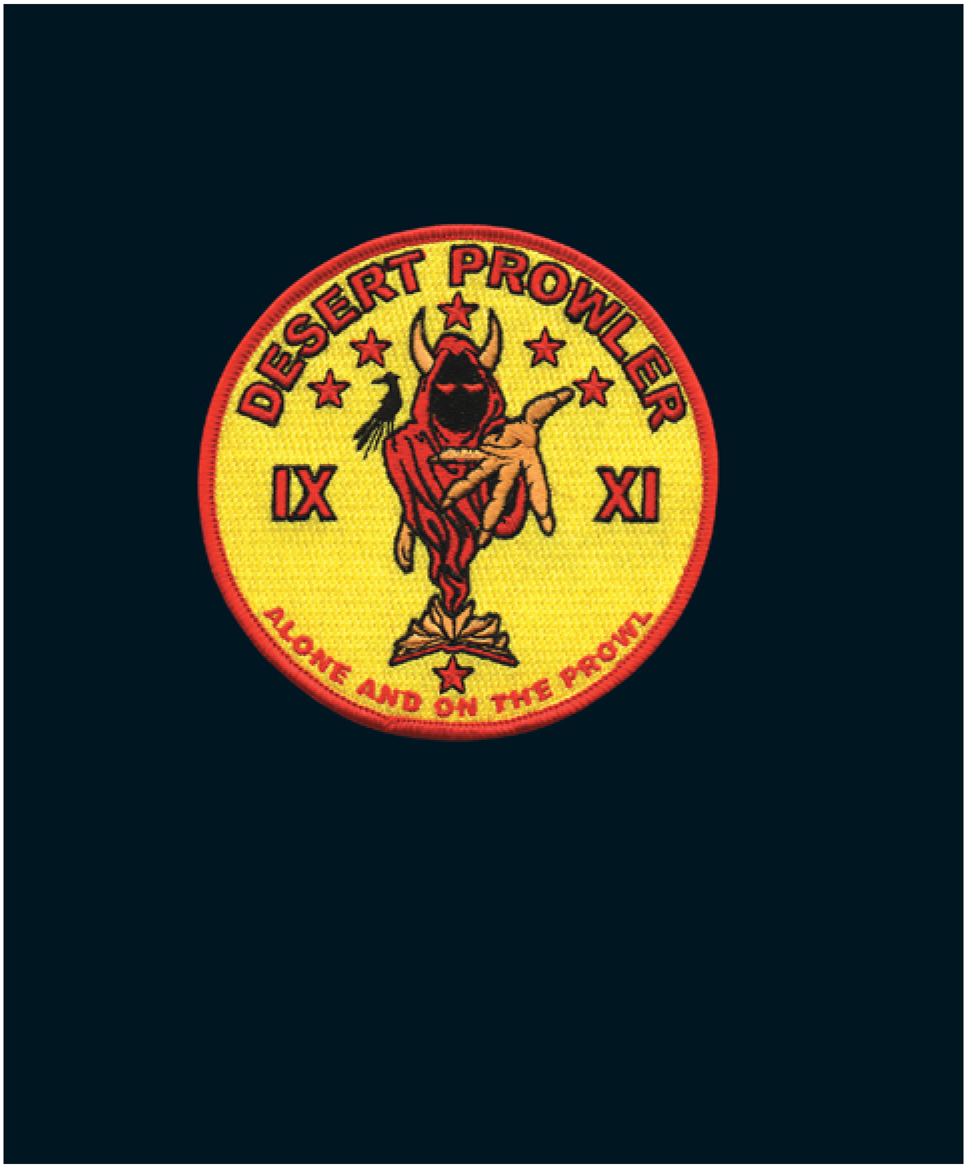
This is one of several patches associated with the Lockheed Martin “Desert Prowler” program, an Unmanned Aerial Vehicle (UAV) first flown on December 13, 2005. The numerals 9 and 11 also appear on other patches associated with the program. The collection of 5 + 1 stars in the lower left section of the patch refers to the classified flight test center at Groom Lake, suggesting that the UAV underwent flight test at the black site or was tested at another site (such as Lockheed’s “Area 6” near Yucca Lake) with support from Groom Lake units.

Desert Prowler may be related to a classified UAV operating out of Kandahar, Afghanistan, that began operations around 2007. Aviation journalist Bill Sweetman initially dubbed the aircraft “the Beast of Kandahar” after a French magazine published a blurry image of the unknown vehicle. On December 4, 2009, the Air Force confirmed the existence of an aircraft called the RQ-170 Sentinel. The RQ-170 is operated by the 30th Reconnaissance Squadron based at the Tonopah Test Range in Nevada.

IX
XI
ALONE AND ON THE PROWL

ALONE AND ON THE PROWL

Another patch associated with the Lockheed Martin Unmanned Aerial Vehicle first flown in late 2005.



DESERT PROWLER
IX
XI
ALONE AND ON THE PROWL

DESERT PROWLER

Yet another patch associated with Lockheed Martin’s “Desert Prowler” program.

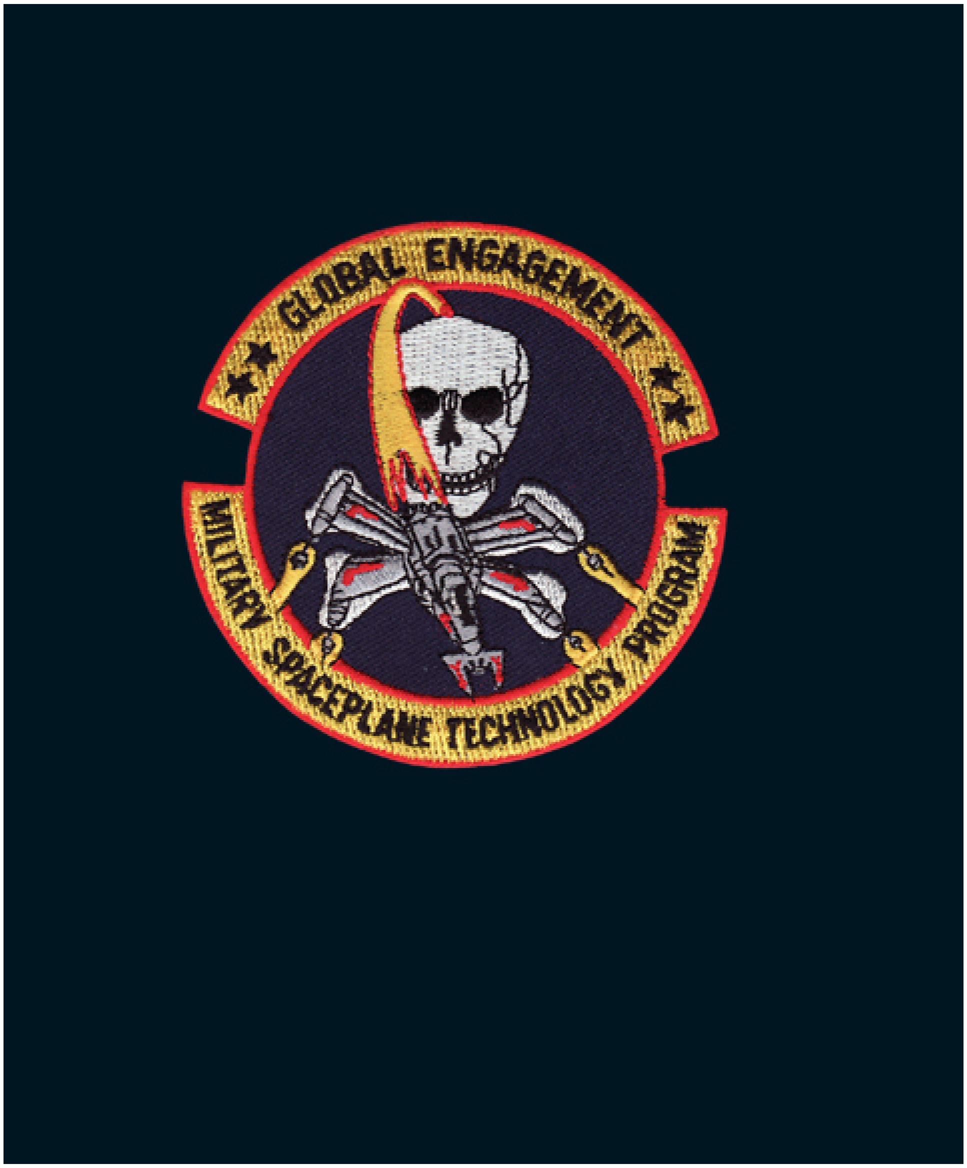
The figure here is taken from the cover art of the hip-hop duo Insane Clown Posse’s sixth “joker card” album, entitled The Wraith: Shangri-La. In the narrative of the concept album, the Wraith takes the listener on a tour through heaven and hell.

Sneeky Pete
21
World's Oldest Known
Flying Pig

SNEEKY PETE

Another patch from an obscure Scaled Composites project; the symbolism is unclear. The name Pete may refer to Scaled Composites test pilot Peter Siebold.

Marines sometimes refer to reconnaissance missions as “Sneeky Pete” work, as in, “We’re going Sneeky Pete.”



GLOBAL ENGAGEMENT
MILITARY SPACEPLANE TECHNOLOGY PROGRAM

GLOBAL ENGAGEMENT MILITARY SPACEPLANE

This patch is from the Phillips Laboratory Military Spaceplane Technology (MiST) Program Office at Kirtland Air Force Base in New Mexico.

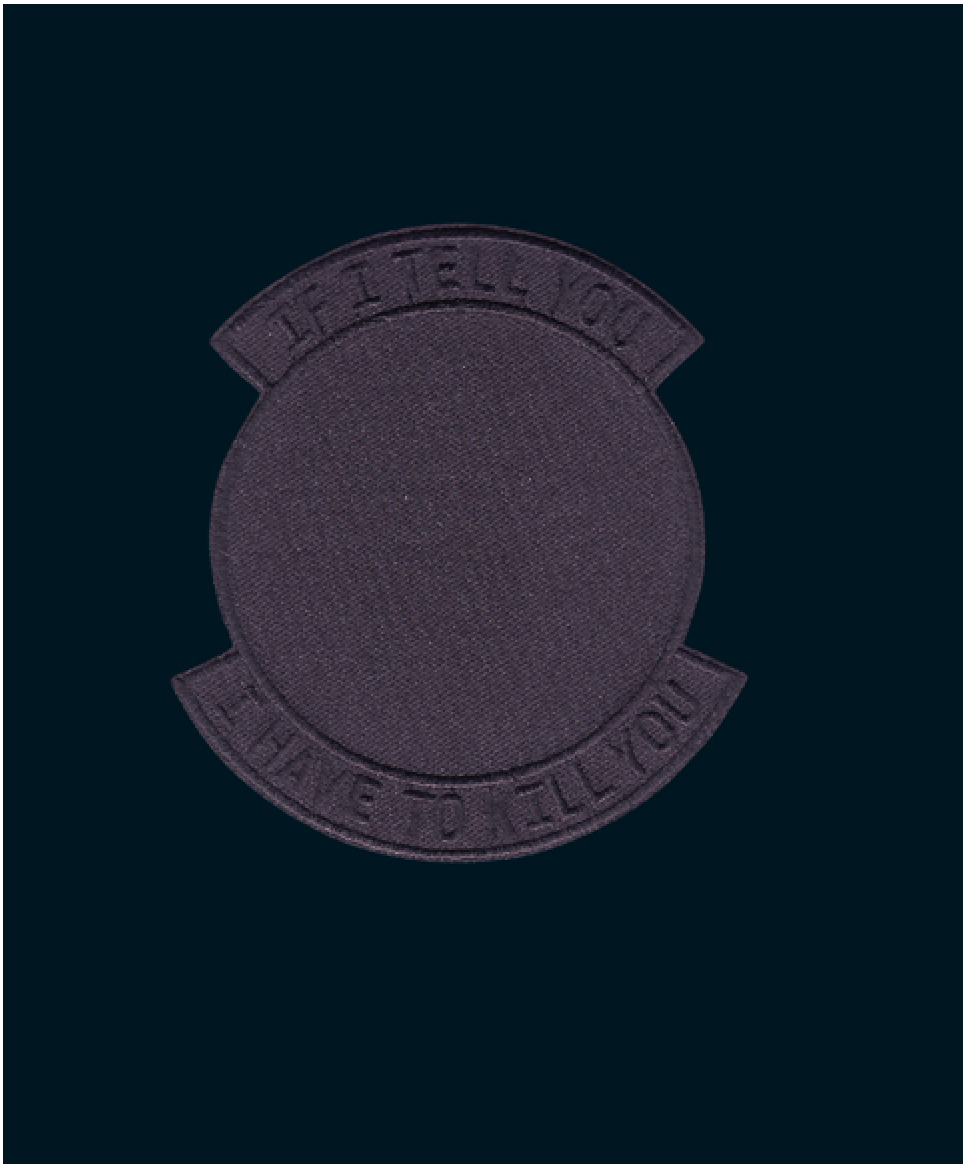
The original version of the patch sported an “X-Wing” fighter from the Star Wars movies. When lawyers representing George Lucas delivered the unit a cease and desist order, the aircraft on the patch was changed to the shape that appears on this patch.

THE CUTTING EDGE
SPECIAL PROJECTS DIVISION

SPACE WARFARE CENTER SPECIAL PROJECTS DIVISION

Based at Schriever Air Force Base in Colorado, the Space Warfare Center's mission is to evaluate the performance of space and missile systems, integrate space systems into military operations, and train space systems operators.

The Special Projects Division presumably performs similar functions for "black" space systems.



IF I TELL YOU
I HAVE TO KILL YOU

IF I TELL YOU I HAVE TO KILL YOU

A generic patch for “black” projects designed by a member of Air Test and Evaluation Squadron Four (VX-4), based at Point Mugu near Camarillo, California. VX-4 eventually merged with VX-5 from NAWC China Lake, also in Southern California, to become VX-9 with detachments at both locations.

TRIANGULUM

TRIANGULUM

“Triangulum” is reported to designate a variation on the RS6b SENIOR SPEAR sensor system built into some versions of the U-2 spy plane. The Triangulum system allegedly uses twelve antennae along the aircraft’s fuselage and an antenna on each wing.

Vindicator

VINDICATOR

Built by Lockheed Martin's Skunk Works, the Vindicator system was a highly classified project (rumored to be "more secret than the F-117A," the stealth fighter program) from the 1980s. This patch includes the Lockheed Advanced Development Projects' skunk mascot wearing a helmet and scarf. The patch depicts a laser anemometer optical air data system, which takes the place of conventional pitot-static probes on stealth or high-speed aircraft where physical protrusions are undesirable. The device is a velocity indicator (or, in aviation parlance, a v-indicator).

L.O. FLIGHT TEST
HUGE DEPOSIT--NO RETURN

LO FLIGHT TEST

The words “LO Flight Test” describe a “Low Observables” flight test, in all probability a radar measurement test for a stealth aircraft using the radar measurement range at Groom Lake, Nevada. The date of this particular flight test is unknown, but the test reportedly involved a B-2 stealth bomber. The sigma symbol in the middle of the patch refers to the unknown value of the aircraft’s radar cross section (sigma/zero being the ideal radar cross section measurement for a stealth plane). “Huge deposit” indicates the bomb load deposited by the bomber on its target, while “no return” refers to the absence of a radar-return, meaning that the aircraft was undetectable to radar. It is unclear why there is a star on the tail of the sigma, though it may simply be an artistic touch.

RED HATS MORE WITH LESS

RED HATS — MORE WITH LESS

Red Hats was a nickname for the 6513th Test Squadron, which was charged with testing a collection of Soviet military aircraft surreptitiously acquired from foreign sources. The 6513th was based at Groom Lake, Nevada, in a collection of hangars on the northern end of the base that became known as “Red Square.” The program to test Soviet MiGs at Groom Lake began in the late 1960s as a joint CIA/USAF effort under the code names HAVE DRILL and HAVE DOUGHNUT

Again, note the collection of six stars on the patch, which may refer to Groom Lake’s nickname, Area 51.

The 6513th was deactivated in 1992 and transformed into the 413th Flight Test Squadron.

413TH FLIGHT TEST SQ

413th FLIGHT TEST SQUADRON

The 413th Test Squadron was designated and activated on October 2, 1992, when it was formed out of the disbanded 6513th Red Hats Test Squadron. The Red Hats had conducted flight testing of purloined Soviet MiGs and other aircraft at Groom Lake. In March 1994, the unit became the 413th Flight Test Squadron, nicknamed the “Bombcats.”

Based at a restricted section of Edwards Air Force Base called “North Base,” the mission of the 413th was to organize flight tests of Electronic Warfare systems around the world. A detachment of the 413th, called the “Nutcrackers,” continued to operate out of Groom Lake and the Tonopah Test Range. Daily flights in unmarked Beech aircraft shuttled members of the 413th to the secret bases each day.

The 413th was responsible for a number of programs; code names included SUNDOWNER, ZIPPER, and IBIS DAWN. In May of 2004, the squadron was deactivated (although the unit designation was later transferred to a squadron formed from a detachment of the 46th Operations Group at Eglin Air Force Base in Florida). The remaining “Bombcats” assets became part of the Electronic Warfare Directorate, also headquartered at Edwards Air Force Base.

PROJECT ZIPPER
We Make Threats Not Promises

PROJECT ZIPPER

This patch represents an unknown project undertaken by the 413th Flight Test Squadron. The zipper seems to refer to the fact that the project cannot be discussed. The first part of the phrase “We make threats” might refer to making simulated (or real) electronic “threats” against aircraft.

ELECTRONIC WARFARE
NUTCRACKERS

NUTCRACKERS

“Nutcrackers” was an alter ego of the 413th Flight Test Squadron referring to detachments operating at classified locations that included Groom Lake and the Tonopah Test Range.

The collection of 4 + 1 + 3 stars on the left side of the patch refers to the 413th Flight Test Squadron. The crow and the lightning bolts symbolize the unit’s electronic warfare mission.

EW DIRECTORATE
TESTUM PONTUS VERATIS

EW DIRECTORATE

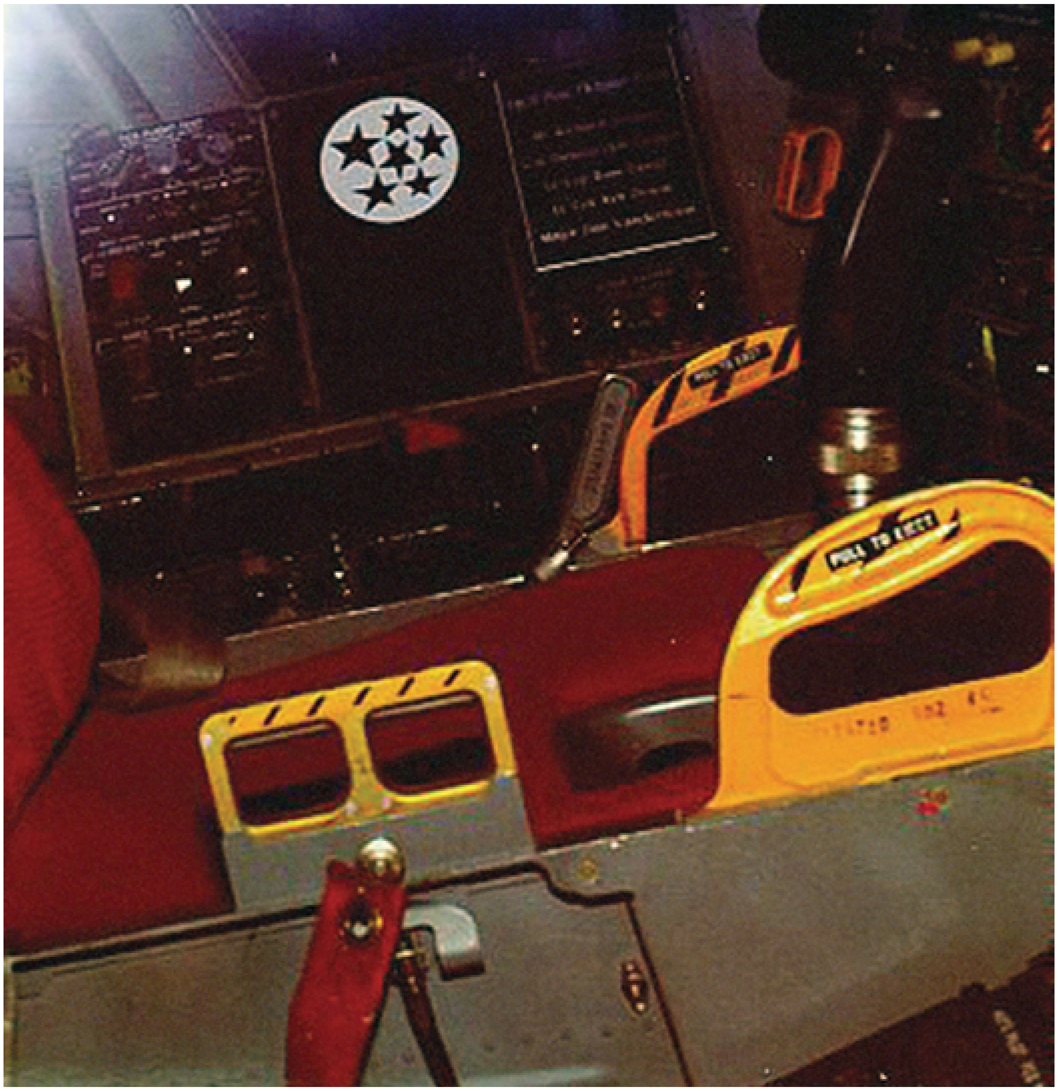
The Electronic Warfare Directorate is the primary EW test organization at Edwards Air Force Base.

Electronic warfare consists of defensive and offensive avionics and includes the so-called “Infowar” revolution in military technologies. Commenting on information warfare, Air Force Chief of Staff John Jumper told Aviation Week and Space Technology that “we’re rapidly approaching the time when you can tell an SA-10’s [surface-to-air missile system] radar that it’s a Maytag washer and put it in the rinse cycle instead of the firing cycle.”

EWAH

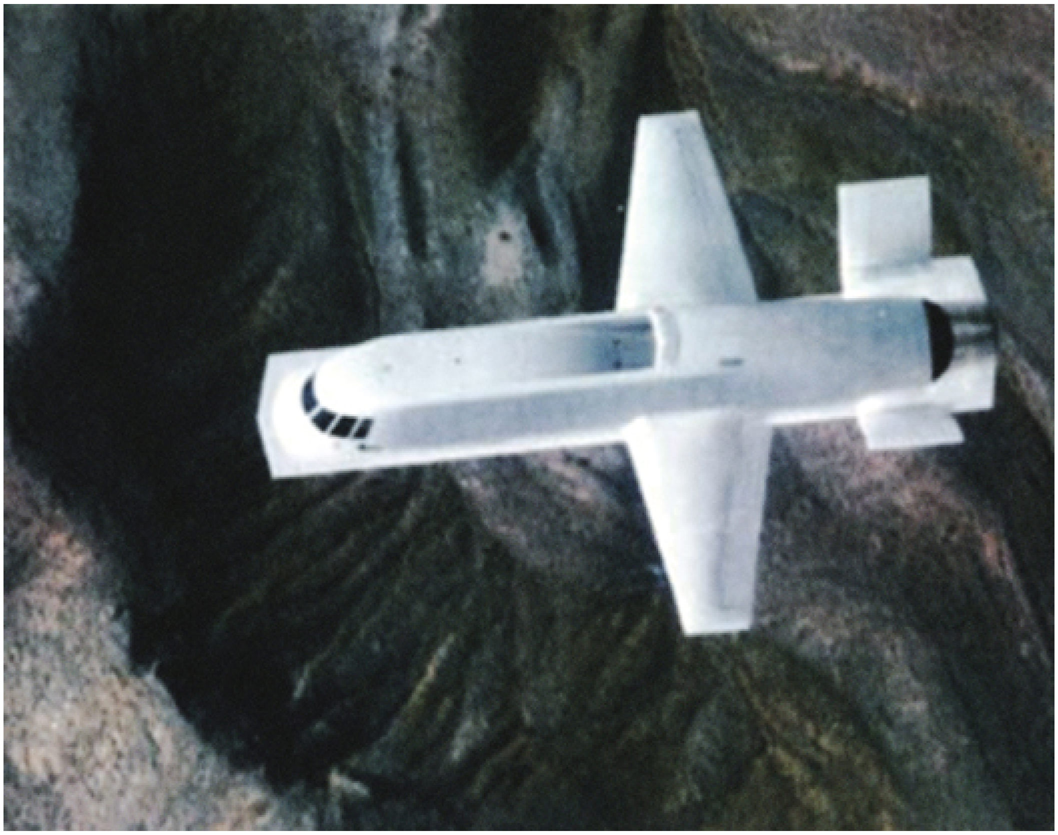
This patch is worn by personnel working for a unit descended from the 413th Flight Test Squadron. Elements of the former 413th FLTS became a part of the EW Directorate known by its organization code EWAH. Located at North Base at Edwards, EWAH has its own commanding officer who reports directly to the EW Directorate.

The collection of 5 + 1 stars recalls the nickname Area 51, the Air Force's classified "operating location" at Groom Lake.



PULL TO EJECT
PULL TO EJECT

A symbol on the inside of the plane’s cockpit shows a collection of five-plus-one stars.



Nicknamed “the Whale,” Northrop’s TACIT BLUE was an early stealth technology demonstrator. It first flew at Groom Lake in 1982 and was retired in 1985. The Air Force made the existence of the black aircraft public in 1996. Both images: USAF

KILLER WHALE
DETERRITUM PER TESTANDUM SUPRA TERRAM

KILLER WHALE

"Killer Whale" was a nickname for the AGM-137 Tri-Service Standoff Attack Missile, also known as TSSAM, which was a project to develop a stealth cruise missile during the 1980s. The name "Killer Whale" has a somewhat complicated history. In the early 1980s, Northrop developed a stealthy prototype aircraft codenamed "TACIT BLUE," which pioneered the use of rounded shapes for stealth aircraft. Because of the plane's unusual shape, it became known as the "Whale" or "Shamu," and the Northrop crews working on the project at Groom Lake became known as "whalers." After TACIT BLUE, which was unarmed, proved that this stealth technology was effective, Northrop began work on the Tri-Service Standoff Attack Missile, which was a variation on the TACIT BLUE design, and resembled the unusually-shaped stealth aircraft. Thus, while the unarmed TACIT BLUE was known as the "Whale," its cruise missile cousin became known as the "Killer Whale."

The Latin phrase "Deterritum Per Testandum Supra Terram" is hard to decipher. The words vaguely translate as "Deterrence/Through/Witness/Above/Earth." Members of the test team choose to interpret it loosely as "Deterrence Through Flight Test."

TSSAM

Because the acronym for the Tri-Service Standoff Attack Missile (TSSAM) recalled the “Tasmanian Devil” cartoon character, the tornado-like image of the character in motion came to represent the classified cruise missile.

SUCCESS
WHERE OTHERS FAIL RANGERS

RANGERS

This patch was designed by security personnel (know as “Rangers”) assigned to classified locations within the Air Force’s Nell is Range Complex.

The design was inspired, in part, by popular stories about ninjas patrolling Nellis black sites. USAF security personnel, whose training and job duties are rather pedestrian, began wearing this patch as an ironic response.

RANGE PATCH

This patch represents various classified locations within the Air Force’s Nellis Range Complex in the Nevada desert.

The meaning of these symbols is unknown.

RED EAGLES
4477th TES

4477th TEST & EVALUATION SQUADRON — “RED EAGLES”

From its inception in 1975, the 4477th Test and Evaluation Squadron conducted tactical evaluations of a highly classified squadron of Soviet fighters in U.S. possession.

The unit was based at Groom Lake until the late 1970s and early 1980s, when the 4477th provided $24 million towards the initial construction of another classified operating location in Central Nevada: the Tonopah Test Range, also known as Area 52.

The 4477th seems to have been disbanded sometime in the early 1990s and its mission taken over by Detachment 2 of the 57th Fighter Wing. Eventually, this became Detachment 3 of the 53rd Test and Evaluation Group.

DET-2 57TH WING
DET-3 53RD TEG

57th FIGHTER WING, DETACHMENT 2

Although all activities associated with Detachment 2 of the 57th Fighter Wing remain classified, it is known that the unit operates under the Advanced Programs office of the 57th Wing. According to official documents from the 57th Wing, which is based at Nellis Air Force Base in Las Vegas, Detachment 2 “operates off-location to support tactical development for the combat air forces.”

DET 2, 57 FW (now DET 3, 53 TEG) has probably taken over much of the 4477th “Red Eagles” mission to provide tactical evaluation of foreign aircraft. Its “off-location” operating base is most likely Groom Lake (Area 51) or the Tonopah Test Range (Area 52).

SEMPER
EN OBSCURUS
SPECIAL PROJECTS

SEMPER EN OBSCURUS

This patch comes from the Special Projects Office, which operated out of the Air Force's Sacramento Air Logistics Center and oversaw maintenance and support of the F-117A stealth fighter program. The phrase "Semper en Obscurus" translates as "Always in the Dark." The mushroom—which grows in darkness—symbolizes the secret nature of the Office's work. This same patch is now used by the 412th Test Wing's Special Projects Office at Edwards Air Force Base.

RAPID CAPABILITIES OFFICE
OPUS DEI CUM PECUNIA ALIENUM EFFICEMUS

RAPID CAPABILITIES OFFICE

Among other things, the Rapid Capabilities Office at Air Force headquarters in Washington is responsible for technical integration of the Department of Defense's classified activities, and for reporting these activities to the Air Force leadership, the office of the secretary of defense, Congress, and the White House.

The symbol in the background of this patch is a black and gray image of the earth, representing the "black world" of classified activities. The Latin at the bottom of the patch translates as "Doing God's work with other people's money."

SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE ACQUISITION
SPECIAL PROGRAMS

DIRECTORATE OF SPECIAL PROJECTS

The Directorate of Special Projects works with the Office of the Secretary of Defense and Congress to direct financial oversight, programmatic evaluation, budget formulation and acquisition management of the $2.2 billion annual Air Force special access program portfolio. The image on the patch recalls a classified aircraft flying above a “black world.”

II DRAGON TEST TEAM

PETE’S DRAGON II

When, in July of 1982, pilot Pete Barnes was scheduled for his first flight in the still-secret stealth fighter, he found that the plane had a green dragon painted on the side. The inspiration for the design came from the Disney film Pete’s Dragon, which was about a green dragon named Elliot who was invisible to everyone except a boy named Pete.

A few years later, Pete Barnes took control of an upgraded stealth fighter, commemorated by the patch shown here. Pete’s Dragon eventually morphed into the “Dragon Test Team.”

DON'T ASK!
NOYFB

DON’T ASK — NOYFB

This patch is from the 22nd Military Airlift Squadron, which flew C-5 cargo aircraft out of Travis Air Force Base in Northern California. Part of the 22nd MAS’ mission was to conduct late night operations picking up classified aircraft from aerospace plants in Southern California and delivering them to classified locations for testing and evaluation.

When the 22nd MAS undertook these missions, its crews would take off their everyday heraldry and Velcro this patch to their uniforms.

The black background and crescent moon on the patch probably represent the unit’s night operations. The silver lining represents star light. The letters “NOYFB” stand for “None of Your Fucking Business.”

GOAT SUCKERS

GOAT SUCKERS

Goat Suckers designates the Q-Unit of the 4452nd Test Squadron, charged in the early 1980s with testing and evaluating a growing squadron of top-secret stealth fighters at the Tonopah Test Range.

In addition to the stealth fighters, the Goat Suckers flew a collection of A-7 Corsair fighters, which were used as chase planes and proficiency trainers. The A-7 also became a cover story for the stealth fighter when its existence was still classified. When stealth pilots were asked about the 4452nd Test Squadron, they would claim that they flew A-7s.

The name Goatsuckers refers to a family of nocturnal birds that, folklore held, fed on goat's milk at night. Included in the Goatsucker family of birds is chordeiles minor: the Nighthawk.

Nighthawk is the nickname of the F-117A stealth fighter; the existence of the F-117A was classified until November 8, 1988.

The Tonopah Test Range at night.

F3XP
M.A.R.S.

F3XP M.A.R.S.

During the years when the F-117A stealth fighter was a black project operating out of the Tonopah Test Range, a secret program known only by the code name F3XP was designed to repair and maintain the aircraft's radar absorbent coatings. Composed of Air Force corrosion control specialists and sheet metal technicians, members of this project, called the Materials Application Repair Section (M.A.R.S.), were known as "Martians."

GRIM REAPERS

GRIM REAPERS

Grim Reapers was the nickname of the 4451st Test Squadron, which operated under the 4450th Tactical Group at the Tonopah Test Range during the 1980s. The unit's mission was to fly a squadron of classified stealth fighters.

When the Pentagon announced the existence of the stealth fighter program in the late 1980s, the Grim Reapers were redesignated as the 416th Tactical Fighter Squadron. After the Grim Reapers' existence became public, the Air Force forced the unit to change their name, as it did not pass the Air Force's requirements for good taste. The Grim Reapers thus became the Ghost Riders.

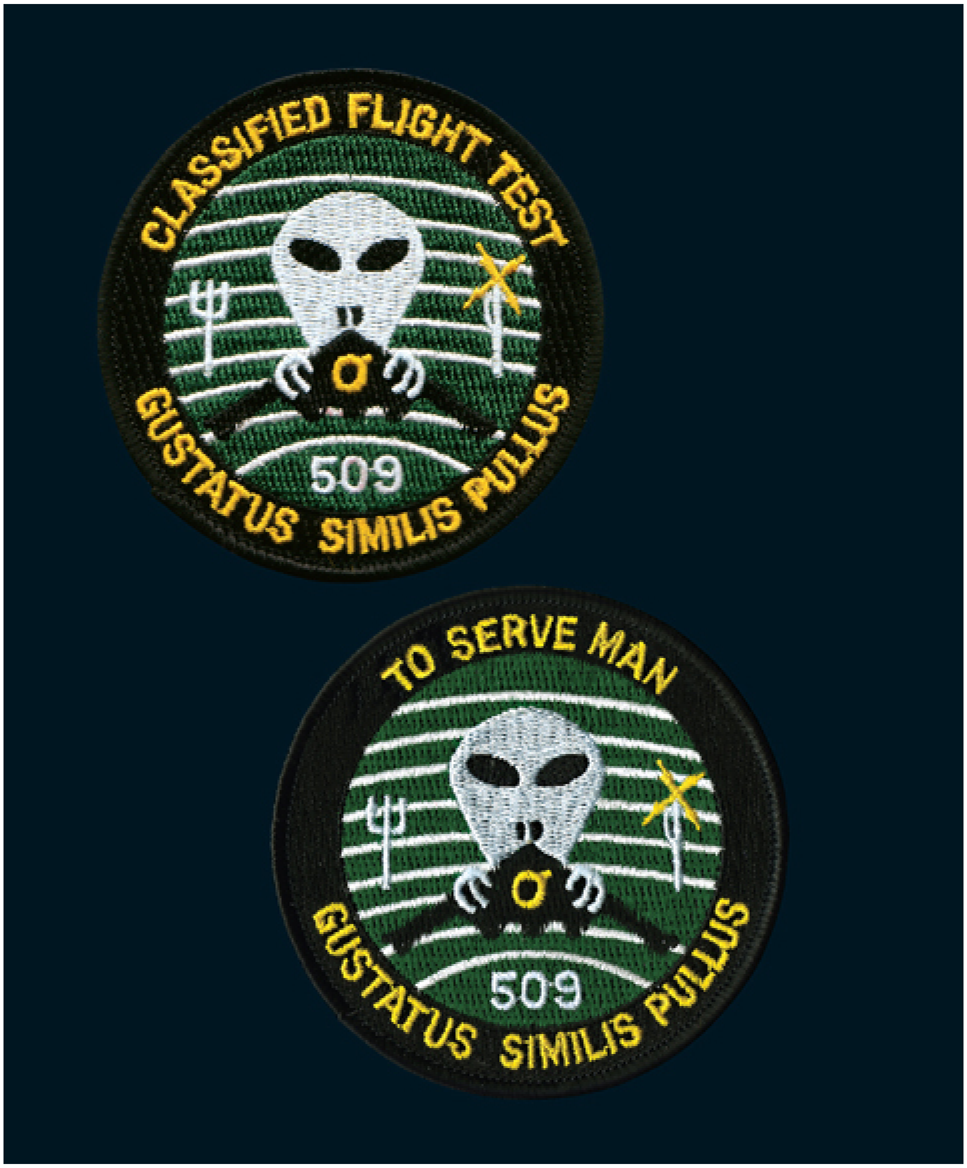
PROCUL ESTE PROFANI
SPECIAL PROJECTS

PROCUL ESTE PROFANI — SPECIAL PROJECTS

This patch is from the 416th Flight Test Squadron’s Special Projects Flight working on advanced technologies for the F-16 Combined Test Force at Edwards Air Force Base.

The phrase Procul Este Profani is usually associated with Virgil’s epic poem The Aeneid. When Apollo arrives at the Temple of Apollo, the prophet Sibyl utters the words “Procul, O procul este profane” before the pair descend into Hades, where Aeneas is told about the future of Rome.

Members of the unit translate the phrase as “Keep your distance, you who are uninitiated.”



CLASSIFIED FLIGHT TEST
σ 509
GUSTATUS SIMILIS PULLUS TO SERVE MAN
σ 509
GUSTATUS SIMILIS PULLUS

CLASSIFIED FLIGHT TEST

This was the original version of a patch commemorating a flight test series involving a B-2 “Spirit” stealth bomber. The Greek sigma symbol on the test shape’s outline signifies the unknown RCS value. The number “509” refers to the 509th Bomb Wing, which operates the United States’ stealth bombers from Whiteman Air Force Base in Missouri. The alien is a reference to the 509th’s infamous lineage. In 1947, the 509th was based at Roswell, New Mexico, home of the “Roswell incident,” which ensued after the 509th’s commander, Col. William Blanchard, issued a press release with the headline “Roswell Army Airfield Captures Flying Saucer on Ranch in Roswell Region.”

The dog-Latin phrase Gustasus Similis Pullus translates as “Tastes Like Chicken.” Note the knife and fork.

This patch was eventually modified when Air Force officials insisted that the phrase “Classified Flight Test” not appear on the design. In an updated version of the patch, “Classified Flight Test” has been replaced with the words “To Serve Man,” referencing a classic episode of The Twilight Zone.

BIG SAFARI

Big Safari is the code name for a program office at the Air Force Material Command at Wright Patterson Air Force Base in Ohio. Founded in 1953, the code name "Big Safari" was classified for decades.

Big Safari is responsible for aircraft specifically designed or modified for missions, including a fleet of RC-135 spy planes codenamed RIVET JOINT.

This patch is from the years when the name Big Safari was classified. The lightning bolts probably refer to electronic warfare. The hog almost certainly refers to RC-135 aircraft, which are sometimes called "hogs" because of their extended noses. The cobra may refer to the code name COBRA BALL, which is the code name for a variation of the RC-135. The dog sniffing the man's foot may refer to the code name COMFY HOUND, which was a quarterly report of electronic warfare activities.

BIG SAFARI PROGRAM

BIG SAFARI PROGRAM

When the code name Big Safari became declassified, the name began to appear on the patch worn by members of the Big Safari Program Office.

Recent projects developed under the Big Safari Program Office include COMPASS CALL (an EC-130H electronic warfare platform), RIVET RIDER (an airborne television broadcast station), PANTHER DEN (an information warfare program office at Hanscom Air Force Base), SCATHE MEAN (a project using decoy drones in the first Gulf War), DISTANT PHOENIX (probably an air-sampling program over the Pacific Ocean in the mid-1990s), and SCATHE VIEW (a program using video cameras embedded in conventional aircraft as a hidden reconnaissance platform).

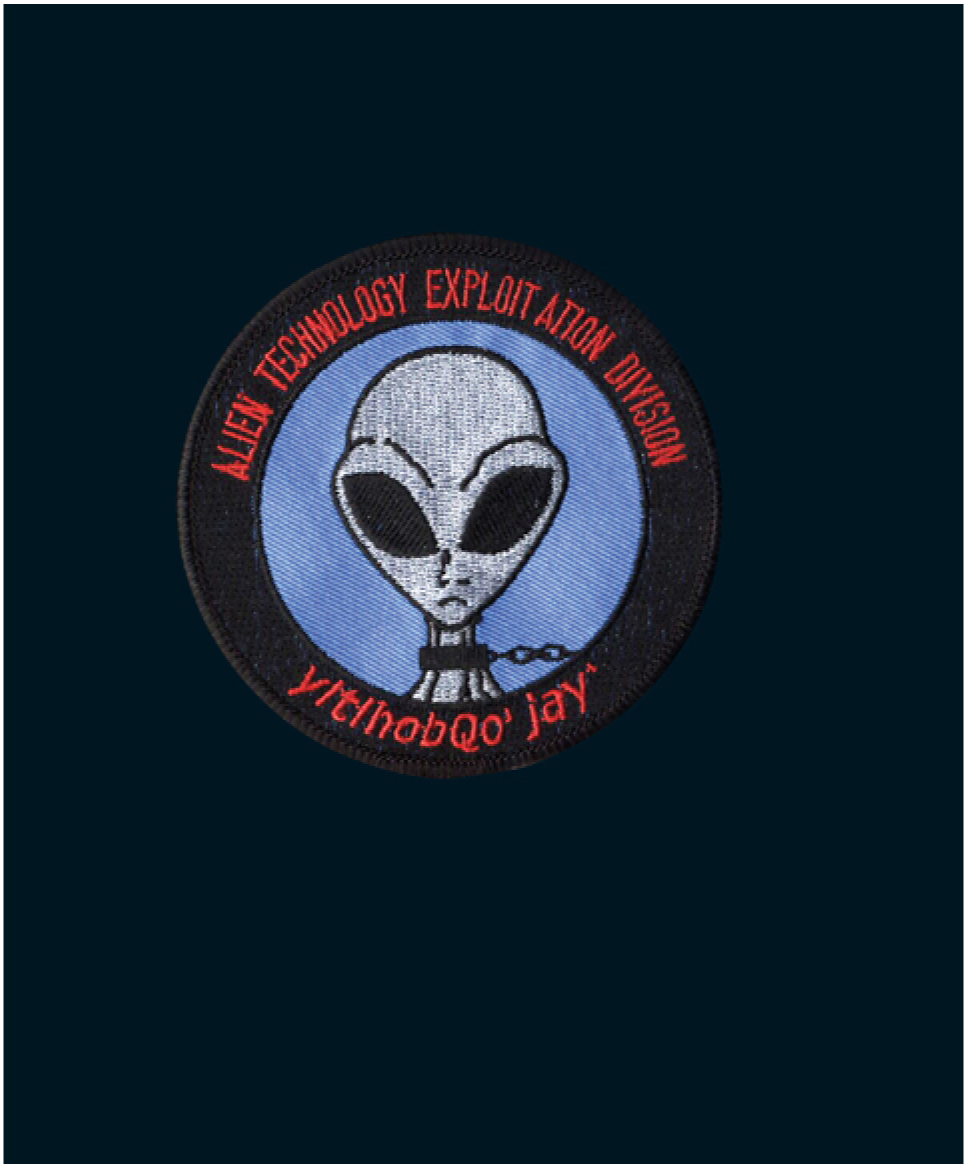
NATIONAL RECONNAISSANCE OFFICE
2000
WE OWN THE NIGHT

NATIONAL RECONNAISSANCE OFFICE “WE OWN THE NIGHT”

This patch commemorates the August 17, 2000, launch of a “classified National Reconnaissance Office payload” atop a Titan IV rocket from Vandenberg Air Force Base in Southern California.

Clues in the patch’s imagery seem to indicate that the satellite in question was, in fact, an ONYX spy satellite, also known by the code name Lacrosse. The owl eyes and the phrase “We Own the Night” seem to imply an imaging platform that can “see” in darkness, indicating a satellite that uses synthetic aperture radar to produce images of the Earth’s surface. The wire mesh surrounding the owl’s eyes is perhaps indicative of the mesh on ONYX satellites, which is purported to cover its antennae.

The triangular images on the patch represent other ONYX satellites, all of which are in a reconnaissance orbit. (Different satellite orbits do different “jobs.”) Two of the filled-in shapes represent active ONYX satellites. The hollowed-out shape represents “Lacrosse I,” which was de-orbited in 1997 after nine years in service (it was originally deployed from the space shuttle Atlantis on mission STS-27). The third solid shape represents the satellite being launched.



ALIEN TECHNOLOGY EXPLOITATION DIVISION
yItlhobQo' jay'

ALIEN TECHNOLOGY EXPLOITATION DIVISION

The Alien Technology Exploitation Division patch was designed by Robert Fabian during the time he was assigned to a classified unit working in a secure facility at Air Force Space command:

> I designed this patch several years ago while stationed at Headquarters, Air Force Space Command. A couple of friends and I pooled our money and had them made—strictly unofficially. I'm afraid there's not a whole lot of symbolism in it. We were working inside a SCIF (vault) and our friends and coworkers used to like giving us a hard time about it, asking if our office was where they kept the alien bodies. As a joke, we told them that dead aliens were no use; we needed live ones to explain their technology to us. After one particularly grueling late night working on briefing slides that went nowhere, we came up with the patch idea. The Klingon translates to "Don't Ask!"
>
> We wore them on our flightsuits for a couple of months before anyone in authority spotted them. Our boss's boss's boss, a Brigadier General, only reaction was to ask where he could get one.

CATCH A FALLING STAR

CATCH A FALLING STAR

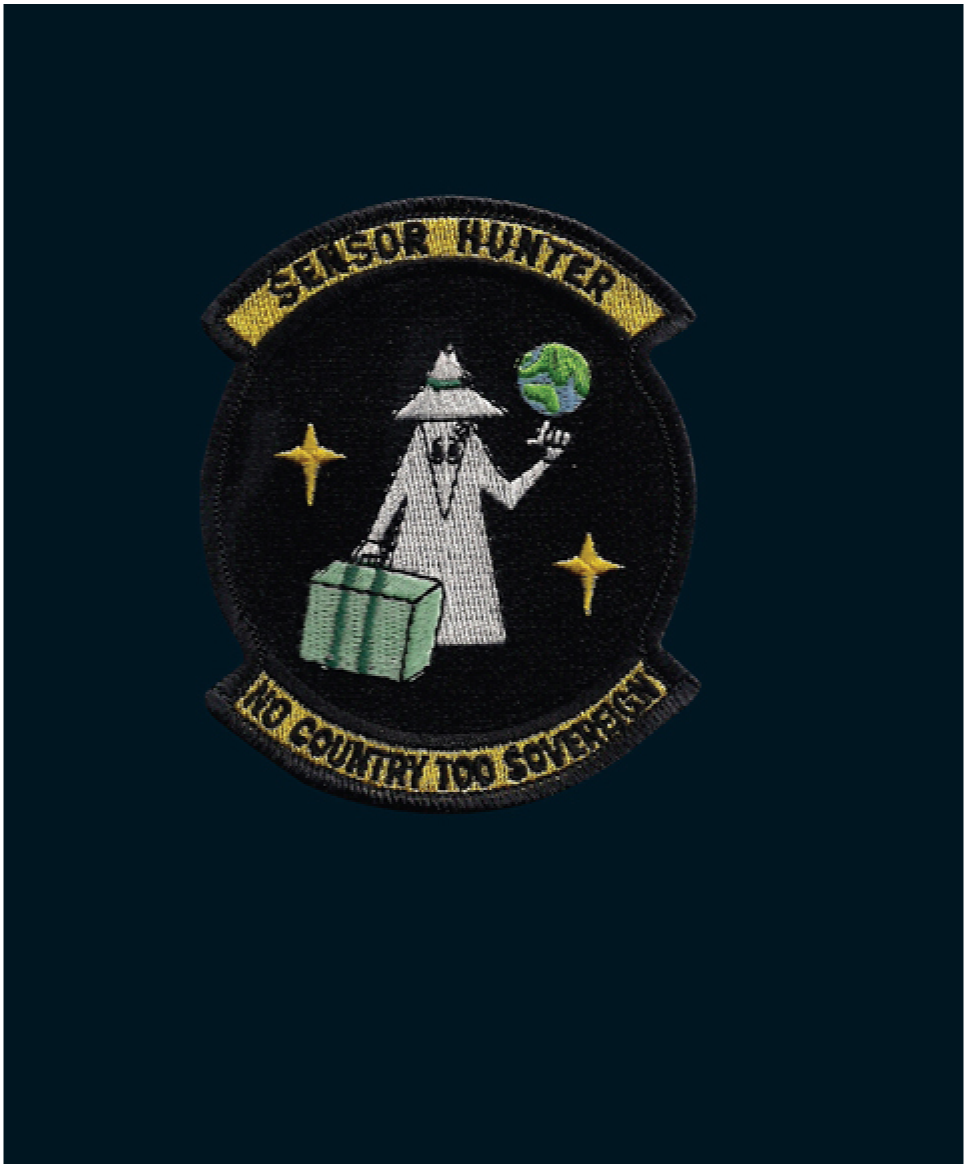
Between the launch of the first photo-reconnaissance satellite in 1960 and the maturation of digital imaging chips in the 1970s, spy satellites produced photographs on long sheets of film. After the satellite's camera had exposed a roll, the film canister ejected from the spacecraft and parachuted towards Earth. Special film-recovery teams were charged with catching the film canisters midair over the Pacific using specially modified aircraft based in Hawaii. This patch was worn by the 6594th Test Group, which was charged with these sensitive missions.

45 SW
AV-018
PAN
PALLADIUM AT NIGHT
ULA
ATLAS

PAN

PAN is a classified spacecraft launched into a geostationary orbit from Cape Canaveral on September 8, 2009. PAN is unique among classified American satellites because, while it is discussed by contractors and appears on military launch schedules, it is not publicly “claimed” by any intelligence or military agency. Space analysts have speculated that the Central Intelligence Agency may be responsible for the satellite.

While some analysts believe the acronym PAN stands for “Pick a Name,” the launch patch for PAN contains the phrase “Palladium at Night.” In Greek and Roman mythology, a palladium was a sacred object—like a statue—that was believed to protect the city or state possessing it. “Pan” could also refer to the Greek god known for inspiring fear and confusion (“pan” is the root of “panic”). PAN may act as a communications relay for armed CIA Predator and Reaper drones operating in Pakistan and Afghanistan.



SENSOR HUNTER
NO COUNTRY TOO SOVEREIGN

SENSOR HUNTER

The unit associated with the Sensor Hunter patch is unknown. Based on the symbolism, it seems likely that it is devoted to reconnaissance and intelligence operations.

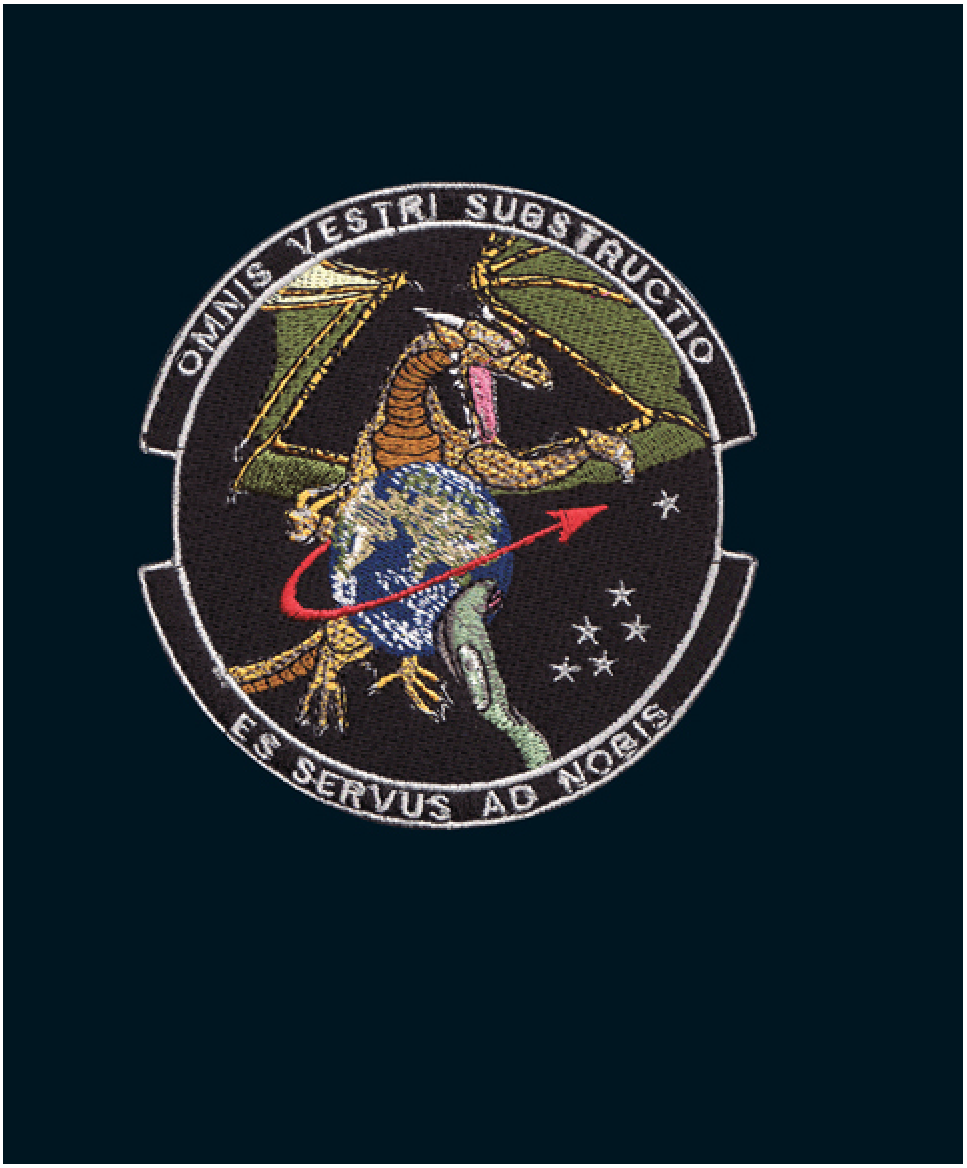
UHF F/O
BELIEVE

UHF F/O

The U.S. Navy’s Ultra High Frequency Follow On (UFO) program is a series of communications satellites designed to replace older Fleet Satellite Communications (FLTSATCOM) and Leasat spacecraft.

The Navy uses UFO satellites as a global communications network, connecting ships at sea, fixed installations, and mobile terminals.

The first UFO satellite (Block 1) was launched in 1993, and the most recent UFO (Block 4) was launched in 2003.



OMNIS VESTRI SUBSTRUCTIO
ES SERVUS AD NOBIS

UNKNOWN DRAGON PATCH

The program associated with this patch remains obscure, but its symbolism provides a number of clues. Overall, the patch strongly suggests a signal intelligence (SIGINT) spacecraft. Dragons have long been associated with SIGINT launches, and the dragon's wings underline the connection (golden dragon wings often symbolize the massive gold-foil dish antennae characteristic of SIGINT spacecraft). Moreover, the red arrow's trajectory suggests a Molniya orbit similar to the JUMPSEAT and TRUMPET spacecraft. In the visual language of classified space launch patches, stars often represent the number of spacecraft in a given lineage or "constellation." The stars here suggest that this spacecraft is being added to a preexisting constellation of five other craft with similar missions.

The meanings of the red point in Asia and the snake-like figure in the lower part of the patch are unclear, although the cobra may refer to a "COBRA"-series sensor platform related to other SIGINT technologies such as "COBRA BRASS," "COBRA BALL," and "COBRA JUDY."

The Latin phrase Omnis Vestri Substructio Es Servus Ad Nobis recalls a 2001–2002 internet meme from a poorly translated Japanese video game: "All Your Base Are Belong to Us." In the opening dialog of the game, an operator says, "We get signal."

Nitwits Rubes Oafs
TOP SECRET
Setec Astronomy

NITWITS RUBES OAFS, SETEC ASTRONOMY

The first letter of each word in the phrase “Nitwits Rubes and Oafs” spells out the agency responsible for this patch: the NRO, the National Reconnaissance Office. Furthermore, “OAFS” could be an acronym for Onizuka Air Force Station, an Air Force Space Operations base in Sunnyvale, California, colloquially known as the Blue Cube.

It is unclear what the collection of three white stars and one black star represents, although these may be related to the collection of four triangles from the NRO’s “We Own the Night” patch depicted on pg. 127.

The phrase “Setec Astronomy” figures prominently in the 1992 film Sneakers, in which the phrase is an anagram for “Too Many Secrets.”

OD-4/DX
We Own The Night

OD-4 / DL AND DX

These patches are from Operating Division 4 of the National Reconnaissance Office. In the OD-4 / DX patch, the phrase “We Own the Night” recalls the phrase associated with the radar-imaging capabilities on the ONYX series of spy satellites. The figure of the owl is also consistent with the theme of seeing at night. The mesh-like structure seems to represent the imaging capabilities of reconnaissance satellites in general, while the polar orbits represented by the rings around the globe are consistent with the types of orbits used by spy satellites.

Mission Operations
You can run...

MISSION OPERATIONS — YOU CAN RUN …

Another patch associated with Operating Division 4 of the National Reconnaissance Office. The background pattern of stars seems to represent the night sky, with the single white star signifying a reconnaissance satellite. Three orbits are depicted around the Earth, all of which are associated with different reconnaissance tasks.

The horizontal orbit around the Earth represents a geostationary orbit for communications and (in the case of the NRO) signals intelligence collection. The Rhyolite/Aquacade series of satellites, for example, were kept in a geostationary orbit over Indochina to constantly monitor Soviet and Chinese communications during the Cold War. The downlink for the Rhyolite satellites was located in the Australian outback at Pine Gap, where the collected signals were encrypted, then sent to the NSA at Fort Meade via another geosynchronous satellite.

The highly elliptical ring depicted on the patch represents a Molniya orbit, which allows a reconnaissance satellite to spend most of its time over one particular region of the Earth and is often used by SIGINT satellites.

The third ring represents a polar orbit, an orbit often associated with imaging and photography because a satellite in such an orbit will cover much larger swaths of the Earth’s surface than satellites in other orbits.

AF TENCAP SPECIAL APPLICATIONS
ODERINT DUM METUANT

AF TENCAP SPECIAL APPLICATIONS

TENCAP is an acronym for Tactical Exploitation of National Capabilities, a collection of programs that involve developing tactical (battlefield) applications out of reconnaissance satellite capabilities (which are normally thought of as strategic).

“Special” almost invariably means “black” or highly classified.

The phrase “Oderint Dum Metuant” is associated with Caligula, the First century Roman emperor whose name became synonymous with depravity, madness, cruelty, and tyranny. It translates “Let them hate so long as they fear.”

Numquam Ante Numquam Iterum

NRO — SNAKES

This patch was designed for the November 8, 1997, launch of spacecraft USA-136, which is believed to be the third spacecraft in the TRUMPET constellation (also known as JEROBOAM). The TRUMPET constellation consists of three spacecraft: USA-103, USA-112, and USA-136.

The three snakes probably represent the three spacecraft that make up TRUMPET, and the three stars at the top of the patch may refer to the same. The way the snakes encircle the earth may also be significant: two of the tails seem to illustrate highly inclined molniya-type orbits, designed to loiter over northern latitudes, while the third seems to illustrate a geostationary orbit. This is curious because all three TRUMPET spacecraft are known to have been placed in molniya orbits.

The Latin inscription reads “Never Before Never Again.”

In documents submitted to the United Nations in compliance with the Convention on Objects Launched into Space, the United States described USA-136 as a “spacecraft engaged in practical applications and uses of space technology such as weather or communications.”

NRO — DRAGON

This is a program patch from the National Reconnaissance Office, the United States' "black" space agency whose existence was a secret until the early 1990s (the agency was formed in the early 1960s).

The patch is associated with a classified satellite launched into geosynchronous orbit from Cape Canaveral on September 9, 2003. Known by the code names MENTOR and ADVANCED ORION, the spacecraft is a late-generation signals-intelligence satellite descended from the 1970s–era RHYOLITE program.

In a series of 2008 articles in The Space Review, Dwayne Day showed that the dragon figure has been associated with space-based SIGINT platforms going back as far as the 1970s. Large, outspread wings are associated with SIGINT spacecraft and thought to represent the circular, football-field sized antennas used to collect stray signals from earth.

The meaning of the diamond is unknown.

MELIOR DIABOLUS QUEM SCIES
VAFB
1st DELTA IV-H
SLC-6

MELIOR

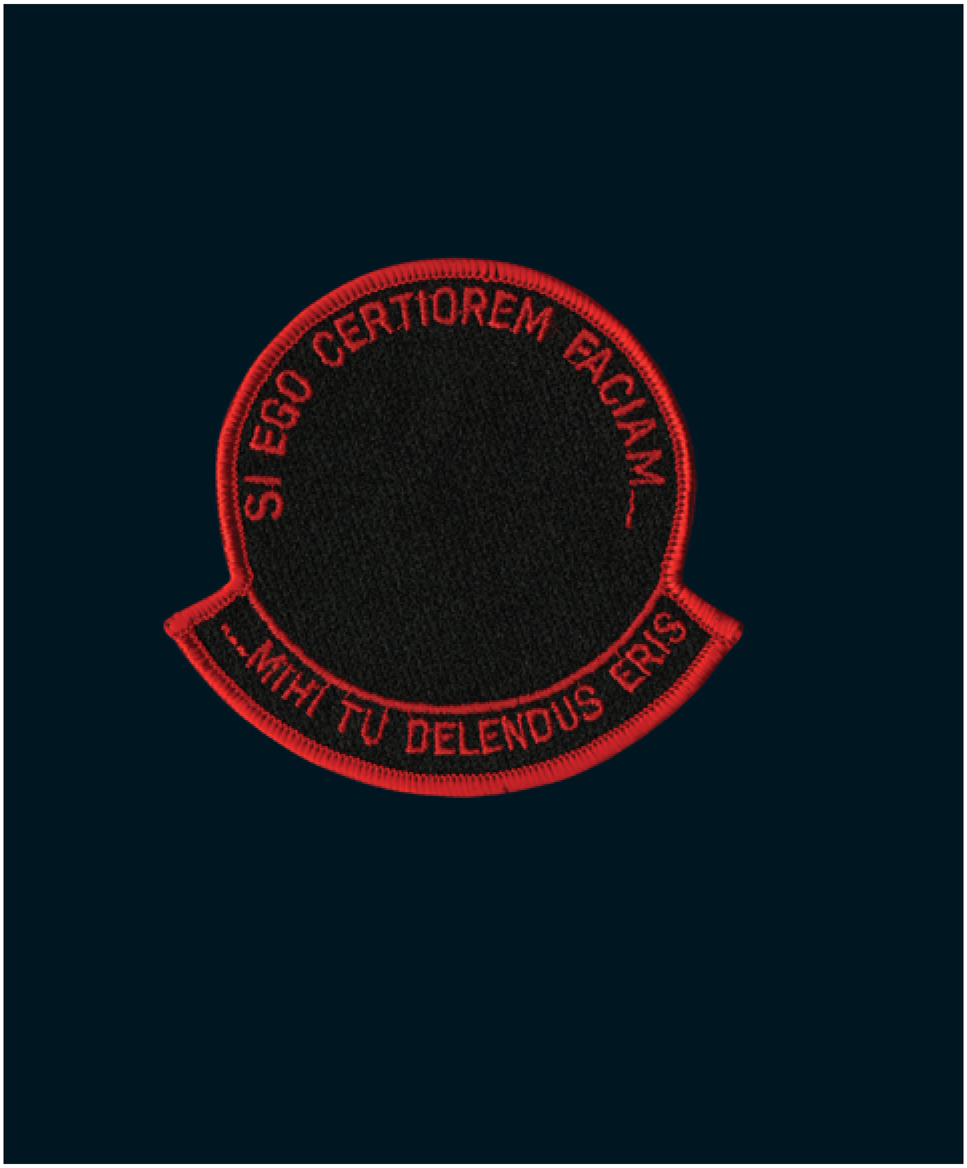
This patch for National Reconnaissance Office Launch 49 shows a phoenix rising from flames, with fourteen stars in the background, another star obscured by the bird's wing, along with the Latin phrase "melior diabolus quem scies."

Dwane Day, writing in The Space Review, has argued that the fourteen stars represent the number of satellites in the KH-11 electro-optical reconnaissance family since its debut in 1976, and that the obscured star signifies a failed launch.

The KH-11 series was supposed to be replaced by a twenty-first century system called Future Imagery Architecture (FIA). The FIA program, however, was cancelled after massive budget overruns and technology failures. In the meantime, the NRO was left with a shrinking constellation of active KH-11s (there are usually four KH-11s in orbit at one time).

The patch for NROL-49 strongly suggests that it will be a final one for the KH-11; the launch is said to have been assembled from spare parts. Thus, the symbolism of a bird rising from fire and ash may represent a KH-11 rising from FIA's demise.

The Latin phrase seems to strongly corroborate this. "Melior diabolus quem scies," translates as "Better the devil you know."



SI EGO CERTIOREM FACIAM...
...MIHI TU DELENDUS ERIS

SI EGO CERTIOREM

This patch was designed as a generic insignia for “black” projects conducted by the Navy’s Air Test and Evaluation Squadron Four (VX-4) based at Point Mugu, California. It was reportedly used during the navy’s involvement with the TSSAM program. It may still be worn by members of the VX-9 squadron formed from a merger of VX-4 and VX-5. VX-9’s mission is to test strike aircraft, conventional weapons, electronic warfare equipment, and to develop tactics involving these weapons systems. The Latin phrase “Si Ego Certiorem Faciam … Mihi Tu Delendus Fris” roughly translates into a cliché commonly heard in the vicinity of “black” programs: “I could tell you, but then I’d have to kill you.”

But the phrasing here is unusual because it is written in the passive voice: a more accurate translation of the Latin would be “I could tell you, but then you would have to be destroyed by me.” By employing the passive voice the patch’s designer makes two references that don’t exist in other phrasings. The first reference is to the Greek God of Chaos, Eris, about whom Homer wrote in Book Four of the Iliad: “[Eris] whose wrath is relentless, she is the sister and companion of murderous Ares. She who is only a little thing at the first, but thereafter grows until she strides on the earth with her head striking heaven. She then hurled down bitterness equally between both sides as she walked through the onslaught making men’s pain heavier.”

The passive phrasing of the Latin also echoes the words of Second century B.C. Roman senator Cato the Elder, who roamed the Senate repeating the words “Carthago delenda est”—“Carthage must be destroyed.” In 149 B.C., Cato got his wish and Rome attacked the city, which was located in North Africa near present-day Tunis. Three years after beginning their assault, the Roman army overran Carthage, tore down its walls, and sold its inhabitants into slavery. After the Roman Senate declared that no one would ever live where Carthage had stood, legend holds that Rome salted the earth around the city in order to ensure that Carthage would remain a wasteland for generations.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Although this book's title page bears the name of a single author, projects such as this are by their very nature collaborative endeavors. The book you're holding is no exception. Numerous people have given me generous access to their time, insight, and to their personal collections in order to realize this project. The majority of them, for obvious reasons, wish to remain anonymous. You know who you are. I thank you immensely. For the record, I'd like to acknowledge the contributions of Peter Merlin, Bugs Mitchell, T. Glen Larson, Rebecca Zorach, Iain Boal and the folks from Dreamland Resort for helping me find and understand the images that have gone into this collection.

I'd also like to thank my colleagues in academia and the arts for their consistent inspiration and support: Negar Azimi, Bidoun magazine, Colby Chamberlain, Cabinet magazine, Lauren Cornell, Beatriz da Costa, Apsara DiQuinzio, Eyebeam Art and Technology Center, Lisa Farjam, Aaron Gach and CTM, Ruth Wilson Gilmore, Ken Goldberg, Renée Green, Gillian Hart, IAA, Adriene Jenik, Thomas Keenan, Shiloh Krupar, Laura Kurgan, Jean Lave, Simon Leung, Michael Light, Yates McKee, Julia Meltzer, Lize Mogel, Sina Najafi, Greg Niemeyer, Marisa Olson, Jack Paglen, Allan and Michele Pred, Rhizome.org, Ananya Roy, Rebecca Solnit, Liz Thomas, A. C. Thompson, Nato Thompson, David Thorne, Anne Walsh, Michael Watts, and Benjamin Young. Praba Pilar belongs in a class of her own.

I'm eternally grateful to Becky Smith, Kristina Ernst, Greg Hopkins, Bellwether Gallery, and Ted Weinstein. They make this and other work possible. Above all, I'd like to thank Kelly Burdick and Melville House for their commitment to this rather unusual project.

IMAGES 1, 2, and 3 © TREVOR PAGLEN.

Trevor Paglen is an artist, writer, and geographer. He is the author of Torture Taxi: On the Trail of the CIA's Rendition Flights (co-authored with A.C. Thompson), Blank Spots on a Map: The Dark Geography of the Pentagon's Secret World, and Invisible: Covert Operations and Classified Landscapes. He lives and works in Oakland and New York City.

I Could Tell You But Then You Would Have to Be Destroyed by Me Emblems from the Pentagon’s Black World

© 2008, 2010 Trevor Paglen
Melville House Publishing
145 Plymouth Street
Brooklyn, NY 11201
mhpbooks.com

eISBN: 978-1-935554-78-3

Library of Congress Control Number: 2010932520

v3.1

https://svalispeaksagain.wordpress.com/2018/07/19/hybrid-labs-fact-or-myth/

Svali Speaks Again

Healing from ritual abuse and mind control

Mizpah: Svali Speaks Again
About
Contact
Blog
Articles Book Info

svalispeaksagain 10:24 pm on July 19, 2018

Tags: mind control (69), nephilim (2), occult (13), programming (60), therapy (3)

Hybrid Labs: Fact or Myth?

Note: the information in this blog post may be triggering to survivors of occultic abuse

Over the years, there have been questions raised and discussions of what have been called “nephilim”, “beautiful ones”, etc., and whether they are real or not. In the Bible, in Genesis, there is mention of “the sons of God” (believed to be angels) having relations with human women, and creating a race of nephilim. The book of Enoch in the Apocrypha also makes some reference to them. Many believe that the myths of half human/half “god” individuals in ancient mythology describe these beings.

What I will share here is based upon my own memories while in the group of these things. I realize that these are recovered memories, shared by parts. Some may disbelieve what I share here, while others may be surprised.

The Jesuit order has been involved in trying to create half-demonic/half-human individuals for many years (since the early 1900’s, especially). This attempt is known as the “Hybrid Project” by those in the order, with the express intent of creating “satan’s son” and includes the following elements:

-A large underground facility (located in Czechoslovakia). This facility has numerous altars within in, where sacrifices are done continuously day and night, for the spiritual empowerment of the project. This facility is equipped with high-tech equipment.

– numerous staff who have strong theta (psychic spiritual) gifts

-birth mothers selected for size, genetics and strength, including strength of will to live.

The latter is extremely important, because carrying a hybrid child is very difficult on the mother. Once impregnated, the birth mother will experience extreme oppression and depression, and over the months, as the fetus grows, the birth mother may literally die from the amount of spiritual oppression in which the mother feels literally consumed from within. In other cases, the mother will abort the fetus before she herself dies, partway through the pregnancy (this happened to me at age 14, when I was a carrier).

Follow •••

In the earlier days of the project, abortions and birth mother deaths were much more common. Many of the hybrid children born only looked partially human. Over time, the technology was developed, along with enhanced genetics (later generation birth mothers were stronger). Omega teams (individuals with strong omega skills) were also developed, during which a group of spiritually strong individuals would spend time around the clock with the birth mother, and literally "take" for a period of time the oppression for her, which allowed birth mothers to carry fetuses to term, and live.

In recent years, several hybrids have been born that look quite human, and that are the product of a spirit father and human mother during specific rituals. One is an individual that the Jesuits believe is "he who has come" or satan's son; this individual is currently 18 years old.

The main issue regarding hybrids is that they do not think or act like humans. These beings have incredibly strong spiritual abilities, and are born with a natural desire to kill. They do not have to be "trained to kill" as humans do; instead, they must be taught to NOT kill, through bonding with a human (usually the birth mother, who is normally a very high-ranking spiritual individual). The birth mothers feed these infants with a combination of milk and blood, obtained by cutting themselves as they nurse the hybrid infant.

These children are incredibly beautiful, although some (but not all) are a bit "odd" in appearance; they may have titanium white hair and violet eyes; or be incredibly strong (they develop coordination and muscle mass much more quickly than full humans). They are able to send very strong demonic attacks (theta skills). They are exceptionally intelligent, and often take on the characteristics of their "birth spirit" as well as the human mother.

The ultimate plan is that the hybrid children being raised now (must are under age 8) will form the future leadership council of the order.

One of the reasons that I left the order years ago was that I disagreed with this. I saw the terrible things done in these labs, and realized that these creatures do not love human beings, or care about their welfare at all. They actually hate all humans, and require significant bonding and gentling to even be able to appear normal to some degree. I remember going to a Jesuit monastery in southern Poland years ago (early in the project days) to work with a hybrid toddler that the staff were afraid of. The toddler had gotten out very early one morning, gone into the chicken coop, and killed all the chickens by pulling their heads off. The toddler was sitting there, eating them, when I arrived. This type of horrific scene can occur with these beings.

After experiences like this, I felt that the order was wrong to fund and staff the hybrid labs, and chose to leave in protest. This was not "improving the world" in any sense; it was senseless to attempt to breed these beings that had a natural cruelty.

I do realize that what I have written here sounds unbelievable – that by writing this, I risk being blown off as a "nut". I wish with all my heart it wasn't true. But this is occurring, and I ask that all Christians join in prayer that this type of occultic activity would be stopped.

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

The overarching purpose of ritual abuse and mind control: remaking man in Satan's image
September 20, 2019
In "dissociation"

The different types of SRA and Mind Control
January 29, 2019
In "mind control"

The Occultic Agenda
April 3, 2021
In "healing"

stephaniekouts 12:58 am on July 22, 2018

Thanks for posting this. It is is actually very believable. To the groups, it must just seem like a 'natural progression'. So good to hear your side of the story. When dealing with the hybrid toddler what methods helped to calm him or her down when no one else knew what to do?

★ Like

svalispeaksagain 1:15 am on July 23, 2018

I was patient, and also relied at the time on my theta (psychic) skills to communicate. I no longer use those skills, but it was important. I also re-bonded the toddler, which helped for a period of time.

★ Liked by 1 person

Russell Mozingo 10:24 pm on November 20, 2018

Thanks for sharing this. You aren't the only one reporting this – Doug Riggs and Amanda Buy have several survivors who were Nephilim mothers. "As in the days of Noah..."

★ Like

John 12:04 am on August 3, 2021

I’ve read much of the info on this site and believe your story but this part may have another explanation. See Mauri’s site – http://reflectionsinthenight.com/grey_aliens.htm

I remember you from an interview you did with Greg Szymanski (Arctic Beacon) and from your forum (Lion and Lamb Ministries) . Glad you are still active.

Svali, have you considered opening up your blog (more active) to comments ?

★ Like

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← Alice in Wonderland Programming Part 2: “Crazy” Alice and Black Alice Programming Programming to Block Healing →

Blog at WordPress.com.

Henry Stevens

Hitler's Suppressed and Still-Secret Weapons, Science and Technology

SUPERMETALS, LASER WEAPONS AND COLD BOMBS-IN 1944??

Nazi technology extended far further than has generally been acknowledged, in fact to almost unfathomable levels! Yet conventional historians have absolutely failed to provide an adequate picture of the technology, science and weaponry of the Third Reich. Was it government intervention, peer skepticism or just plain intellectual laziness which caused these historians to stop digging?

Henry Stevens takes the story to the mat, providing a glimpse into German research of those times relying mostly on the governments own reports. Some reports were declassified just for this book! Stevens also uses direct Nazi sources, summarized and translated in this book.

Now we know what spooked the Allies in the closing months of WWII and why they were in such a panic to win quickly—they had assembled mind-blowing intelligence reports of Nazi development of supermetals, electric guns, and ray weapons that could stop the engines of Allied aircraft—in addition to highly feared x-ray and laser weaponry. Then there were the bombs. Contained in this book are reports of structured bombs of nipolit, N-stoff bombs, cold bombs, oxygen bombs which could destroy all life, atomic bombs and rumors of the mysterious molecular bomb. The true history of the fuel-air bomb is revealed by our own military. There is even a probability that the SS black alchemists of the Third Reich were experimenting with red mercury bomb technology.

Very exotic technologies are also discussed including German experiments in time, sustained fusion reactions, zero point energy and travel in deep space. The reasons for the scientific flowering in Germany during this period are discussed in terms of a completely different scientific paradigm shared by these scientists and how it relates to a unified view of gravity, matter and energy.

Introduction

Much of the material presented in this book came to me by accident, as the result of fifteen years of research into German flying discs. In my first book, Hitler's Flying Saucers A Guide to German Flying Discs of the Second World War, some of that research was presented. What was not presented in that book are the many references to truly amazing technology which seems to have vanished right off the face of the earth. References to this technology are not mentioned by the victorious former Allied Powers for reasons known only to them.

Slowly, at some point in my investigation of German saucers, the fact that other types of technology had been suppressed became apparent to me. From that point on I began to collect references to unknown technology stemming from the Third Reich, which came to me in addition to references made by other researchers.

Some references are better than others. This fact was hammered home in my first book. The topic in question then, German flying discs, was a loaded one socially and politically No monkey business could be tolerated. That book had to be iron clad and so it had to be written with an iron fist, so to speak. To date, no challenge has been made to my first book on the basis of content or facts. This turn of events is surprising to me as it was aimed at the UFO world and the overwhelming specter of the mass media, neither of which cares much for the concept of German flying saucers. This later force is almost omnipotent and grips much of our entire planet in a Matrix-like-world of ignorance on so many vital issues.

This "grip" is one of the reasons for this book. We realize that the movie, The Matrix, was fiction on the physical level. We are not housed in glass tubes being fed nutrients and given a digital identity and reality as in a computer generated game. But on the intellectual level this is not too far from the situation when it comes to secret technology.

Remember Galileo? He knew the world was not flat but could not advocate this truth because of the church dogma of the times. But there certainly was an underground of thinkers who took his proposition as truth. This underground was obliged to mouth dogma in public, only discussing the truth in secret, among trusted comrades. The proof of this is the New World, for Christopher Columbus knew the world was round before he ever set sail. No man, intelligent or otherwise, would knowingly sail off the side of an abyss. Columbus knew the truth but could not speak it. Yet he must have used this knowledge as a selling point to the very religious queen of Spain, Isabella, as he made his plea for funding. Queen Isabella mouthed the dogma but knew the truth or she would have never funded Columbus. Queen Isabella represented the elite of her time but she was willing to forgo dogma, she was willing to use her suppressed information at this particular moment to make a huge gain for herself and her country.

Today, dogma exists in every body of knowledge. Anybody with half a brain who has been through our educational system knows that something is terribly wrong. We know deep down inside that there are truths not being told. When we do independent research, we find inconsistencies in the data and the theories and explanations we are given. There seems to be something, perhaps many things, which are missing. It almost seems that we are educated, not to further explore the mysteries of life for which we have been "trained", but to explain the existing dogma to those outside of our individual specialty.

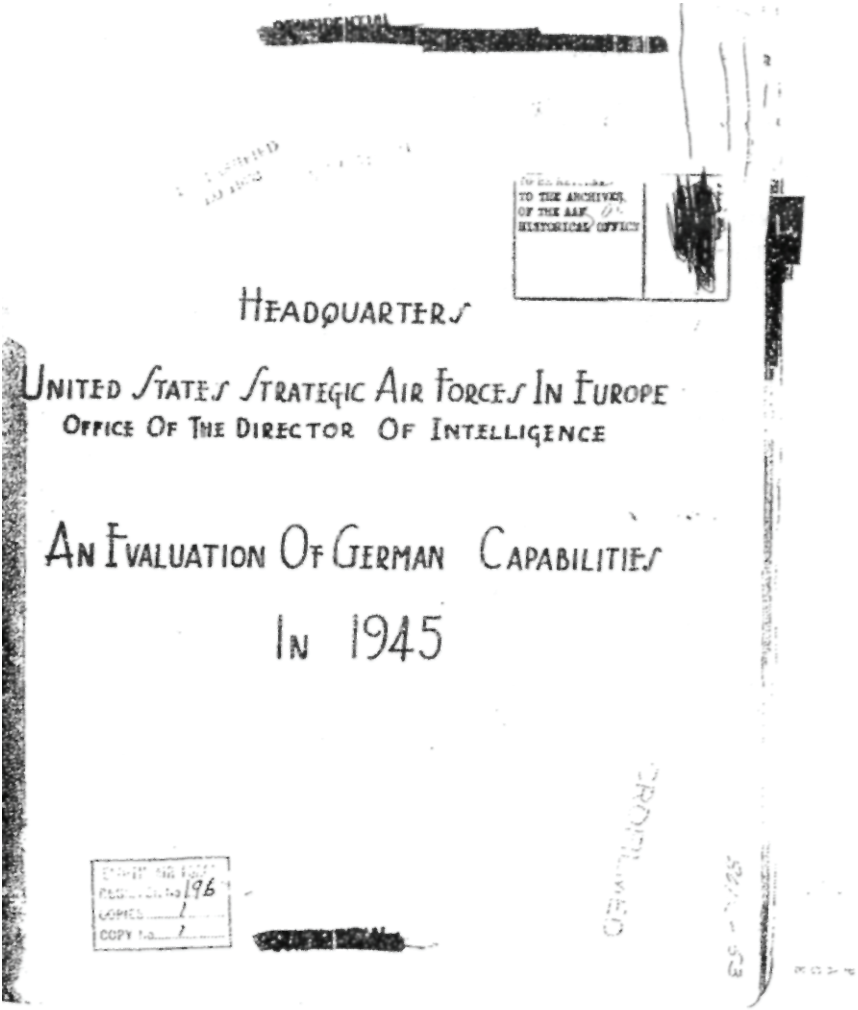
But why should there be missing technology? Science and technology deal in facts without political implications in spite of the efforts of those who have found a comfortable niche in life masquerading in "scientific ethics".

Missing technology is a clue that something is wrong. Missing technology is missing because it has been suppressed. If technology is suppressed, then there is a suppressor. This "suppressor" will eventually use this technology for individual gain. At the right time this technology will surface much as a stock trader illegally uses insider information. If technology is suppressed then, in short, there is a conspiracy to do so. It is my opinion that this conspiracy is large is scope, just as it was in the day of Christopher Columbus and Queen Isabella. The conspirators can be found at the nexus of military, industrial, political, financial and media circles. The exact nature of this conspiracy is really beyond the scope of this book.

In presenting the material in this book I am not as concerned in building the air-tight case as I did for German flying discs. This time around, I am interested in presenting as many examples of lost technology as possible. The only caveat being that the particular technology must be of some interest to me. For this reason some real breakthroughs made by the Germans will be omitted. For instance, breakthroughs in synthetic fabrics and fabric dyes will not be discussed other than to say now that it seems that the Germans can make anything from coal tar from aspirin to plastic. References are given immediately after each chapter so that interested individuals can verify what is said and begin their own research from there.

The stories and tales gathered herein do not constitute the entire collection of lost German technology. Far from it. Remember, the German Patent Office lost thirty boxcars of material to the Allies when the war ended. But even that is not the end of the matter, however. The SS never even bothered to notify the German Patent Office of that institution's advances, thinking itself well above mere patents. In addition to this there were individual inventors in individual laboratories throughout Germany, Austria and the occupied countries whose wartime breakthroughs were taken by known or unknown entities when the conflict ended.

This is not a book about the organization of German wartime research. German wartime research was administered in a complicated way and was always changing in its organization. As far as I am concerned, the only important thing to remember is that as the war progressed the SS secured an ever-increasing control over German research. Some facilities remained independent to the end but probably continued to do so only at the pleasure of the SS command. By the end of the war a whole new research and production command and control structure had been set up which reduced or replaced the



[redacted]

[illegible]
TO THE ARCHIVES
OF THE AAF
HISTORICAL OFFICE

[redacted]

HEADQUARTERS

UNITED STATES STRATEGIC AIR FORCES IN EUROPE
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF INTELLIGENCE

AN EVALUATION OF GERMAN CAPABILITIES
IN 1945

[illegible]
[illegible] No. 196
COPIES 1
COPY No. 1

[redacted]

An Evaluation Of German Capabilities In 1945 - The "Rosetta Stone" This intelligence document was instrumental in finally cracking the U.S. government's wall of silence regarding World War Two German high technology. This document supplied the government's names for German projects. Using German names or using our own vernacular, our government always claimed a "no record" response to requests for this information. Using their own names for things, the government had no option but to produce the documentation under provisions of the Freedom Of Information Act. For instance, our words are foo fighters but their words are phoo bombs. Another example is Motorstoppmittel vs. Magnetic Wave. We now have evidence for all the weaponry discussed in this report. This document continues for the next two pages.

PART SIX - OTHER WEAPONS

1. In the following paragrpahs are listed the actual or potential weapons which the Germans may use against U.STAF operations in 1945. For the most part they include the so-called V weapons. No consideration is given to those for which there is lacking evidence of possible use for some time to come. Both V-1 and V-2 are considered in the analysis because, even though they are, in effect, long-range artillery, they do possess the ability to affect our operations by hitting airfields, and supplies enroute and in concentrations.

2. V-2:

a. Present status. The V-2, or rocket projectile, with a warhead of approximately one ton, and a current range of 225 miles; is being fired at London at the rate of 180/250 per month, and against Continental ports at the rate of approximately 300 per month.

Against London its accuracy is currently rated at 3.2/1,000 per square mile at the main point of impact. Against Continental ports it is estimated at the least 6.1/1,000 per square mile at the main point of impact. The best record was 75 in a twenty-four hour period within a four square mile area of the Antwerp Docks.

b. 1945 Potential: The German plan calls for an increase in montly production from 600 to 1200. It is known, however, that any increase would be at the expense of the aircraft industry in radio equipment and certain essential components. An increase in accuracy would depend upon increased firings and increased use of already proved radio equipment, without which the majority of firings are conducted today. It is thought unlikely that range will be materially increased. Accuracy begins to fall off somewhere between 165 and 190 miles, and becomes increasingly inaccurate to the maximum of 225 miles. Whether or not V-2 becomes an increased menace in 1945 must depend upon the position of the aircraft industry and its requirements. Its potential lies in stabilization of the expanding aircraft program.

Larger rockets (68 feet in length as against 45 feet) are known to exist, and may appear in small quantities during the year. They would have a considerably larger warhead.

3. V-1:

a. Present Status: The so-called Flying Bomb is being fired from launching ramps against Continental targets, ports and supply concentrations, at the rate of 600 per month, and against England by airborne launchings, at the rate of 250 per month. Accuracy against Continental targets is now between 11.0/1,000 per square mile at main point of impact, and against England at 3.3/1,000 per square mile at main point of impact.

b. 1945 Potential: Here again, the German plan calls for an expansion in production, but, as in the case of V-2, this expansion must be at the expense of other vital industries. Authoritative estimates state that airborne launchings against England may reach 450 per month, and that a very substantial increase of launchings on the Continent will take place. On the other hand, the number of He-111s available for airborne launchings is distinctly limited, and the demands of other industries are such that the expanded production may not be carried out as planned.

4. "PHOO" BOMBS: Occasionally reports by pilots and the testimony of prisoners of war and escapees describe this weapon as a radio-controlled, jet-propelled, still-nosed, short-range, high performance ramming weapon, for use against bombing formations. Its speed is estimated at 525 mph and it is estimated to have an endurance of 25 minutes. These bombs are launched from local airfields, and are radio-controlled, either from the ground, or possibly by aircraft. The few incidents reported by pilots indicate no success. They have passed over formations, andperformed various antics in the vicinity of formations. It is believed that in order to be effective some 100/200 would have to be launched against a formation, and it is also believed that they will not be produced in sufficient quantities to prove a real menace in 1945.

[redacted]

5. MAGNETIC WAVE: The best information available is from very secret and reliable sources, and forces the conclusion that this weapon exists as a possibility. It is designed to cause failure of various electrical apparatus in aircraft. Technically it does not appear to be a possible serious threat in 1945. At most it would be effective at a few locations for preventing ground strafing. Evidence to date indicates that it could have little effect against high level attack, since the apparatus would be too cumbersome to permit its use in aircraft.

6. GASES APPLICABLE TO AIRCRAFT: Two types of gases applicable to aircraft are known. One is designed to cause pre-ignition, blowing the heads off cylinders; and the other is designed to break down the viscosity of lubricating oils. Under laboratory conditions, free from operational considerations, these gases are a distinct possibility. It is doubtful, however, that with proper fighter escorts a sufficient concentration of either of these gases could be thrown against our formations to have any serious effect. Similarly, it is doubted whether sufficient anti-aircraft guns are available to produce an effective concentration, and it is probably that any possible concentration would be no more effective than a similar amount of well-directed flak.

7. ATOMIC BOMB: Close check of every report, and close surveillance of the area in which tests are alleged to have taken place lead to the conclusion that such bombs are not a likelihood in 1945.

THIS PAGE IS UNCLASSIFIED

figures we normally think of as running the Third Reich such as, for instance, Herrmann Goring and Albert Speer. When the Allies finally forced the collapse of Germany and began interrogating the officials with whom they were familiar, they had to learn a whole new set of names and locations in deciphering the new weapons research and development chain of command. First and foremost of these was General Dr. Ing. Hans Kammler and the super-secret organization which he set up to research and catalog scientific findings within the Reich, the Kammler Group.

We will start off with some simple, seemingly isolated reports.

We may see some of them again in a completely different setting or in an advanced form, so please bear with me and read from start to finish without jumping around.

What happened to all this stuff? I have reports and lots of questions myself but not many answers as to where it all went or why. You will have some ideas about what happened before you finish this book. I will save my speculation for the Conclusion.

Contents

Introduction i

1 The Kammler Group 1

2 The Stonewall and Undervaluation 6

3 German Digital Computers 18

4 German Flying Discs Update 24
Witness to a German Flying Disc

5 The Electromagnetic Vampire 27

6 Liquid Air 30

7 Synthetic Penicillin Substitute "3065" 37

8 Synthetic Blood 42

9 Human Nutrition and Performance Enhances 44

10 Magnetofunk and Himmelskompass and Point 103 52

11 German Free Energy Research 58

12 Technical Infrastructure 63

13 German Atomic Test 75

14 La Fusee Pilotee "T" 87

15 Mysterious German Bombs 91

16 "Projekt Hexenkessel" The Fuel-Air Bomb 103

17 "Pfiel" (Arrow) Aircraft 112

18 Supermetals 122

19 N-Stoff 131

20 Nipolit 134

21 Red Mercury 137

22 Electric Gun or Rail Gun 152

23 Electric Gun Part 2 156

24 Means To Stop Engines
Gas 163

25 Means To Stop Engines
Magnetic Wave —Motorstoppmittel 170

26 "Death Rays"
X-Ray—Gamma Ray Weapon 190

27 "Death Rays"
Laser Weapon 198

28 Distillation off Crude Oil Using Sound Waves 209

29 Synthetic Production of Gasoline 212

30 Super Lubricants 217

31 What is Happening in Antarctica? 220

32 Large German Mystery Rockets
"The Hammer of Thor" 227

33 Yet Another "V-3" Rocket 238

34 "Y" Communication Facilities 245

35 Experiments in Time 248

36 Dr. Ronald Richter 258

37 Dr. Friedrich Gold, Again 306

38 Why? 309

39 Kammler Again 324

40 Conclusion 332

Thanks 335

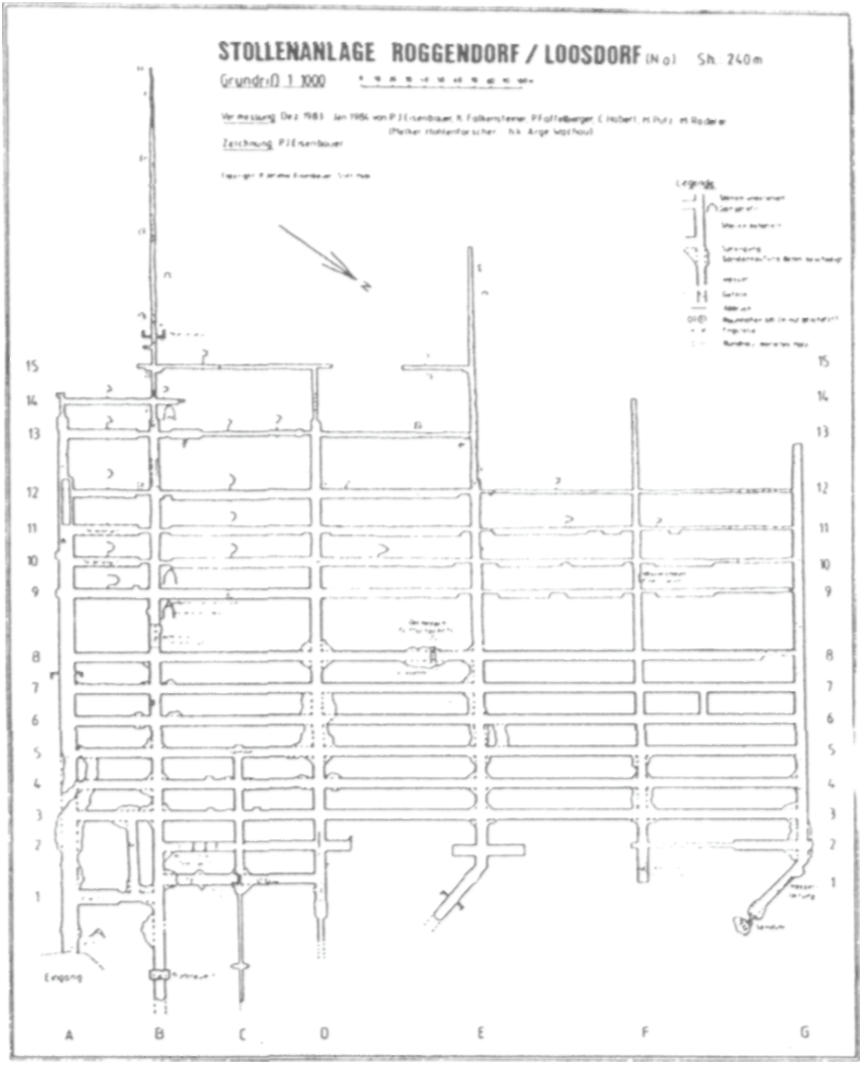
1 The Kammler Group

The Kammler Group or Kammler Staff owes its name to Hans Kammler. Kammler was born on August 26, 1901 at Stettin in northern Germany. He was a Doctor of Engineering. Kammler specialized in the very rapid construction of bombproof underground facilities. His ability to work ahead of schedule impressed all those around him and caused his rapid rise within the military-engineering world and from the Luftwaffe to the SS.

Parallelling Kammler's meteoric rise was the rise of the SS itself. The SS increasingly usurped power from the military but it also usurped industrial and scientific research and development, as well as economic functions which had previously been in civilian hands. This transfer of power exploded following the August, 1944 attempted assassination of Hitler. From that moment on, Hitler seems to have relied on the SS primarily.

Meanwhile, Kammler's SS Works Division C was busy burrowing into German soil and burying and hiding its industry there. He built countless underground installations, some of which remain unknown and unexplored today. To do this, Kammler had at his disposal, a slave-labor force which could have been as high as 14 million.

Eventually, Kammler became the number three man in the SS, behind Heinreich Himmler and SS General Oswald Pohl. And besides overseeing construction projects Kammler was also given responsibility for missile production in Germany as well as jet aircraft production. At this point Kammler began sucking in



STOLLENANLAGE ROGGENDORF / LOOSDORF (N.ö.) Sh. 240m
Grundriß 1:1000
Vermessung: Dez. 1983 - Jan 1984 von P.J. Eisenbauer, K. Falkensteiner, P. Foffelberger, C. Hobert, H. Putz, M. Roderer
(Melker Höhlenforscher - h.k. Arge Wachau)
Zeichnung: P.J. Eisenbauer
Legende
N 15
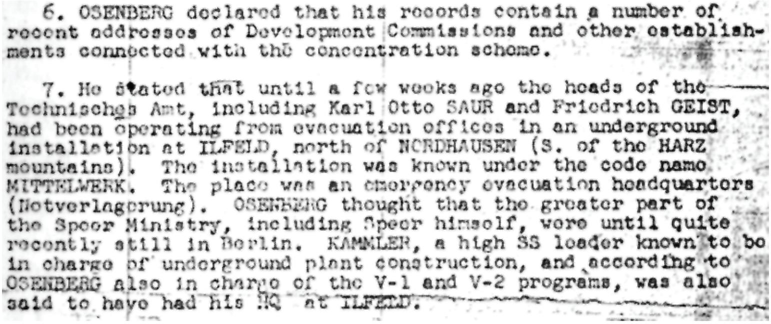
14
13
12
11
10
9
8
7
6
5
4
3
2
1
Eingang
A
B
C
D
E
F
G

This is diagram of Kammler's facility in Austria code-named "Quarz". This was nearing completion as the war ended. It would have been Kammler's private nest and headquarters.



6. OSENBERG declared that his records contain a number of recent addresses of Development Commissions and other establishments connected with the concentration scheme.

7. He stated that until a few weeks ago the heads of the Technisches Amt, including Karl Otto SAUR and Friedrich GEIST, had been operating from evacuation offices in an underground installation at ILFELD, north of NORDHAUSEN (S. of the HARZ mountains). The installation was known under the code name MITTELWERK. The place was an emergency evacuation headquarters (Notverlagerung). OSENBERG thought that the greater part of the Speer Ministry, including Speer himself, were until quite recently still in Berlin. KAMMLER, a high SS leader known to be in charge of underground plant construction, and according to OSENBERG also in charge of the V-1 and V-2 programs, was also said to have had his HQ at ILFELD.

These are two statements made by Professor Osenberg in a Combined Intellegence Objectives sub-Committee report, number 51, dated June 2, 1945. Osenberg was head of the Reichs Research Council. Professor Osenberg was a very influential scientist and one who steered the course of scientific research and development within Nazi Germany. In this report, Osenberg actually says the name "Kammler", which is one of the very few times Kammler's name was allowed to be reproduced in this official documentation.

projects and responsibility far beyond the alleged scope of his duties. Eventually, virtually every priority or secret technology and weapons system fell under his control.

This was a big responsibility, even for a guy like Kammler, but Kammler solved or perhaps controlled this problem as he had solved all his other challenges, by organization. Kammler put together a think-tank. This involved finding and organizing a technical staff who could take potential war-winning ideas and research these ideas, develop them to the point of practicality, coordinate their production with an appropriate industrial firm, and deliver them to the field, usually to the Reich's soldiers of choice, the Waffen SS. This means that by war's end, the Kammler Group ending up sitting on a huge library: a nest-egg of German research secrets.

The Kammler Group needed a secure home in which to operate. They needed the use of technical laboratories and machine tools. Kammler found the environment he was looking for in the Skoda Works at Pilsen in what is now the Czech Republic. During World War Two, this region had been annexed by Germany and was part of the Greater German Reich. For a period of time Reinhard Heydrich administered the region with an iron fist resulting in a relatively stable occupied population. The population contained Czechs and also Germans. The Skoda Works relied on German supervisors or German-trained Czech supervisors and a skilled work force of Czechs.

Skoda did many things and must be thought of like one of the major technical industrial manufacturing firms in the USA today. Examples of these are Boeing, General Dynamics, General Electric, Lochkeed or perhaps even General Motors. Skoda was not, however, considered as a core "German" company by the German military since it was outside Germany proper and had a history going back to Austro-Hungarian times. This was perfect for Kammler. Kammler spoke Czech. Skoda had countless sub-facilities in the area. Skoda, technically, had everything Kammler needed.

Security was the last piece in the puzzle. It is a puzzle today because Kammler's security was never breached. It was not breached by the U.S., British Intelligence or even Soviet Intelligence which thought they knew everything. Kammler was able to pull Albrich's Cloak of Obscurity over himself and his staff using a tripple-wall of counterintelligence. There were three counterintelligence divisions at work in the Kammler Group. These were the military counterintelligence unit, the political counterintelligence unit and the industrial counterintelligence unit.

This security arrangement was so successful that when the Allies began advancing into Germany in the early spring of 1945, nobody asked the local population anything about Kammler or the Kammler Group. Neither side knew anything about it. By the time the "boots on the ground" realized who Dr. Kammler and his organization really were, his very name became a forbidden subject. This was probably so lest the other Allied Powers, especially the Soviets, learn of any potential treasure-trove of scientific secrets.

Remember, Kammler administrated up to 14 million slave-laborers. I think we can all agree that this was probably illegal and this led to the deaths of some, if not many, conscripts. Yet Kammler was not charged with war crimes at the Nuremberg hearings. Kammler's name only came up twice and nobody, none of the Allied Powers conducting these hearings, bothered with follow-up questions about Kammler. Also remember that Field Marshal Hermann Goering was tried, convicted and sentenced to hang for using slave labor. What is going on here?

Dr. Ing. Hans Kammler's life and "death" are full of mysteries. Unfortunately, we only have so much time and space, so this discussion of Kammler and his Kammler Group must be limited to secret weapons and high technology activities. Kammler would have had knowledge of everything described in the pages of this book. As a matter of fact, this book as well as everything ever written about Kammler, German secrets, and German secret weapons is probably only a tiny drop in the whole bucket of his nest-egg.

SOURCES

1. Agoston, Tom, 1985, Blunder How the U.S. Gave Away Nazi Supersecrets to Russia, Dodd, Mead and Company, New York

2 The Stonewall and Undervaluation

Before describing some of this lost technology itself a couple of things should be mentioned. Getting real information out of the government of the United States is not as easy as it should be if you read the Freedom Of Information Act. For some reason, the government is very reluctant to disclose anything once classified. Sometimes it even goes beyond this, however. Sometimes information is declassified but then filed away where the light will never shine, without index or filing records. In fact, the information was classified, declassified and then, in the de facto sense, re-classified. Here is how it works.

The Army, or Air Force or Navy has wartime records. After awhile, they decide these records are old news and reassign and ship them to the U.S. National Archives and Records Office for storage, safe keeping and perhaps declassification and dissemination. The National Archives are stingy with their index system. They have a computer-based system, known by their acronym, N.A.I.L. but using this system a person cannot even find records previously produced by the National Archives. This secret-keeping regarding their holdings allows them to generate a "no record" at will. Any argument or appeal is met with the refrain "we don't do research". The U.S. National Archives honestly believes pulling a file is research. The only working methodology is to request a list of their holding for a particular topic as a separate Freedom Of Information request and then use it against them. Even with box numbers, file numbers, group numbers, etc., the National Archives frequently claim the item is out of file or lost. So, even with all the appropriate identification, so their clerks can walk right to the filing cabinet, open the drawer and go right to the information requested, they then seem to want to know which of their two hands is holding the file in question. This is their stonewall strategy and it is their first line of defense.

The German U-boat, U-234, and its cargo are an infamous example of this secrecy. Briefly, U-234 was a mine-layer, converted into a cargo submarine which left Germany for the Norwegian fjord of Kristiansand in the middle of March, 1945, the dying days of the 3rd Reich. Aboard were two Japanese officers, reels of microfilm on super-secret German weaponry, an entire disassembled Me 262 (the jet fighter) German scientists, specialists and technicians, and ten barrels of uranium oxide each weighing 56 kg each. This was not normal uranium oxide. It had been irradiated in an atomic reactor (or perhaps enriched by some other process) and converted into uranium 235, the uranium required for an atomic bomb.

This U-boat allegedly bound for Japan, ended up surrendering to U.S. authorities on May 19th, 1945, off the east coast of the United States. The story of the enriched uranium falling into the hands of the Americans in this way is legendary and has been cited many times. Remember, the Germans surrendered on May 8, 1945 and the United States was still at war with Japan at this time. The first atomic bomb detonated by the U.S. authorities was not until July, 1945. There has always been the hint or suspicion that the uranium carried by the U-234 found its way into the American uranium bomb dropped on Nagasaki.

I set out to verify this naval legend. I wanted to actually document the uranium on the German U-234. I wrote to the source always given, the U.S. National Archives. They generated a bill for copying and a statement denying fissionable material being aboard U-234 (see the copy of the National Archive's letter). I requested the bill of lading anyway and there was no uranium on their list, as they stated. Naturally, I appealed and got nowhere.

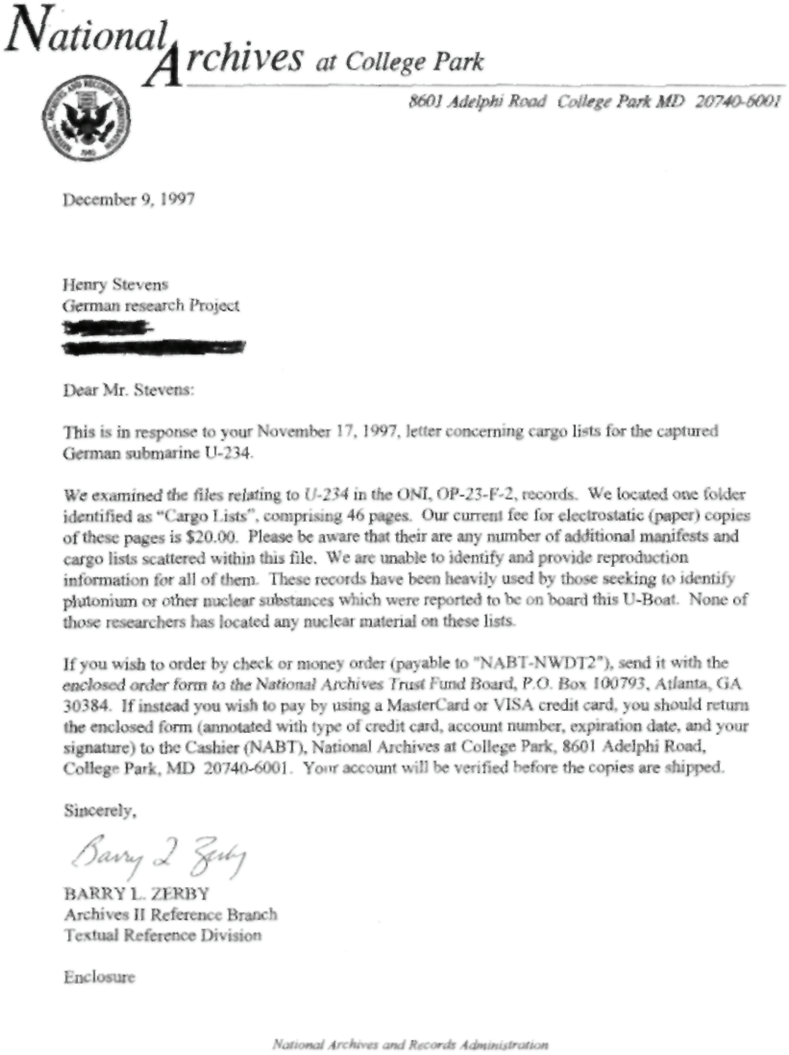
Originally, U-234 had surrendered to the U.S.S. Sutton. A request was made to the agency which would have originally held this information before transfer to the National Archives, the Naval Historical Center, Washington Navy Yard. To my surprise, it was no secret or mystery at all and they were perfectly willing to send me a micro-fish copy of the cargo list for $5.00. Sure enough, the cargo list was exactly as sent by the National Archives except for the fact that the uranium oxide canisters were present and listed as the reader can see. This is in contrast to the list provided by the National Archives. Had the U.S. National Archives actually lied? Not only did they lie, but had they altered records and then covered up the whole thing? I wondered how they would react over a request for truly sensitive information?

The second big problem encountered is the undervaluation of German technology by the Allies. They seem to do this as a matter of course. This may have originated during the war itself. After all, did we really want to tell our 18 year-old soldiers that the German soldier was better trained than he was? Or did we want to tell him that the Germans had better small arms, machine guns, or tanks? Of course the answer is no. This undervaluation extended to matters of higher technology as well, especially aircraft and missiles. After the war re-use of this dis-information technique proved to be a successful way of minimizing German achievements in comparison to ours as part of some sort of nationalist, cold-war reasoning. Let me cite one example.

During the war, the Germans experimented with tailless, flying wing aircraft. The ones described here were made by the firm Horton, owned by the Horton brothers. There were several flying wing designs under development during those years for various purposes but the one in question is the Horton 9.

The Horton 9 was a tailless, jet-powered, flying wing fighter. Only three were ever built. The first Horton 9 (V-1) was never given engines and used as a glider for test purposes. The second Horton 9 (V-2) was given jets and tested. The third aircraft was actually produced by another company, the Gotha firm who was to mass-produce this aircraft. This one aircraft was given the designation Gotha 229 and was never fully assembled and never flew. It fell into the hands of the Americans while still in pieces.

So, it was only the second Horton 9, the V-2 version that flew at all. In fact, it flew very well. Remember, this was a tailless flying wing that flew before computer avionics made such aircraft possible in the USA. Evidently, the Horton 9 was so well thought out that a mere human pilot could fly it. But the Horton 9 was somewhat more than just an ordinary fighter aircraft. During flight testing it was noticed that the radar return for this aircraft was almost absent. The Germans got busy with this idea and planned to paint the Horton 9 with radar



National Archives at College Park
8601 Adelphi Road College Park MD 20740-6001

December 9, 1997

Henry Stevens
German research Project
[redacted]

Dear Mr. Stevens:

This is in response to your November 17, 1997, letter concerning cargo lists for the captured German submarine U-234.

We examined the files relating to U-234 in the ONI, OP-23-F-2, records. We located one folder identified as "Cargo Lists", comprising 46 pages. Our current fee for electrostatic (paper) copies of these pages is $20.00. Please be aware that their are any number of additional manifests and cargo lists scattered within this file. We are unable to identify and provide reproduction information for all of them. These records have been heavily used by those seeking to identify plutonium or other nuclear substances which were reported to be on board this U-Boat. None of those researchers has located any nuclear material on these lists.

If you wish to order by check or money order (payable to "NABT-NWDT2"), send it with the enclosed order form to the National Archives Trust Fund Board, P.O. Box 100793, Atlanta, GA 30384. If instead you wish to pay by using a MasterCard or VISA credit card, you should return the enclosed form (annotated with type of credit card, account number, expiration date, and your signature) to the Cashier (NABT), National Archives at College Park, 8601 Adelphi Road, College Park, MD 20740-6001. Your account will be verified before the copies are shipped.

Sincerely,

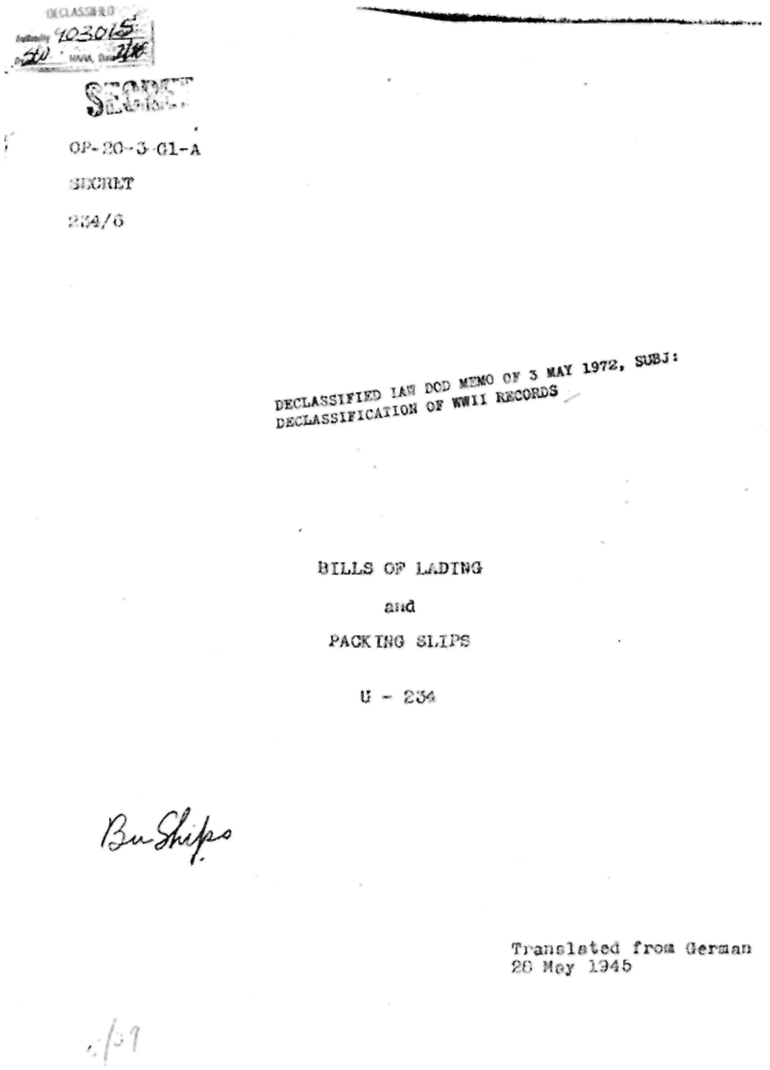
Barry L Zerby

BARRY L. ZERBY
Archives II Reference Branch
Textual Reference Division

Enclosure

National Archives and Records Administration

U-234 Deceptive Response - U.S. National Archives. Please note the last two sentences in the second paragraph. Was this information altered?



DECLASSIFIED
Authority 903015
By SW NARA, Date 2/..

SECRET

OP-20-3-G1-A

SECRET

234/6

DECLASSIFIED IAW DOD MEMO OF 3 MAY 1972, SUBJ:
DECLASSIFICATION OF WWII RECORDS

BILLS OF LADING

and

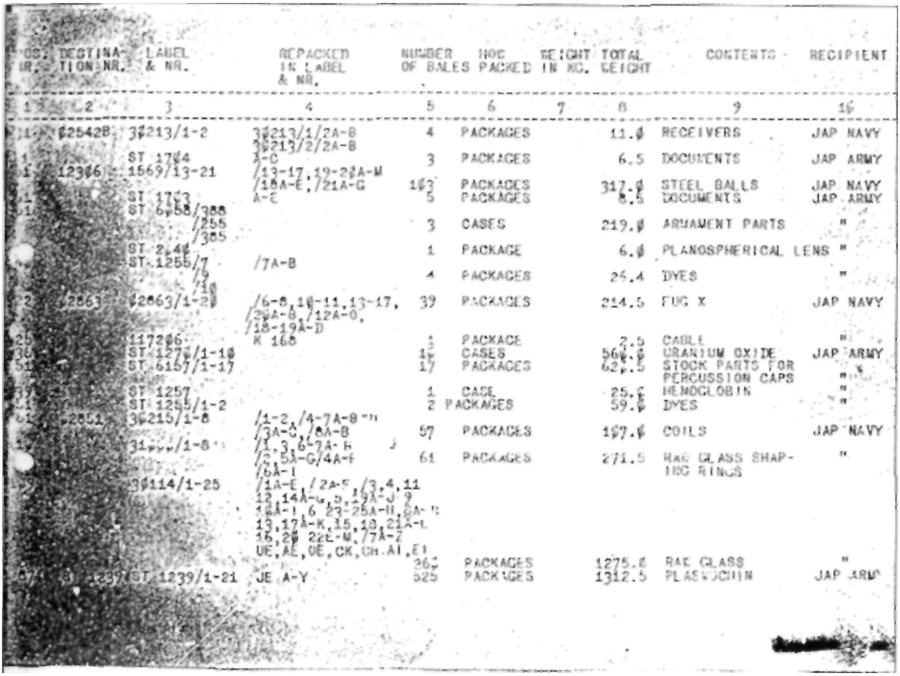
PACKING SLIPS

U - 234

Bu Ships

Translated from German
28 May 1945

This is the cover of the U.S. National Archives and Records Administration Document regarding U-234. This document omits all reference to uranium on board U-234.



POS. NR.	DESTINATION NR.	LABEL & NR.	REPACKED IN LABEL & NR.	NUMBER OF BALES	HOW PACKED	WEIGHT IN KG.	TOTAL WEIGHT	CONTENTS	RECIPIENT
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
1	025428	30213/1-2	30213/1/2A-B 30213/2/2A-B	4	PACKAGES		11.0	RECEIVERS	JAP NAVY
1		ST 1704	A-C	3	PACKAGES		6.5	DOCUMENTS	JAP ARMY
1	12306	1569/13-21	/13-17,19-20A-M /18A-E,/21A-G	103	PACKAGES		317.0	STEEL BALLS	JAP NAVY
1		ST 1703	A-E	5	PACKAGES		8.5	DOCUMENTS	JAP ARMY
1		ST 6058/388 /255 /385		3	CASES		219.0	ARMAMENT PARTS	"
		ST 2,440		1	PACKAGE		6.0	PLANOSPHERICAL LENS	"
		ST 1255/7 /9 /10	/7A-B	4	PACKAGES		25.4	DYES	"
22	2863	02863/1-20	/6-8,10-11,13-17, /20A-B,/12A-O, /18-19A-D	39	PACKAGES		214.5	FUG X	JAP NAVY
25		117206	K 168	1	PACKAGE		2.5	CABLE	"
38		ST 1270/1-10		10	CASES		560.0	URANIUM OXIDE	JAP ARMY
51		ST 6157/1-17		17	PACKAGES		620.5	STOCK PARTS FOR PERCUSSION CAPS	"
39		ST 1257		1	CASE		25.0	HEMOGLOBIN	"
[illegible]		ST 1255/1-2		2	PACKAGES		59.0	DYES	"
[illegible]	2851	30215/1-8	/1-2,/4-7A-B /3A-C,/8A-B	57	PACKAGES		107.0	COILS	JAP NAVY
		31[illegible]/1-8	/1,3,6-7A-H /2,5A-G/4A-F /6A-I	61	PACKAGES		271.5	RAW GLASS SHAPING RINGS	"
		30114/1-25	/1A-E,/2A-F,/3,4,11 12,14A-G,5,19A-J 9 10A-I,6 23-25A-H,8A-N 13,17A-K,15,18,21A-L 16,20 22L-M,/7A-Z UE,AE,OE,CK,CH.AI,EI	262	PACKAGES		1275.0	RAW GLASS	"
67	[illegible]	ST 1239/1-21	JE A-Y	525	PACKAGES		1312.5	PLASMOCHIN	JAP ARMY

Copy of the U.S. Navy's cargo contents for U-234. Note that uranium oxide is clearly part of the cargo. The U.S. Navy sends records to the U.S. National Archives for safe keeping. It is lucky that the Navy kept a copy for themselves.

absorbing paint that they had developed for another purpose. The fact is that the Horton 9 was the world's first stealth aircraft. Unfortunately, during a landing one of its two engines failed and the one flying Horton 9 crashed.

So what do we know about the Horton 9 in flight? All we now know about the performance of this legendary aircraft is what Allied technical teams said about it and this is the way it has been reported to us down through history via semi-technical aircraft history journals and books.

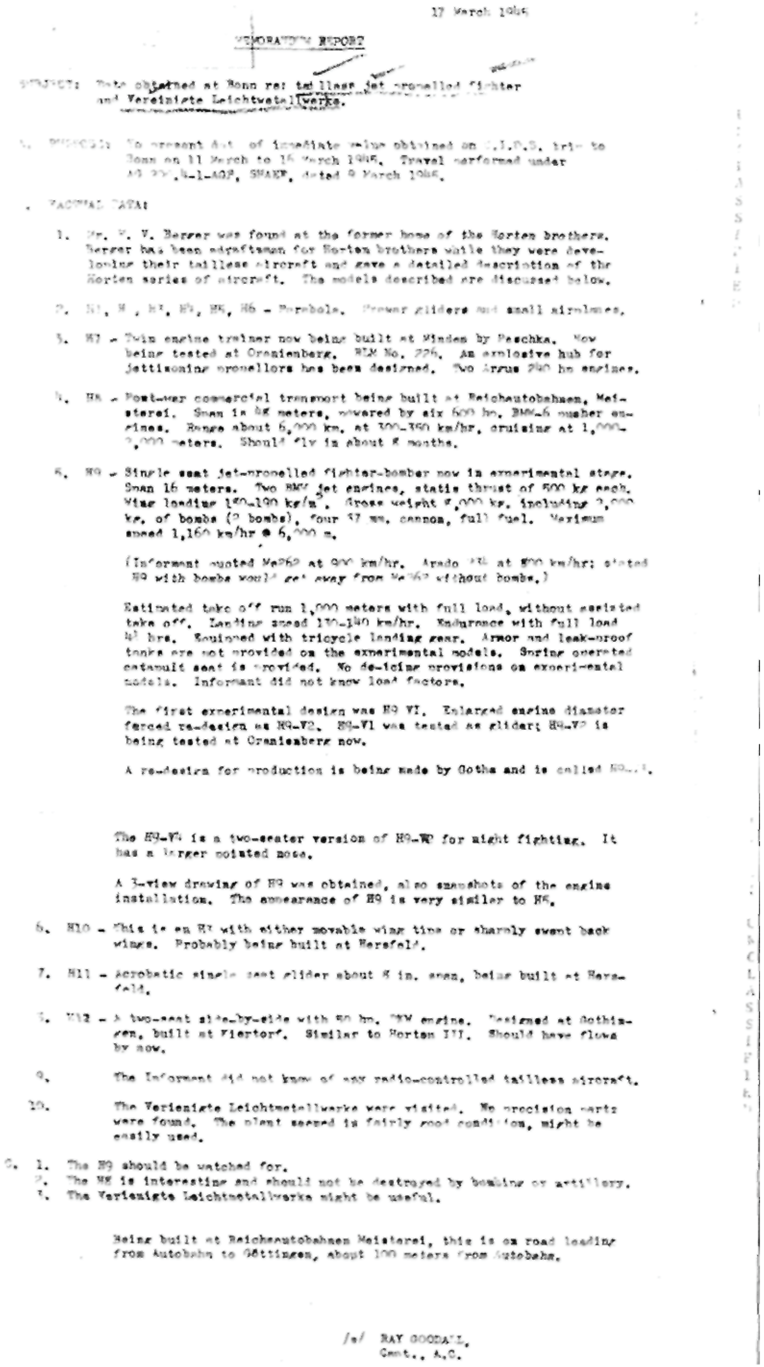
For instance David Masters, in his book German Jet Genesis, lists the speed of the Horton 9 at 540 mph with a ceiling altitude of 52,490 feet. The same authority reports the Gotha 229 (which never flew) as having a maximum speed of 590 mph at sea level and 640 mph at 21,320 ft. with a ceiling of 51,000 ft. This compares with the Me 262, the operational German jet fighter with which we are familiar, whose top speed Masters lists at 538 mph at 29,560 ft. with no ceiling given.

Surprisingly, both jets were powered by the same two Junkers Jumo 004B-1 engines. Yet the Horton 9 had the cross-section of a knife while the Messerschmitt cross-section was much more typical for an aircraft of the time. How could their performance be nearly identical? How would the Allies know what the performance of the Horton 9 actually was since they never got their hands on a working example?

Perhaps it was extrapolation. Perhaps they simply wanted to under value this sleek German jet simply because it looked so advanced for its time and there was nothing comparable in the Allied arsenal. Without contradictory evidence, the word of the American experts was repeated and became part of history as we know it. The funny thing is that now contradictory evidence has surfaced and has somehow slipped by the American censors.

The document in question is a Memorandum Report, dated March 17, 1945 while the war was still in progress. The "Subject" of this report was data obtained on the German tailless jet propelled fighter and Vereinigte Leichtmetalwerke (United Light-Metal Works). The "Purpose" of the report:

"To present data of immediate value obtained on C.I.O.S. trip to Bonn on 11 March to 16 March 1945. Travel performed under AG 200m 4-1, SHAEF, dated 9 March 1945."



17 March 1945

MEMORANDUM REPORT

SUBJECT: Data obtained at Bonn re: tailless jet propelled fighter and Vereinigte Leichtmetallwerke.

A. PURPOSE: To present data of immediate value obtained on C.I.O.S. trip to Bonn on 11 March to 15 March 1945. Travel performed under AG 200.4-1-AGP, SHAEF, dated 9 March 1945.

B. FACTUAL DATA:

1. Mr. W. V. Berger was found at the former home of the Horten brothers. Berger has been draftsman for Horten brothers while they were developing their tailless aircraft and gave a detailed description of the Horten series of aircraft. The models described are discussed below.

2. H1, H2, H3, H4, H5, H6 – Parabola. Prewar gliders and small airplanes.

3. H7 – Twin engine trainer now being built at Minden by Peschka. Now being tested at Oranienberg. RLM No. 226. An explosive hub for jettisoning propellors has been designed. Two Argus 240 hp engines.

4. H8 – Post-war commercial transport being built at Reichautobahnen, Meisterei. Span is 48 meters, powered by six 600 hp. BMW-6 pusher engines. Range about 6,000 km. at 300-350 km/hr, cruising at 1,000-2,000 meters. Should fly in about 8 months.

5. H9 – Single seat jet-propelled fighter-bomber now in experimental stage. Span 16 meters. Two BMW jet engines, static thrust of 500 kg each. Wing loading 180-190 kg/m². Gross weight 8,000 kg. including 2,000 kg. of bombs (2 bombs), four 37 mm. cannon, full fuel. Maximum speed 1,160 km/hr @ 6,000 m.

(Informant quoted Me262 at 900 km/hr. Arado 234 at 800 km/hr; stated H9 with bombs would get away from Me262 without bombs.)

Estimated take off run 1,000 meters with full load, without assisted take off. Landing speed 130-140 km/hr. Endurance with full load 4½ hrs. Equipped with tricycle landing gear. Armor and leak-proof tanks are not provided on the experimental models. Spring operated catapult seat is provided. No de-icing provisions on experimental models. Informant did not know load factors.

The first experimental design was H9 V1. Enlarged engine diameter forced re-design as H9-V2. H9-V1 was tested as glider; H9-V2 is being tested at Oranienberg now.

A re-design for production is being made by Gotha and is called [illegible].

The H9-V4 is a two-seater version of H9-V2 for night fighting. It has a larger pointed nose.

A 3-view drawing of H9 was obtained, also snapshots of the engine installation. The appearance of H9 is very similar to H5.

6. H10 – This is an H7 with either movable wing tips or sharply swept back wings. Probably being built at Hersfeld.

7. H11 – Acrobatic single seat glider about 8 in. span, being built at Hersfeld.

8. H12 – A two-seat side-by-side with 80 hp. DKW engine. Designed at Gottingen, built at Kiertorf. Similar to Horten III. Should have flown by now.

9. The Informant did not know of any radio-controlled tailless aircraft.

10. The Verienigte Leichtmetallwerke were visited. No precision parts were found. The plant seemed in fairly good condition, might be easily used.

C. 1. The H9 should be watched for.
2. The H8 is interesting and should not be destroyed by bombing or artillery.
3. The Verienigte Leichtmetallwerke might be useful.

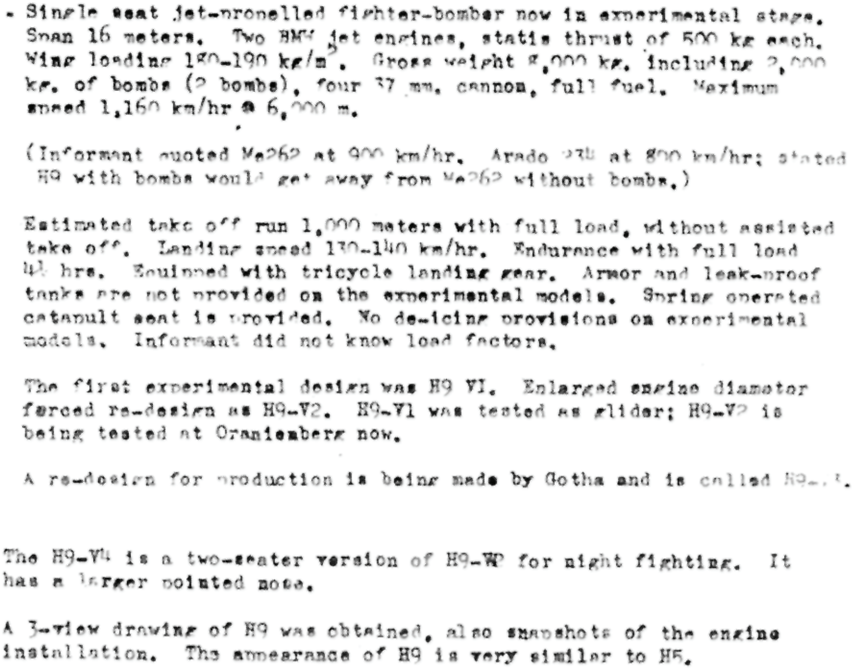
Being built at Reichsautobahnen Meisterei, this is on road leading from Autobahn to Göttingen, about 100 meters from Autobahn.

/s/ RAY GOODALL,
Capt., A.C.

UNCLASSIFIED

UNCLASSIFIED

Microfilm copy listing Horton aircraft.



- Single seat jet-propelled fighter-bomber now in experimental stage. Span 16 meters. Two BMW jet engines, static thrust of 500 kg each. Wing loading 180-190 kg/m². Gross weight 8,000 kg. including 2,000 kg. of bombs (2 bombs), four 37 mm. cannon, full fuel. Maximum speed 1,160 km/hr @ 6,000 m.

(Informant quoted Me262 at 900 km/hr. Arado 234 at 800 km/hr; stated H9 with bombs would get away from Me262 without bombs.)

Estimated take off run 1,000 meters with full load, without assisted take off. Landing speed 130-140 km/hr. Endurance with full load 4½ hrs. Equipped with tricycle landing gear. Armor and leak-proof tanks are not provided on the experimental models. Spring operated catapult seat is provided. No de-icing provisions on experimental models. Informant did not know load factors.

The first experimental design was H9 V1. Enlarged engine diameter forced re-design as H9-V2. H9-V1 was tested as glider; H9-V2 is being tested at Oraniemberg now.

A re-design for production is being made by Gotha and is called H9-V3.

The H9-V4 is a two-seater version of H9-V2 for night fighting. It has a larger pointed nose.

A 3-view drawing of H9 was obtained, also snapshots of the engine installation. The appearance of H9 is very similar to H5.

Enlargement of the Horton IX discussion in which a maximum speed of 1,160 km/hr or about 719 miles per hour. The informant spoke during the war, while the last example of the Horton IX was still flying. Data about all other German aircraft is correct. Was there an intentional cover up concerning the performance of the Horton IX by the Allies?

So what we have here is raw intelligence to be compiled into a Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report by SHAEF personnel.

Under "Factual Data" we learn that their German informant, Mr. F.V. Berger, is a draftsman for the Horton organization during the time that the Hortons were designing the tailless aircraft. To add to Berger's trusted position, he was actually found in the former home of Horton brothers by the intelligence agents.

Mr. Berger describes the Horton aircraft, models H1 to H12 but most of the discussion centers on the H9, the jet-powered, tailless, flying wing fighter-bomber. Berger goes on to list the weight, bomb load and cannons used but then states that the maximum speed for the H9, which was still being tested as this report was being written, was 1,160 km/her at an altitude of 6,000 meters.

This last statement must have shocked the SHAEF team to the core. The speed given, 1,160 kilometers per hour works out to slightly over 719 miles per hour! The Allies weren't even thinking about flying that fast in those days.

In the next paragraph it is evident that the intelligence team has been transfixed by Berger's statement and is double-checking his veracity. They asked him about the speed of the Me 262 and the Arado 234. Allied intelligence knew both these operational German aircraft and their capabilities by this time even if they had not gained an example of each aircraft. Berger gave the speed of the Me 262 at 900 km/hr and the Arado 234 (jet-powered bomber-reconnaissance aircraft) at 800 km/hr. This works out to 558 mph for the Messer-schmitt and 496 mph for the Arado. These figures are right on the money and lend credibility to Berger's evaluation of the Horton 9.

Then Berger made another astonishing statement. Berger stated that the Horton 9, loaded with bombs (weighing 2,000 kg.) "would get away from Me262 without bombs".

Berger went on to describe the Horton 9 V-1 correctly as being tested as a glider and the Horton 9 V-2 as a fully powered aircraft. He goes on to say that the Horton 9 V-2 "is being tested at Oranienberg now." So at the time of this interview, the Horton 9 V-2 was still flying and had not crashed yet.

Perhaps we could back up a little bit and go over what we already know. The Horton 9/Gotha 229 had a low radar return. The Germans knew this and planned a radar repelling type of paint for it that was already used on submarines. These features would make the Horton 9 the first stealth aircraft, a fact much mentioned concerning the history of the American B-2 bomber. In fact, American engineers visited the remaining partially assembled Gotha 229 in Maryland to get ideas for the B-2.

But the speed given by Berger, 719 miles per hour, puts the Horton 9 in a class by itself. By this it is meant that this speed and ceiling altitude exceed both the Soviet Mig 15 and the American F86 Sabre of Korean War vintage, five or six years later.

If we listen, we can hear echoes of the undervaluation of German aircraft at the highest levels, even within the American aerospace industry. Aircraft legend Howard Hughes owned a captured Me 262. Hughes was a big fan and participant in something called aircraft racing during those post-war years. Towering pylons would mark out a course of several miles in the California desert and aircraft would race around this course. When Hughes' rival company, North American Aviation came out with its F-86 Sabre, Howard Hughes challenged the US Air Force to a one-on-one match race of their new Sabre jet against his old German Me 262. The Air Force declined. Obviously, there is some unspoken fact behind the Air Force decision.

The Sabre was said to be "trans-sonic" or having a top speed of about 650 mph. with a ceiling of 45,000 ft. If the US Air Force wanted no part of a contest with the real Me 262, not the paper projection, what would they have thought of a head to head match with the Horton 9?

Yet, the Horton 9 was a stealth aircraft. The Americans didn't even recognize what a stealth aircraft was until over 30 years later and even then they always wanted to couch the comparison of the Horton 9 to the B-2 stealth bomber. That comparison is fallacious and perhaps designed to hide something else.

Let's compare the Horton 9 to the F-117 stealth fighter instead. The F-117 has vertical control surfaces and may be, in fact, less stealthy than the Horton 9. Both had special radar absorbing paint. But the F-117 is not supersonic. The F-117 is generally conceded to fly about 650 mph, about the same as the F-86 Sabre, while the Horton 9 could be faster at 719 mph. Another difference is that the Horton 9 carried two 37 mm cannons while the F-117 has no guns or rockets and so is really not a fighter at all but only a first-strike bomber.

There are other examples but we should both watch for these tactics and recognize that the government is reluctant to fully credit the Germans for their advances during the war and we should recognize that they will go to some lengths to maintain the secrecy status quo. These tactics also include false comparisons and outright deception.

3 German Digital Computers

Quite frankly, nothing is quite as boring as a computer discussion. However, computers have the ability to make rapid mathematical calculations and to take mountains of raw data and organize it for us in ways which give us new insight into problems. This organizational ability was picked up on immediately by Dr. Kammler.

Dr. Kammler had the benefit of knowledge, hardware and software that was developed by the computer pioneer, Dr. Konrad Zuse. In spite of everything churned out by the computer industry and "history" as we know it, Dr. Zuse built the first digital computer in 1938[1] and the first programmable software language, "Plankaikuel"[2]. He was also instrumental in developing magnetic tape as a computer storage medium[3]. By 1944 the Germans were using computers, the Zuse-built Z-3, to plot the course of ballistic attack by the V-2 at Peenemuende and Nordhausen[4].

After the assassination attempt on Hitler in July, 1944, power, on many levels of German cultural, technological and military life was transferred to the SS. Old-time Nazi bosses such as the Minister of Armaments, Albert Speer, sat back and watched helplessly as most of his empire was usurped by Dr. Hans Kammler. This included Dr. Kammler taking over the most promising and most highly technical wartime projects. Dr. Kammler was able to assume this role in addition to his other responsibilities and to handle them all with the excellence for which he was known. There is no doubt that Kammler had a genius

Fig.43b (Left). The Methfesselstraße in Berlin (1999). The Z3 and Z4 were constructed in a house on this plot of land (just to the right of the red car). Fig 44 (Right). Konrad Zuse (1989) at the entrance of the Methfesselstraße 7

The Z4 Computer

The goal of the Z4, which was developed between 1942 and 1945, was to build the prototype for a machine that was intended to be produced in the thousands. Unfortunately, the war destroyed my father's hope, which was that his machines should support the work of engineers of the time.

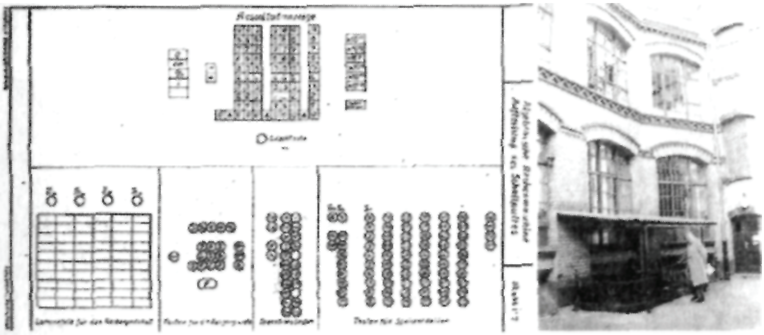


Fig.45 (Left). The Z4's input and output devices, as drawn in 1942 by Konrad Zuse. Fig.46 (Right) Konrad Zuse at the building of the Oranienstraße 6 in Berlin-Kreuzberg (1989), where the Z4 was almost finished in 1944/45.

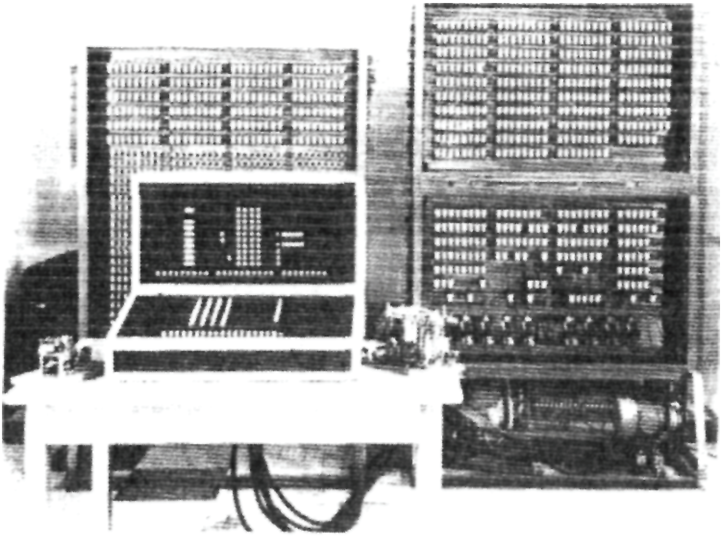
It took more than four years to build the Z4, which ended up being much smaller than was originally planned. In the case of the Z4, Konrad Zuse wanted to implement a sub-program principle. For this reason he planned six punch tape readers and two punch tape writers. However, lack of materials, the almost daily air raids (Fig. 47 and Fig. 48), and the increasing difficulty of living in Berlin (which worsened daily) made it impossible to finish the Z4 completely.

Conrad Zuse - The Z4 Computer and the Zunse Apparatebau Memory component of the Z-4 computer



Die rekonstruierte Z3 im Deutschen Museum in München

The Z4 Planfertigungsgerät.

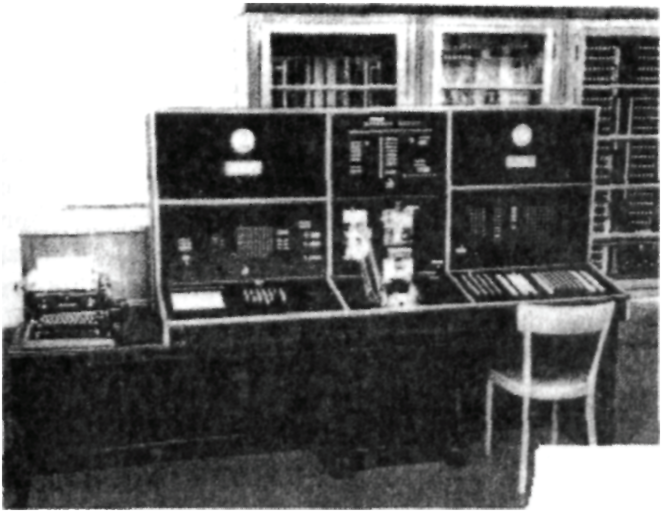
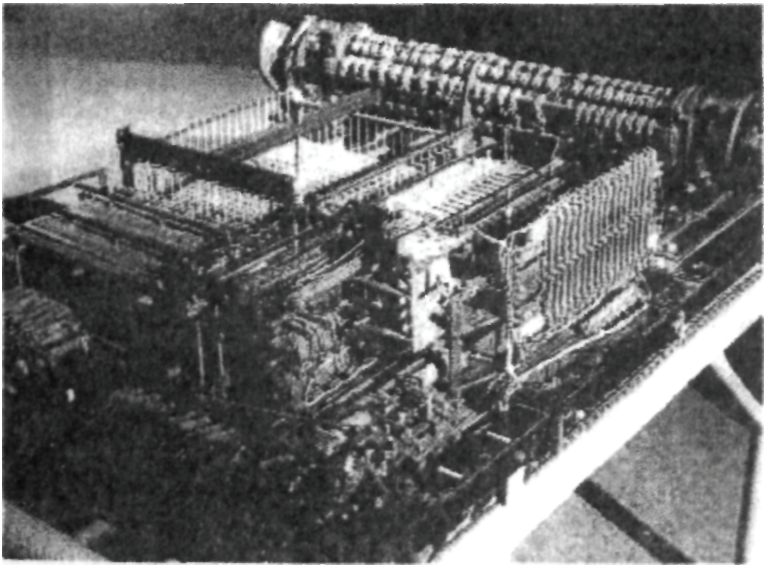
Above: is the reconstructed Z-3 computer. This machine was most likely used in the headquarters of the Kammler Group as well as to calculate trajectories of the V-2 rocket.

Below: is the "Planfertigunsgeraet" (plan completion apparatus) which produced punched tapes as a program. Programming of the Z-4 could be learned in three hours.



The Z4.



Memory unit of the Z4. This picture was kindly made available by Dr. Kistermann. It was taken at an exhibition at ETH Zurich in 1981.

Top: picture is the reconstructed Z-4 computer.

Bottom: memory of the Z-4

for organization, but he had some digital help.

Perhaps we can imagine the Kammler Group Headquarters, somewhere in Czechoslovakia, probably underground and perhaps near Prague or Pilsen. There, behind a triple wall of security which the Allies never managed to break, Kammler's think-tank and laboratories selected and directed the production of weapons and secret technology for the Reich. One of Kammler's secrets was that his organization was completely computerized[4]. Hollerith, Z-3, and Z-4 computers, software computer languages and magnetic tape storage devices made Kammler's headquarters look more late 1960s like than mid-19405. In fact, German computers were so advanced that the Allied scientists and technicians failed even to understand the future when it stared them in the face.

The citation comes from a British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report:

"D. Calculating Machine of Dipl. Ing. K. Zuse Associated with Ernst (Josef Ernst who is mentioned elsewhere in this book—author) were a group of people headed by Dipl. Ing. K. Zuse, of the Zuse Apparatebau, Berlin, who had been evacuated to Hinterstein in the last days of the war. They claimed to have invented and developed a new and exceptionally versatile calculating machine, which had an application in the solving of, for example, aerodynamic, ballistic, and statistical calculations. The apparatus itself is at Hinterstein, but is not assembled. Another team of specialists led by Dr. Simms, of the Ministry of Supply, who were passing through the area at the time were consulted, and one of their members, who had considerable experience of calculating machines gave it as his opinion that the apparatus did not embody any special features which were in advance of Allied knowledge."[5].

The fact that Zuse and his computers were so advanced that the Allies didn't know what they were seeing, comes from the fact that they waited five years to approach Zuse, under Operation Paperclip, and offer him work in the United States. When they did realize their error, at least two government missions were sent to Germany, with the backing of the US computer firm Remington-Rand. Dr. Zues resisted these advances since he had found work in Germany. In fact, he was directing his own computer company by this time and had found the funding to do so which was hard for that time and place. Eventually, a trip to the USA was planned but canceled. It is unknown if he ever gave the US computer maker the benefit of his knowledge[6]. Today Dr. Zues is held in high esteem in Germany and any Internet search using the words "Konrad Zuse" produce a plethora of old pictures and documentation.

SOURCES

1. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, page 23, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 2: Star Wars 1947 Teil A: Von der V-l bes zur A-9: unkonventionelle Kurz-und Mittelstreckenwaffen, Amun-Verlag, Schleusingen.

2. ibid

3. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, page 24

4. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, page 31

5. British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 142, "Information Obtained From Targets Of Opportunity In The Southofsi Area, page 9, London

6. File of Konrad Zuse, Foreign Scientist Case Files, Record Group 330, box 186, (Paperclip Scientists), US National Records and Archives, College Park, MD.

4 German Flying Discs Update

Witness to a German Flying Disc

Shortly after the release of Hitler's Flying Saucers: A Guide To German Flying Discs Of The Second World War, I was contacted by a radio talk-show host, Jeff Rense, to do a live interview on his show. This radio show centers around the "unknowns" or "barely knowns" in life. Although Jeff's show originates from the Pacific Northwest, he has contacts throughout the country, if not the world. During our chit-chat off the air he mentioned another researcher, Lea McDonald, who had made contact with an individual who had actually seen a German flying disc take off during the war. Jeff was most gracious in providing an e-mail address for Lea. This seemed like a hot lead so I could not wait to make contact with Lea. Lea McDonald was as gracious as Jeff had been and gave me the telephone number of "Leo".

I don't want to give out Leo's last name at this time but he is known both to Jeff Rense and Lea McDonald. Leo is a friendly, elderly gentleman who took time to rely his sighting to me. I, in turn, do not want to appear ungrateful, so I don't want to be responsible for his telephone ringing off the hook at all hours of the night by people interested in verifying this story.

Leo's story is that he saw a flying disc ascend from the Prague airport. He does not remember the exact year, nor does he have details which can be gotten through question and answer sessions. The reason for this is that Leo was a child when he made this sighting. He saw the disc rise and ascend out of his line of sight from a school room at the Prague airport.

At first, this testimony, that of a child, might be deemed less reliable than a competent adult's testimony. To be sure, it is not as good as J. Andreas Epp's sighting, which may have occurred on the exact same day, in terms of detail, let alone the photographs Epp took. Nevertheless, I know from personal experience how accurately a child can see things.

As a child, I grew up near Los Angeles International Airport. The period of which I an speaking was the 1950s. During that time both commercial and military aircraft landed at "LAX". Almost always all the aircraft took off to the west, into the wind. The difference between flight patterns of commercial and military aircraft centered on their landing. Military aircraft landed near the south side of the airport and so circled in by making a turn over the south side of the airport. This turn took the military aircraft directly over my home, sometimes so close I could see the pilot.

I learned each aircraft operated by the U.S. military during those times and which company made it. Further, if there was some sort of inconsistency regarding this landing routine, such as military aircraft landing from the east or a new type of aircraft landing, I recognized it instantly. I could even tell aircraft by their signature engine sound. My eyes were not the eyes of a trained observer but my eyes did count for something.

Likewise, Leo probably saw and was disrupted by, many aircraft coming and going while in his classroom at the airport. The fact that this particular aircraft was something special is the reason that memory of it has been retained all these years. Leo simply saw an unusual disc-shaped, jet powered flying craft noisily ascend from the vantage point of a classroom window. He watched its ascent until his line of sight was obstructed by the building. His sighting could not have lasted more than a few seconds.

The fact that the disc was spinning on its axis indicates that it was either the Schriever or the Habermohl saucer. Both projects were stationed at the Prague airport. The Miethe discus may have been brought to the Prague airport from its place of development in Breslau at some time but its exterior skin did not spin as did the others. Since, by his own admission, Schriever says his saucer never flew, and since we have photographic evidence as well as testimony of a functioning disc at Prague, we must assume that it was the Habermohl version[2].

SOURCES

1. Interview with witness. Leo

2. Stevens, Henry, 2003, Hitlers Flying Saucers A Guide To German Flying Discs of The Second World War, pages 41-52, Adventures Unlimited Press, Kempton, Illinois

5 The Electromagnetic Vampire

What I am calling the "electromagnetic vampire" is so unique that I feel it must be discussed. Its implications in the modern world, in our current "Security State", are obvious.

The uncovering of this device is not my work. This report comes to us from Dr. Axel Stoll in his book Hochtechnologie im Dritten Reich[1]. The topic of interest arises as Dr. Stoll is discussing a German base in Tibet during the Second World War. He mentions that Tibet fought with the Germans in this conflict and that SS men were actually trained in Tibet. This association argues for a German underground base in Tibet and Dr. Stoll goes on to describe possible provisions for security in German underground bases and describes an example of a German electromagnetic security system.

The example he uses is the early Reich Chancellery. The lower floors of the Reich Chancellery were flooded during the latter stages of the war. This tactic was used numerous times on high-value underground facilities to prevent the advancing Allied Powers from learning Nazi secrets. Therefore, there may be other examples still out there.

The device under discussion is some sort of electromagnetic cage. Dr. Stoll calls it an "energetischen Kaefig" or "elektromagnetische Birne". Within the area of this cage a special electromagnetic field was present. This cage would be used to surround a specific room or area within the larger facility. Presumably, within this room, objects of tremendous value would be stored and therefore needed ultimate security, even more security than simply housing them within this high-security underground facility.

Dr. Stoll is unable to name his sources for security reasons, but goes on to tell a fascinating story. In the former East German Democratic Republic (DDR), strong, able-bodied divers, who were former members of the State Security Service (MfS) of that communist government were detailed to dive into the Reich Chancellery and surrounding vicinity with the goal of recovering documents, material stores and technology.

These operatives were not boy scouts, nor was East Germany a worker's paradise in the 1970s and 1980s, which is the period in which our story takes place. The DDR is the country which spawned the dreaded secret police, the "Stasi". Stasi was one of the most efficient, innovative and ruthless intelligence organizations ever conceived. Stazi could be thought of as the KGB coupled with German innovative efficiency. It is from this hard background that the divers were lowered by ropes into the black pool which were the lower floors of the Reich Chancellery.

What the divers encountered in the blackness was terror itself. Some of the divers, described by Dr. Stoll, surfaced with prolific symptoms. Their faces were contorted into a horrible grimaces. The problem was that this terribly distorted expression would not relax. Their contorted faces were frozen into a masks of permanent deformity. Not only were they disfigured but somehow they had been aged during the dive. Now they appeared to be visibly older, perhaps aging up to fifteen years in a few minutes. But that was not all.

Functioning like an almost perfect security system, the divers could not remember what had happened during their dive. Their memories had been blanked out. This was not temporary amnesia. This amnesia proved to be life-long.

Dr. Stoll, a Geophysicist, explains the workings of the device this way. Within the cage, "Kaefig", which is the space to be secured, a human body encounters an almost null-point of energy near the physical center of the device. At this point, energy is actually drawn out of the human body! This withdrawal of energy alters the human body and the human being, as a rule, for the worst. This sucking away of human energy can lead to death.

This electromagnetic or psychic vampire constitutes the ultimate in security systems. Imagine marketing a home security system boasting to suck the life out of intruders. Imagine this system in place in all truly sensitive government facilities today.

SOURCES

1. Stoll, Axel, Ph.D., 2001, Hochtechnologie Im Dritten Reich Reichsdeutsche Entwicklungen und die vermutlich wahre Herkunft der "UFOs", Amun-Verlag, Schleusesiedlung 2, D-98553 Schleusingen, Germany

6 Liquid Air

It seems that the Germans were on to a new way to make and store energy. It was the process of liquefying air. Air is a combination of many gases but its main components are nitrogen and oxygen in a ratio of roughly seventy percent and twenty percent, respectively.

There is a history of research and breakthroughs regarding means to liquify air prior to World War Two. A commercial means to liquify air was developed by the Frenchman, Georges Claude, who worked with the Germans[1]. Given a method to liquify air, liquified air seems to have been produced and stored by the Germans for later use.

There may also have been a breakthrough in storage. To make it a liquid, the gas must be artificially cooled until it reaches a temperature were it turns from a gas to a liquid. Some gases are harder to liquify than others. Usually, the difficulty comes from reaching a temperature low enough to liquify the gas. Once a gas has been liquified, it can usually be stored under pressure. This means storing the liquified gas in steel containers.

One source says that liquid hydrogen as well as liquid air can not be stored under pressure because of their low boiling points. Instead, it must be stored at normal atmospheric pressure in thermos bottles or Dewar flasks[2]. This is a system in which a metal bottle is encased within another metal bottle with a space in between where the air has been removed. With a vacuum between the two bottles, the inner bottle is filled with the liquid to be kept cold. The vacuum is an excellent insulator and so the contents of the bottle are kept cold or hot, depending on application, for an extended period of time. Additionally, a small hole or valve can be placed in the bottle, allowing a measured quantity of liquid gas to escape and expand to a gas. Heat is absorbed in this expansion process, cooling the remaining liquid gas in the bottle to offset any heat entering the bottle.

This thermos-at-atmospheric-pressure explanation is fine but somehow does not conform to what was observed during the war. Apparently, the Germans were making liquified air, storing it under pressure, and extracting its stored energy at a later date.

As early as 1930, the Reichsarbeitsgemeinschaft, the Reichs Works Association, concerned itself with liquified air and its energy potential almost as much as it concerned itself with sources of new energy[3]. This organization was set up with the express purpose of energy independence for Germany. The exact application to which the liquified air was to be put was not explained but it was given a considerable volume of print in their publications.

During the war, all sorts of plans were made to utilize the liquid air that must have been on hand. Plans were made to ignite it in new engines[4]. Liquified air facilities fell under the control of the SS, which is a sure sign that this was a valued commodity with a real role to play in the war[5]. These roles included powering submarine as well as aircraft engines[6]. But the information that tells us the Germans were able to store liquid air, presumably under pressure in a closed container, comes from their work to used liquid air as an explosive in artillery shells.

This information comes from a G-2 source working in conjunction with the U.S. Seventh Army, on or about October 21, 1944[7]. In that source a prisoner of war was interviewed. The prisoner claimed that 105 mm howitzer cannons had been modified to fire a liquid air-filled shells. The German word "Pressluft" is inserted into the English text and presumably was the word employed by the prisoner. The barrel of this gun was about half meter longer than the normal German 105 mm howitzer, and, on both sides of the breech there was a vent 2-3 cm wide. The projectile itself is somewhat longer that the standard for that gun. The new shell, without the powder charge is about the same as the length of the normal 105 mm projectile and the cartridge case combined.

The firing of this gun was somewhat out of the ordinary. The firing crew stood off 10 meters away from the gun at time of firing. The explosion made a muffled sound and smoke came through the vents in the breech. The smoke itself was described as having the effect of vomiting gas and caused the lungs to ache which way why the crew withdrew to the 10 meter distance. This description seems to indicate that the projectiles themselves were fired using liquid air as a propulsion source.

In test firings, 30 cows and horses were spread out over a 2.5 km diameter area. Four projectiles were fired. All the animals were killed. It was discovered that the animals died because their lungs had been crushed. At time of the tests a Col. Kruse, the commanding officer of the artillery school made an odd comment:

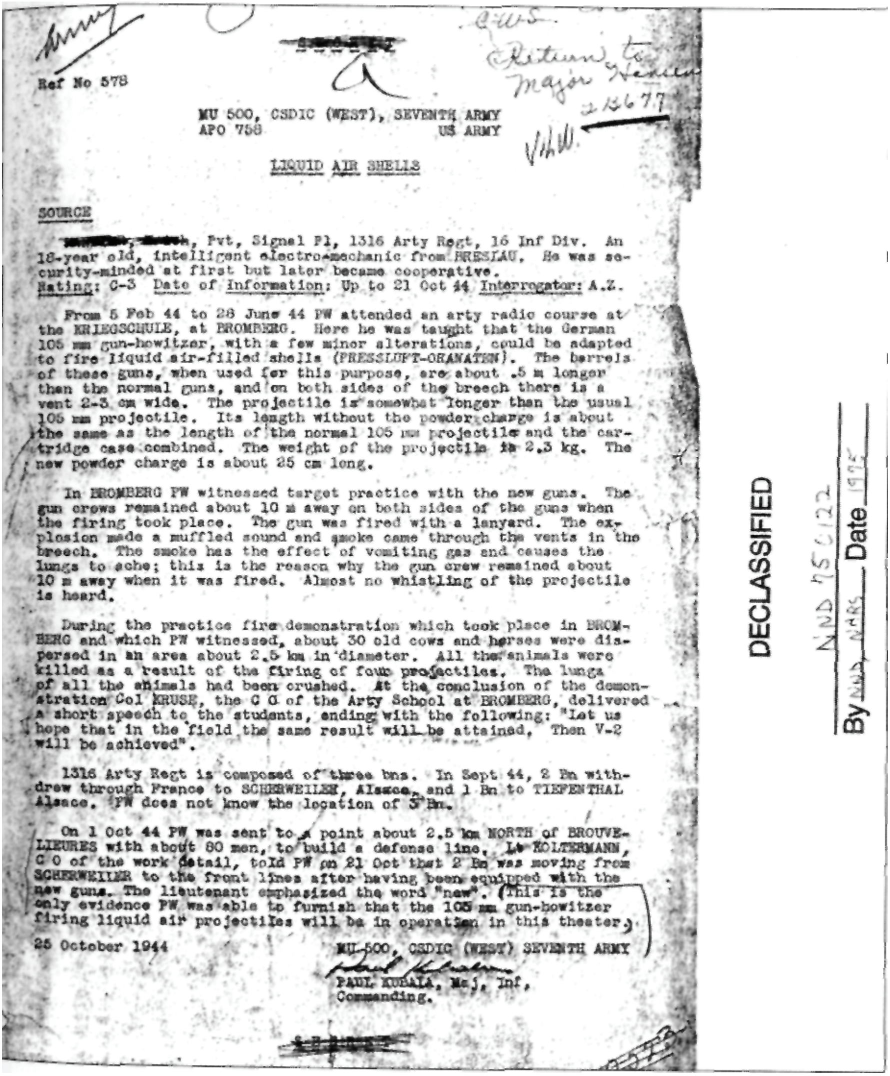
"Let us hope that in the field the same result will be attained. Then V-2 will be achieved".

The first sentence is not surprising. Every military man hopes his weapons will work in practice as they do in testing. It is the second statement which is noteworthy and which raises the question as to if liquid air was intended as an explosive warhead for the V-2 rocket. According to one source, this is exactly what was in the works and an American OSS report from October 8, 1944 is cited—a date very close to the one discussed here[8].

The use of liquid air as an explosive is probably only one small part of its significance. During the period of the Third Reich, the Germans envisioned liquid air as a source of energy. They did not need to go abroad to get it, the raw material, air, was everywhere. No prospecting equipment, pipelines or refinery was necessary. Liquid air could be manufactured at leisure, then bottled and stored for later use. Its energy could be extracted halfway around the world.

The ultimate German flying machine may have been a saucer that manufactured and burnt its own liquid air as it flew. This is an idea hinted at by flying saucer pioneer Renato Vesco[9] and which has recently been taken up again by researcher Klaus-Peter Rothkugel who has written me about this on many occasions.

In the liquid air howitzer shell and the V-2 warhead, we think of the utilization of liquid air as a burning or explosive force. To do this, of course, liquid air must burn. Oxygen itself doesn't really burn; it supplies the oxygen necessary for combustion. We seem to be left with nitrogen as the combustible material under consideration. Nitrogen is



Army

~~SECRET~~

C.W.S.

Return to Major [illegible]

213677

VHW.

Ref No 578

MU 500, CSDIC (WEST), SEVENTH ARMY
APO 758 US ARMY

LIQUID AIR SHELLS

SOURCE

[redacted], Pvt, Signal Pl, 1316 Arty Regt, 16 Inf Div. An 18-year old, intelligent electro-mechanic from BRESLAU. He was security-minded at first but later became cooperative.
Rating: C-3 Date of Information: Up to 21 Oct 44 Interrogator: A.Z.

From 5 Feb 44 to 28 June 44 PW attended an arty radio course at the KRIEGSCHULE, at BROMBERG. Here he was taught that the German 105 mm gun-howitzer, with a few minor alterations, could be adapted to fire liquid air-filled shells (PRESSLUFT-GRANATEN). The barrels of these guns, when used for this purpose, are about .5 m longer than the normal guns, and on both sides of the breech there is a vent 2-3 cm wide. The projectile is somewhat longer than the usual 105 mm projectile. Its length without the powder charge is about the same as the length of the normal 105 mm projectile and the cartridge case combined. The weight of the projectile is 2.3 kg. The new powder charge is about 25 cm long.

In BROMBERG PW witnessed target practice with the new guns. The gun crews remained about 10 m away on both sides of the guns when the firing took place. The gun was fired with a lanyard. The explosion made a muffled sound and smoke came through the vents in the breech. The smoke has the effect of vomiting gas and causes the lungs to ache; this is the reason why the gun crew remained about 10 m away when it was fired. Almost no whistling of the projectile is heard.

During the practice fire demonstration which took place in BROMBERG and which PW witnessed, about 30 old cows and horses were dispersed in an area about 2.5 km in diameter. All the animals were killed as a result of the firing of four projectiles. The lungs of all the animals had been crushed. At the conclusion of the demonstration Col KRUSE, the C G of the Arty School at BROMBERG, delivered a short speech to the students, ending with the following: "Let us hope that in the field the same result will be attained. Then V-2 will be achieved".

1316 Arty Regt is composed of three bns. In Sept 44, 2 Bn withdrew through France to SCHERWEILER, Alsace, and 1 Bn to TIEFENTHAL Alsace. PW does not know the location of 3 Bn.

On 1 Oct 44 PW was sent to a point about 2.5 km NORTH of BROUVELIEURES with about 80 men, to build a defense line. Lt KOLTERMANN, C O of the work detail, told PW on 21 Oct that 2 Bn was moving from SCHERWEILER to the front lines after having been equipped with the new guns. The lieutenant emphasized the word "new". (This is the only evidence PW was able to furnish that the 105 mm gun-howitzer firing liquid air projectiles will be in operation in this theater.)

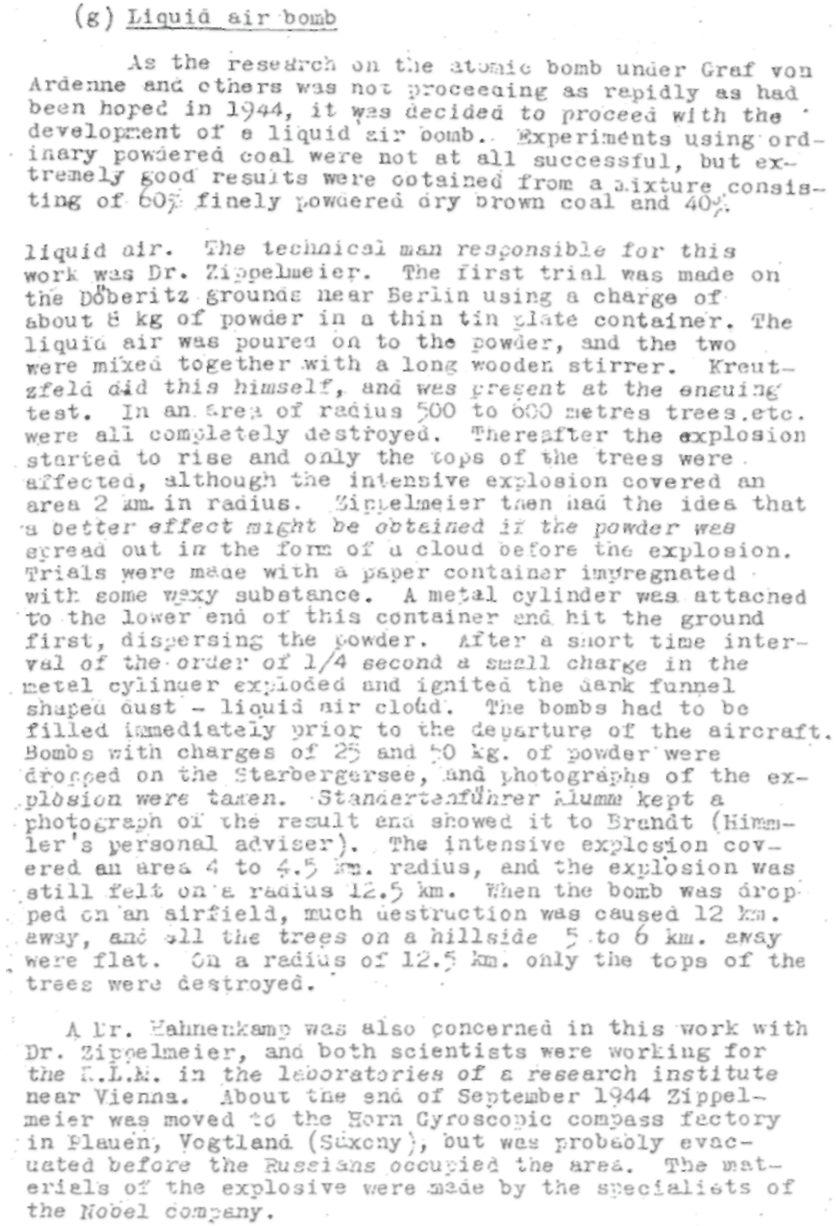
25 October 1944

MU 500, CSDIC (WEST) SEVENTH ARMY
Paul Kubala
PAUL KUBALA, Maj, Inf,
Commanding.

~~S-E-C-R-E-T~~

DECLASSIFIED
NND 750122
By NND, NARS Date 1975

U.S. government file describing liquid air used as an explosive shell.



(g) Liquid air bomb

As the research on the atomic bomb under Graf von Ardenne and others was not proceeding as rapidly as had been hoped in 1944, it was decided to proceed with the development of a liquid air bomb. Experiments using ordinary powdered coal were not at all successful, but extremely good results were obtained from a mixture consisting of 60% finely powdered dry brown coal and 40%.

liquid air. The technical man responsible for this work was Dr. Zippelmeier. The first trial was made on the Döberitz grounds near Berlin using a charge of about 8 kg of powder in a thin tin plate container. The liquid air was poured on to the powder, and the two were mixed together with a long wooden stirrer. Kreutzfeld did this himself, and was present at the ensuing test. In an area of radius 500 to 600 metres trees,etc. were all completely destroyed. Thereafter the explosion started to rise and only the tops of the trees were affected, although the intensive explosion covered an area 2 km. in radius. Zippelmeier then had the idea that a better effect might be obtained if the powder was spread out in the form of a cloud before the explosion. Trials were made with a paper container impregnated with some waxy substance. A metal cylinder was attached to the lower end of this container and hit the ground first, dispersing the powder. After a short time interval of the order of 1/4 second a small charge in the metal cylinder exploded and ignited the dark funnel shaped dust - liquid air cloud. The bombs had to be filled immediately prior to the departure of the aircraft. Bombs with charges of 25 and 50 kg. of powder were dropped on the Starbergersee, and photographs of the explosion were taken. Standartenführer Klumm kept a photograph of the result and showed it to Brandt (Himmler's personal adviser). The intensive explosion covered an area 4 to 4.5 km. radius, and the explosion was still felt on a radius 12.5 km. When the bomb was dropped on an airfield, much destruction was caused 12 km. away, and all the trees on a hillside 5 to 6 km. away were flat. On a radius of 12.5 km. only the tops of the trees were destroyed.

A Dr. Hahnenkamp was also concerned in this work with Dr. Zippelmeier, and both scientists were working for the R.L.M. in the laboratories of a research institute near Vienna. About the end of September 1944 Zippelmeier was moved to the Horn Gyroscopic compass factory in Plauen, Vogtland (Saxony), but was probably evacuated before the Russians occupied the area. The materials of the explosive were made by the specialists of the Nobel company.

BIOS Report Number 142: Liquid Air Bomb. A liquid air bomb design using coal dust may have been a forerunner to Dr. Zippermayr's fuel-air bomb.

usually thought of as an inert gas. This is true as a practical matter in our daily lives, but nitrogen will burn if it gets hot enough. Thunder is evidence of this.

During a discharge of lightning, atmospheric nitrogen is burnt by the heat generated by the lightning. Nitrogen rapidly combines with atmospheric oxygen, causing a low-pressure area in its wake. Thunder is the sound generated by the gasses of the atmosphere slamming that pocket of low pressure, burnt nitrogen, shut once more. The fallout is "fixed nitrogen", molecules of nitrogen combined with oxygen, falling to earth which are used by plant life as fertilizer. The point is that nitrogen will burn given enough heat.

A second method to extract energy from liquid air involves its rapid transformation from a frozen liquid (liquid nitrogen at-147 degrees C.) to a gas as the result of heating. Here we encounter the patent of Karl Nowak. Nowak was an Austrian who found that when matter in its cold, liquid state is heated rapidly, for instance injected into a combustion chamber on an engine, it expands with a tremendous rate of force. Nowak made all sorts of claims as to the power of that force but for us it is probably only necessary to recognize the principle. If liquid air were injected into a combustion chamber, such as that of an automobile engine, and it was sufficiently heated, such as with a high voltage discharge, not only would a force of expansion arise from the burning of the gasses, but prior to the burning and just before ignition, a force would have generated based upon the rapid heating of the liquid air by the spark discharge. A second expansion would take place upon the burning of the fuel itself, a reaction with which we are all familiar.

The basics of this liquid air discussion are that the Germans succeeded in finding a simple new source oi energy, one that was not based on foreign sources and which could be produced and transported relatively easily and one that has apparently been forgotten today. We will add to this discussion of liquid air when we review the work of Dr. Mario Zippermayr.

SOURCES

1. Vesco, Renato, Intercept UFO, 1976, page 164, Pinacle Books, Inc., New York

2. Van Nostrand's Scientific Encyclopedia, 1958, page 979, D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc., New York

3. Weltdynamismus Streifzueg durch technisches Neuland an Hand von biologischen Symbolen, 1930, commissioned by the Reichsarbeitsgemeinschaft "Das kommendende Deutschland", Otto Wilhelm Barth Verlag, Berlin

4. Vesco, Renato, Intercept UFO, 1976, pages 93,134-136,163,164.

5. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 93

6. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 135,164

7. Office of the Director of Intelligence (G-2), file: MU 500, CSDIC (West), Ref. No. 578, Interrogation Reports and Correspondence on Prisoners of War ("Mis-Y"), 1943-1945, The National Archives, Record Group 165: Records of the War Department Genera and Special Staffs

8. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 2: Star Wars 1947 Teil A: Von der V-1 bis zur A-9: unkonventionelle Kurz - und Mittelstreckenwaffen, page 116, Amun-Verlag, Zella Mehlis

9. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 135-136,163,168

7 Synthetic Penicillin Substitute "3065"

During the 1950s, penicillin, an antibiotic, was touted as a "wonder drug". It was so effective against a myriad of bacterial infections that it single-handedly replaced "sulfa-drugs" which were previously in use against infection. Penicillin saved countless lives. It ushered in a whole medical age of similar antibiotics.

Now we know that antibiotics were over prescribed and over used by doctors. Bacteria, being adaptable and quickly reproducing organisms, evolved into strains resistant to penicillin. Newer antibiotics constantly had to be developed to stay one step ahead of the latest super-bacteria. Today, we live in fear of these evolved bacteriological super-bugs. Of course, the elite can have any prescription that money and power can buy but penicillin is now prescribed only as a last resort for the general populace.

But perhaps this sad situation was not the inevitable consequence of medical and pharmaceutical history. What if there were a non-antibiotic based treatment which was just as effective or even more effective against infection as penicillin? What if it were cheap and easy to manufacture compared with penicillin? What if this medicine really did exist yet all knowledge of it were suppressed? Do you think this sounds like "fringe" or "kook" medicine, something which can easily answered by the current resident doctor on CNN? Well, let's see if the debunkers can deal with this.

Penicillin substitute 3065 was the brainchild of Professor and Doctor Richard Kuhn. We learn from the Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee had warlike application. (Address of RWA - 126 Saarlandstrasse, Berlin).

Kuhn had no direct knowledge of CW activities, any information he had coming from casual sources, such as servicemen (e.g., he had heard of Stickstofflost from a soldier, but had no knowledge of any other CW agent). He supposed that, as in the last war, research was going on at the KWI, Berlin. Professor Flury who worked at the KWI Berlin during the last war was now at Würtzburg. Kuhn had no knowledge of Spandau.

7. ACCOUNT OF WORK ON "3065"

Kuhn et al have synthesised simple derivatives of benzil which they have found to have the same order of effect as penicillin, and in some cases to be much more effective.

The most effective derivative, termed 3065 is the 2:2' dihydroxy-5:5'-dibromo benzil

This may be readily synthesised by condensing 2 mols salicylaldehyde (hydroxy groups protected by methylation); bromination may be carried out in the initial or in the final stage. 3065 is stable towards heat (m.p. 215) (cf. penicillin), is little soluble in water, but is soluble in weak alkalis and forms a water soluble (5-10%) complex with boric acid.

Other benzil derivatives (e.g. tetrachloro-) are effective but not as good as 3065. The synthesis of some analogues is given in Ber. 1943, 76.900 (Kuhn, Birkhofer and Möller).

Interest in the benzil derivatives was stimulated by the discovery that 4:4'-diamino benzil was a powerful antagonist to p-amino benzoic acid--this was the first example of an antagonist which was not a sulphonamide drug.

The clinical application of 3065 will be covered by a report from a medical assessor. Briefly, it rivals penicillin in its effects, especially in the case of staphylococcus (claimed to be 300 times more effective); the MLD is of the same order as the sulphonamide drugs except that the patient is more evaluation reports number 75, report 1, dated April 20, 1945 and marked "Secret"[1] that Dr. Kuhn was not a quack. On the contrary, he was President of the German Chemical Society since 1938. In wartime Germany, Dr. Kuhn was the Director of the organic chemistry division of the Reichforschungshaft, second only to Professor Thiessen. Dr. Kuhn did pure research while at the Reichforschungshaft, that is, it was not militarily oriented. Dr. Kuhn was responsible for work on nutrition, vitamins and war infection and disease. Since Dr. Kuhn worked in a purely research setting, any discoveries were given to a development (Entwicklung) facility or appropriated by the Reichamt fuer Wehrschaft Ausbau (Reich Bureau for Military Consolidation) for purposes of practical application. Dr. Kuhn was very cooperative with Allied interrogators who believed in his sincerity and efforts to set down the facts correctly. Additionally, Dr. Kuhn spoke excellent English. This meant that there were no misunderstandings about the properties of "3065".

Synthetic Penicillin—"3065" A copy from the actual text showing the chemical structure of "3065".

The account of the work on 3065 is well described and seems to lack mystery. From the report cited we learn that Dr. Kuhn and his team "synthesized simple derivatives of benzil (benzol or benzoyl?—author) with they have found to have the same order of effect as penicillin, and in some cases to be much more effective". For those interested in chemistry, 3065 is described further as a 2:2' dihydroxy-5:5'-dibromo benzil. A chemical diagram is pictured in the report. 3065 may be synthesized by condensing 2 mols salicylaldehyde (hydroxy groups protected by methylation); bromination may be carried out in the initial or in the final stage. 3065 is stable towards heat (m.p. 215), is little soluble in water, but is soluble in weak alkalis and forms a water-soluble (5-10%) complex with boric acid.

This CIOS report goes on to say that a detailed report of the clinical value of 3065 will be covered by a report from "a medical assessor". It does state, however, that 3065:

> "rivals penicillin in its effects, especially in the case of staphylococcus (claimed to be 300 times more effective; the MLD is of the same order as the sulphonamide drugs except that the patient is more sensitive when narcosized e.g., by morphine; it has been very effective against sulphonamide resistant gonococcus."

Clinical application in Germany was in the early stages and was interrupted by Allied occupation. Manufacture of 3065 was being carried out by I.G. Wuppertal-Elberfeld.

Reference is made to the investigation of the physiological workings of 3065 which was being done by introducing radioactive bromine, prepared by Professor Bothe at Heidelberg. This statement is confirmed by another Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee report, number 75/155 "Cyclotron Investigation at Heidelberg Interview with Prof. Walter Bothe[2] in which Dr. Bothe confirmed collaboration with Dr. Kuhn in producing tracer materials.

In addition to his work of 3065, Dr. Kuhn also worked on the medical application of a synthetic rubber derivative said to be a deep blue liquid that was effective in treating mustard gas burns. The liquid was applied prior or two hours after exposure. It was also an anti-inflammatory and provided protection from B. coli infection.

What can be said of Dr. Kuhn and 3065 in summary? Dr. Kuhn did not disappear after his CIOS report. He went on to be a Paperclip scientist, coming to the USA to work after the war. The final outcome of 3065 is somewhat unclear: in fact it is unknown. It just seems to have fallen off the face of the earth. Why was this? Was this pressure from the pharmaceutical companies, which were busy developing antibiotics? We simply do not know. But at one time there was the possibility of a world in which both antibiotics and medicines such as 3065 coexisted. Perhaps bacteria would have rapidly evolved defenses against 3065 just as they have to penicillin and other antibiotics. On the other hand, 3065's method of killing bacteria would have been totally different from that of an antibiotic. Therefore, its effectiveness and usefulness would have complemented antibiotics. If this is true, no near universal reliance on antibiotics would have been necessary. In this senecio, bacteria would not have had the universal exposure to nor built up the tolerance to penicillin and other antibiotics as they have done today. If penicillin was a "wonder drug" and we lost the opportunity for a complimentary drug equal to it, then we seem to have lost more than another wonder drug and we seem to have somehow gained, unnecessarily, super bacteria resistant to all antibiotics we can throw at them. Is it too late for 3065 to be of value to us?

SOURCES

1. Combined Intelligence Objective Subcommittee evaluation reports 75, April 30, 1945, evaluation Report 1, April 20, 1945, CIOS Target 8/59 (Professor R. Kuhn at the KWI, Heidelberg.

2. Combined Intelligence Objective Subcommittee Evaluation Report 159, June 30, 1945, Target C-9/327, Cyclotron Investigation at Heidelberg Interview with Prof. Walter Bothe

8 Synthetic Blood

Imagine, in our world where the fear of AIDS transmission though blood transfusion is a constant worry, what if that worry did not exist. What if our blood supply was safe? What if it had always been safe? What if countless lives had been saved through the transfusion of uncontaminated blood and what if those individuals had not passed the disease on to others? Is this possible? Yes it is and yes, it always was.

It is possible because during World War Two, the Germans invented not only synthetic blood plasma, but actual synthetic blood itself.

Rudolf Lusar wrote a book from memory. He was a German engineer who worked it the German Patent Office. He was privileged to only those patents filed officially at that time and not the secret SS patents, but even these official patents are truly impressive. The Allies took these patents and left no record or receipt. All that remains of boxcar loads of seized patents is Lusar's memory of them.

Lusar mentions that the method to produce synthetic blood plasma was invented by the Germans during this time period.[1]

An even more revealing glimpse into this suppressed science comes to us from a 1946 American magazine article titled "Secrets By The Thousands" which ran in Harper's Magazine.[2] Before describing the article, a little explanation is necessary.

In 1946 the war was over. The troops were coming home. The world looked so good that it spawned a "baby boom" in the United States. The Cold War had not started yet. In this brief moment of good feeling the censors were lifted and the press was allowed to print whatever they wanted to print. It was in this brief glow of good cheer that the Harper's article appeared. The article is a real window into exactly what was taken from Germany.

That article was only a few pages in length and only attempted to list the booty taken. The article says in part:

"German medical researchers had discovered a way to produce synthetic blood plasma. Called capain, it was made on a commercial scale and equaled natural plasma in results. Another discovery was periston, a substitute for the blood liquid."

Another secret, lost.

SOURCES

1. Lusar, Rudolf, 1964, Die deutschen Waffen und Geheimwaffen des 2. Welkrieges und ihre Weiterentwicklung, page 365

2. Walker, C. Lester, October 1946, "Secrets By The Thousands", Harper's Magazine, page 333.

9 Human Nutrition and Performance Enhances

Worldwide, humans eat a surprisingly varied diet. Some people eat almost no meat at all, yet other people eat almost nothing but meat. The diets of peoples originating in Europe and East Africa contain large amounts of dairy products while peoples originating outside those areas find dairy products undi-gestible. We, as individuals and as members of distinct human populations, have varying nutritional needs. The United Nations has tried repeatedly to establish minimum daily requirements regarding calories and vitamins but has failed miserably.

In the western world, especially in the United States, we are swamped with nutritional studies in our mass media. Many times, these studies contradict earlier ones. Even our official governmental organizations, such as the USDA, only seem to be telling us to eat whatever foods that we have in abundance.

Compounding this confusion is the fact that some of the testing done in the United States is sponsored by the companies which stand to gain from favorable findings regarding the foods or vitamins they produce. These companies know of human diversity and variability and they, therefore, know how to manipulate the results of a "clinical study" by using a carefully selected, small, statistically insignificant test group.

In the meantime, we are marketed food, vitamins, performance enhances and "engineered foods" Madison Avenue style, each coming with their own "proof". What are we to believe?

Wartime Germans were under particular stress. Young males almost universally wore a uniform.

Everyone else was mobilized in some form and worked for the war effort. There was a labor shortage. Slave laborers were drafted from prisoners as well as foreign civilian and prisoner of war populations. German efficiency demanded that the maximum return be gotten out of each calorie of food and out of every vitamin and mineral. German nutritional studies of those times were conducted with the necessary scientific rigor and were devoid of commercial considerations. It is for these reasons that the results of this work is still valid today and should be heeded.

Information used in this presentation was based upon a September 1, 1945 report by the Headquarters, United States Air Force In Europe, Office of the Surgeon, Aero-Medical Research Section which was titled "Interrogation of Major Gunther Lehmann Medical Officer, German Luftwaffe". The information in question was done by the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Medical Research at Dortmund and Baden. Major Gunther Lehmann was the director of this project. Before joining the Luftwaffe, Major Lehmann was a medical doctor and professor and had already been with the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Medical Research since shortly after his graduation from medical school in 1923. His miliary commission was largely ceremonial as was his Nazi party affiliation. Major Lehmann was told to remain at the institute and to continue his civilian research. Two additional topics of research were given him. One was to test the effectiveness of drugs in combating fatigue. The other was the effect of oxygen on fatigue.

The Germans were very interested in drug stimulants. They wanted to know if an individual's productivity could be increased. If workers and soldiers could be stimulated into increased productivity, obviously the entire German war effort would benefit. Dr. Lehmann actually began this work in 1933. These experiments led to later research with Professor Kraut which was performed on volunteers at the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute.

Subjects continued to work all night and were given a stimulant before breakfast. They were then tested for endurance on a bicycle ergometer. Pulse rates and pulse pressure were graphically recorded. The ergometer test continued until the product of the pulse rate times pulse pressure reached 10,000 which was considered the exhaustion threshold.

Initially, Dr. Lehmann administered caffeine as the experimental stimulant. In 1942 Dr. Lehmann switched to pervitan, which he believed to be the superior drug in all respects. Pervitan was found to alter the "vegetative energy reserve" or "work capacity", terms coined during this research, little, if at all. Pervitan was, however, found to double or even triple the ability to carry on over and above the ordinary exhaustion threshold or "energy ability". This energy ability is entirely a function of the brain cortex according to Dr. Lehmann in somewhat of a complex relationship.

In addition to drug stimulants, Dr. Lehmann did some rather interesting experimentation with adrenalin, which is nature's own stimulant. He concluded that there were actually two types of adrenalin secreted by the body, each with a different purpose. One, called the "activated form" causes the familiar flight or fight response. The other, called the "inactivated form" is secreted constantly by the body.

Dr. Lehmann found that subjects who tested the highest on the bicycle endurance test also had the highest levels of adrenalin in their blood streams. Dr. Lehmann determined that trained athletes invariably had higher blood levels of adrenalin than non-athletes. Finally, Dr. Lehmann determined that the ability to secret adrenalin could be trained or increased simply by the conditioning derived from the daily bicycle ergometer testing.

It can be seen that adrenalin levels figure into the vegetative energy reserve, the Adrenalin Level and Vegetative Compensations on Lehmann's chart that he used to measure drug stimulant response.

Dr. Lehmann also studied oxygen's relationship to fatigue, both mental and physical. As before, rigorous testing was conducted to measure both the physical and mental fatigue of subjects while controlling for oxygen in an altitude chamber. Dr. Lehmann found that both muscular and mental performance was positively increased in fatigued subjects by breathing 100% oxygen as measured at ground level. A tested efficiency increase of up to 50% was observed.

Dr. Lehmann and Professor Groff had already begun performance nutritional studies before the war. These studies continued with the directive that the effects of thiamin (vitamin B-l) on exercise be investigated. In addition to thiamin, glucose, simple sugar, was also a subject for testing. For this testing subjects were chosen from a nearby glass factory and their work was graded and classified by an industrial expert assigned to Dr. Lehmann's staff. Dosages were fifty grams of glucose and five mgms. of thiamin given after breakfast.

About 40% of the factory workers were already thought to have a thiamin deficiency.

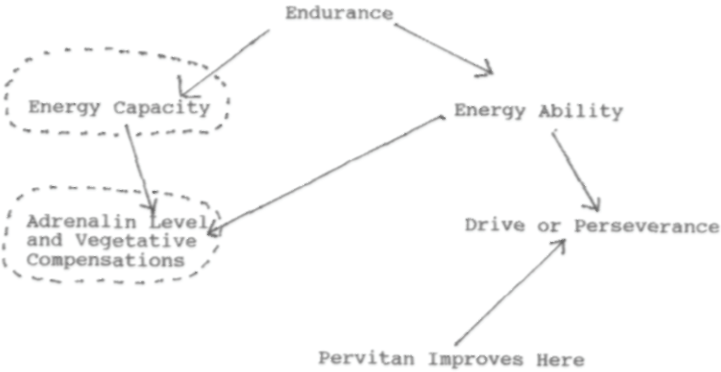
The results of this testing were that neither glucose nor thiamin had any affect on work tolerance or efficiency if given separately. If combined, however, there was a noticeable improvement in both work tolerance and efficiency. In view of these findings thiamin enriched bread was ordered to be given to the Luftwaffe in 1943 and 1944 and employees in mines and glass factories were given sweetened tea and thiamine tables each day.

In 1941 Drs. Lehmann and Kraut began investigations on human protein requirements. Their methods were revolutionary for the times and were later incorporated by East European coaches for monitoring their strength athletes. Drs. Lehmann and Kraut measured the nitrogen content in their test subject urea. All protein is composed of nitrogen. Neither fats nor water contain nitrogen. The test subjects, like all humans, break down bodily proteins in relation to their activity. The more activity and the harder it is, the more protein is broken down and excreted through the urine as nitrogen. The subjects for this test were female statistical clerks in a nearby factory and a bridge building crew composed of Russian prisoners. This is quite a range of physical activity.

In order to measure protein intake, Dr. Kraut employed the "best chefs available" to "ingeniously mask changes in protein content". The doctors running the study could then measure protein or nitrogen input vs output while using essentially two sample populations, one sedentary and the other composed of hard laborers. The exact amount of protein required for a given activity could roughly be determined using this protein balance method.

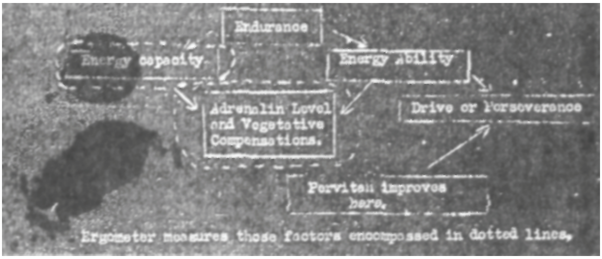
The results were interesting. The absolute minimum protein intake necessary daily to maintain a positive urinary protein balance is 40 grams for sedentary office workers. The figure increased to 55 grams for laborers. The most interesting finding was that for work efficiency to reach its highest level, that is for the workers to work at peak performance, whether sedentary or laborer, the stated minimum protein intake figures had to be doubled.

These findings were immediately marked "Secret". The diets of Luftwaffe personnel, upon which depended the protection of the Reich, were supplemented with 15 grams of additional protein. That



Endurance
Energy Capacity
Energy Ability
Adrenalin Level and Vegetative Compensations
Drive or Perseverance
Pervitan Improves Here

Ergometer measures those factors encompassed in dotted lines.



Endurance
Energy capacity
Energy Ability
Adrenalin Level and Vegetative Compensations.
Drive or Perseverance
Pervitan improves here.
Ergometer measures those factors encompassed in dotted lines.

A chart from the text showing the relationships involved. Ergometer measures those factors encompassed in dotted lines.
Above: redrawn chart, Below: original chart.

brought the dietary figure up to an average content of 85 grams in 1943 and 1944.

Caloric intake also effects work performance. Dr. Lehmann found that work efficiency increased in direct proportion to caloric intake up to 3,000 calories per day for office workers and 4,500 calories per day for laborers. Interestingly enough, it was found that there was a time lag of approximately three weeks between improvement in the diet and increased work efficiency.

American intelligence summaries of this type hardly ever make conclusions or even assess the implications about the research reviewed. Why this was so remains somewhat of a mystery. Some implications can be drawn, however.

The conclusions involve those individuals engaged in physical exertion, whether it be hard labor or athletics. Drug stimulants can greatly increase the capacity of an individual to do work after that individual has reached his or her exhaustion threshold. Exceeding the previous work capacity causes an increase in the level of blood adrenalin. Increased levels of blood adrenalin allow that individual to exceed his or her previous best. What is being described is a kind of performance enhancing feedback loop or step-by-step increase begun using drug stimulants.

It was found that pure oxygen increases physical and mental ability.

It was found that work efficiency could be doubled using a combination of vitamin B-l and glucose.

It was found that a 40 grams per day protein consumption can be considered a minimum, even for sedentary individuals, while individuals doing heavy manual labor, and presumably athletes, can benefit from a diet containing up to 110 grams per day of protein.

It was found that there is a daily caloric requirement needed for peak output which varies positively with the degree of activity involved.

All this may mean that those small, canned energy drinks whose main ingredients are caffeine, B vitamins and simple sugars may actually work. They may be used when the individual is exhausted and actually build further endurance. This research also means that more oxygen, even the deep breathing as done by boxers between rounds, is probably beneficial toward recovery.

It also means that individuals restricting caloric intake to lose weight will not be at peak performance. Boxers and other athletes who must "make weight" usually do this during training for their next contest. The training period employed for most boxers, for example, is about six weeks. It takes about six weeks to bring a boxer to his peak. If less time is allocated, then the boxer will not be in proper condition. If more time is taken, the boxer runs the risk of overtraining and going stale. But it can be concluded from the research presented above that if the boxer is restricting himself calorically, he will never achieve optimum performance. This research indicates that the wiser course of action might be to diet to make the weight before the six-week training period commences as opposed dieting during the training.

There is an addendum to this story. The reader may be wondering exactly what pervitin is. And the reader may be wondering if it was ever actually used by the German military. In other words, were the Germans on their way to inventing "Universal Soldiers", drugged to enhance performance?

Freedom of Information Act requests were made for "pervitin". One did come back which was obviously only a piece of a much larger story. This involved the 1946 post-war world of Occupied Germany and the culture that sprung up there overnight. This file was marked "secret" at the time and was titled "Report on Deadlock". This file took on both the aspect of a criminal as well as a military investigation because it dealt with a black-market conspiracy to sell pervitin and another stimulant called "hykola" by a former military man of questionable motives.

The concern on the part of the military seems to be the history of the principal character in the investigation who was a former SS man. It seems that their concern was that the funds derived from this black market sale not go to any surviving SS organization. As far as we are concerned, the file is mostly trivial nonsense except for the fact that the drug pervitin was produced in wartime Germany by a company called Tem_ler Werke (one letter cannot be read) and that a sizeable store of these pills was in the possession of the Wehrmacht at the end of the war[2]. No records could be found concerning its field use by the German military but we now know that Pervitin was what we now call methamphetamine.

Sources

1. Head Quarters, United States Air Force In Europe, Office of the Surgeon, Aero-Medical Research Section, September 1, 1945, "Interrogation Of Major Gunther Lehmann, Medical Officer, German Luftwaffe.

2. CSDIC(WEA), "Report on Deadlock", page 5, May 25, 1946, (ref IB/A1/PF13520 dated 22 May 46 and IB/A1/PF 6467 dated 25 May 46.

10 Magnetofunk and Himmelskompass and Point 103

The Magnetofunk and Himmelscompass were passive defenses used by the Germans in conjunction with their secret arctic base, which Wilhelm Landig calls "Point 103". To gain some understanding of these devices it is necessary to discuss this base but to do that we must digress even further to include the Nazi post-war writer Wilhelm Landig and one of his detractors.

In 1993 Joscellyn Godwin published Arktos The Polar Myth in Science, Symbolism, And Nazi Survival. Godwin summarizes Landig's contribution as best as possible in six pages. Godwin's point in this summarization was to paint Landig's attempt to air the Nazi point of view as Godwin puts it:

"Goetzen gegen Thule is in one sense a massive work of revisionism, or, to put it plainly, of whitewashing the Nazis."[1].

Godwin is part of a time-tested tradition. He cites and uses the work of known Nazis, but, to do so and to get his work published, he must mumble an anti-Nazi formula as penitence. The effect is to discredit Landig. Unfortunately, because of the language barrier, this has become the "accepted party line" view of Landig in the English-speaking world.

Wilhelm Landig died in 1997. Since then we have learned that he was in the SS and was in charge of security at the Prague Airport, the site were the Habermohl saucer lifted off[2]. In all probability, he oversaw, on at least one occasion, not only the Habermohl model, but the Schriever and Miethe designs as well. Landig was a responsible person within the security structure of the 3rd Reich and probably came across many other items of interest during his duty, which he passes along to us in his writing.

After the war, Landig wrote three novels describing things and events that went on in the war and immediately afterward. He prefaces these works by telling the reader these are novels full of realities. This was code because in the post-war world of Germany and Austria one was not allowed to state in fact what Landig stated in "fiction".

One of these "facts" was Point 103. Point 103 was a secret German base somewhere in the Arctic. Landig tells us it was in Canada but, in fact, it could have been most anywhere. Point 103 was a military base in every sense of the word in "Goetzen". It had hangers, runways, housing, storage facilities, shops, laboratories, and maintenance facilities, all contained in huge caverns blasted from the arctic rock.

One main function of Point 103 was to serve as a weather station since northern storms move from the West before arriving in Europe and accurate weather forecasting on the part of the Germans for their military operations could help mitigate Allied air superiority. The Battle of the Bulge is a great example of how the Germans used bad weather to their advantage.

This base was always sought out by Allied aircraft. Landig tells us that this base survived this aerial onslaught and survived the war. In fact, Landig's story picks up at Point 103 after the war has ended. It is the technology that allowed this base to survive which is our topic in this chapter. These devices, according to Landig, were the Magnetofunk and the Himmelskompass.

The magnetic north pole, the "North" of compasses, is not as close to the geographical North Pole as one would imagine. It is located near 70 degrees of North Latitude, near 90 degrees West Longitude, on the Boothis Peninsula in the Northwest Territories of Canada.

"Funk" in German has to do with our word "radio". Therefore, Magnetofunk is magnetic and delivered by radio waves. The job of the Magnetofunk was to deflect the magnetic lines of force in the instruments of Allied aircraft ever so slightly. Over the vast tracks of the Arctic, this slight deflection was designed to steer the search aircraft safely around Point 103 [3].

But if the magnetic compasses of the Allied aircraft were altered, how would it be prevented from confusing the compasses of the Germans? How would the base ever be resupplied, for instance?

The answer is the other device under consideration, the Himmelskompas or heavenly compass. This compass did not use the magnetic north pole to orient itself but oriented itself using the position of the sun instead. This compass was so sensitive to sunlight that it could even function in twilight or if the sun was below the horizon. The explanation given is that a portion of the sunlight striking the earth is polarized. This effect is said to be strengthened by the focused magnetic field in the region of the poles. This polarized light was measured and a position relative to the pole fixed[4].

Its ability to function below the horizon is based on its ability to register polarized light which would only appear above the horizon. Not only could this light be used for directional purposes but it could also be used to indicate the aircraft's attitude from the horizontal. This horizonal ability may be the cause of some confusion in its name.

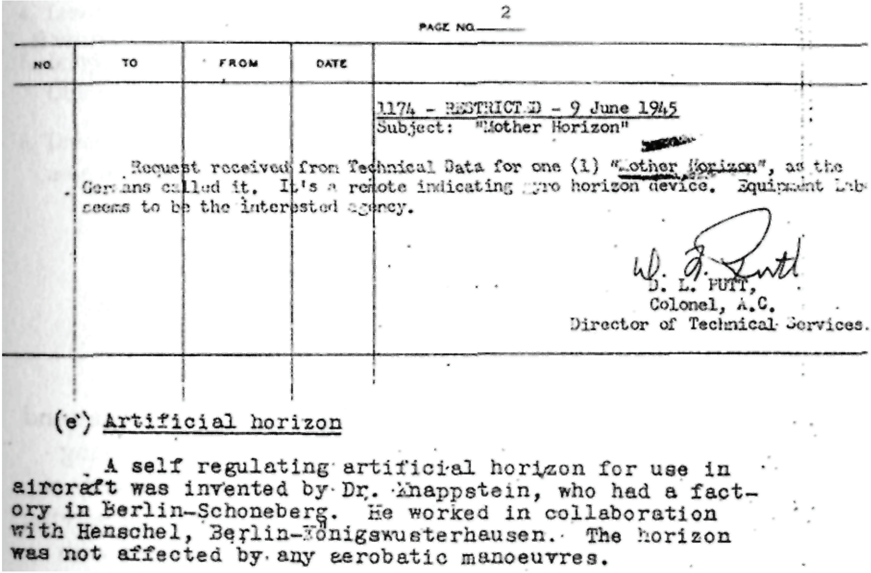
So, Landig claims that through use of these two devices the German polar base's secret location was kept from the Allies while its exact position was known to the Germans. Is this a fairy tale as Godwin implies? Is there any proof?

Nobody has ever found Point 103, or, if they have, this information has been kept from us. Nobody has ever come up with a Magnetofunk as far as I know. But there is independent evidence that the Himmelskompass did exist. And the evidence comes from United States intelligence documents.

These two references are brief and rather cryptic as are many such documents. They are more interested in identifying the devices to be studied without divulging classified details to the casual reader. Remember, the United States military already had plenty of horizon devices which were mounted in the cockpits of aircraft and indicated to the pilot the degree of level flight of the aircraft. Therefore, we are not discussing the usual cockpit horizon device in these reports.

The first report comes from a prisoner of war, Kurt Kreutzfeld, involved in German high technology. In the report in question he also discussed German glide bombs, rocketry, devices for projectile direction, as well as microfilmed SS technology. He describes an "Artificial horizon" as:

"A self regulating artificial horizon for use in aircraft was invented by Dr. Knappstein, who had a factory in Berlin -



PAGE NO. 2

NO	TO	FROM	DATE
				1174 - RESTRICTED - 9 June 1945 Subject: "Mother Horizon"

Request received from Technical Data for one (1) "Mother Horizon", as the Germans called it. It's a remote indicating gyro horizon device. Equipment Lab seems to be the interested agency.

D. L. PUTT,
Colonel, A.C.
Director of Technical Services.

(e) Artificial horizon

A self regulating artificial horizon for use in aircraft was invented by Dr. Knappstein, who had a factory in Berlin-Schoneberg. He worked in collaboration with Henschel, Berlin-Königswusterhausen. The horizon was not affected by any aerobatic manoeuvres.

Above: copy of HQ, U.S. Strategic Air Forces in Europe document discussion "Mother Horizon".

Below: part of a British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 142, page 4, discussing an artificial horizon.

Schoneberg. He worked in collaboration with Henschel, Berlin-Koenswusterhausen. The horizon was not affected by any acrobatic maneuvers".[5]

The second document is strange indeed. It is a two-page extract of a certain Lt. Newton's diary, copied and sent to a Col. Deyarmond on 6/21/45 by Col. D.L. Putt, Director of Technical Services. This was a month and a half after the war in Europe ended. The first entry concerned communications problems in forwarding an "engine" to Wright-Patterson AFB and how to avoid such problems in the future. The second entry describes the lack of qualified technical people involved in the "V-1" project (the American investigation) and how it would be great to find qualified Germans to explain it all. The third entry is the shortest and most cryptic:

"1174-Restricted-9 June 1945 Subject: "Mother Horizon"

Request received from Technical Data for one[1] "Mother Horizon", as the German's call it. It's a remotely indicating gyro horizon device. Equipment Laboratory seems to be the interested agency."[6]

These documents are reproduced here.

Incidently, the US military spent huge amounts of time, money and manpower in the years following the war in secret missions, flying over the Arctic. This is no secret now since we have the testimony of Col. Wendele Stevens who took part in these operations while serving in the USAF. In these operations, B-29 bombers were outfitted with the latest electromagnetic sensing gear and flown all over the American and Canadian Arctic allegedly looking for "flying saucers". According to Wendele, when they were sighted, they were filmed and the film and recorded measurements were spirited way to Washington D.C. Nothing was ever heard of them afterward.

It may be no coincidence that something like this was the method used to track down German weather stations during the war. It is also even possible that the origin of these post-war, artic flying saucers was this base or others like it.

SOURCES

1. Godwin, Joscelyn, 1993, page 68, Arktos The Polar Myth In Science, Symbolism, And Nazi Survival, Phanes Press, Grand Rapids, MI.

2. Chatwin, Margret, 1999, page 1, Ahnenerbe, UFOs, Neonazis: Wilhelm Landig, Informationsdienst gegen Rechtsextremismus, http://www.idgr.de/texte-1/esoterik/landig/landig.html

3. Landig, Wilhelm, 1971, pages 121,132, Goetzen gegen Thule Ein Roman voller Wirklichkeiten, Hans Pfieffer VerlagGmbH, Hannover

4. Landig, Wilhelm, 1971, page 27

5. British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report 142, page 4, Information Obtained From Targets Of Opportunity In The Sonthofen Area, London,

6. Unmarked document, undated, titled "Carrier Sheet", page two, microfilm numbers: A-1007,1652

11 German Free Energy Research

The Germans like people everywhere in the 20th century, were experimenting with free energy or new energy inventions. Among those well-known inventions are the Hans Coler devices and the Karl Schnappeller device. The Karl Schnappeller device was described in an earlier book, Hitler's Flying Saucers: A Guide To German Flying Discs Of The Second World War. The Hans Coler device is one of the best-known devices thanks to the British having declassified their analysis of his work and their publication and translation of earlier evaluations[1]. Beyond these two, there is the work of Georg Otto Erb, which was also briefly touched upon in Hitler's Flying Saucers.

Besides working on field propulsion systems, Dr. Erb also worked on "Electric sources of energy of various kinds" as well as "Apparatus for turning the energy of the sun's rays into electrical energy"[2]. A page of the microfilm report is reproduced here. Beyond this report there is no information on Dr. Erb or his research during or after the war.

The devices of Hans Coler are quite another matter. Information about them can is only a mouse-click away using the search words "Hans Coler". Indeed, the entire British Intelligence Sub-Committee report is reproduced on-line, in full. So perhaps instead of a full review of his work, our time would be best spent in discussion of Coler and his ideas as they are contained in that report.

Hans Coler incorporated permanent magnets into both of his devices. There were two of these, the Statement of the work of Dr. Otto ERB

1. Before the war, Dr. Erb developed measuring instruments of all sorts. The following are examples of his work:

- (i) Measuring apparatus for interference free determination of the hardness and temper of steel.
- (ii) Electrical measuring apparatus for automatic control of storage temperature.
- (iii) Apparatus for conversion of residual heat into electrical energy.
- (iv) Electrical medical apparatus of various sorts.
- (v) High tension apparatus.
- (vi) Warning mechanisms for excessive temperatures.
- (vii) Electric fire fighting apparatus.
- (viii) Electric sources of energy of various kinds.
- (ix) Apparatus for turning the energy of the sun's rays into electrical energy.
- (x) Rearward impulse propulsion for vehs and aircraft.
- (xi) Wood gas generator for high performance.

After outbreak of war he had to devote his research to armament work.

[redacted]

CIC 75/139 - 1 - Enclosure

Government file on Dr. Georg Otto Erb. Note his interest in new sources of energy.

SOLID STATE - AMPLIFYING TRANSFORMERS
HANS COLER - CURRENT FLOW DEVICE & MAGNET CURRENT FLOW APPARATUS

Hans Coler, a German energy researcher from the period from 1936 to 1945 evolved several promising solid state electrical energy sources using permanent magnets, various shaped coils, copper plates and condensers (capacitors).

Two significant devices were produced from this war-time research, the first being the "Stromerzeuer," or Current Flow Device, which consisted of a central transformer comprised of two flat coils, with the ends of the secondary flat coil connected in series with the South poles of two permanent magnets. The North poles of the two permanent magnets are linearly connected to two flat copper plates.

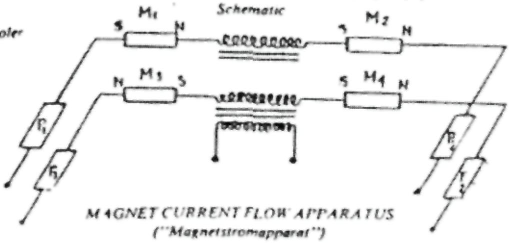
The output leads were connected to the ends of the copper plates, all in accordance with the accompanying diagram.

The input to the primary flat coil was at the wattage level provided by a standard dry cell battery, presumed to be the 1½ volt size. It was claimed that when the battery energized the primary circuit, a separation of charge takes place, influenced by the two magnet polarities, within the linear circuitry. When the battery source was switched off, a reversing current is supposed to flow, in the secondary circuit, but the magnets are not supposed to influence a polarization effect on this reversing.

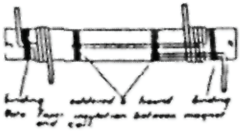
Several size versions of the "Stromerzeuger" were built, one small ten watt unit, a larger seventy (70) watt unit and finally a large unit built in 1937 reportedly produced 6 KW output.

CURRENT FLOW DEVICE (Stromerzeuger")
Schematic

VI Hans Coler

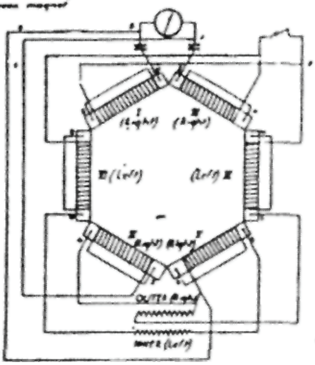


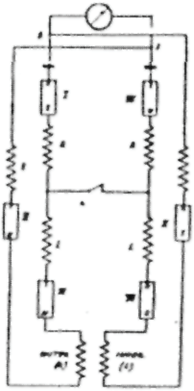
MAGNET CURRENT FLOW APPARATUS
("Magnetstromapparat")



Coil-over Magnet-Detail Schematic

Fig 1





Geometric Layout - "Magnetstromapparat"

German Free Energy Devices: Above is the Stromerzeuger which greatly interested the German Navy.

Below is the agnetstromapparat, a demonstration device.

"Magnetstromapparat" and the "Stromerzeuger". The Magnetstromapparat was fully developed and completed by 1933 with the help of von Unruh and Franz Haid of Siemens-Schukert. This means that the Siemens firm, inspire of later denials (or memory losses), has known of free energy and specifically the Hans Coler device since the early 1930s. In 1933, as part of a test, the Magnetstromapparat was locked in a room in the Norwegian Legation in Berlin. During the time it was locked away, the Coler device continued to produce electric tension of thirteen volts

No further work was done by Coler on the Magnetstromapparat after this time. His entire energies were focussed on the Stromerzeuger. In 1943 Coler and his work ended up at the O.K.M., or the German Navy. At this time Coler had achieve an output of 6 kilovolts for the Stromerzeuger. This was just the basic unit, meaning that additional sections could be grafted onto this unit for a much increased output.

The official "party line" is that no further developments came after this time, meaning that the German Navy never used this device. The story gets even more definitive in that it is claimed that the Coler devices were destroyed in an air raid. For what purpose do you suppose the German Navy might have used this device? I have only one clue to offer. By this time in the war the German Navy was really nothing more than the German U-boat service. Imagine a U-boat running on electricity generated underwater without an air-consuming diesel engine? Do you think they just might be interested?

It was only after the war, in 1946, when Color found himself in the British occupation zone, that the Magnetstromapparat was rebuilt at the request of the British. The British supplied material but the device was re-created in Germany. The British also asked for a materials list for the much more powerful Stromerzeuger, but information on its re-construction is lacking.

The Stromerzeuger was not one device or model but several. In reading the descriptions given by scientists who studied the device for fraud, it is evident that these devices varied in size and output as well as design details.

The Stromerzeuger consisted of two separate devices, a primary connected via induction to a secondary. The primary was activated by battery. The primary was opened and closed inducing a reaction in the secondary. The output from the secondary was said to have been many times that of the primary's input. Additional "secondaries" could be added, further increasing output.

Coler said that ferro-magnetism has an oscillation of a frequency of 180 kilohertz. The interaction of this frequency and that of opening and closing the circuit is thought by Coler to have built up an electrical tension.

Coler thought this tension was further enhanced by what he called "Raumenergie" or "space energy". Coler believed that this additional outside energy, "space electrons" flowed from "repelling spaces" to "attracting spaces" in his device. These were located in the flat copper plates he used as part of the circuit. This attracting-repelling space sounds very much like the semiconductor theories presented in modern textbooks. The space energy is still unrecognized by accepted science, yet the British confirmed that the Magnetstromapparat worked and could not be explained by conventional electrical theory.

The British report on Coler was not de-classified until 1978 or 1979, well after the first energy crisis. If this were just mad ravings, then it would have never been classified and would have been used for propaganda purposes to discredit German science, thus removing it from the notice or interest of "enquiring minds".

It sounds like when the flat copper plates were activated, they acted like an open drain-plug, allowing this "space energy" to enter the circuit.

Hold on, we are not quite done with German free or new energy devices and research and I promise you a big surprise when we return to it.

SOURCES

1. British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report no. 1043, item no. 31, The Invention Of Hans Coler, Relating To An Alleged New Source Of Power, 1946, London, W.1.

2. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 146, Dr. Georg Otto Erb

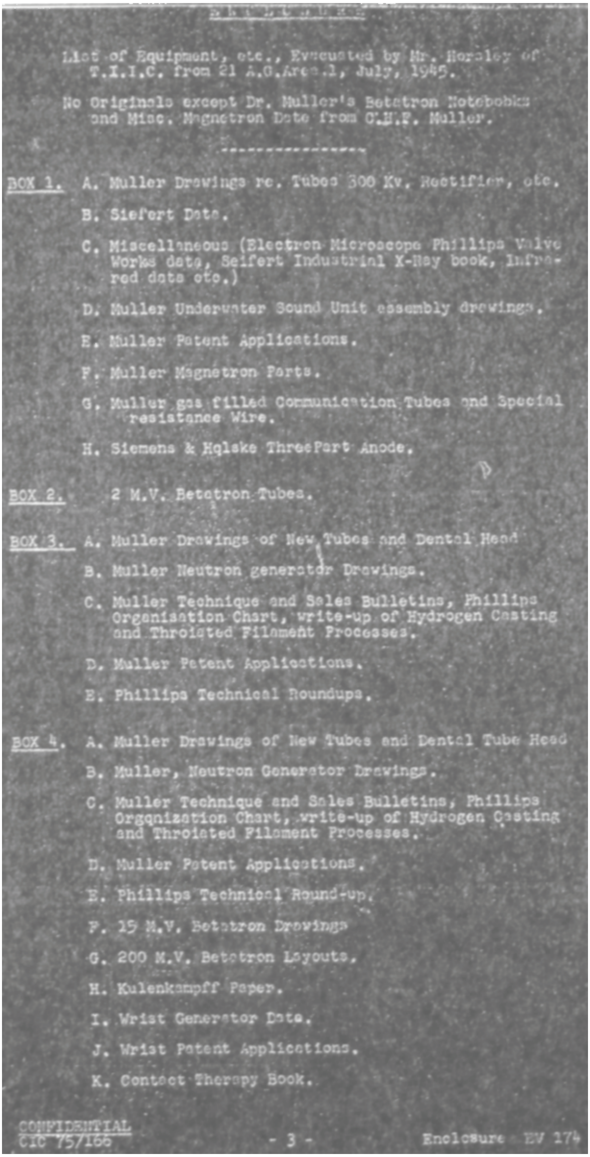
12 Technical Infrastructure

Just as established history tells us that there are no new energy sources or new energy devices, established history also tells us that it was not the Germans, but the Americans who detonated the first atomic device. German atomic research is often described in establishment history as consisting of a crude atomic pile in someone's basement or backyard which would have either exploded or the faulty device would have killed everyone involved with radiation. This is the classic undervaluation, minimization story.

But if the Germans were able to do far more than they have been credited, wouldn't there be some sort of corroborating technical evidence? In other words, wouldn't there have been a supporting technical infrastructure?

Thanks to the intensive efforts of Allied intelligence to investigate every aspect of the technical underpinnings of the German war effort, we have the evidence in the form of the Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee reports, the British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee reports, the F.I.A.T. reports and other similar research gathering reports and organizations. All these agencies published findings and summary reports, even if they have not all been de-classified today. It would take volumes of books to bind and organize this material but I would like to discuss one or two that have a bearing on past and future topics.

Through much of the war, research was directed by the Reich's Research Council. From here it was organized in three phases. Basic research was done at a



[illegible]

List of Equipment, etc., Evacuated by Mr. Horsley of T.I.I.C. from 21 A.G.Area.1, July, 1945.

No Originals except Dr. Muller's Betatron Notebooks and Misc. Magnetron Data from C.H.F. Muller.

BOX 1. A. Muller Drawings re. Tubes 300 Kv. Rectifier, etc.

B. Siefert Data.

C. Miscellaneous (Electron Microscope Phillips Valve Works data, Seifert Industrial X-Ray book, Infra-red data etc.)

D. Muller Underwater Sound Unit assembly drawings.

E. Muller Patent Applications.

F. Muller Magnetron Parts.

G. Muller gas filled Communication Tubes and Special resistance Wire.

H. Siemens & Halske ThreePart Anode.

BOX 2. 2 M.V. Betatron Tubes.

BOX 3. A. Muller Drawings of New Tubes and Dental Head

B. Muller Neutron generator Drawings.

C. Muller Technique and Sales Bulletins, Phillips Organisation Chart, write-up of Hydrogen Casting and Throiated Filament Processes.

D. Muller Patent Applications.

E. Phillips Technical Roundups.

BOX 4. A. Muller Drawings of New Tubes and Dental Tube Head

B. Muller, Neutron Generator Drawings.

C. Muller Technique and Sales Bulletins, Phillips Orgqnization Chart, write-up of Hydrogen Casting and Throiated Filament Processes.

D. Muller Patent Applications.

E. Phillips Technical Round-up.

F. 15 M.V. Betatron Drawings

G. 200 M.V. Betatron Layouts.

H. Kulenkampff Paper.

I. Wrist Generator Data.

J. Wrist Patent Applications.

K. Contact Therapy Book.

From the Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee report number 174, C.H.F. Muller, A.G. This is a list of recovered items in boxes. Note: box 3, letter B and box 4, letter B, "Neutron Generator Drawings". Also note in box 4, I and J which concerng a wrist generator data and patent application. Magnetrons and betatrons are also discussed.

"Forschungs" (research) facility. After the basic concept had been tested and verified, the idea, machine, weapon, etc., went on to an "Entwicklung" (development) facility where the idea was worked out in practical terms. From here the idea was carried to a production facility that was a manufacturer, usually a commercial manufacturer. The larger manufacturers have names which are familiar to us, Heinkel, Siemens, I.G. Farben, etc. But it could also go to a smaller, less known manufacturer.

Having described a chain of events, it should be added that there were many exceptions to this sequence. Some of the manufacturing companies did their own research. Universities and technical colleges did research besides and in addition to that sponsored by the government. Every branch of the German military did independent research. There were many private inventors and scientists working on their own projects that were of special interest to them. Finally, the SS had a vast system of research by the end of the war and actually appropriated facilities and people from other organizations.

Government intelligence reports are not explicit but what I would like to do is use them to describe a couple of these research facilities and a small manufacturing firm who made devices necessary for the development of some of the more exotic devices we will encounter later. Also, a description of one or two of the completely researched concepts from those days might prove interesting.

Let us first look at the C.H.F. Muller, A.G. Company. This was a small manufacturing company, employing about 500 people with about 80,000 square feet of floor space.

C.H.F. Muller made x-ray machines and similar electronic devices that were employed in the nuclear effort. They made x-ray machines for use in the medical realm. They also made a "cascade" high voltage generator, 900 to 2,400 Kv. for use as a deutron generator. A deutron or deuteron is the nucleus of the deuterium atom. Deuterium is an isotope of hydrogen meaning that it has the same chemical properties as hydrogen but a slightly different atomic structure. Both hydrogen and deuterium form oxides, hydrogen oxide and deuterium oxide. We call hydrogen oxide "water" and deuterium oxide "heavy water".

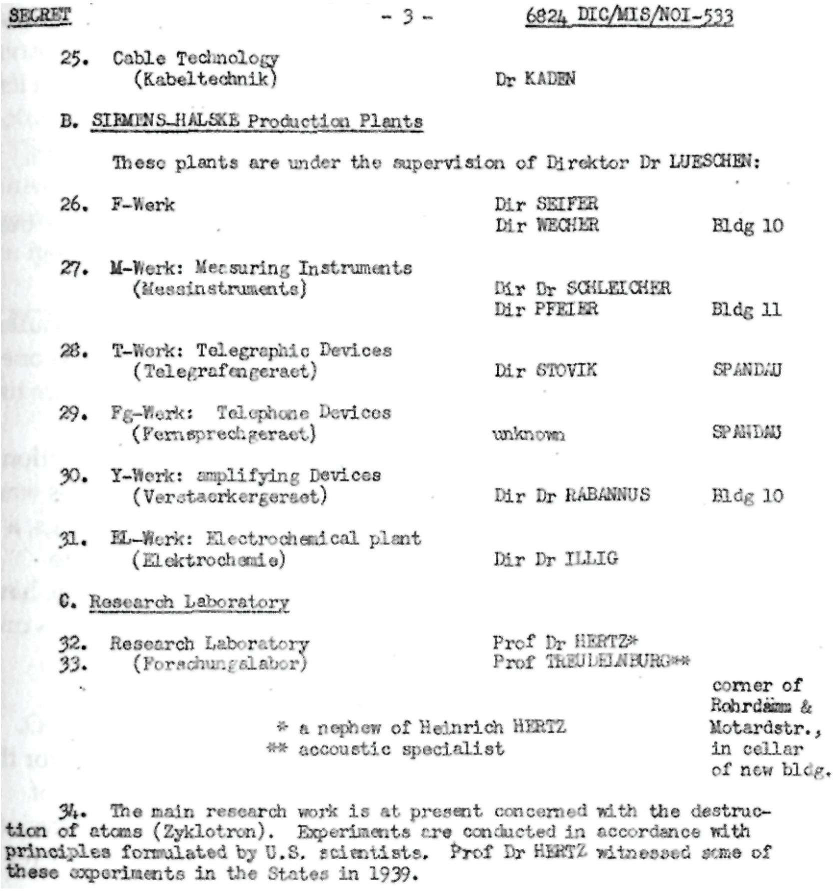
C.H.F. Muller made magnetrons of apparently their own design. A magnetron is used to generate very high frequency wavelengths. They also made betatrons of three kinds. The betatron had only been recently invented and it was used to generate very high-energy electron beams as well as extremely powerful beams of x-rays. The x-rays generated using a betatron have very great penetrating power. C.H.F. Muller made electron microscopes, a "wrist generator" (a patent application for this device was also found at C.H.F. Muller) and there were plans found for a Muller neutron generator. Let's look at the last two in more detail.

A few years back, a retired USAF Colonel, Philip Corso, made some claims about finding a dead alien in a plastic body bag at some US Air Force base in his book titled, The Day After Roswell. Well, he couldn't produce the dead alien for his book or even a picture of it or another witness to corroborate his testimony, so, to bolster his argument he linked this alleged dead alien with examples of to-that-time unknown technology which he claimed were of alien origin. The two big unknown technologies he cited as coming from with the alien universe were the transistor and night vision equipment.

Night vision equipment is well documented as having been invented by the Germans during World War Two. In fact, the device described below must have been some sort of light amplification device. This particular device was said to have been powered by a truly miniature generator.

"He showed me then what had been two of the most closely-guarded technical secrets of the war: the infrared device which the Germans invented for seeing at night and the remarkable diminutive generator with operated it. German cars could drive at any speed in total blackout, seeing objects clear as day two hundred meters ahead. Tanks with this device could spot targets two miles away. As a sniper scope it enabled German riflemen to pick off a man in total darkness.

There was a sighting tube, and a selenium screen out front. The screen caught the incoming infrared light, which drove electrons from the selenium along the tube to another screen that was electrically charged and fluorescent. A visible image appeared on this screen. Its clearness and its accuracy for aiming purposes were phenomenal. Inside the tube, distortion of the stream of electrons by the earth's magnetism was even allowed for!



25.	Cable Technology (Kabeltechnik)	Dr KADEN

B. SIEMENS-HALSKE Production Plants

These plants are under the supervision of Direktor Dr LUESCHEN:

26.	F-Werk	Dir SEIFER Dir WECHER	Bldg 10
27.	M-Werk: Measuring Instruments (Messinstruments)	Dir Dr SCHLEICHER Dir PFEIER	Bldg 11
28.	T-Werk: Telegraphic Devices (Telegrafengeraet)	Dir STOVIK	SPANDAU
29.	Fg-Werk: Telephone Devices (Fernsprechgeraet)	unknown	SPANDAU
30.	Y-Werk: amplifying Devices (Verstaerkergeraet)	Dir Dr RABANNUS	Bldg 10
31.	EL-Werk: Electrochemical plant (Elektrochemie)	Dir Dr ILLIG

C. Research Laboratory

32. 33.	Research Laboratory (Forschungslabor)	Prof Dr HERTZ* Prof TREUDELENBURG	corner of Rohrdamm & Motardstr., in cellar of new bldg.

* a nephew of Heinrich HERTZ
 accoustic specialist

34. The main research work is at present concerned with the destruction of atoms (Zyklotron). Experiments are conducted in accordance with principles formulated by U.S. scientists. Prof Dr HERTZ witnessed some of these experiments in the States in 1939.

This is part of a page from a Secret report, dated October 1944 but issued in March, 1945, titled: Coil Research Laboratory Siemens Halske Berlin (6824 DIC/MIS/NOT-533) Please note item 34. At this radio research and development laboratory the Germans experimented with a "Zyklotron" with is their spelling of cyclotron. A cyclotron is a particle accelerater, still used in atomic research and development to this day.

The diminutive generator-five inches across-stepped up current from an ordinary flashlight battery to 15,000 volts. It had a walnut-sized motor that spun a rotor at 10,000 rpm—so fast that originally it had destroyed all lubricants with the great amount of ozone it produced. The Germans had developed a new grease: chlorinated paraffin oil. The generator then ran 3,000 hours!"[1].

The C.H.F. Muller wrist generator fits this description. Please remember this context as we will return to the super lubricant in a later chapter.

The other development mentioned in the intelligence report is the neutron generator. In order to cause a chain reaction, on demand, resulting in an atomic bomb, a method to generate a stream of neutrons is usually thought necessary. The fact that the C.H.F. Muller A.G. had designed some sort of neutron generator indicates that one piece in the puzzle concerning the detonation of an atomic device had been solved.

Along these same lines there was another company in production of electronic devices necessary for an atomic infrastructure. This was the Siemens Halske firm in Berlin who made, among other things, a cyclotron[2]. A cyclotron is a machine that uses a magnetic field to propel heavier nuclear particles. It is a particle accelerator. There have been rumors that the Germans even used a particle accelerator as one method to enrich uranium.

Next we turn to a pure research organization, the Flugfunk Forschungsinstitut Oberpfaffenhofen, abbreviated F.F.O. The F.F.O. was an organization specializing in aeronautical radio research for the Luftwaffe. This organization seems to have specialized in work of jamming radar. This was a large organization and had many physical sites of operation. When the war drew to a conclusion, all the secret research done at the F.F.O. was burnt. What we know and what remains consist largely of what was remembered by the individual scientists involved and their private libraries. It is not unreasonable to assume that some secrets went forever unspoken after those ashes cooled, however.

The F.F.O. developed three types of magnetrons and several types of klystrons. A klystron tube is used to produce ultra-high frequencies but they seem to have been smaller than magnetrons. Klystrons seem to have been the hot ticket at this time and were employed to generated frequencies in order to jam radar. Klystrons were employed in the famous "Feuer" devices of which there was more than one[3]. This name "Feuer" is "fire" in English and has given rise to speculation that klystrons were employed in the alleged jamming devices on the German Feuerball (foo or phoo fighter). The klystron tube could very well have been the transmission apparatus for the Magnetic Wave or Motorstoppmitel device we will discuss later.

The F.F.O. also did some interesting work in "crystal detectors", as named by the Americans. But before discussing that topic, perhaps two examples of completed projects should be pointed out as well as one involving some very futuristic research:

ELECTROSTATIC ANTI-AIRCRAFT SHELL FUSES

"The principle involved in these fuses is similar to that used in measurements of electric fields. The shell or projectile has a small aerial sticking out on one side. The whole shell rotates about its axis in the normal manner and this causes the aerial to develop an alternating voltage if any electrostatic fields are present. This voltage is fed to the grid of a cold-cathode thyratron tube causing it to conduct when the voltage is large enough. The anode of the tube is fed by a condenser that was charged while the shell was in the gun. The discharge of this condenser through the thyrotron blows a small electric fuse and explodes the shell.

The shell is fired from the ground where the electrostatic field is usually about 1 Kv per metre (it varies between 0.1 and 10 Kv/m). Consequently, the shell has an appreciable charge induced on it by this field before it loses contact with the earth. During flight this charge gives a field that is symmetric and produces no alternating voltage in the aerial. When the shell approaches an aircraft or large conducting body the induced fields are asymmetric and can induce alternating voltages of the order of tens or hundreds of volts in the aerial."[4]

Today, we call this a proximity fuse but it is evident in this careful description by the CIOS that this concept was revolutionary at that time.

GUIDED MISSILES

"A remote control steering mechanism for a falling bomb has been developed by the group of Ing. Kreil at F.F.O. Grafolfing. It consists of an airborne transmitter at 25 mc/s and a receiving system inside the bomb. The aerials are stretched diagonally between the tail fins of the bomb to make them less susceptible to jamming coming from the front of the bomb. The apparatus was unsuccessful owing to electrical discharges (corona, etc.), from the bomb during fall affecting the receiver and causing the bomb to zig-zag. The work was stopped in 1944.

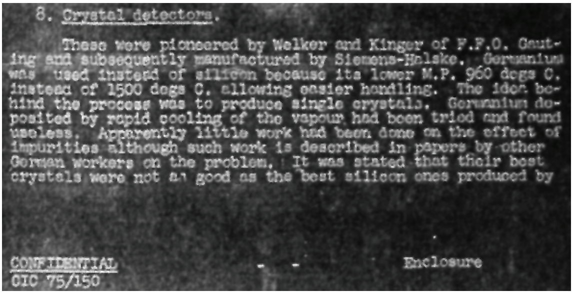
Ing. Kreil said that the Luftwaffe had subsequently found a cure for this by trailing wires with resistors or threads of semi-conducting materials behind the bomb to cause the electrical discharges to take place slowly and without oscillation in the frequency range used for controlling the bomb.[5]

In other words, the F.F.O. invented the first "smart bomb".

STEALTH RESEARCH

"Measurement on the conductivity and dielectric properties of flame gases are being conducted by Dr. Lutze at Seeshaupt. They are intended to provide knowledge of the effects to be expected with radio control of rockets and to say how much the flame and trail of a V-2 contributes to radar reflections."[6]

So the F.F.O. was measuring the conductivity and radar reflectional properties of exhaust gases? Placing a cathode in the exhaust of a jet or rocket was the Flame Jet Generator of Dr. T.T. Brown[7]. This procedure induced a negative charge to the exhaust. A corresponding positive charge is automatically induced on the wing's leading edge. This combination bends



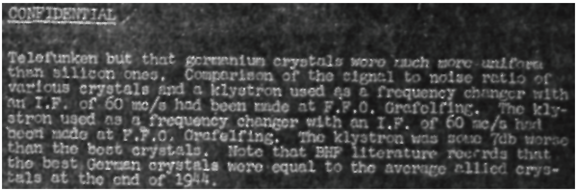
8. Crystal detectors.

These were pioneered by Welker and Kinger of F.F.O. Gauting and subsequently manufactured by Siemens-Halske. Germanium was used instead of silicon because its lower M.P. 960 degs C. instead of 1500 degs C. allowing easier handling. The idea behind the process was to produce single crystals. Germanium deposited by rapid cooling of the vapour had been tried and found useless. Apparently little work had been done on the effect of impurities although such work is described in papers by other German workers on the problem. It was stated that their best crystals were not as good as the best silicon ones produced by

CONFIDENTIAL
CIC 75/150

- -

Enclosure



CONFIDENTIAL

Telefunken but that germanium crystals were much more uniform than silicon ones. Comparison of the signal to noise ratio of various crystals and a klystron used as a frequency changer with an I.F. of 60 mc/s had been made at F.F.O. Grafelfing. The klystron used as a frequency changer with an I.F. of 60 mc/s had been made at F.F.O. Grafelfing. The klystron was some 7db worse than the best crystals. Note that BHP literature records that the best German crystals were equal to the average allied crystals at the end of 1944.

Work of the Flugfunk Forschungsinstitut Oberpfaffenhofen (F.F.O.) on "crystal detectors" involving silicon, germanium and a discussion of impurities within these materials. Engineered impurities in silicon/germanium form the basis for modern semiconductors.

radar signals around the aircraft and is one method used by the B-2 bomber.

Let's back up a second. The Horton 9, described earlier, had recessed intake and exhaust ports. It had no vertical control surfaces. Therefore, its radar reflection was already super-low. We certainly have no trouble imagining this aircraft painted with radar absorbing paint as was planned. How about inducing a radar-bending envelope of charged particles around this aircraft? And how about fitting this aircraft with a klystron tube in its nose pumping out the same frequency used by Allied radar, jamming it or making the aircraft invisible to radar? If we can imagine this, so could the scientists with the F.F.O. If the war had lasted another year, the Allies might have faced not only a 700 mile per hour Horton 9, but a Horton 9 which was also a true stealth aircraft in the modern sense.

Finally, "crystal detectors" should be mentioned. According to the CIOS report, both the F.F.O., the firm Telefunken, and Siemens-Halske worked with this and related ideas, the pioneering work having been done by Welker and Kinger of the F.F.O., Gautling facility. Single crystals were involved which originally were made of silicon. This is the same silicon used today in our modern semi-conductor industry. This technology broke upon the scene with the introduction of the transistor.

The transistor, invented in 1947 by Dr. William Shockley, replaced the glass vacuum tube as a valve or switching device in electronics. The transistor works because it allows electrons to flow only in one direction, on demand. Transistors could make a gate or valve in a three-way connection. It does this using special impurities in the crystal structure which facilitate electron flow.

Philip Corso, in his book The Day After Roswell, claims that aliens invented transistors and they just suddenly appeared on the scene. These transistors just fell into the hands of Dr. Shockley at Bell Laboratories, according to Corso. Of course nobody in the scientific community agrees with Corso. But what would be evidence for the terrestrial development of transistors? It would be a history of development of transistors and related devices right here on earth leading up to the transistor.

Not only was the F.F.O. and other institutions working with silicon in electronics during the Second World War, they were also working with the other crystal substance always mentioned in discussion of semi-conductors, Germanium. In fact, the CIOS report describes manufacturing methods involving both of these crystals and compares the results of silicon vs. Germanium.

Of course, there are those who will say that working on crystals is not necessarily the same as working on semi-conductors. But the discussion of impurities within a discussion of silicon or Germanium would indicate a discussion of semi-conductors. From the CIOS report:

"Apparently little work had been done on the effect of impurities although such work is described in papers by other German workers on the problem."[8]

At first, this may sound like negative evidence but it is not. It says that the Germans were not working on semi-conductors at the F.F.O. but they had recognized the concept and were not only working on the problem somewhere else, they had written about it. This report is dated July 1, 1945, just after the war in Europe ended. This pre-dates the alleged Roswell crash. It documents that research in semi-conductors or leading to semi-conductors took place on planet earth shortly before their disclosure in the form of the transistor. I really do not know if the Germans invented the transistor and if it was later funneled into the hands of an American company or not. But this CIOS report does document that the Germans were at the very least involved in this research which not only argues for their high-tech status, it strips the late Col. Corso of any corroborating physical evidence for aliens besides his body-bag testimony.

What these examples show is that the technical infrastructure which was present in Germany during this period of time was more than advanced enough to supply research scientists with machines and devices they needed to do advanced work. This technical infrastructure was at least the equal of anything found in Britain or the United States at the time.

SOURCES

1. Walker, C. Lester, "Secrets By The Thousands", October, 1946, page 331, Harper's Magazine

2. Coil Research Laboratory Siemens Halske Berlin Oct 44, March 14, 1945, reference numbers 0136094, 6824 DIc/Mis/Noi-5633, VicaMed. Afbq No R-1198/455

3. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 139, "Drs. Kleen & Larbs,l July, 1945, page 2

4. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 156, "Report On Flugfunk Forschungsinstitut Oberpfaffenhofen F.F.O. Establishments, 1 July, 1945, pages 9 and 10

5. ibid

6. ibid

7. Stevens, Henry, Hitler's Flying Saucers A Guide To German Flying Discs Of The Second World War, 2003, pages 132-136, Adventures Unlimited Publishing, Kempton, Illinois

8. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 156, "Report On Flugfunk Forschungsinstitut Oberpfaffenhofen F.F.O. Establishments, 1 July, 1945, pages 7 and 8

13 German Atomic Test

For some readers of history the very idea that Germany built and tested an atomic device during World War Two is heretical. Conventional history has drilled it into our heads that American scientists of the Manhattan Project built the first atomic weapons. They allegedly succeeded in accomplishing this goal in July of 1945 with the first atomic weapon was tested in New Mexico. Beginning in August of 1945, atomic weapons were dropped on Japan, which brought the Second World War to a close. It is all very neat and tidy. American scientists became heroes, icons in our culture. Buildings and whole institutions are named after Enrico Fermi and Robert Oppenheimer, for instance. At the same time we are told that the weak German effort at building atomic weapons was too little and too late and too disorganized.

Established history does not deny the German atomic program, it only minimizes it. Modern writers cite such evidence as the Farm Hall conversations as proof that the German scientists were years behind the Americans in building atomic weapons. At the same time established history seeks to maximize the British effort to destroy the German heavy water producing facilities in central Norway. This operation is treated as one of the military/technological turning points in the war effort and one that sealed the fate of the German atomic weapons program permanently. So that is it, then, neat and tidy?

Recently, new information has cast doubt on idea that the Germans were incompetent in this area. This new information is based upon evidence in Europe itself rather than simply the controlled information released in post-war America.

Some of this new information is based upon exploration of underground facilities abandoned by the Germans in the closing days of the war[1]. Many of these underground facilities were sealed with explosives as the Germans retreated and never re-opened until after the collapse of the former Soviet Union. Some of this new information is based upon research done in Germany at the Jonas Valley which indicates that a whole atomic infra-structure was set up there during and that this was done after the destruction of the heavy water facilities in Norway[2]. This is not conjecture but based upon eyewitness evidence as well as actual physical evidence which is still on-site. Some of this new information resides in the American government's own declassified words in which they admit the existence of neutron generators, for instance[3], and affix the location and scientists involved.

And finally, some of the new information comes from interconnecting a number of separated and isolated eyewitness and historical sources[4] which would have been impossible only a few years ago. The resulting tableau painted by these facts is shocking, to say the least. What emerges is a detailed step-by-step, date-by-date account of the German atomic program. Actually, it is many programs, not three or even six. Some were secret programs within a secretive Germany, one of these being run by the SS. Thanks to this new research, we have dates, locations, names of scientists who were involved and even the weapons they produced at these individual locations.

The Germans did make atomic bombs. Not only did they make atomic bombs, they made uranium as well as plutonium bombs and other atomic weapons which remain somewhat of a mystery. What the Germans could not do in these dying days of the 3rd Reich, was to match up one of these nuclear warheads with an effective delivery system. The reasons for this differ with each weapon, individually, and run the gambit from mistake to treachery to incompetence[4].

The shocking outcome of these events was that the unexploded German atomic bombs fell into the hands of the Americans at the end of the war in Europe in May of 1945, two months before the "first" explosion of an atomic weapon in the New Mexico desert. What a present for the Americans! All they did was to put new tail fins on the bombs, repaint them, and drop them on Japan. Naturally, the American scientists involved with the Manhattan Project were given credit[4].

As an aside, the fact is that many of those very scientists were spies for the Soviet Union during this time as recently discovered Soviet intelligence proves[5]. I am not talking about simple middlemen like the Rosenbergs. What I am talking about are those very icons in our society who speak for American atomic scientists. I am talking about all those American atomic scientists who found a "conscious" after they realized the atomic bomb would never be used on Germany, as they hoped, but might instead be used on the Soviets after the war was over. I am talking about those "emigre", "peacenik" scientists calling for and "end to war". I am talking about those scientists who posed, smoking a pipe, as someone somehow smarter and morally on a higher plane than you and I.

Here are the facts: "Calibre" was the Soviet code-name for their agent Greenglass. "Editor" was their name for Enrico Fermi and "Star" was the Soviet code-name for their agent Robert Oppenheimer[5]. These men are our cultural heroes. Put your hand behind your ear. Can you hear the KGB laughing all the way from Moscow? Not only were they spies, they conspired to lie about their work and did so. But they are not alone. They got a lot of help from their friends in the intelligence community and the mass media. The amazing truth is that they got away with the whole big lie. The Manhattan Project scientists, failures, unable to build their own atomic bomb, literally fell into the toilet and came out smelling like roses, as far as history is concerned.

I am not going to try to re-tell the whole story of the German atomic projects. Those interested can see the sources below. What I would like to do is tell one story. It is a story of an eyewitness to a German atomic test which took place in October of 1944, nine months before "history" says that was possible.

This report originates in the journal "Defensa", Number 76-77, August-September of 1984. The text was in Italian but a summary and translation appeared in German language and it is from this translation that this report is derived[6]. The report was the life experience of the writer, Luigi Romersa. Mr. Romersa was sent upon a strange mission by Bonito Mussolini, the Fascist leader of Italy and Hitler's ally. The time was April of 1944. The war was not going well for the Axis Powers and Mussolini was summoned to a meeting with Hitler at Castle Klessheim, near Saltzburg, Austria. The meeting lasted three days. With Mussolini came Marshal Rodolfo Graziani and with Hitler were von Ribbentrop, Keitel, Dollmann and Ambassador Rahn. Hitler's allies had been given little information on the development of German wonder weapons until this time. This meeting was the first time Hitler had broached the subject with Mussolini.

Hitler and Mussolini were genuine friends. In the past, Hitler had personally defended Mussolini when he was disparaged by ranking members of the German military. Hitler had personally intervened when the Italian government did a flop-flop and deposed Mussolini, imprisoning him on a mountaintop fortress while entering into negotiations to turn him over to the Allies. This intervention took the form of Colonel Otto Skorzeny, who led a team of commando raiders onto this mountaintop fortress in a daring glider attack. El Duce was freed and flown to Vienna before the turn-coat Italian government knew what had happened. Mussolini was subsequently installed in a Northern Italian government, loyal to Hitler. Mussolini spoke excellent German and had even given a speech or two in that language. So, bearing these facts in mind, it was not lack of trust or lack of communication, which caused the doubt that had arisen in Mussolini's mind after hearing Hitler's discussion of German wonder weapons. But Mussolini did want to know if Hitler's promised weapons could really win the war. In other words, he wanted to do his own appraisal.

The first meeting lasted two hours. By all accounts, Hitler was the master of positive thinking and was also the master of intoning such optimism in the face of adversity. Using this manner, Hitler reviewed the global political and military situation and inundated his guests with impressions and observations. He assured his audience that the war would certainly be won once Germany had deployed its new weapons. Hitler walked through the room as he said:

"We have aircraft, imperceptible U-boats, giant tanks and cannons, unbelievably powerful rockets and a bomb with a force which will surprise the whole world. The enemy knows this, he attacks us, he destroys us, but through this destruction he will be answered with attack and without launching biological warfare, for which we are also prepared. (...). All my words correspond with the purest truth which will be confirmed."

After the meeting Mussolini quietly returned to Gargnaro, on Lake Garda in Northern Italy, where he had a residence. Mussolini clearly wanted to know more.

In the Fall of 1944, Mr. Romersa was summoned by Mussolini to the villa Orsoline where he was living with his family. Romersa was given the assignment by Mussolini to journey to Germany and find out more about things which had only been presented to him superficially at Castle Klessheim. Mussolini wanted detailed information. Romersa was given credentials and a letter of recommendation for Goebbels and Hitler, respectively.

Romersa traveled to Germany by car. Hitler personally read the letter of recommendation in his headquarters at Rastenburg in East Prussia and allowed Mr. Romersa's presence at some experiments. He began his tour with underground factories that were concentrated in Upper Selesia and Bavaria.

The underground factories were more like small cities buried underground within a mountain. Elevators offered access the inner bowels of these well-camouflaged, well-guarded facilities. The tunnels ran kilometer after kilometer within the earth, all connected by rail, which facilitated transport of personnel as well as material.

The tour of the underground facilities, however interesting, was not the highlight of Mr. Romersa's trip to Germany. Sometime during the night of October 11, 1944 Mr. Romesa was picked up at the hotel Adlon in Berlin. He was told that after this particular trip, he would be received by none other than Minister Goebels himself. Mr. Romersa asked where he was being taken but to his question there was no answer. This was at two o'clock in the morning. A light rain fell that night as he was driven to his goal. At ten o'clock the following morning they arrived and got out of the car. They were on the shores of the Baltic in the vicinity of Stralsund. They took a motorboat from there to the island of Ruegen. Ruegen was within the testing range were many German weapons were completed. This was a secret place, guarded by specialized units. It was an area in which none could even set foot without an approval card from the supreme command of the German military. In fact, Ruegen Island lies just north of Peenemuende.

Once on Ruegen Island, they immediately went into a region that was sheltered by trees. In a flat area within this forest there had been prepared stone houses and a protective bunker made from cement. They went into a half buried underground tower through a metal door that was closed behind them. Besides Mr. Romersa, there were three other men in the party.

One of the military men who had accompanied Romersa began talking. He said that they would now witness a test of an atomic bomb. Nothing could withstand the blast of such a bomb, the man went on, saying that the explosive power of this bomb was the strongest ever discovered. They were only a kilometer from the point of the explosion but, of course, well sheltered from the blast, which was scheduled for noon. Nevertheless, they would have to remain in the bunker until that evening. Romersa was told that the bomb released deadly radiation. The effective circumference of the blast would be a kilometer and a half. The witnesses would, therefore not only be seeing the blast, they would be experiencing it first hand.

The telephone rang. The test had been moved up to 11:45 A.M. Slits in the side of the concrete bunker had been provided which were covered with smoked glass for viewing. Romersa could see trees and a darkened landscape. The telephone ran again with the exact time of detonation. All present synchronized their wristwatches.

Suddenly a blinding light appeared as the concrete tower of the bunker shook. As Mr. Romersa watched, a thick curtain of smoke descended over the landscape and then the cloud covered their position. Nobody spoke. They were entangled in the smoke and the impact of the blast. They felt as if they had fallen over an abyss.

Finally, the driver of their vehicle who was a lieutenant in the army, the branch of the service that had prepared this test, said that the test they had seen and therefore confirmed was extremely important. When ready, he went on, these bombs could be dropped on the Anglo-American invasion troops or on enemy cities. This bomb, he said, should cause the enemy to think twice about the course of this war.

The officer went on: We have done research for years. After long and tiring experimentation, we have finally completed this discovery. We have facilities everywhere. Some were met with and destroyed by the enemy, such as the facilities in Norway, but Peenemuende is intact although the Americans have sought to destroy this facility. In six or seven months the series mass production of these bombs will begin. Everything will change then but some will be perplexed or disconcerted because of or on account of the introduction of this frightful remedy.

Mr. Romersa continues his narrative which is loosely translated here: About four o'clock, the hall dark, there appeared some shadows. They ran to our bunker tower. They were soldiers dressed in what looked like some sort of strange diving suit. These soldiers soon entered the building. They brought with them special garments for those inside to wear as they left the shelter of the bunker. Romersa did not know for sure what the overcoats were made of but they were white, rough fiber-like material that might have been asbestos. The head covering was provided with a slit of mica-like glass at eye level. They were given high but very light boots to wear as well as gloves made from the same material as the overcoats. The soldiers led them out of the bunker tower in single file.

The farther they got from the bunker the more mixed up the landscape looked. The forest looked like it had been swamped by a wave of fire. In this burnt-out setting, Mr. Romera's foot struck something unusual. It turned out to be the carbonized body of a goat. The stone houses and tower that he had seen a few hours earlier were completely swept away. The devastation increased as they moved toward ground zero. Here, the grass had a strange color resembling chamois and the trees that had remained upright were stripped of their leaves. They returned to Berlin that night.

Before the end of October Mr. Romersa met with Minister Goebbels. The meeting took place at Goebbels home. Goebbels was informed of Mr. Romersa's presence at the "Experiment in Ruegen". He told Mr. Romersa that by various means great numbers of these weapons would be manufactured by which the enemy would be "decisively met with". Countermeasures to the weapon, if any, could be thought up later since, by that time, this war would be over.

Goebbels paused and then began discussing delivery systems. He told Mr. Romersa that the bombs would be delivered by special U-boats equipped with snorkels and turbines, from radio controlled V-weapons of unbelievable high speed, from supersonic aircraft, from long-range rockets, A-4 and A-9 with a range of more than one thousand kilometers. For a few months we must bear our teeth and hold out, Goebbles said. "We need time. Twenty-four hours could be decisive".

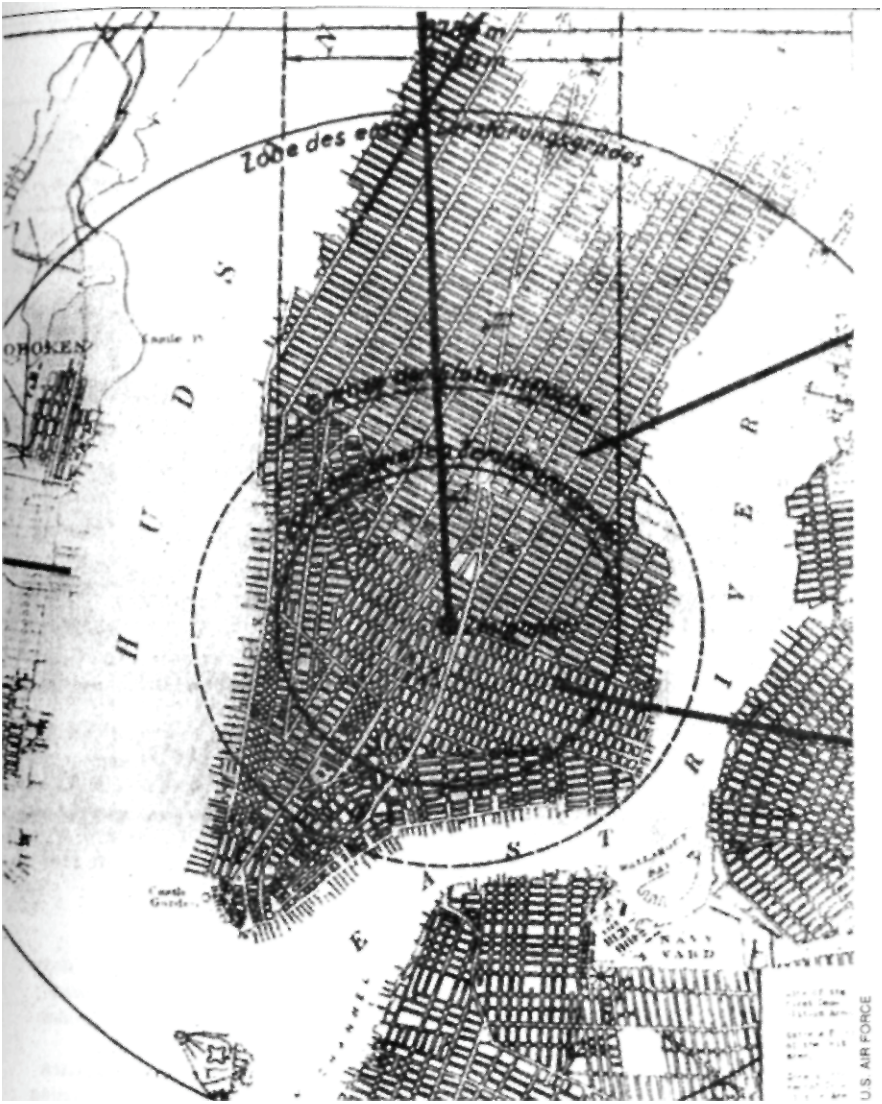
Goebbels began to discuss the development of the atomic bomb. He mentioned that heavy water facilities were located in Norway as well as on the Northeastern coast of Germany. The Allies knew of these facilities and their meaning. Air attacks and sabotage had been mounted, the latter being successful in Norway but not in Germany. Hitler, according to Goebbels, had not wanted to employ atomic bombs at first because he thought them unnecessary to win the war. In 1942, he changed his mind and inquired as to how long such weapons would take to develop. He was told it would be two years, which he considered too long. He changed his mind again in 1943 at which time intensive work began anew.

Goebbels described other weapons, confirming what Romersa had been told earlier. These included new cannons, and instruments that would allow the Germans to see and precisely shoot in the dark. A dozen new remotely controlled rockets were in the works. A-4 and A-9 rockets were to be equipped with 10 and 15 ton atomic warheads respectively.

Then Goebbels came back to a recurring theme. This theme was the need to hold out until these weapons became operational. He reiterated that six months were necessary. This contest was clearly a war of time since the Allies were dropping tons of bombs, day and night, in the hope that Germany would collapse in the meantime. Goebbel's final words to Romesa were: "Germany's salvation depends upon its genius".

What can be made of Mr. Romersa's narrative? The Germans clearly wanted Mr. Romersa to recount his impressions of the atomic test and the optimistic words he had heard to Benito Mussolini. But by late 1944, Mussolini was not in any real position to assist Germany at this point in the war. German atomic weapons were never deployed. The German atomic programs were discredited by the Allies. Nobody had ever mentioned a German atomic test. One wonders what would have happened to anybody making such a claim in the early days of the cold war. In light of these developments, Mr. Romersa's extraordinary experience on Ruegen Island became a politically incorrect "tale" or at best a baseless "war story". Without confirmation, it is no wonder that he kept the information to himself for so many years.

But Luigi Romersa, himself, did not fall off the pages of history. After the war, somehow, perhaps because of his substantial insider information concerning the Axis Powers, Romersa applied for and was granted a high security clearance with the government of the United States of America[7]. He went on in 1959 to write a ten part series, titled: "Wernher Von Braun Y La America Del Futuro" (Wernher von Braun and the Future of America) for a Spanish

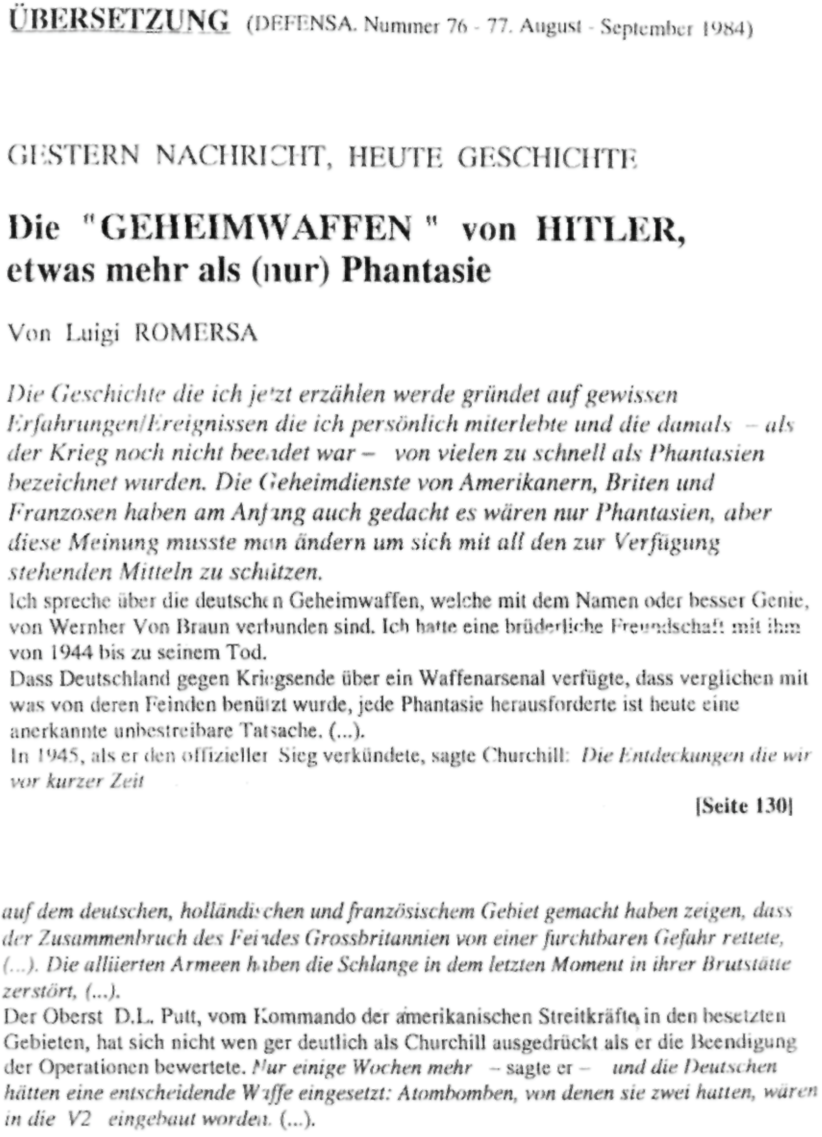


Zone des
OBOKEN
H U D S
R E V I R
E A S T
NAVY YARD

U.S. AIR FORCE

As this captured map indicates, the Germans planned for their atomic bomb—to be delivered by a specially designed V-2 rocket—to explode near Delancy Street and the Bowery in downtown New York City.

This is a German map of New York City showing the projected destruction their atomic bomb would cause. Source: World War II. (magazine), Danny Parker.



ÜBERSETZUNG (DEFENSA. Nummer 76 - 77. August - September 1984)

GESTERN NACHRICHT, HEUTE GESCHICHTE

Die "GEHEIMWAFFEN" von HITLER, etwas mehr als (nur) Phantasie

Von Luigi ROMERSA

Die Geschichte die ich jetzt erzählen werde gründet auf gewissen Erfahrungen/Ereignissen die ich persönlich miterlebte und die damals – als der Krieg noch nicht beendet war – von vielen zu schnell als Phantasien bezeichnet wurden. Die Geheimdienste von Amerikanern, Briten und Franzosen haben am Anfang auch gedacht es wären nur Phantasien, aber diese Meinung musste man ändern um sich mit all den zur Verfügung stehenden Mitteln zu schützen.

Ich spreche über die deutschen Geheimwaffen, welche mit dem Namen oder besser Genie, von Wernher Von Braun verbunden sind. Ich hatte eine brüderliche Freundschaft mit ihm von 1944 bis zu seinem Tod.

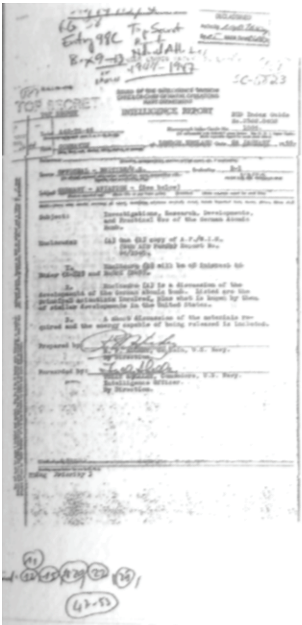
Dass Deutschland gegen Kriegsende über ein Waffenarsenal verfügte, dass verglichen mit was von deren Feinden benützt wurde, jede Phantasie herausforderte ist heute eine anerkannte unbestreibare Tatsache. (...).

In 1945, als er den offiziellen Sieg verkündete, sagte Churchill: Die Entdeckungen die wir vor kurzer Zeit auf dem deutschen, holländischen und französischem Gebiet gemacht haben zeigen, dass der Zusammenbruch des Feindes Grossbritannien von einer furchtbaren Gefahr rettete, (...). Die alliierten Armeen haben die Schlange in dem letzten Moment in ihrer Brutstätte zerstört, (...).

[Seite 130]

Der Oberst D.L. Putt, vom Kommando der amerikanischen Streitkräfte in den besetzten Gebieten, hat sich nicht weniger deutlich als Churchill ausgedrückt als er die Beendigung der Operationen bewertete. Nur einige Wochen mehr – sagte er – und die Deutschen hätten eine entscheidende Waffe eingesetzt: Atombomben, von denen sie zwei hatten, wären in die V2 eingebaut worden. (...).

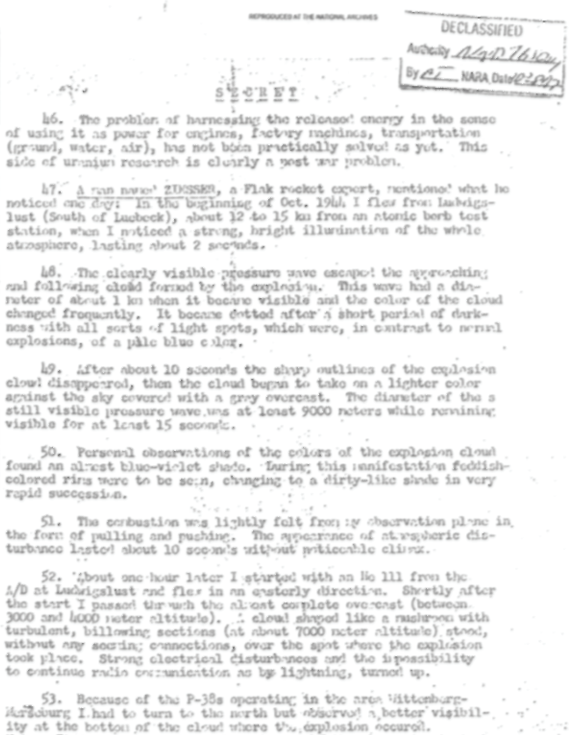
This is the first page of a German translation of an article written by Luigi Romersa in the journal "Defensa", number 76-77, August 1984, titled: "Yesterday's News, Today's History: The "Secret Weapons" of Hitler, Something more than (mere) Fantasy".



TOP SECRET

INTELLIGENCE REPORT

SC-5723



DECLASSIFIED
Authority NND 761024
By CT NARA Date 2-2-07

REPRODUCED AT THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES

S E C R E T

46. The problem of harnessing the released energy in the sense of using it as power for engines, factory machines, transportation (ground, water, air), has not been practically solved as yet. This side of uranium research is clearly a post war problem.

47. A man named ZINSSER, a Flak rocket expert, mentioned what he noticed one day: In the beginning of Oct. 1944 I flew from Ludwigslust (South of Luebeck), about 12 to 15 km from an atomic bomb test station, when I noticed a strong, bright illumination of the whole atmosphere, lasting about 2 seconds.

48. The clearly visible pressure wave escaped the approaching and following cloud formed by the explosion. This wave had a diameter of about 1 km when it became visible and the color of the cloud changed frequently. It became dotted after a short period of darkness with all sorts of light spots, which were, in contrast to normal explosions, of a pale blue color.

49. After about 10 seconds the sharp outlines of the explosion cloud disappeared, then the cloud began to take on a lighter color against the sky covered with a grey overcast. The diameter of the s still visible pressure wave was at least 9000 meters while remaining visible for at least 15 seconds.

50. Personal observations of the colors of the explosion cloud found an almost blue-violet shade. During this manifestation reddish-colored rings were to be seen, changing to a dirty-like shade in very rapid succession.

51. The combustion was lightly felt from my observation plane in the form of pulling and pushing. The appearance of atmospheric disturbance lasted about 10 seconds without noticeable climax.

52. About one hour later I started with an He 111 from the A/D at Ludwigslust and flew in an easterly direction. Shortly after the start I passed through the almost complete overcast (between 3000 and 4000 meter altitude). A cloud shaped like a mushroom with turbulent, billowing sections (at about 7000 meter altitude) stood, without any seeming connections, over the spot where the explosion took place. Strong electrical disturbances and the impossibility to continue radio communication as by lightning, turned up.

53. Because of the P-38s operating in the area Wittenberg-Merseburg I had to turn to the north but observed a better visibility at the bottom of the cloud where the explosion occured.
Note: It does not seem very clear to me why these experiments took place in such crowded areas.

Ruegen island atomic explosion. October12, 1944
11:45 AM .Photo done in Stralsund.
The sky looks dark as contrast to brilliant explosion.

Top Left: Cover sheet of Top Secret US Naval Intelligence report detaining a German atomic test.

Top Right: blow up of the pertinent text. Bottom: Alleged picture of the German atomic test, October 12, 1944, at Ruegen Island, just north of Peenemuende.

language newspaper in Valencia, "Las Provincias"[8]. One photograph contained within that series of articles shows the two men, Romersa and von Braun, standing together as von Braun points to a rocket model. One can only wonder what these two men discussed in their private moments. Ruegen Island is located at the tip of the peninsula where Peenemuende was located. Both were privy to insider information, which could have changed the popular world-view of the history of science and technology. They must have had a lot to discuss.

It was only years later, in 1984, after von Braun's death, that he went public with the atomic test on Ruegen Island.

SOURCES

1. Jesensky, Milos, Ph.D., and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, "Wunderland" Mimozemske Technologie Treti Rise, AOS Publishing, Czech Republic

2. Faeth, Harald, 1998, 1945-Thueringens Manhattan Project Auf der Spurensuche nach der verlorenen V-Waffen-Fabrik in Deutschlands Untergrund, CTT-Verlag und Druckerei Foester, Schleusingen, Germany

3. Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee Evaluation Report 174, July 9, 1945, C.H.F. Muller, A.G. Hamburg, Fuhlsbuttel, Rentgenstrasse 24, Target No. CAFT 1/132a

4. Georg, Freidrich, 2000, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 1: Luftwaffe und Marine Geheim Nuklearwaffen des Dritten Reiches und ihre Traegersysteme, Anum Verlag, Schleusingen and Heinrich-Jung-Verlagsgesellschaft, Gmbh, Zella-hehlis

5. Jesensky, Milos, Ph.D. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, page 149

6. Romersa, Luigi, German language translation of article in Defensa, Number 76-77, August-September, 1984, Gestern Nachricht, Heute Geschichte Die "Geheimwaffen" von Hitler, etwas meher als (nur) Phantasie, (English translation of the German title is: Yesterday's News Today's History The Secret Weapons of Hitler, something more than only Fantasy)

7. Mayer, Edgar and Thomas Mehner, 2002, pages 150-154, Die Atombombe und das Dritte Reich Das Geheimnis des Dreiecks Armstadt-Wechmar-Ohrdruf, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

8. ibid

14 La Fusee Pilotee "T"

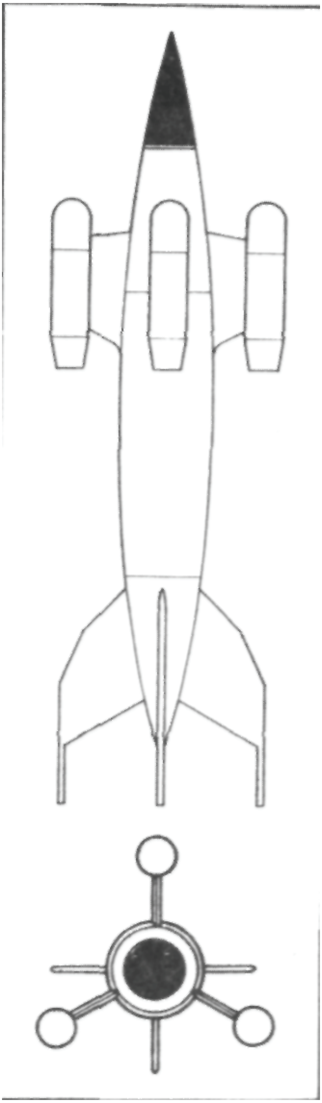
This tale comes to me via a French researcher, Joseph Altairac. It is an article from the magazine "Au dela du del". The date is unknown. This article was translated into English for me by the writer, editor, environmentalist, activist and free energy advocate, Remy Chavilier.

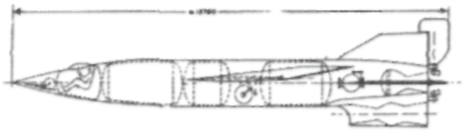
This article has much to do with the previous discussion of the German atomic tests and also concerns a subject which we will come to shortly, unknown large German rockets. This article may be a confirmation of the atomic test seen by Mr. Romersa but if that is so it is seen through different eyes, which add some additional detail. Also, the focus is different because this story is primarily about the rocket or flying craft sent to deliver the bomb.

This article claims that device was the Triebflugel. The Triebflugel was an aircraft shaped very much like the V-2 but with three wings at its center and rotating around the craft like a helicopter. At the end of each rotor was a ram jet. The three ram jets powered the craft which could rise vertically and then transition into horizontal flight. There was no rocket exhaust at the tail of the craft as in the V-2. In fact, the resemblance to the V-2 was superficial.

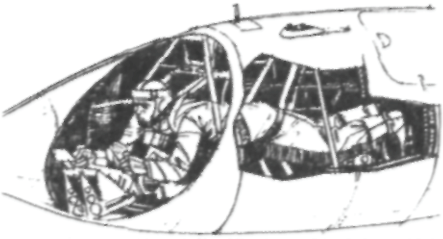
The Triebflugel was an interceptor. It was never intended to be used to deliver a bomb. Further, only models of the Triebflugel were built to the best of our knowledge, no full-scale versions actually flew.

What all this means is that, in my opinion, this device's designation as a Triebflugel is almost certainly





Source: "Peenemünde East Through the Eyes of 500 Detained at Garmish" 1945



Top Right: La Fusse "T".

Below-Center: manned version of the A-4 or V-2.

Below-Bottom: detail of the pilot in the cabin of the V-2.

wrong. On the other hand there were manned rockets under consideration by the Germans and this could have been any one of those prototypes. The list includes the A-9, the V-1, and the Saenger stratospheric vehicle. It may have even been some sort of hybrid machine, a manned A-4b for instance, which was a V-2 with large wings, intended to glide to its target rather than free-fall. The article begins stating that this rocket delivery system exists but without giving it a name or other designation.

The test occurred in Northern Germany just as in the Romersa description. In the heather of that region a target town was erected with concrete buildings, low cost houses, two and three-storey buildings, offices and metallic constructions. Different types of cars were parked on the streets. There was a small train station, rail tracks, locomotives, gardens and winding trees added a to complete the picture of a town.

Two miles away from the town a shelter was constructed from which to observe the test. In that shelter there were Luftwaffe technicians and army officers.

The article says that "witnesses" saw "the rocket" rise vertically. The three flaming engines could be plainly seen. The missile leveled off at 8000 meters and flew in a rather zigzagging manner toward the target. Nearing the target the missile seems to have made a wide turn, under power, which could be heard by the witnesses below. The power was then cut and the missile started downward. At 5000 meters the transparent nose broke away and the pilot bailed out. A few seconds later his white cloth parachute could be seen slowly descending in the vicinity of the shelter.

"The rocket landed almost in the center of the buildings with a deafening detonation. There was a huge flame and everything was covered with a dense, gray heavy smoke, while a warm breath cutting puff of air spread rapidly. It took more than one hour for this dense curtain to clear. From the buildings, only debris remained. Metallic constructions stuck out of the ground shapeless and melted. The tall trees were no more than burned trunks."

At the point of impact, the ground was literally furrowed with deep crevasses, actually burning in some points and dug as if subjected to an enormous pressure. The cars parked in the street were reduced to debris, or violently thrust by the explosion against the houses on fire. The concrete train station had partly collapsed. The locomotives had resisted the blow but the smashed and tipped over wagons showed their insides."

The article goes on to say that a great number of French prisoners witnessed these rockets in the hands of the Germans and being destroyed prior to the Allied advance.

"The Germans went to great length to hide these experiments. The Allied information services found out about them only after the peace was declared, and competent technicians thought it was a nuclear explosion."

The article goes on to describe what they believed to be the facts of the rocket used to deliver the weapon, the Triebflugel. One obvious shortcoming of using this device as a bomber is mentioned:

"It is to be noted at this point that the weakest part of what our witness relates lies in the fact that, according to a few American technicians, the explosions were of a nuclear kind, in which case, the pilot being ejected near the launching place would make no sense at all because of the harmful radiations of the bomb which would have had a considerable effect thousands of meters away."

Here it is stated a second time. The bomb was nuclear or considered such by the investigating American technicians.

It is to be noted that the real dangers of atomic radiation were only appreciated much later, not in the 1940s, or 1950s, but only later did the real enduring nature of atomic radiation sink home in the minds of most individuals.

This story would be considered just another post-war tale if it were not for some of the other evidence offered here and by the German investigators working in the area of the German atomic bomb. The validity of the German atomic bomb and exactly how this story meshes with the tale of Mr. Romersa will be left for the reader to decide.

SOURCES

1. La Fusee Pilotee "T", an article from Au dela du ciel (magazine), 1958, author unknown.

15 Mysterious German Bombs

In this chapter a few fragmentary accounts are explored which deal with truly strange bombs on which the Germans were said to be working.

There are sporadic accounts of a German bomb, which is sometimes said to kill all life within its blast radius. The interesting thing about this bomb it is alleged to do this by absorbing all the oxygen within this area. The first report shown here from late 1943 is typical in that it gives few details. It says only that the projectile in question contains phosphorus and other chemicals that absorb oxygen within a radius of a few hundred meters from the spot of detonation.

The second report referenced "Nordhausen", the site of the huge underground V-1 and V-2 rocket production facility, adds some detail to our picture of the oxygen bomb. This report says that the bomb has been under development for three years and it is huge. The dimensions given are: Length 17 meters (about 55 feet) with a diameter of 7 meters (almost 23 feet). This would make it larger than a V-3 rocket! Its kill-zone is said to be several kilometers.

The third report of this device is marked "Polish Intelligence". It repeats the active ingredient as phosphorus compounds and then goes on to say that the radius of action of this bomb is larger than present incendiaries.

The facts that the bomb itself was very large and that its killing radius was also very large are worthy of note. Details are lacking but this same basic theme has come from different sources. For the moment, perhaps, we should set aside evaluation and perhaps return to it at a later time.

The next very strange bomb is the endothermic bomb or cold bomb. Like the oxygen bomb, little reports of this device crop up throughout the wartime intelligence reports. In the "Polish Intelligence" report we learn that it works though some unknown chemical agent. The chemical agent is disbursed by the bomb, evaporates, and the result is a sudden drop in temperature for the area within the bomb's working range. Freezing kills life forms. Some property damage also results such as the breaking of water pipes and some cables.

Some confirmation of this device comes from another intelligence report on a related weapon, "icing gas". As we all know from recent airliner crashes, an airplane wing does not work well when it is iced over. Airports work long and hard with dedicated crews and special chemicals to keep aircraft wings free of ice before take off.

According to the report, the Germans wanted to use ice to down Allied aircraft. They planned to send a aircraft, or even a robot aircraft, ahead of a flight of a bomber squadron and discharge this specific chemical. The chemical would drift back, ice over the bomber's wings and cause them to fall from the sky.

The substance forming the active ingredient was called "Azote" which was a mixture of liquid nitrogen (minus 250 degrees C.) and liquid air. We know the Germans were making liquid air projectiles shells for cannons. Air is largely nitrogen, so it is not surprising that a chemical cocktail wasn't being considered by the Germans for use as a bomb.

The last item in the "Polish Intelligence" document, item (c), is a very brief description of a third bomb. This is described as the H.B. bomb "of great power". This H.B. was to be used with the other two bombs for maximum efficiency. What was this H.B.?

Could it be a hydrogen bomb? Is that really so far-fetched considering what has already been discussed? Well, if you think this idea was not under consideration by the Germans, please suspend judgment until we review some of Dr. Richter's work.

Perhaps the most mysterious bomb of the Second World War is called the molecular bomb or M-bomb. Indeed, a respected German researcher has told me that the account of Luigi Romersa as discussed above, was not exactly an atomic bomb in our modern conception of that device but a molecular bomb.

This bomb was said to have been under development through the Erteilt auf Grund des Ersten Überleitungsgesetzes vom 8. Juli 1949

(WiGBl. S. 175)

BUNDESREPUBLIK DEUTSCHLAND

AUSGEGEBEN AM
8. MÄRZ 1954

DEUTSCHES PATENTAMT

PATENTSCHRIFT

Nr. 905 847

KLASSE 12g GRUPPE 1 01

N 1126 IVb / 12g

Karl Nowak, Wien
ist als Erfinder genannt worden

Karl Nowak, Wien

Verfahren und Einrichtung zur Änderung von Stoffeigenschaften oder Herstellung von stark expansionsfähigen Stoffen

Patentiert im Gebiet der Bundesrepublik Deutschland vom 16. März 1943 an Patentanmeldung bekanntgemacht am 18. Juni 1953
Patenterteilung bekanntgemacht am 21. Januar 1954

Die Erfindung betrifft ein Verfahren und eine Einrichtung zur Änderung von Stoffeigenschaften oder Herstellung von stark expansionsfähigen Stoffen (bzw. Sprengstoffen) und besteht darin, daß der zu verändernde Stoff bei Tiefkühlung, zweckmäßig möglichst nahe dem absoluten Nullpunkt (im Zustand der Supraleitfähigkeit), unter Druck gesetzt wird oder ist.

Es hat sich erwiesen, daß durch die gleichzeitige Unterkühlung und Druckbehandlung eines Stoffes dessen Atomstruktur geändert werden kann.

Die Erfindung basiert auf der Überlegung, daß es möglich sein muß, durch Ausübung eines äußeren Druckes bei tiefen Temperaturen die Eigenschaft eines Stoffes zu ändern, und zwar insbesondere in folgenden Richtungen:

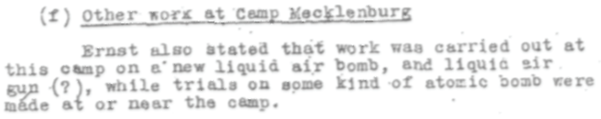
1. Bei der folgenden Erwärmung des bei Tiefkühlung komprimierten Stoffes bilden sich entsprechende Atomabstände aus, die aber nicht der vorherigen Atomanordnung (Gitter) entsprechen müssen. Insbesondere ist es auf diese Weise möglich, verschiedenartige Stoffe miteinander durch Verkettung ihrer Kristallgitter auf besondere Art zu legieren.

2. Bleibt der Stoff auf sein Kompressionsvolumen beschränkt, so wird er bei der folgenden Erwärmung einen besonderen Expansionsdruck ausüben, stärkste Ausstoß- oder Expansionswirkung zeigen.

Der Erfindungsgegenstand wird an Hand der Zeichnung noch weiter erläutert.

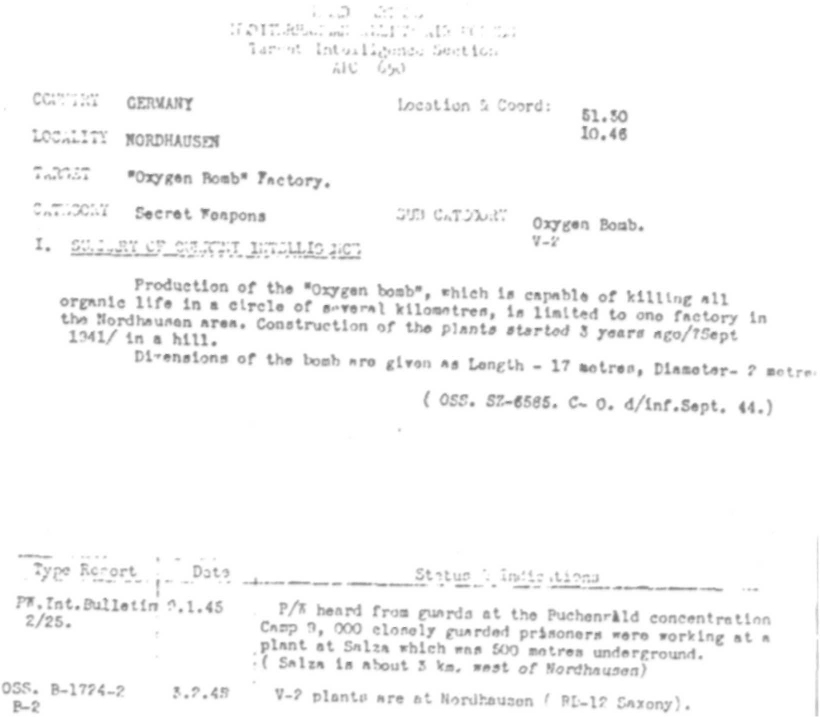
Es zeigt die Darstellung ein Gefäß 1, in welches der zu beeinflussende Stoff 2 durch eine obere Öffnung eingebracht wird, die dann mittels eines Verschlusses 3 hochvakuumdicht verschlossen werden kann. Das Gefäß 1 wird von einem zweiten Gefäß 4

Cover Sheet of a Karl Nowak Patent: "Processes and Arrangements for the Change of Characteristics of Matter of Production of Strong Expansion-Capable Matter." It is one fundamental part of the ideas presented in this book: changing matter and/or energy through densification and re-radiation. This can be done by cold, mechanical compression, a centripetal-centrifugal vortex, atomic radiation, bombardment by ultrasound, or the absorption of aether by matter shielding (gravity).



(f) Other work at Camp Mecklenburg

Ernst also stated that work was carried out at this camp on a new liquid air bomb, and liquid air gun (?), while trials on some kind of atomic bomb were made at or near the camp.



[illegible]
MEDITERRANEAN ALLIED AIR FORCES
Target Intelligence Section
AIC [illegible]

COUNTRY GERMANY
LOCALITY NORDHAUSEN
Location & Coord: 51.30 10.46
TARGET "Oxygen Bomb" Factory.
CATEGORY Secret Weapons
SUB CATEGORY Oxygen Bomb. V-2

I. SUMMARY OF CURRENT INTELLIGENCE

Production of the "Oxygen bomb", which is capable of killing all organic life in a circle of several kilometres, is limited to one factory in the Nordhausen area. Construction of the plants started 3 years ago/?Sept 1941/ in a hill.

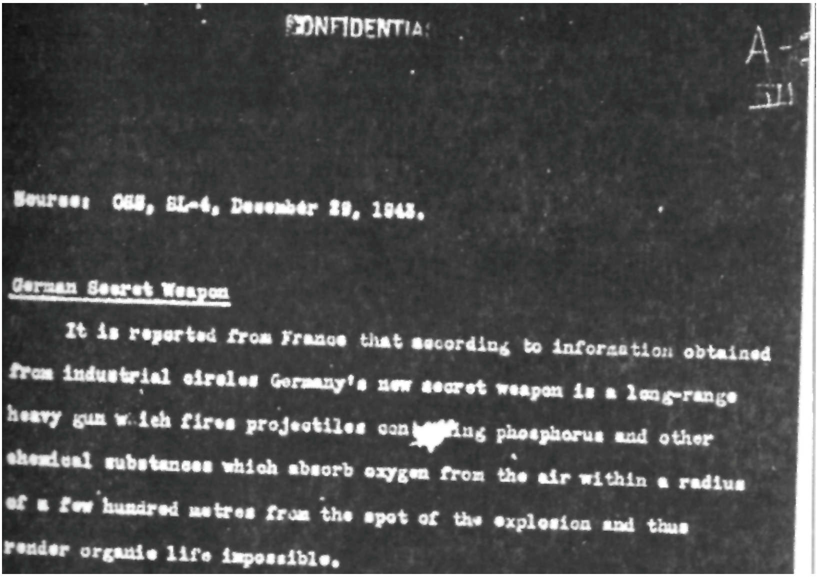
Dimensions of the bomb are given as Length - 17 metres, Diameter- 2 metre

(OSS. SZ-6565. C- O. d/inf.Sept. 44.)

Type Report	Date	Status & Indications
PW.Int.Bulletin 2/25.	9.1.45	P/W heard from guards at the Buchenwald concentration Camp 9, 000 closely guarded prisoners were working at a plant at Salza which was 500 metres underground. (Salza is about 3 km. west of Nordhausen)
OSS. B-1724-2 B-2	3.2.45	V-2 plants are at Nordhausen (RD-12 Saxony).

Top: part of a British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 142 discussing exotic bomb research.

Bottom: Intelligence discussion of the oxygen bomb.



CONFIDENTIA

A-

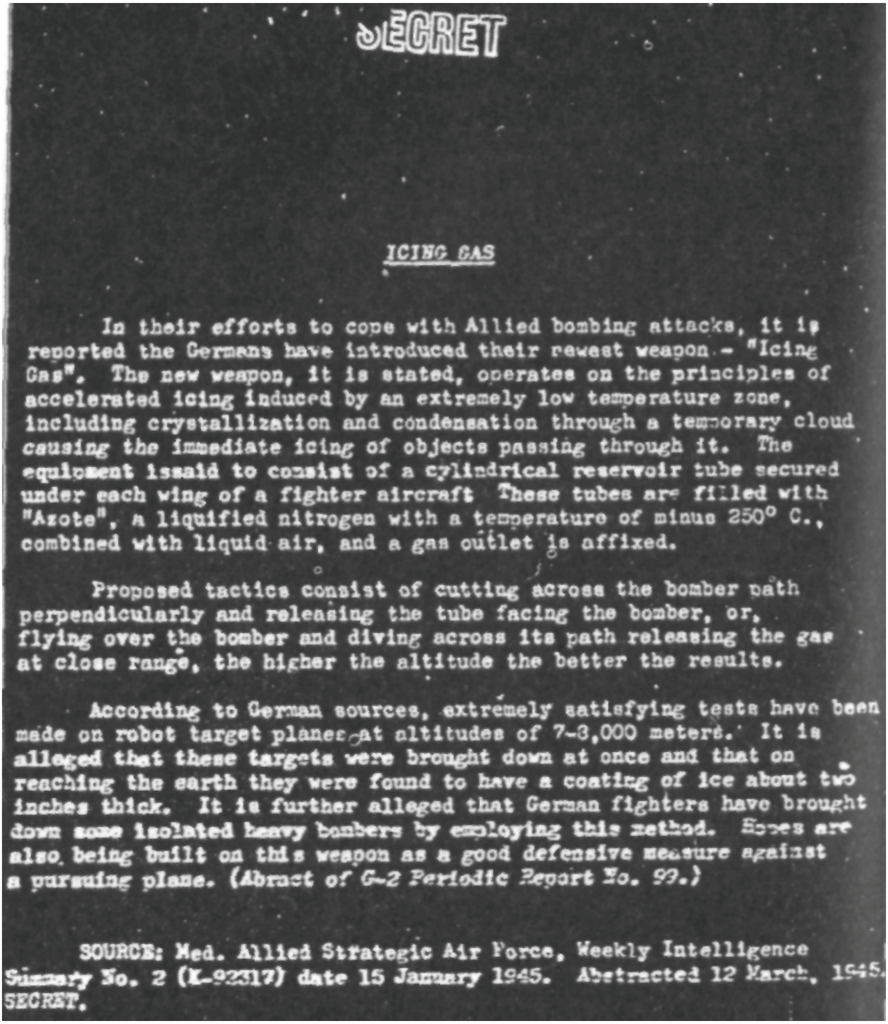
511

Source: OSS, SL-4, December 29, 1943.

German Secret Weapon

It is reported from France that according to information obtained from industrial circles Germany's new secret weapon is a long-range heavy gun which fires projectiles cont[illegible]ing phosphorus and other chemical substances which absorb oxygen from the air within a radius of a few hundred metres from the spot of the explosion and thus render organic life impossible.

Tales of the oxygen bomb from a second source.



SECRET

ICING GAS

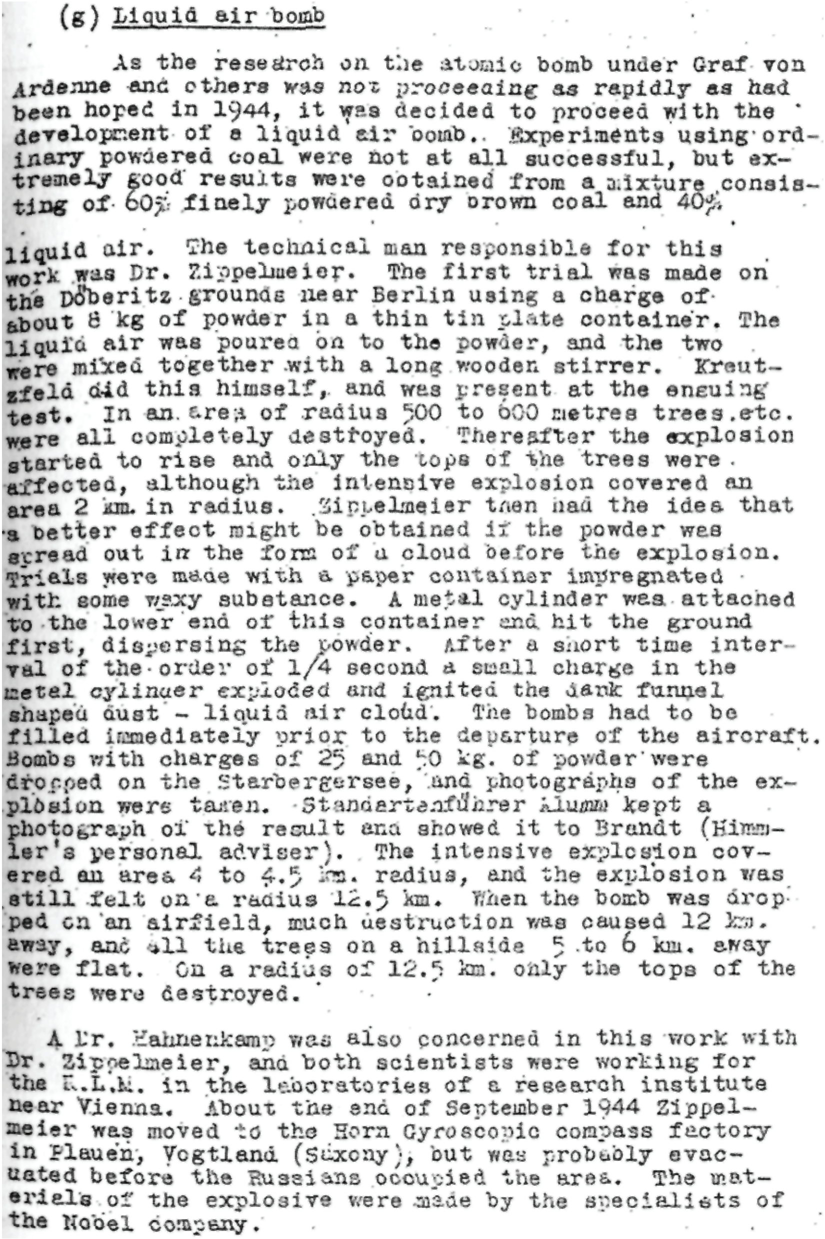
In their efforts to cope with Allied bombing attacks, it is reported the Germans have introduced their newest weapon - "Icing Gas". The new weapon, it is stated, operates on the principles of accelerated icing induced by an extremely low temperature zone, including crystallization and condensation through a temporary cloud causing the immediate icing of objects passing through it. The equipment issaid to consist of a cylindrical reservoir tube secured under each wing of a fighter aircraft These tubes are filled with "Azote", a liquified nitrogen with a temperature of minus 250° C., combined with liquid air, and a gas outlet is affixed.

Proposed tactics consist of cutting across the bomber path perpendicularly and releasing the tube facing the bomber, or, flying over the bomber and diving across its path releasing the gas at close range, the higher the altitude the better the results.

According to German sources, extremely satisfying tests have been made on robot target planes at altitudes of 7-3,000 meters. It is alleged that these targets were brought down at once and that on reaching the earth they were found to have a coating of ice about two inches thick. It is further alleged that German fighters have brought down some isolated heavy bombers by employing this method. Hopes are also being built on this weapon as a good defensive measure against a pursuing plane. (Abract of G-2 Periodic Report No. 99.)

SOURCE: Med. Allied Strategic Air Force, Weekly Intelligence Summary No. 2 (K-92317) date 15 January 1945. Abstracted 12 March, 1945. SECRET.

Icing Gas and its proposed tactics.

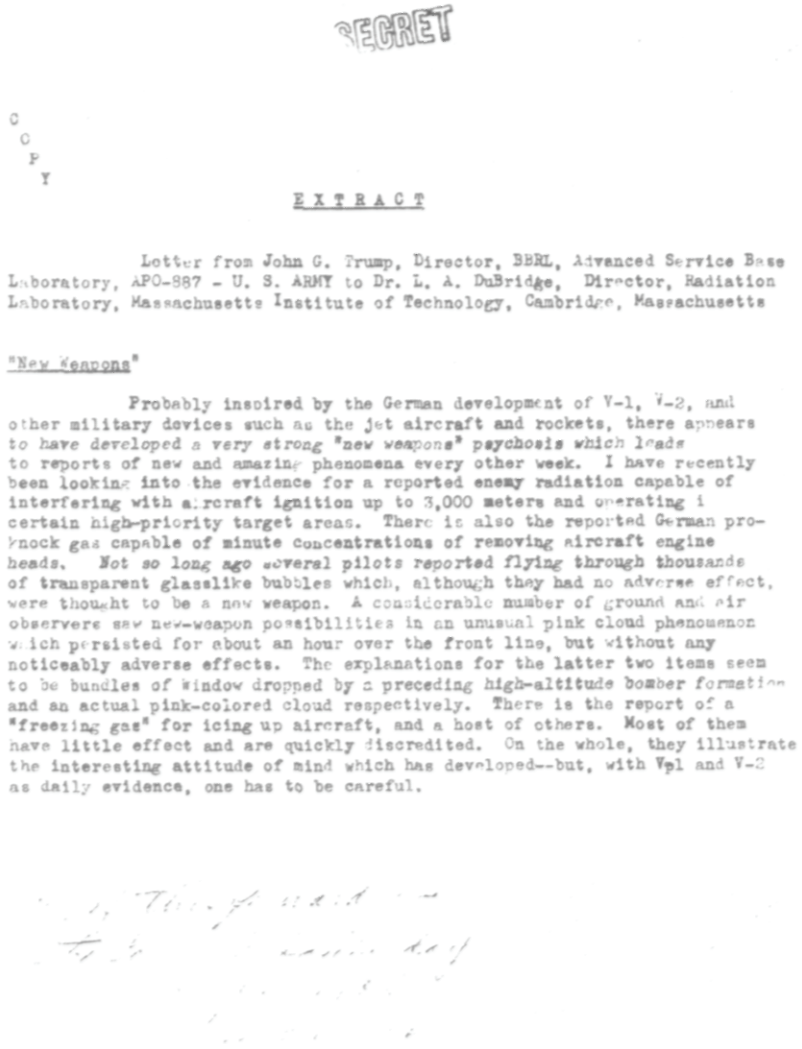


(g) Liquid air bomb

As the research on the atomic bomb under Graf von Ardenne and others was not proceeding as rapidly as had been hoped in 1944, it was decided to proceed with the development of a liquid air bomb. Experiments using ordinary powdered coal were not at all successful, but extremely good results were obtained from a mixture consisting of 60% finely powdered dry brown coal and 40% liquid air. The technical man responsible for this work was Dr. Zippelmeier. The first trial was made on the Döberitz grounds near Berlin using a charge of about 8 kg of powder in a thin tin plate container. The liquid air was poured on to the powder, and the two were mixed together with a long wooden stirrer. Kreutzfeld did this himself, and was present at the ensuing test. In an area of radius 500 to 600 metres trees, etc. were all completely destroyed. Thereafter the explosion started to rise and only the tops of the trees were affected, although the intensive explosion covered an area 2 km. in radius. Zippelmeier then had the idea that a better effect might be obtained if the powder was spread out in the form of a cloud before the explosion. Trials were made with a paper container impregnated with some waxy substance. A metal cylinder was attached to the lower end of this container and hit the ground first, dispersing the powder. After a short time interval of the order of 1/4 second a small charge in the metal cylinder exploded and ignited the dark funnel shaped dust - liquid air cloud. The bombs had to be filled immediately prior to the departure of the aircraft. Bombs with charges of 25 and 50 kg. of powder were dropped on the Starbergersee, and photographs of the explosion were taken. Standartenführer Klumm kept a photograph of the result and showed it to Brandt (Himmler's personal adviser). The intensive explosion covered an area 4 to 4.5 km. radius, and the explosion was still felt on a radius 12.5 km. When the bomb was dropped on an airfield, much destruction was caused 12 km. away, and all the trees on a hillside 5 to 6 km. away were flat. On a radius of 12.5 km. only the tops of the trees were destroyed.

A Dr. Hahnenkamp was also concerned in this work with Dr. Zippelmeier, and both scientists were working for the R.L.M. in the laboratories of a research institute near Vienna. About the end of September 1944 Zippelmeier was moved to the Horn Gyroscopic compass factory in Plauen, Vogtland (Saxony), but was probably evacuated before the Russians occupied the area. The materials of the explosive were made by the specialists of the Nobel company.

Reconsider this document again as it shows that several of these exotic bombs had elements in common. We will consider Zippermayr's fuel-air bomb in the next chapter.



SECRET

C
O
P
Y

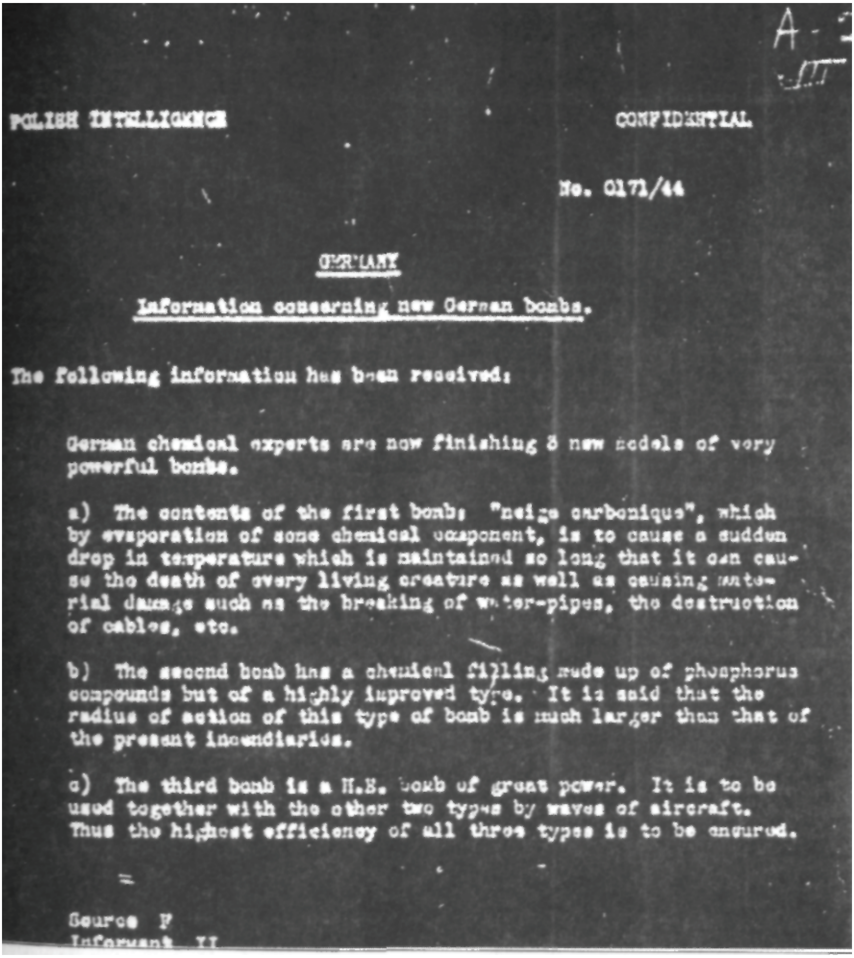
EXTRACT

Letter from John G. Trump, Director, BBRL, Advanced Service Base Laboratory, APO-887 - U. S. ARMY to Dr. L. A. DuBridge, Director, Radiation Laboratory, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Massachusetts

"New Weapons"

Probably inspired by the German development of V-1, V-2, and other military devices such as the jet aircraft and rockets, there appears to have developed a very strong "new weapons" psychosis which leads to reports of new and amazing phenomena every other week. I have recently been looking into the evidence for a reported enemy radiation capable of interfering with aircraft ignition up to 3,000 meters and operating i certain high-priority target areas. There is also the reported German pro-knock gas capable of minute concentrations of removing aircraft engine heads. Not so long ago several pilots reported flying through thousands of transparent glasslike bubbles which, although they had no adverse effect, were thought to be a new weapon. A considerable number of ground and air observers saw new-weapon possibilities in an unusual pink cloud phenomenon which persisted for about an hour over the front line, but without any noticeably adverse effects. The explanations for the latter two items seem to be bundles of window dropped by a preceding high-altitude bomber formation and an actual pink-colored cloud respectively. There is the report of a "freezing gas" for icing up aircraft, and a host of others. Most of them have little effect and are quickly discredited. On the whole, they illustrate the interesting attitude of mind which has developed--but, with V-1 and V-2 as daily evidence, one has to be careful.

A letter from a U.S. Army lob to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology reporting the magnetic wave (Motorstoppmittel), gas designed to stop engines, mysterious glass-like bubbles and a pink cloud, as well as freezing gas.



A -

POLISH INTELLIGENCE CONFIDENTIAL

No. 0171/44

GERMANY

Information concerning new German bombs.

The following information has been received:

German chemical experts are now finishing 3 new models of very powerful bombs.

a) The contents of the first bomb: "neige carbonique", which by evaporation of some chemical component, is to cause a sudden drop in temperature which is maintained so long that it can cause the death of every living creature as well as causing material damage such as the breaking of water-pipes, the destruction of cables, etc.

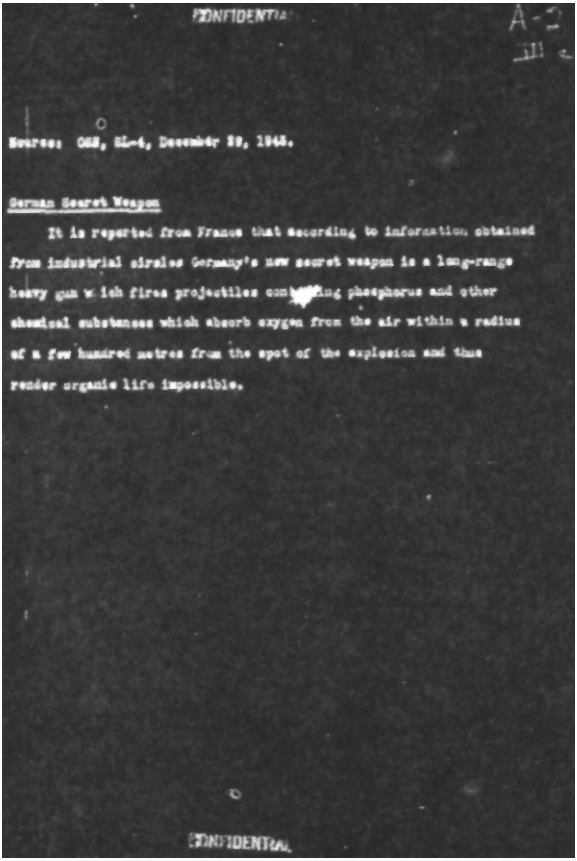
b) The second bomb has a chemical filling made up of phosphorus compounds but of a highly improved type. It is said that the radius of action of this type of bomb is much larger than that of the present incendiaries.

c) The third bomb is a H.E. bomb of great power. It is to be used together with the other two types by waves of aircraft. Thus the highest efficiency of all three types is to be ensured.

=

Source F
Informant XI

The legendary cold bomb described in U.S. government files as well as what may be the oxygen bomb using phosphorus and an "bomb of great power", identified only by an abbreviation which may be H.B. or M.B., the old microfilm copy is unclear.



CONFIDENTIAL

A-2

Source: OSS, SL-4, December 29, 1943.

German Secret Weapon

It is reported from France that according to information obtained from industrial circles Germany's new secret weapon is a long-range heavy gun which fires projectiles containing phosphorus and other chemical substances which absorb oxygen from the air within a radius of a few hundred metres from the spot of the explosion and thus render organic life impossible.

CONFIDENTIAL

The oxygen bomb described again.

combined efforts of Dr. Kurt Diebner and Manfred von Ardenne in addition to their work on a classic atomic bomb. This is interesting because these are two very different, high-profile individuals.

Diebner was already involved in more than one atomic project and was also involved with a secret SS atomic project. So, in other words, Dr. Diebner was a somewhat clandestine scientist whose primary allegiance belonged to the SS and Dr. Kammler. It may be that he even reported the progress of these other projects in which he was involved directly to the SS.

Manfred von Ardenne ran one of well-known German atomic projects. This was for the Reichspostamt, the German Post Office. Now, in the USA, the Post Office is just about the last place you would want running a high-tech, crucial, war sensitive project but this was not so in wartime Germany. The German Post Office enjoyed a high-tech reputation and organization. It was perhaps on the same order as Bell Laboratories in the US. Manfred von Ardenne was a first-rate scientist and had all he needed to do his work.

My one source says the M-bomb was developed in a middle school in Stadtilm but that no tests were carried out in Thuringia[1]. This bomb was in the widest sense an atomic weapon but very different from both the atomic and hydrogen bombs we are familiar with. This bomb is also known as a super-compression bomb because it was composed of matter that was compressed or "densified" as compared to normal matter. This bomb did generate pressure and heat just as a normal atomic blast does but did not generated radioactive radiation. From this description, it sounds exactly the opposite of a neutron bomb.

From the discussion super-compression, this is reminiscent of the work of Karl Nowak. Nowak was responsible for a process used to compress and so strengthen metals through cooling and pressure. He was also responsible for a new method of power generation within an internal combustion engine in which a super-cooled liquid gas was injected and subsequently expanded, producing power[2]. We might ask if the M-bomb has any relationship to the oxygen bomb or the cold bomb? We should also consider whether or not the work of Nowak was involved in the M-bomb or any of the other bombs described above. Unfortunately, the answers still await exact determination.

Finally, there was yet another type of liquid air bomb. This information comes to us via British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report 142[3], which is a gold mine.

This report involved Dr. Mario Zippermayr whom we will meet in the next chapter and serves as background and introduction to his fantastic work. It seems that in 1944 the progress on the atomic bomb was not as advanced as the Germans expected. It was decided at that it was time to experiment with a kind of "Ersatz" bomb using liquid air and coal dust. Dr. Zippermayr was put in charge of this project and the first tests were done at the Doeberitz grounds near Berlin. A mixture of 60% finely powdered dry brown coal was hand-mixed into a 40% solution of liquid air. Eight kg of powder was mixed together for this test. This was actually done by a man named "Krautsfeld" according to the report, by hand, using a wooden stirrer. According to Krautsfeld, our witness for the report, an area whose radius was 500 to 600 meters containing trees was absolutely destroyed. The explosion started to rise into the air, afterward, so that only the tops of the trees were affected, although the explosion itself consumed 2 km.

At this point Dr. Zippermayr had the idea that a better effect might be realized if the powder was spread out in the form of a cloud before the explosion. This was evidently the idea behind the fuel-air bomb to which we will turn our attention to next.

SOURCES

1. Georg, Friedrich and Thomas Mehner, 2004, page 258. Atomziel New York Geheime Grossraketen-und Raumfahrtprojekte des Dritten Reiches, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

2. Nowak, Karl, Deutsches Patentamt, Patentschrift Number 905847, original patent dates from March 16, 1943

3. British Intelligence Subcommittee report number 142, pages 4 and 5, London

16 "Projekt Hexenkessel" The Fuel-Air Bomb

The German word "Hexenkessel" means "witches cauldron" in English. It is only one of the projects run by a true genius of the days of the Second World War, Dr. Mario Zippermayr. Dr. Zippermayr, sometimes spelled incorrectly as "Zippermeyer", was born an Italian of Austrian parents and educated in German speaking institutions. His interests ranged from perfecting color photographic film to the medical benefits of ozone therapy. He is remembered for his wide-ranging weapons research. His involvement with secret weaponry has never been much of a mystery but the true nature of his research has been hidden in layers of secrecy and disinformation until quite recently.

As the war broke out, Dr. Zippermayr was drafted into the Luftwaffe but detailed to begin practical research to facilitate the German effort. Dr. Zippermayr was first posted in Vienna and given his own laboratory where he headed a thirty-five-man research team. Among some of the research objectives he was given at this time were the development of the L-40 torpedo, the development of the Enzian and Schmetterling anti-aircraft rockets as well as the development of a mysterious, high-speed jet airplane.

Suddenly, in March of 1945, Dr. Zippermayr was put in charge of a facility called Talstation, near Lofer. He immediately fired most of its employees. The acronym T.A.L. means Technische Akademie der Luftwaffe. The word "Tal" also means "valley" in English. Talstation, which was actually more than one facility, was located in the mountainous region of the Working Plan: Fl. Stabing 4. B. Dr. Zippermayr Laboratory

Dr. Zippermayr
Vienna - Lofer
Repeat on the stationary
explosives tests.
Measuring the impulse reactions
Blumauer - Explosives A.G.
Blumau - Vienna
Explosive research
Dr Nisil - Vienna
Dust problem.
Theoretical questions for Aerosols.

23. TRIALS WITH COAL DUST EXPLOSIONS

a. Explosive-air mixtures present themselves as media suitable for the production of explosions as described. The substance to be mixed with air may be gas, liquid, or solid. After ignition the character of all these explosive mixtures is that of a gas. With fog or dust mixtures of liquids or solids vaporization precedes the explosion. Of these explosive-air mixtures, those of dusts are of particular interest and especially those formed from brown-coal dust. The coal used should contain a minimum of ash, 5% to not more than 10%, and a minimum of moisture. The explosive range includes mixtures between 80 and 1600 grams of dust per cubic meter (2 1/2 to 40 ounces per cubic yard). The available energy of brown-coal dust is about 5 times that of conventional explosives. Only a small part of the oxygen needed for combustion need be supplied, as that required for the explosion is drawn from the air. The action of dust explosions in confined spaces, as in mines, is well known. Explosions in the atmosphere have not been observed. If a dust cloud is ignited in the air it simply burns.

25. METHODS OF APPLICATION

a. To defend a large space, for example against a close formation of bombers, it is more useful to produce simultaneously a large number of small explosions. This is accomplished by sending up a large number of small rockets and igniting them simultaneously as soon as they have reached the elevation of the attacking aircraft. Thus there is produced in the air a mass explosion similar to a bomb carpet on the surface. It is essential that simultaneous ignition take place, most easily obtained by radio means. Tests on remote ignition were projected and the firm of Prinz Werke, Markt Pongau, was given the assignment of developing a simple igniting mechanism.

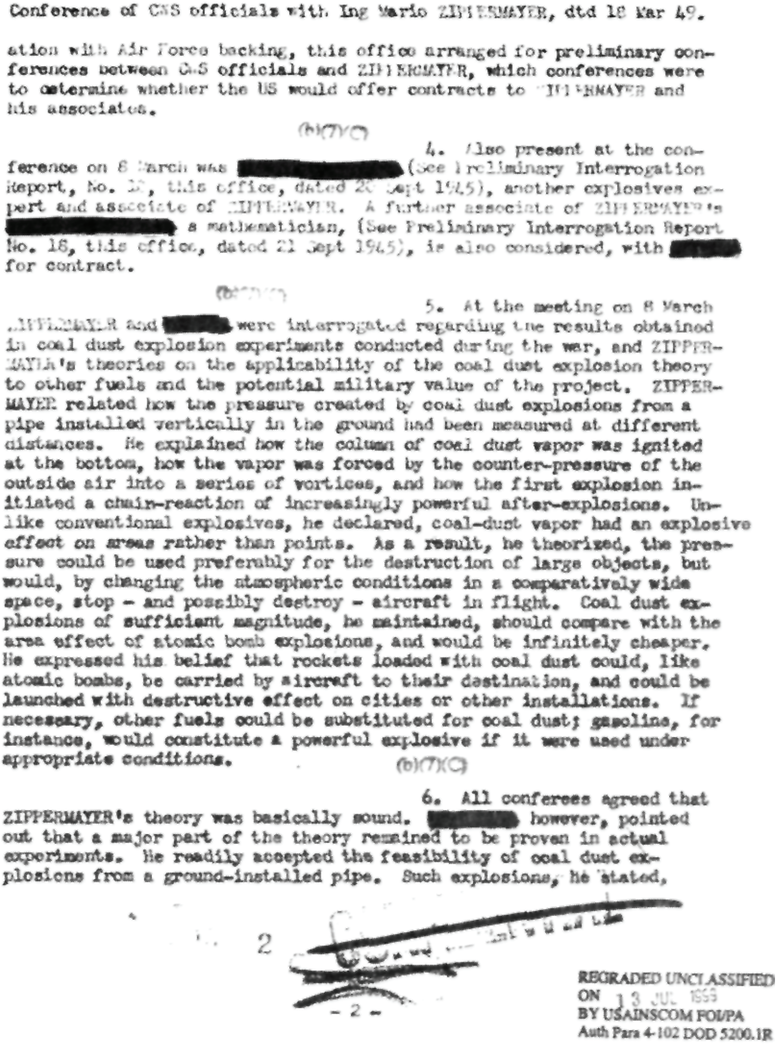
of "Enzian" and "Schmetterling" were foreseen. This involves rockets with searching heads and proximity fuses. As far as is known "Enzian" had a capacity of approximately 500 liters of coal dust.

Top: Chart of Dr. Zippermayr's organization.

Bottom: C.I.O.S. report 201 which focus on Project Hexenkessel's use of coal dust explosive as an anti-aircraft weapon.

5. At the meeting on 8 March ZIPPERMAYER and [redacted] were interrogated regarding the results obtained in coal dust explosion experiments conducted during the war, and ZIPPERMAYER's theories on the applicability of the coal dust explosion theory to other fuels and the potential military value of the project. ZIPPERMAYER related how the pressure created by coal dust explosions from a pipe installed vertically in the ground had been measured at different distances. He explained how the column of coal dust vapor was ignited at the bottom, how the vapor was forced by the counter-pressure of the outside air into a series of vortices, and how the first explosion initiated a chain-reaction of increasingly powerful after-explosions. Unlike conventional explosives, he declared, coal-dust vapor had an explosive effect on areas rather than points. As a result, he theorized, the pressure could be used preferably for the destruction of large objects, but would, by changing the atmospheric conditions in a comparatively wide space, stop - and possibly destroy - aircraft in flight. Coal dust explosions of sufficiant magnitude, he maintained, should compare with the area effect of atomic bomb explosions, and would be infinitely cheaper. He expressed his belief that rockets loaded with coal dust could, like atomic bombs, be carried by aircraft to their destination, and could be launched with destructive effect on cities or other installations. If necessary, other fuels could be substituted for coal dust; gasoline, for instance, would constitute a powerful explosive if it were used under appropriate conditions.

(b)(7)(C)



Conference of CWS officials with Ing Mario ZIPPERMAYER, dtd 18 Mar 49.

ation with Air Force backing, this office arranged for preliminary conferences between CWS officials and ZIPPERMAYER, which conferences were to determine whether the US would offer contracts to ZIPPERMAYER and his associates.

(b)(7)(C)

4. Also present at the conference on 8 March was [redacted] (See Preliminary Interrogation Report, No. 22, this office, dated 20 Sept 1945), another explosives expert and associate of ZIPPERMAYER. A further associate of ZIPPERMAYER's [redacted] a mathematician, (See Preliminary Interrogation Report No. 18, this office, dated 21 Sept 1945), is also considered, with [redacted] for contract.

(b)(7)(C)

5. At the meeting on 8 March ZIPPERMAYER and [redacted] were interrogated regarding the results obtained in coal dust explosion experiments conducted during the war, and ZIPPERMAYER's theories on the applicability of the coal dust explosion theory to other fuels and the potential military value of the project. ZIPPERMAYER related how the pressure created by coal dust explosions from a pipe installed vertically in the ground had been measured at different distances. He explained how the column of coal dust vapor was ignited at the bottom, how the vapor was forced by the counter-pressure of the outside air into a series of vortices, and how the first explosion initiated a chain-reaction of increasingly powerful after-explosions. Unlike conventional explosives, he declared, coal-dust vapor had an explosive effect on areas rather than points. As a result, he theorized, the pressure could be used preferably for the destruction of large objects, but would, by changing the atmospheric conditions in a comparatively wide space, stop - and possibly destroy - aircraft in flight. Coal dust explosions of sufficient magnitude, he maintained, should compare with the area effect of atomic bomb explosions, and would be infinitely cheaper. He expressed his belief that rockets loaded with coal dust could, like atomic bombs, be carried by aircraft to their destination, and could be launched with destructive effect on cities or other installations. If necessary, other fuels could be substituted for coal dust; gasoline, for instance, would constitute a powerful explosive if it were used under appropriate conditions.

(b)(7)(C)

6. All conferees agreed that ZIPPERMAYER's theory was basically sound. [redacted] however, pointed out that a major part of the theory remained to be proven in actual experiments. He readily accepted the feasibility of coal dust explosions from a ground-installed pipe. Such explosions, he stated,

2

REGRADED UNCLASSIFIED
ON 13 JUL 1999
BY USAINSCOM FOI/PA
Auth Para 4-102 DOD 5200.1R

This is a portion of a U.S. government post-war interview with Dr. Zippermayr, March 8, 1949. In this interview Dr. Zippermayr explained to the U.S. officials the test conclusions he reached during the war blowing coal dust out of hollow pipes. This test method led to a cover story that Dt. Zippermayr had invented a "vortex cannon" by which enemy aircraft would be swept from the sky. This myth still persists to this day and has even been repeated by a prominent and respected historian in a recent British TV documentary. The initial explosion scattering and vaporizing the coal dust must be slow enough to allow a long billowing explosion over a wide area. For this a mathematician was included to verify Dr. Zippermayr's work. Other than this math, the method was so simple and direct that a cover story was needed lest this cheap rival to the atomic bomb fall into the wrong hands. This cover story and strategy worked for decades.

Continued on following page

Tyrol, approximately where Germany, Switzerland, Austria and Italy meet. Dr. Zippermayr and his pre-existing staff, now a total of eighty individuals, set up shop in one of the outlying sub-bases just outside of Lofer which was called "Hochtal" (high valley).

Dr. Zippermayr continued his brief tenure at Lofer until May 8, 1945, the day of the German surrender. Days later, American troops reported the presence of 2,000 kilos of explosives at Hochtal and laboratory facilities in an absolutely pristine state. Dr. Zippermayr continued to reside at Hochtal, setting up an open house for any intelligence people or dignitaries who cared to visit. On May 15, 1945 Dr. Zippermayr was arrested and interrogated by military authorities. Shortly thereafter he was discharged from the Luftwaffe with the rank of Major and transported back to Lofer on June 20, 1945 where he apparently continued to host the "open house". The facility was visited by increasingly higher levels of intelligence people, including Colonel Leslie E. Simon, Director of the Ballistic Research Laboratory at the Aberdeen Proving Grounds. Dr. Zippermayr complied completely with all requests for information.

Information used for this report does not come from a review of the existing literature on Dr. Zippermayer or his work. Instead, it comes as a result of a Freedom Of Information request directed to the United States Army regarding Dr. Zippermayr and the facility at Lofer[1]. To this writer's delight, the Army responded with a whole series of reports, each originally more classified than the last, which gave us a whole new perspective on Dr. Zippermayr and his work as well as the nature of the maintenance of secrecy concerning German secret weapons. The Army even persuaded the Air Force to contribute with a report of their own which was known to the Army but now out of their control In all four large reports were received.

Legend and propaganda had it that Dr. Zippermayr was working on a "vortex cannon" at Lofer. It was said that this gun was powered by coal dust and set off in such a way that a huge explosive vortex would be generated. This explosive vortex was said to be powerful enough to blow the wings off enemy aircraft and so was to be employed as an anti-aircraft weapon. Hidden within this story is an element of truth. But the truth is much greater than the alleged story, so much greater that it can only be concluded that the whole vortex cannon concept was created to conceal the nature of this truth. It is unclear if the Germans originally concocted this tale and it was just maintained by the Americans or if it was completely a post-war addition by the Americans.

When Dr. Zippermayr began his experimentation on coal dust the project was code-named "Humus". On March 8, 1945, in the waning days of the war, the project was re-named "Hexenkessel". At this time, coinciding with Dr. Zippermayr move to Lofer, a large-scale, intensive effort was put into this project, involving several agencies besides the Zippermayr laboratory.

Coal contains a surprising number of calories, that is, it has a high energy content even when compared with the explosives of the times. As a matter of fact the amount of energy available in coal is about five times that of high explosive. But to get the highest possible temperatures and pressure from the explosion, it must be an instantaneous detonation. The destructive effects of this explosion are limited by the intensity and duration of the explosive pressure. Explosive pressure at the center produces high heat but at the same time the very nature of the explosion disperses the explosive material eventually to a point were detonation no longer takes place, so limiting the scope of the explosion. But it was found that the effectiveness on an explosion upon a target with flat surface was more dependent upon increased duration of the explosion rather than high intensity. Knowing this, Dr. Zippermayr concentrated upon producing explosions of longer duration.

Coal dust is explosive within a confined space, every coal miner knows this, but to get coal dust to explode in the atmosphere it has to be compressed. The wave of air pressure resulting from an explosion can provide this compression. It was found that this could be done using by packing coal dust around a low velocity explosive charge but not directly next to it. A space between the charge and the coal dust was necessary for dispersion of the coal dust into the atmosphere. Under pressure from this explosive wave, the coal dust of the fuel-air bomb mixes with the atmosphere and uses atmospheric oxygen as its burning agent rather than chemical oxygen in the warhead itself.

To defend a city against a close formation of bombers, used at that time, several smaller explosions would be used at once. The rockets "Schmetterling" and "Enzian" were foreseen for this purpose. Multiple rockets would detonate, spreading their coal dust packages in a large area throughout the atmosphere directly below or above the bomber formation. All the warheads would be detonated at once by radio. A truly monstrous explosion would take place near the squadron, producing a long-duration explosion that would simply break the wings off the heavily laden bombers.

Tests had begun with coal dust being shot out of tubes pointed upward. Something curious was observed. A flaming vortex was observed which spread outward from the center of the column of air as it was shot skyward. From this curiosity was born the cover story of the "vortex cannon". In fact, what was being developed was what we call an air-fuel bomb today. The blast resulting from this kind of weapon is second only to an atomic bomb in destructive power.

According to a later set of declassified documents received under pressure from the Army, Dr. Zippermayr met with U.S. Air Force officials on March 18, 1949. Dr. Zippermayr presented his findings to the Air Force for the use of what would be called the air-fuel bomb for use as an anti-aircraft weapon. The record of this meeting is important because he explained the explosive process in somewhat more detail. According to the report:

"...He explained how the column of coal dust vapor was ignited at the bottom, how the vapor was forced by the counter-pressure of the outside air into a series of vortices, and how the first explosion initiated a chain-reaction of increasingly powerful after-explosions. Unlike conventional explosives, he declared, coal-dust vapor had an explosive effect on areas rather than points. As a result, he theorized, the pressure could be used preferably for the destruction of large objects, but would, by changing the atmospheric conditions in a comparatively wide space, stop-and possibly destroy-aircraft in flight. Coal dust explosions of sufficient magnitude, he maintained, should compare with the area effect of atomic bomb explosions, and would be infinitely cheaper. He expressed his belief that rockets loaded with coal dust could, like atomic bombs, be carried by aircraft to their destination, and could be launched with destructive effect on cities or other installations. If necessary, other fuels could be substituted for coal dust; gasoline, for instance, would constitute a powerful explosive if it were used under appropriate conditions."

Three points taken from the general FOIA text on Dr. Zippermayr are worth mentioning at this point. Coal dust or any solid fuel once it is blown into the atmosphere in this way becomes a vapor. This long-duration explosion characteristic of the fuel-air bomb actually seems to be many explosions, each billowing out and creating the next. According to Dr. Zippermayr such an explosion would probably reach a maximum height of one mile.

At the conclusion of the meeting it was recommended that Dr. Zippermayr be hired along with a mathematician for further work.

That was 1949. The fuel-air bomb concept was not spoken of publicly by the government until the United States was ready to invade Iraq during the Gulf War. At that time much was made out of the possibility that Saddam Hussein might possess a fuel-air bomb and use it on U.S. ground troops. Presumably, the technology was known outside the USA. Perhaps this presumed leak came during Dr. Zippermayr's weeks at the "open house" in Lofer when anybody might have simply inquired about this technology. In any event, the Iraqis did not use a fuel-air bomb in the early 1990s. Again, this idea was to sleep for a period of time.

According to recent chatter on the internet, the fuel-air bomb idea has been recently resurrected, now going by the name "a-neutronic bomb" or "electro-hydrodynamic gaseous fuel device". This bomb is said to be the handiwork of the renegade scientist Dr. Michael Ricionoscuito. You may remember Dr. Ricionoscuito for his other work, the famous Promis software, used to spy on individuals by just about every government intelligence agency in the world today.

The a-neutronic bomb consists of blowing a cloud of gaseous, combustible material into the atmosphere whereby a small rocket is launched into its midst trailing a small wire connected to the ground. The wire charges the cloud with electric energy so that the cloud is saturated with electro-static energy. The cloud is detonated with the resulting explosion being on a par with a small atomic detonation. The resulting blast also produces the same long duration as its ancestor. This is evidenced by the fact that it is said that the Nevada test site, which is flat desert, sank about 30 feet after the blast[6].

SOURCES

1. Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee Evaluation Report 201, 7/23/45, Report On Talstation, Lofer, Target Nos. C-4/222 and C-1/667, obtained through Department Of The Army, Fort George G. Meade, MD. 20755-5995

2. Counter Intelligence Corps, Salzburg Detachment, United States Forces Austria, Zell am See Section, 8/4/45, Case Nol S/Z/55, Zippermayr Mario Dr. Ing., obtained through Department Of The Army, Fort George G. Meade, MD. 20755-5995

3. Headquarters Seventh Army, C.I.C. Detachment, 5/16/45, Dr. Zippermayer, (Stabsingenieur) Kreis Zell Am See, Lofer, obtained through Deptartment Of The Army, Fort George G. Meade, MD. 20755-5995

4. Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee Evaluation Report 201, 7/23/45, Report On Talsation, Lofer, Target Nos. C-4/222 and C-l/667, (Expanded Version), obtained through Department Of The Army, Fort George G. Meade, MD. 20755-5995

5. Conference of CWS Officials with Ing. Mario Zippermayer, Regraed Unclassified, 7/13/99 by USAINSCOM FOI/PA, obtained through Department Of The Army, Fort George G. Meade, MD. 20755-5995

6. Grabbe, Orlin, "When Osama Bin Ladin Was Tim Osman", www.orlingrabbe.com/binladin_timosman.html

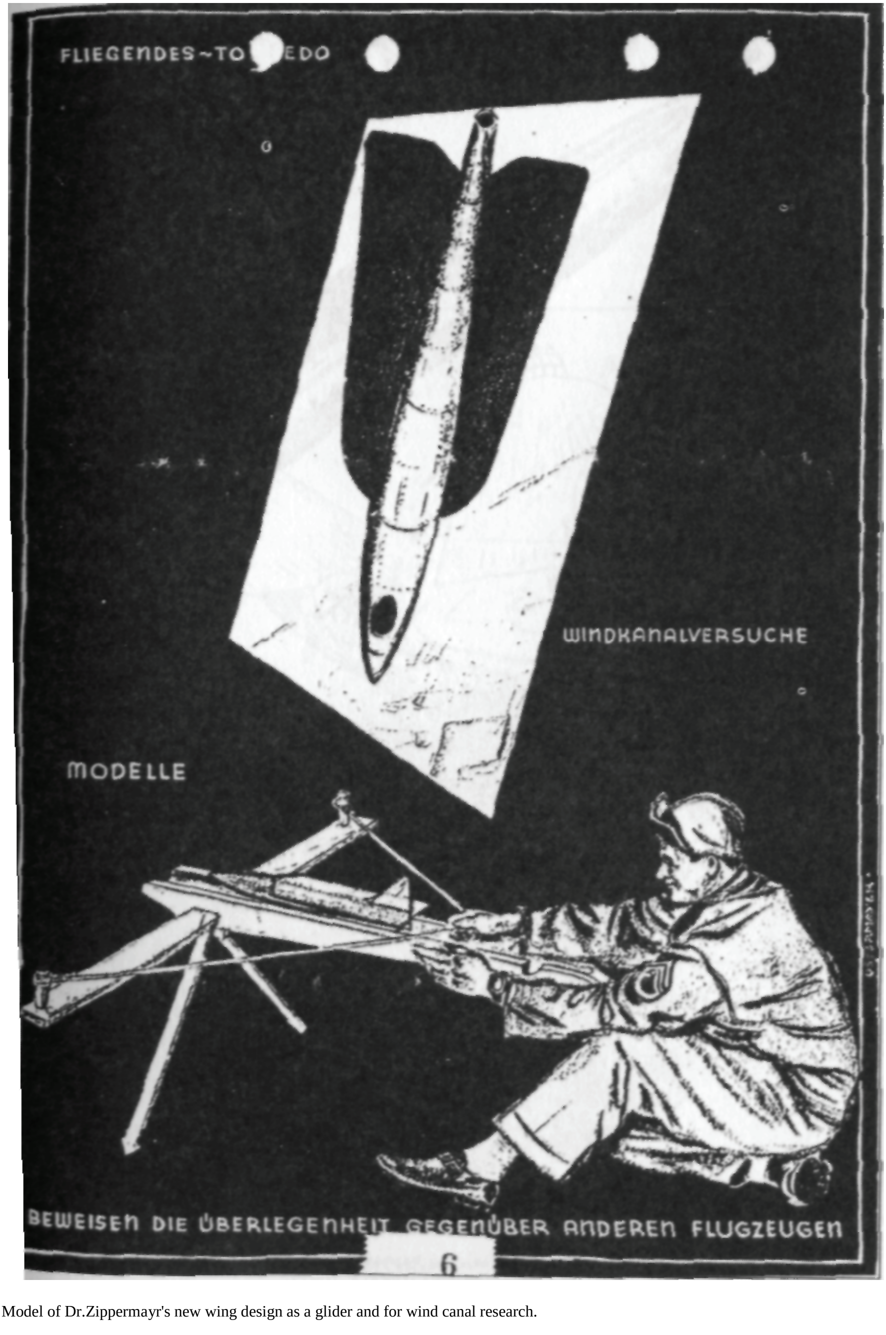
17 "Pfiel" (Arrow) Aircraft

In reviewing the new documents sent by the Army concerning Dr. Zippermayr it became evident that he was involved in another project, which had never been reported before. This project was called the "Pfiel Flugzeug" or Arrow aircraft. This "Pfiel" had nothing to do with the Donier projectof the same name.

Anyone familiar with German weaponry of the Second World War knows how much research has been done in tracking down every proposed German aircraft prototype. These prototypes have been fleshed out in illustrations and in projected operational data by interested researchers. These illustrations fill numerous books and magazines as well as several internet web-sites dedicated to the idea of what might have been if the 3rd Reich had lasted another year. Because of the intensity of this work and the number of years that it has been in progress, it is truly gratifying to stumble upon something new and unreported at this late date.

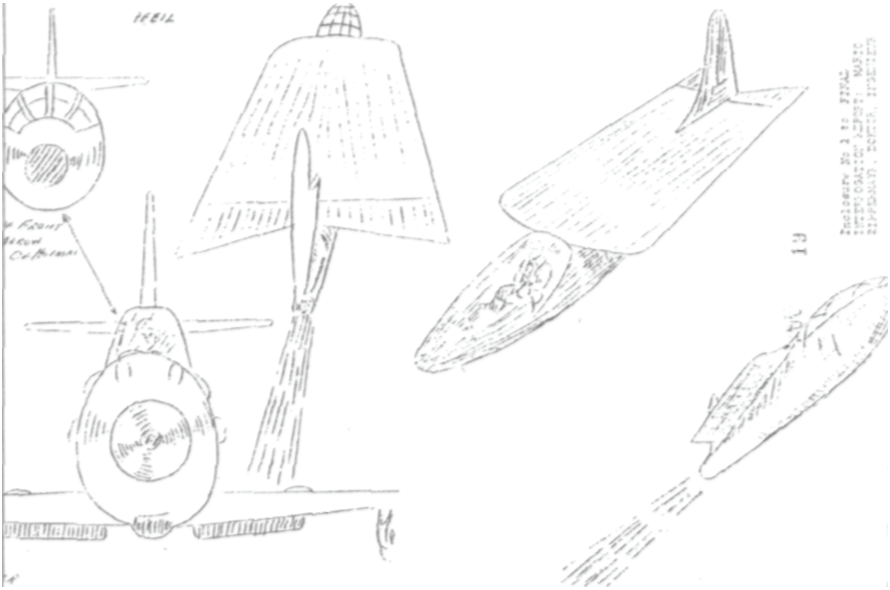
The concept for this aircraft came from his work on another project, the L-40 aerial torpedo. Dr. Zippermayr's solution to the problem of the aerial torpedo led directly to a subsequent project, the Pfiel aircraft.

The standard German aerial torpedo was released at about 50 meters (slightly over 150 feet) from the ocean's surface by an aircraft in horizontal flight at an air speed of about 300 km. per hour or about 180 m.p.h. To release higher or faster would cause the torpedo to impact the water at too great a speed,



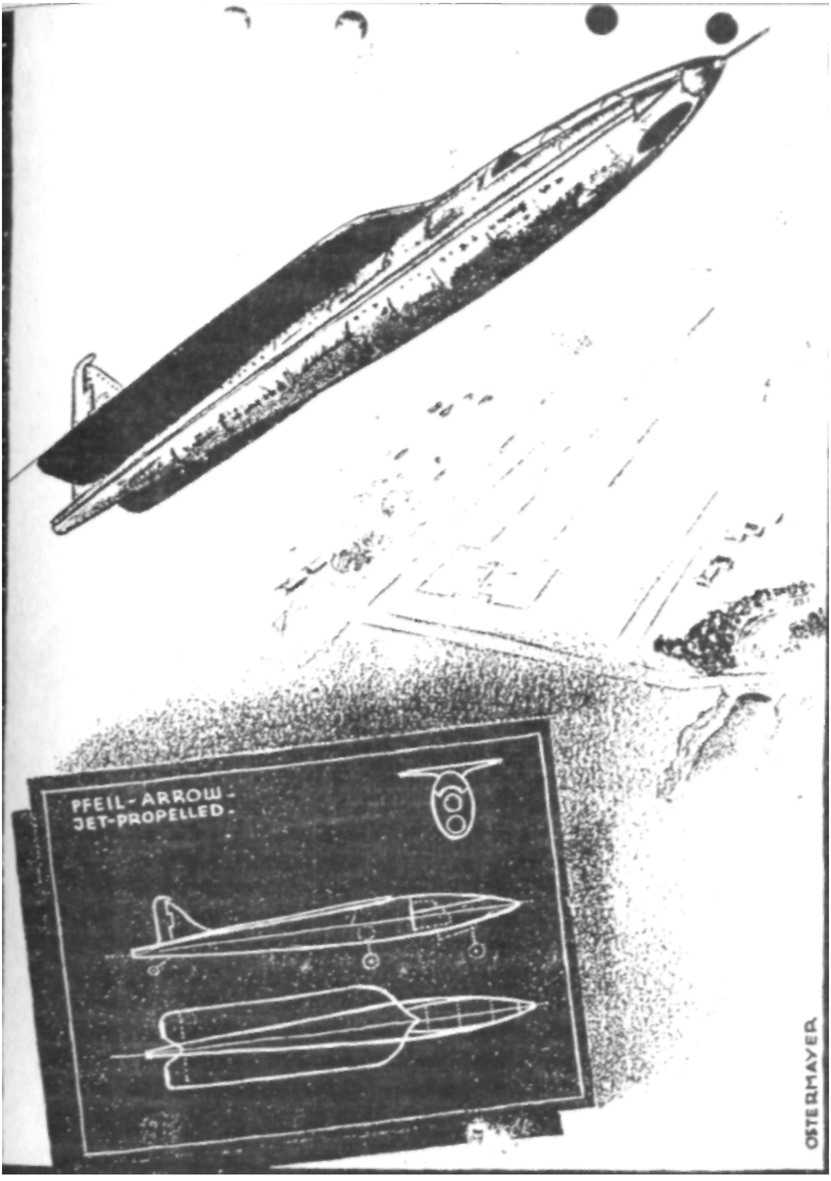
FLIEGENDES~TO EDO
WINDKANALVERSUCHE
MODELLE
BEWEISEN DIE ÜBERLEGENHEIT GEGENÜBER ANDEREN FLUGZEUGEN
6

Model of Dr.Zippermayr's new wing design as a glider and for wind canal research.



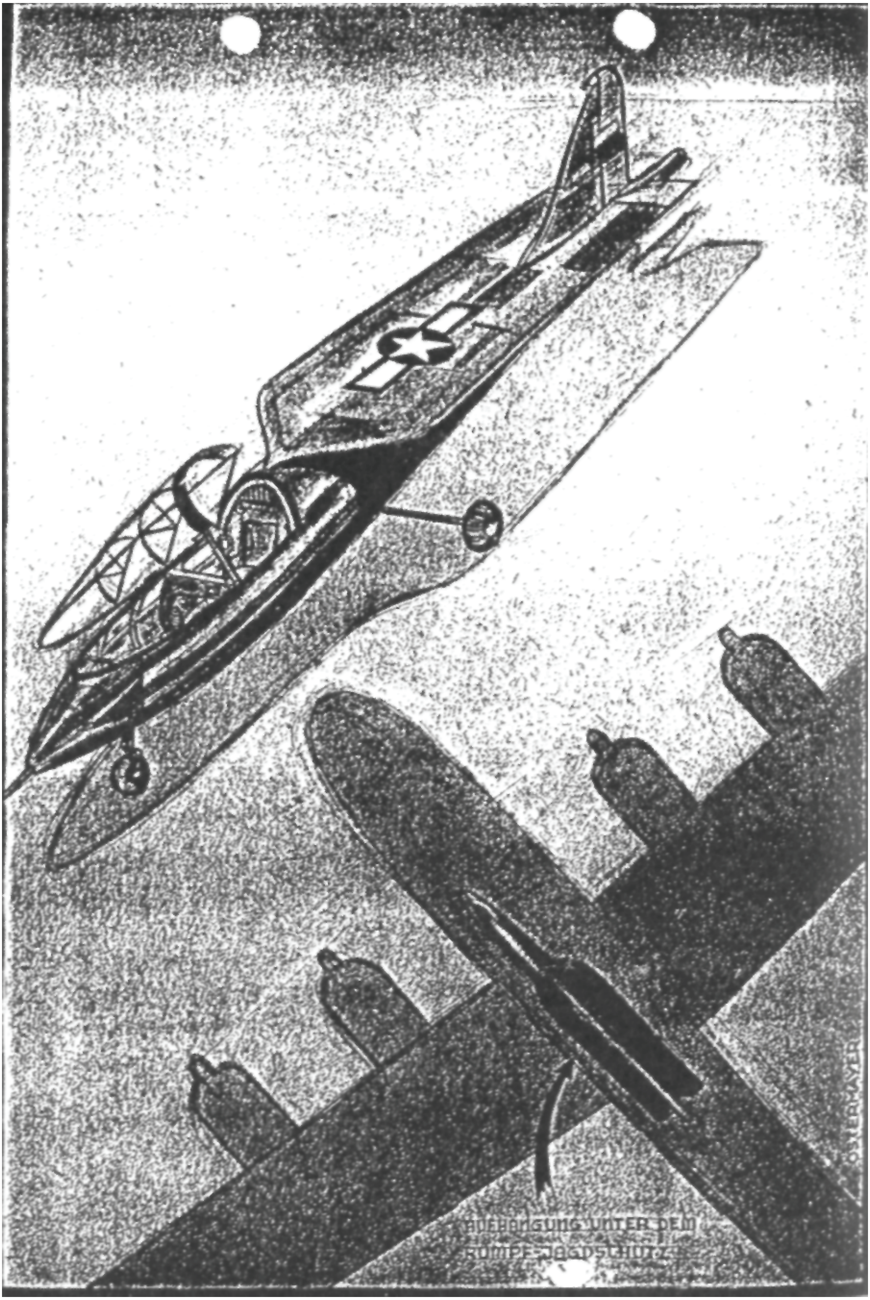
PFEIL
19
Enclosure No 1 to FINAL
INTERROGATION REPORT: MAGIC

Drawings of the Pfiel in flight and in three views.



PFEIL-ARROW-
JET-PROPELLED-
OSTERMAYER

The Pfiel (arrow) design in comparison with a conventional propeller-driven aircraft.



AUFHÄNGUNG UNTER DEM
RUMPF-JAGDSCHUTZ
OSTERMAYER

A U.S. built Pfiel design as it would be test-dropped from a B-29.

Blohm & Voß P. 202

Im Verlauf des Krieges wurden bereits eingehende Untersuchungen über die Beeinflussung der Schnellflugeigenschaften durch gepfeilte Tragflügel angestellt, die eindeutig bewiesen, daß bei Pfeilflügeln die Kompressibilitätserscheinungen im schallnahen Bereich hinausgeschoben wurden. Gleichzeitig erbrachten diese Versuche aber die durch den Auftriebsabfall des Pfeilflügels hervorgerufenen schlechten Langsamflugeigenschaften, die Probleme bei Start und Landung auftürmten. Bei der P. 202 wurde versucht, sämtliche Nachteile des Pfeilflügels im Langsamflug durch einen um die Hochachse drehbaren Flügel zu beheben. Beim Start und bei der Landung lag der normale Trapezflügel, mit als Pfanne ausgebildetem Mittelstück, rechtwinklig zur Längsachse des Rumpfes, also in Normalstellung eines eingepfeilten Flügels, bei der sämtliche auftriebserhöhenden Mittel, wie Landeklappen und Vorflügel, wirksam blieben. Beim Schnellflug sollte der Flügel um 35° gedreht werden, so, daß die linke Fläche negative und die rechte Fläche positive Pfeilform aufwies. Der sonstige Aufbau des freitragenden Schulterdeckers war normal. Unter dem Rumpf waren nebeneinander zwei Jumo 004 Luftstrahl-Turbinen geschlungen, das Leitwerk war ungepfeilt. Die einsitzige Maschine sollte als Jagdflugzeug Verwendung finden.

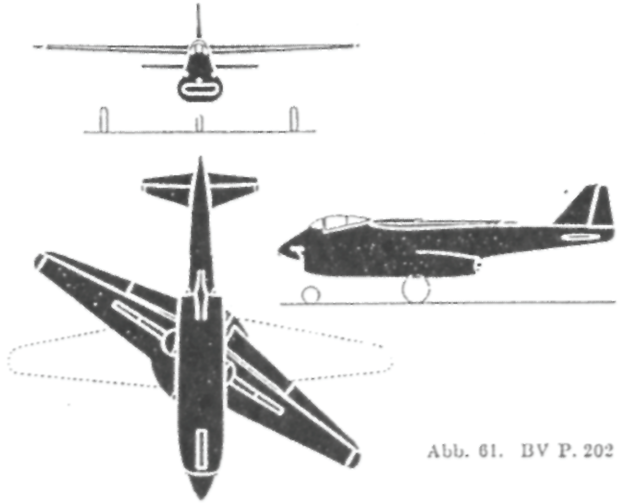


Abb. 61. BV P. 202

Blohm & Voß P. 203

Die geradezu primitiv anmutende Konstruktion der Zelle dieses als Langstreckenflugzeug ausgelegten Aufklärers täuscht darüber hinweg, daß dieses Flugzeug durch seine Triebwerksanlage etwas revolutionierend Neues brachte. Daß der von Vogt beschrittene Weg richtig war, ist be-damaging the torpedo's steering mechanisms. The Germans suffered substantial losses to their attacking aircraft using these weapons and tactics. The low altitude and low speed simply left the attacking aircraft venerable.

A diagram of the Blohm & Voss P.203 scissor-wing aircraft. When folded back for high speed flight, this design resembles the Pfiel. For low speed takeoff, the wings were set in the conventional position.

What was needed was a new torpedo with a new attack methodology. The Germans needed a torpedo that could be fired from a distance, at a high altitude, and at jet-plane speeds. They wanted the new torpedo to be launched at 1.5 kilometers from the target, at any height, at any angle and at speeds up to 700 km per hour (435 m.p.h.).

Dr. Zippermayr reworked the internal components of the new aerial torpedo with these goals in mind. But what is most interesting were his aerodynamic solutions for the new torpedo. This solution was a new gliding surface that automatically balanced the torpedo in flight. This gliding surface was a new wing with a special shape. It was attached to the top edge of the torpedo and its wings were "V" shaped as seen from the front or rear. This wing design automatically confirmed stability on the flying craft since its center of gravity was directly below what we might call its point of suspension, the midpoint between the V-wing surfaces. Tests were performed in which the torpedo was dropped from an aircraft flying at speeds up to 720kph and from heights of over 1000 meters. The Arado 234 was envisioned as using this weapon. The work was carried out from January, 1944 until the end of the war.

The success of the L-40 torpedo design had obvious implications for high-speed aircraft. Besides Dr. Zippermayr, Messerschmitt, Augsburg, was already present at Lofer for work on the Enzian rocket. Dr. Wurster and none other than Dr. Lippisch worked on this project. Given all this aviation genius, it is no surprise that the Aerodynamische Institute der Technischer Hochschule, Hanover was put to work conducting wind tunnel and other tests of the torpedo design. They passed the opinion that the structure was sound and suitable and could be applied successfully to aircraft. These findings were published in their technical research manuals (Berichten des General-Luftzeugmeinster). Orders were given to Dr. Zippermayr to incorporate the torpedo principles in developing a jet-propelled aircraft capable of extremely high speed.

The first aircraft was to be a high-speed fighter. But, at the same time experiments were to be conducted to determine the value of the new design in the construction of gigantic, high-speed airliners. These plans were said to have been successful as far as they were able to progress before Germany's defeat.

The first step was to build a model glider, complete with instruments to register flying and diving qualities of the aircraft. This model would be released from a tow line at high altitude. The results of these experiments were then used in the construction of the first full-scale glider model. It was during the construction of this full-sized model, about three-fourths complete, that the war ended and construction stopped. At least for a time the model was stored at the Hagen carpenter shop in Lofer.

After flight tests of the full-scale model were completed, work was to begin on a jet-propelled prototype. The Army report states: "Dr. Porche, located at Schuttgut near Zell-am-See had already been assigned the task of supplying the jet-units." Yes, this is the same Dr Porsche whose cars we all know and love.

The Zippermayr wing design had two advantages over contemporary wing design. The first was tremendous speed. Even as the Army wrote up their findings, in July of 1945, two years before the sound barrier would be officially broken, there was already discussion in the report of this wing design going supersonic. The reason these wings were credited with "speed" is that they offered considerably less resistance, drag, to the atmosphere than wings in current usage. In other words, this type of wing was more efficient at high speed.

The second advantage bestowed by this wing design is stability. The stability was especially apparent on the transverse axis, which made the aircraft easy to control. The torpedo prototype flew without any automatic steering device and, even at speeds of 80 to 200 meters per second, was perfectly stable. At an incidence angle of 52 degrees the torpedo showed no tendency to stall nor were their any irregularities in the flight direction. It was also claimed that the wing loading was much less than for conventional wing types.

In engineering, there are always trade-offs. The big disadvantage, although not ever mentioned in the government reports. This would certainly be that takeoffs would be more difficult. Short takeoffs are usually associated with large, straight wings. As we know, the double-decker wings of World War One aircraft are sometimes used, even today, for jobs requiring slow speed and reliability such as crop dusters.

The Germans invented just about every wing type that exists.

Swept wings, both front and back, delta wings and swing wings were all invented by the Germans at this time. The German aircraft makers all shared information during the war. They simply had to do this. Many times aircraft designed by one company were actually built by another firm during the war. This was done to more efficiently utilize resources. Messerschmitt was on-site at Lofer. It is to be expected that knowledge of the Zippermayr wing design was disseminated throughout the German aircraft industry on some level. Therefore, it is not surprising if another attempt was made to utilize the advantages of the Zippermayr design while minimizing the disadvantage.

The design in question is the Blohm & Voss P.203. This wing design is called a scissor wing. At takeoff the wing assumes its customary position, at right angles to the fuselage. After takeoff, when high speed is desired, the wing is rotated from the standard position to a position almost parallelling the fuselage. At high speed, this position would still provide enough lift for flight yet the atmospheric drag would be greatly reduced as in the Zippermayr design. As the drawing shows, the wing is affixed on top of the fuselage as in the Zippermayr design. The scissor wing design would combine the virtues of a standard wing, for takeoff and low speed efficiency, with the reduced wind resistance of the Zippermayr design for high-speed performance. The government documents do not make this connection, nor does any known literature to date, but the similarity of the two designs begs for comparison and possible connection.

The scissor wing has remained on the drawing board in spite of its apparent advantages. Every so often mention of this design or a picture of a futuristic aircraft with scissor wings appears on the cover of a magazine.

SOURCES

1. Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee Evaluation Report 201, 7/23/45, Report On Talstation, Lofer, Target Nos. C-4/222 and C-1/667, obtained through Department Of The Army, Fort George G. Meade, MD. 20755-5995

2. Counter Intelligence Corps, Salzburg Detachment, United States Forces Austria, Zell am See Section, 8/4/45, Case Nol S/Z/55, Zippermayr Mario Dr. Ing., obtained through Department Of The Army, Fort George G. Meade, MD. 20755-5995

3. Headquarters Seventh Army, C.I.C. Detachment, 5/16/45, Dr. Zippermayer, (Stabsingenieur) Kreis Zell Am See, Lofer, obtained through Department Of The Army Fort George G. Meade, MD. 20755-5995

4. Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee Evaluation Report 201, 7/23/45, Report On Talsation, Lofer, Target Nos. C-4/222 and C-1/667, (Expanded Version), obtained through Department Of The Army, Fort George G. Meade, MD. 20755-5995

5. Conference of CWS Officials with Ing. Mario Zippermayer, Regraded Unclassified, 7/13/99 by USAINSCOM FOI/PA, obtained through Department Of The Army, Fort George G. Meade, MD. 20755-5995

18 Supermetals

There are reports of super metals being produced by the Germans during the Second World War. There are probably multiple origins of these rumors and perhaps multiple metals or metal alloys involved.

In 1960 Michael X., later writing under the name Michael X. Barton, described a metal called "Impervium" which was allegedly used by the Germans in construction of field propulsion flying discs. Barton's German informant describes an experience from wartime Germany:

"In Schramberg, South Bavaria, I had a friend who's father was a renowned Metallurgy scientist. He experimented with the chemistry of metals. There is little doubt but that he was one of the world's most brilliant minds, for it was this same scientist who invented a metal harder than diamonds. In 1935-36 the Nazis put this amazing metal—we shall call it IMPERVIUM—to use for the first time in airplanes of the German Air Force.

I recall visiting his fantastic laboratories under a luxurious house at Lake Schramberg. He allowed me to see how the metal glowed with a red-blue florescence when heated to a high degree.

One year later (in the 1940's) I met this scientist and his daughter again, this time at the Polish Embassy. The daughter told me that her father had been called for an audience with Hitler that very night. The scientist's consultation with Hitler concerned secret plans for an OVAL or 'ELLIPSE-SHAPED' aircraft".[1]

The author goes on to state that the source of power for this oval aircraft was "electro-magnetism" or "electrified propulsion system"[2]. The quotation stated "to use for the first time in airplanes of the German Air Force", so might this metal have appeared in other aircraft? According to another source, Wilhelm Landig, it did.[3] Curiously enough, the word "Impervium" is today the registered trademark of a company called Northwest Research Institute, Inc. and can be found on the internet at:

www.carbideprocessors.com/Knives/Impervium.htm

Their Impervium may not be quite the Impervium described above but there are similarities. This commercial Impervium is twice as hard as stainless steel. It is a stainless steel like alloy of 65% iron as well as Nickel and chromium for carbide formation. It also contains about 10% manganese and about 10% carbon. Then something interesting is described:

"As a final step a gas is introduced as final alloying agent".

This gas is evidently not oxygen since the carbon content has already been fixed by the manufacture and introduction of oxygen is done for this purpose. What was the gas and why was it not named? Maybe we will find out.

At this same website another commercial metal alloy is described in the discussion of Impervium. It is called "Lubricium" and it is described as Impervium that has been "cold reduced". The description of cold reduction is a forging process in which a piece of Impervium is beaten long and hard enough to re-arrange the crystalline structure of the metal, packing the molecules tighter together.

As with Impervium only part of the story is being told and these two metals, while probably very tough, constitute only partial steps of the original German research.

Wilhelm Landig wrote three novels. These novels, he claimed, were based upon reality and we are given to understand in the text of his work that the technology he describes was real or at least under development during World War Two. The fictional aspect of his work seems to be the characters by which this technology is explained. After Landig's death in 1997, it was made public that he was a member of the SS during the war and it was his job to guard German flying discs near Prague.

Landig wrote of other aircraft and weapon's systems besides flying discs. One description involved a peculiar aircraft, a prototype, flown out of Norway called the "Dosthra". This aircraft resembled a giant insect. It was a mid-wing monoplane with a five-cornered fuselage, viewed in cross-section. It was thicker in the front than the rear. The front end of the fuselage was made of glass, giving it the insect-look. The wing-span of the aircraft was about 135 feet, so it was about the size of a B-29. The Dosthra was designed for rough, outlying airfields with tow landing wheels being an incredible four meters in diameter. It's four radial Argus engines each dove a four bladed propeller. A fifth high-altitude engine was positioned in the rear of the aircraft. One the tips of the wings were mounted jet engines as in the B-36, which additionally, could be used for steering. The wings were of a slotted construction, possibly suction wings, whose area was considered small in proportion to the size of the aircraft. The tail section slanted backwards. Top speed for this aircraft was given at 830 kilometers per hour or almost 515 miles per hour. Its range was given at 22,000 kilometers or 13,640 miles. Enough range to be a threat to the American mainland. Its crew consisted of five to seven people. The mission of the Dosthra remains unclear. The most curious thing about this aircraft was that it was armed with a weapon called "Metalstrahl".

Metalstrahl was a type of rail gun that used magnetic forces to attract and repel steel bullets and launch them at tremendous velocity[4]. Whether or not a rail gun was actually mounted in this aircraft or not, it is a fact that such a weapon was under development by the Germans in this time frame[5].

Returning to our discussion of super metals, the other curious thing about this aircraft was that it was said to be made of a special metal. This metal, according to Landig, was made by compression at 400,000 atmospheres of pressure. It is said to have had the highest possible tensile strength and functioned on the Dosthra as a protective armor[6].

This is all good and well if we are talking about "rumors" of super metals, but what actual evidence is there that the Germans managed to realized this technology? There is some evidence coming from government sources, one Allied and one Axis.

As soon as the smoke had cleared off the battle ground, elite teams of Allied scientists began combing Germany and Austria for advanced technology which could be used against the remaining enemy, Japan. These teams of scientists, going by various names, compiled their findings in a series or reports, actually several series of reports. One of these series of reports was the British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee reports (BIOS). In report number 142, a German advance in metallurgy is described which seems to have baffled the British scientists of the times.

The reason this is said is that one of the German informants, upon with the British relied for information, is simultaneously given credence and then discredited. The BIOS report says of their informant, Josef Ernst:

"In the course of interrogation it became clear, that Ernst was not at all reliable, and though there may in some cases be a factual basis for some of his claims, they are as a whole inaccurate and of doubtful value"[7].

This is a pattern seen over and over again in Allied intelligence reports. The question is: Why use information from a source that is unreliable? Why would these scientists report information to their superiors that they themselves believe is wrong or inaccurate? The answer is that they are covering themselves either way. If the information is correct, then they were the first to report it and are to be commended. If it is false, they are on record having warned all those concerned against this information.

The underlying truth about this and other such attempts of Allied scientists to have it both ways in their reports is that these interviewing Allied scientists "didn't have a clue" if the information is accurate or not and are just covering their butts.

Ernst claimed the Germans had developed a method to harden steel and aluminum beyond any means yet developed. He claimed this involved a process of nitrogen bonding to the surface of these metals. The report says:

"Ernst claimed to have worked for many years on nitrid-ing processes, and to have evolved a method of hardening steels and aluminum alloys. Ernst had been in contact with a Prof. Dr. Thalhofer of the Technische Hochschule, Karlsruhe, who had carried out trials for the army, at Wamberg, Czechoslovakia, and is probably the real inventor of these processes. The method for the hardening of steels, which is claimed to produce a nitride coating up to 0.5 cm. thick with a hardness of up to 1,800 Vickers, is as follows. The steel is heated to 600 degrees C and quenched in 30% aluminum sulphate solution, which etches the surface. When cold the steel is packed in powdered charcoal and heated to 750 degrees C, and on reaching temperature is removed from the charcoal and quenched in a 15% sodium nitrite solution at 35 degrees C. The method is good for drills, and silicon steels."[8]

Ernst goes on to say that all the equipment for operating this process is at the house of Baroness Mangold, at Silcherof, near Weilheim, near Munich. Remember that the site for the Impervium research is also said to be in Bavaria and one wonders if the two reports are possibly describing the same research.

In doing research for this chapter, I spoke on the telephone with a chemical engineer, John Ritzenthaler, who deals with metal surfaces. He told me that this process was carbo-nitriding. Aluminum impurities in the steel react with nitrogen and bond. Carbon is then added as in making steel. The process is called case hardening.

On another occasion, I called a large defense contractor, TRW, and spoke with a metallurgist about German developments in metals during the war. I asked him:

"What about all those super-metals the Germans were supposed to have developed?"

To this sort of open-ended leading question the metallurgist replied that:

"It is true. The Germans developed all sorts of alloys during the war. After the war we took them—some of them were great—we took one and gave it a TRW number, and still market it today—we didn't want to give the Germans credit though".

TRW assigned a "TRW number" to its commercial metals for purposes of designation and marketing.

There is more. Norbert Juergen-Ratthofer describes a method of propulsion based upon a super-cooled, fuel such as liquid helium, injected directly into the combustion chamber of a motor at which time it expands tremendously. The connection to metallurgy is that this same super-cooling, high compression process, needed to utilize this fuel can be employed upon metal to make it super-hard. This is reminiscent of the high-pressure technique described by Landig in describing the compressed metal skin of the Dosthra. This process, according to Juegen-Ratthofer, is based on the German patent of inventor Karl Nowak.[9]

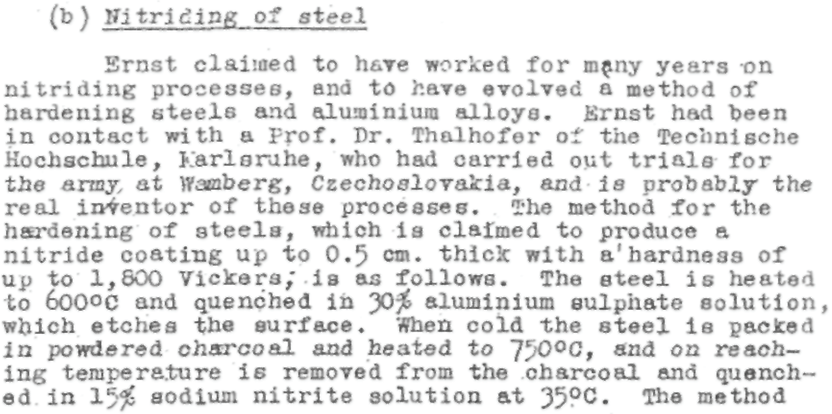
According to Karl Nowak's 1954 German patent, patent number 905847, Class 12g, Group 101, by a process of extreme cooling coupled with pressure, the basic atomic structure of material can be changed. It is reduced, narrowed and confined in terms of atomic, crystalline structure. Nowak's idea was to re-heat this substance in a combustion chamber and reap the rewards of an instantaneous, explosive expansion. The question remains if it is possible to apply this technology toward the hardening of metals. Admittedly, at first the idea of compression cooling as a means to change atomic structure sounds a lot like junk science.

At this point Dr. Gordon Freeman weighs in with some remarkable scientific insight. According to Dr. Freeman, an elements behavior is determined by its arrangement of electrons orbiting the nucleus of that elemental atom. Seven electron shells are present around the core. Under high pressure electrons are shifted to lower orbits and new orbital overlappings are formed. This changes the whole behavior of the element concerning color, boiling temperature, density and so forth.[10]

The trick seems to be to cool and compress the material and then gradually release the pressure. The material will retain its new properties at least for several months.

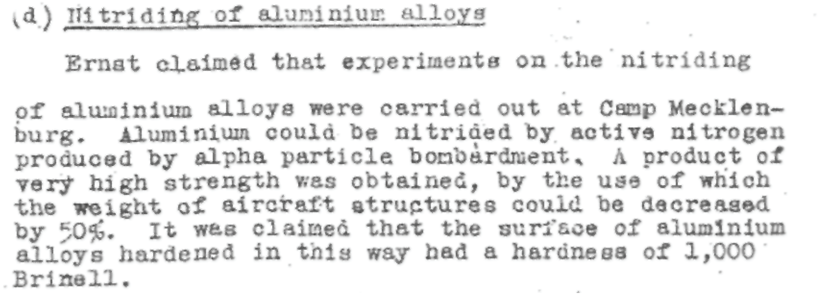
Dr. Freeman points to a neutron star as an example. A star burns out and turns cold in intergalactic space. "Cold" is very cold, meaning at or near absolute zero. As it burns out it collapses, putting the remaining cold material under unbelievable pressure. Imagine hydrogen, composed of one electron and one proton, as an example. Pressure becomes so great that the electrons are pressed into the core of the atom, that is, pressed into the core of the proton. A new neutron is formed through this process. Repeated billions and trillions of times, a new material and a new type of star is thus formed which is a cold, dark neutron star. This is the most dense and strongest of metals.

A question remains as to if there were whole classes of metals or



(b) Nitriding of steel

Ernst claimed to have worked for many years on nitriding processes, and to have evolved a method of hardening steels and aluminium alloys. Ernst had been in contact with a Prof. Dr. Thalhofer of the Technische Hochschule, Karlsruhe, who had carried out trials for the army at Wamberg, Czechoslovakia, and is probably the real inventor of these processes. The method for the hardening of steels, which is claimed to produce a nitride coating up to 0.5 cm. thick with a hardness of up to 1,800 Vickers, is as follows. The steel is heated to 600°C and quenched in 30% aluminium sulphate solution, which etches the surface. When cold the steel is packed in powdered charcoal and heated to 750°C, and on reaching temperature is removed from the charcoal and quenched in 15% sodium nitrite solution at 35°C. The method



(d) Nitriding of aluminium alloys

Ernst claimed that experiments on the nitriding of aluminium alloys were carried out at Camp Mecklenburg. Aluminium could be nitrided by active nitrogen produced by alpha particle bombardment. A product of very high strength was obtained, by the use of which the weight of aircraft structures could be decreased by 50%. It was claimed that the surface of aluminium alloys hardened in this way had a hardness of 1,000 Brinell.

Super Metals - British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 142.

Top: the hardening of steel through nitriding. This is a chemical process.

Bottom: Aluminium was hardened through bombardment by alpha particles. Alpha particles are similar to nitrogen atoms so the two processes, one chemical the other using irradiation, had similarities. Both are examples of densification technology. Former SS man Wilhelm Landig describes a prototype aircraft built with this super-hardened aluminium in his novel "Goetzen gegen Thule". Was this one of the "realities" he said his novel contained?

other metals whose final step in manufacture is the introduction of nitrogen for purposes of super-hardening? Could other more exotic processes have been involved in nitriding such metals as Michael X. describes? Ernst answers the question in the same Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report.

Ernst claims that aluminum was nitrided, strengthened and hardened to the degree that a 50% weight reduction could be achieved in aircraft using this metal. But the most amazing claim Ernst makes is the method for the nitriding process itself. Ernst claims that to achieve this the metal was subject to alpha particle bombardment. Alpha particles are positively charge particles emitted from a nucleus and composed to two protons and two neutrons. This makes an alpha particle identical with the nucleus of a helium atom.

The generation of alpha particles would require special equipment and the presence or absence of this equipment could be considered a test of the veracity of Ernst's testimony. To the best of my knowledge, the minimum piece of equipment required to generate alpha particles is a cyclotron. A search was made and a record for cyclotron research in Nazi Germany was found with no less than the Siemens firm[11].

One can only imagine a cyclotron bombarding the subject metal to be strengthened in some strange underground lab at Camp Mecklenburg, as Ernst describes. It may sound like weird science but it is exactly this sort of Nazi atomic alchemy that we have encountered before and will encounter again. The description of the atomic nitriding of aluminum is beginning to resemble the original words of Michael X. and one cannot help but wonder at the validity of the real Impervium as he describes.

SOURCES

1. X, Michael (Michael X. Barton), 1960, We Want You Is Hitler Alive?, page 17, Futura Press, Reprinted 1969 by Saucerian Books

2. ibid

3. Landig, Wilhelm, 1971, Goetzen Gegen Thule, page 185, Hans Pfeiffer Verlag GmbH, Hannover

4. ibid

5. Lusar, Rudolf, 1960, German Secret Weapons of the Second World War, page 160, Neville Spearman, London

6. Landig, Wilhelm, 1971, Goetzen Gegen Thule, page 185. Hans Pfeiffer Verlag GmbH, Hannover

7. British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 142, page 6,7,32 Bryanston Square, London

8. ibid

9. Nowak, Karl, 1954, German Patent, Patent number 905847, Klasse 12g, Gruppe 101, page 1,

10. Personal communication to the author, 12/19/02

11. Coil Research Laboratory Siemens Halske Berlin, File Number 6824 DIC/MIS/NOI-533, March 14, 1945, (interrogation of Paul Mehler), Reference Number 0136094

19 N-Stoff

Shortly after the end of the war in Europe, Allied Intelligence interrogated the former Reich Minister of Armaments, Albert Speer. Speer was an architect who got lucky. Somehow, he became a personal friend to Adolf Hitler and rose in prominence within the Third Reich as the war fortunes of Germany rose. Eventually, he became Reich Minister of Armaments. In this position he coordinated the war industry of Germany. In his interrogation we have the transcript of the answers Speer gave but, unfortunately, not the questions[1]. From his answers, of course, we can deduce the questions in a general sort of way.

From the answers given, we know that the questions centered around the highest technology Germany possessed and its most powerful weaponry. The Allied interrogators prepared for this interview as if they were dealing with a media celebrity. This interrogation is to the point and pointed, as if there time constraints involved, not as if the prisoner is simply languishing in prison. Implicit in the questioning is the understanding that they, the Allied interrogators, are talking to "the man", the one most knowledgeable about these things and the person in overall control of these projects. We now know that this time had long passed for Speer. He had lost position and power to other agencies within Germany during the wane of the Third Reich. Principally, Speer's loss was General Hans Kammler's gain. Speer's answers reflect this "loss" in that there are some projects that were given code-names by the interrogators, for which Speer knows little or nothing at all.

In the third paragraph of the interview, labeled "3.", Speer apparently strays from the point of the question and provides us with a clue to something totally unknown, even today. It reads:

"3. Questioned on chemical warfare, SPEER said at once that Dr. AMEROS of I.G. Fraben LUDWIGSHAFEN was entirely responsible both for development and production and the sonderausshuss of K-Stoff was virtually the I.G. he mentioned in this connection a new substance known as N-Stoff, which was the only one developed and made not by I.G. Farben but by HWAmt at FALKEN-HAGEN; he was not sure of the exact purpose of this material-it was not real war gas, but he thought it could "burn without oxygen"."

The Germans had code words for some chemical concoctions. There was C-Stoff and T-Stoff, for instance, which were complicated formulas for rocket fuel. Rather than recite or write out a long chemical formula, a codeword such as T-Stoff could be employed and be understood. N-Stoff was, then, a chemical formula rather than a codename for an element. Because of the "N", nitrogen might come to mind but this is not the case since the German word for nitrogen doesn't begin with an "n" and in fact is called "Stickstoff".

What was this N-Stoff that was so secret that even Albert Speer was unclear about it?

There is a clue. It seems the N-Stoff was to be used as the explosive warhead of both the V-1 and V-2[2]. It was a completely new type of explosive. At first, it was being developed by the German Army but the Wehrmacht's progress was deemed too slow by Hitler, so he gave it to a more reliable institution in his mind, the SS[3]. This technological transfer to the SS is the reason Speer seemed so vague about N-Stoff, it had simply escaped his purview and had fallen into the hands of Dr. Hans Kammler.

The development of N-Stoff seems to have gotten quite far along. A test of N-Stoff was actually done[4]. A fifteen-centimeter grenade of N-Stoff burnt a circumference to a distance of 800-1000 meters. Imagine a ton of this explosive in a V-1 or V-2.

This may have actually happened, because during the V-1 and V-2 attacks on London during October to November, 1944, there were extremely strong fires reported as a result of a few of these attacks which was never clarified[4].

According the Freidrich Georg, upon whom we are relying for much of this information, N-Stoff was composed of Chlorine and Fluorine and other substances[5]. This is about all we have on N-Stoff, just enough to perk the curiosity. N-Stoff has always been and remains one of those unsolved mysteries of the Second World War.

SOURCES

1. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report, Evaluation Report 53(b), June 18, 1945, page one

2. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 2: Star Wars 1947 Teil A: Von der V-1 bis zur A-9: unkonventionelle Kurz-und Mittelstreckenwaffen, pages 77 and 113, Amun-Verlag, Schleusingen

3. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, page 77

4. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, ibid

5. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, page 113

20 Nipolit

Nipolit is another one of the mysterious explosives developed by the Germans during the war. Friedrich Georg describes nipolit as a "Sprengbaustoffen" or an explosive construction material[1]. It can immediately be appreciated that a construction material which itself is an explosive would have tremendous use in a military situation. Imagine, for example, a retreating army making bridges or even roads out of this material, which could be utilized as if it were concrete, yet detonated as the enemy approached or even detonated, as the enemy used it.

Planners at the time had another application. They wanted to form a whole nose cone out of nipolit and mount it atop a V-2 rocket[2]. This V-2 would not just be any rocket, it was to be the first V-2 using a nuclear-powered rocket engine. In this technique, an atomic reactor would be placed where the combustion chamber normally was located and through it or around it would be pumped a liquid gas such as hydrogen, for instance. The liquid hydrogen would cool the reactor but the intense heat would cause the liquid hydrogen not only to vaporize but to ionize. Without an oxidizer, the hydrogen would not burn in the normal sense, but would expand at an even greater rate and be ejected at rear of the rocket, providing thrust.

The nipolit nose cone would have the structural strength to remain intact until impact, presumably without the need of detonating equipment. The effect of this weapon would be further enhanced as radioactive uranium was scattered by the exploding nipolit giving it some of the value of a "dirty bomb".

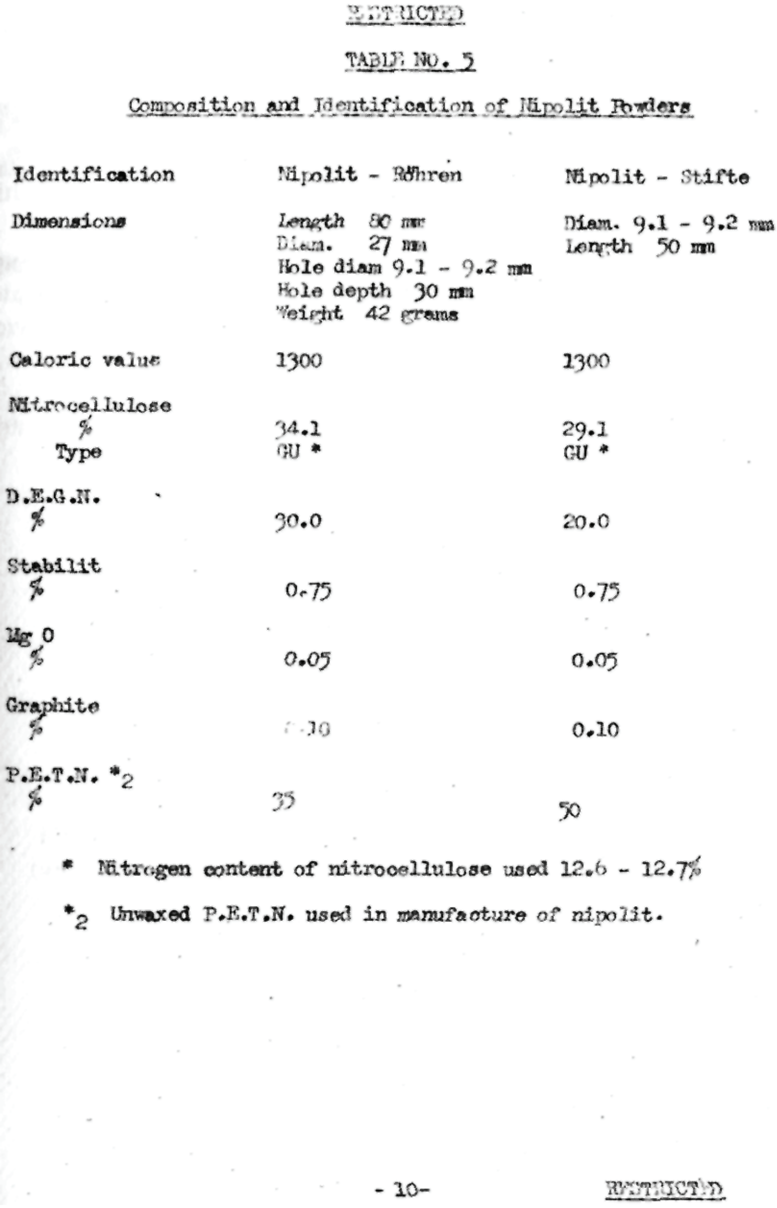


TABLE NO. 5

Composition and Identification of Nipolit Powders

Identification	Nipolit - Röhren	Nipolit - Stifte
Dimensions	Length 80 mm Diam. 27 mm Hole diam 9.1 - 9.2 mm Hole depth 30 mm Weight 42 grams	Diam. 9.1 - 9.2 mm Length 50 mm
Caloric value	1300	1300
Nitrocellulose % Type	 34.1 GU *	 29.1 GU *
D.E.G.N. %	30.0	20.0
Stabilit %	0.75	0.75
Mg O %	0.05	0.05
Graphite %	0.10	0.10
P.E.T.N. *2 %	35	50

* Nitrogen content of nitrocellulose used 12.6 - 12.7%

*2 Unwaxed P.E.T.N. used in manufacture of nipolit.

Nipolit as described in a CIOS report by the U.S. government.

Confirmation of the reality of nipolit comes from the Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report, on the subject titled: Manufacture Of Solventless Type Smokeless Powder & Nipolit Kraiburg Works, Deutsche Sprengchemie

G.M.B.H. The plant in question was visited by Allied investigators just after the war and nipolit is described in their report[3].

They state it was an explosive and the only explosive make at this particular facility. The other job of Kraiburg plant was to make solventless, smokeless powder for various types of guns. To make these various powders nitrocellulose, nitroglycerin, diglycodinitrate and a mysterious substance, PETN, were used. PETN is an abbreviation. Only nipolit contained PETN in its formula and PETN is nowhere defined.

A table showing the other contents of nipolit as well as the mysterious PETN indicates that it was formed into tubes (Roehren) and spikes (Stifte) which seems to confirm that nipolit was something other than just an explosive powder.

SOURCES

1. Georg, Freidrich, 2003, page 90, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 2: Star Wars 1947 Teil A: Von der V-1 bis zur A-9: unkonventionelle Kurz-und Mittelstreckenwaffen, Amun-Verlag, Schleusingen

2. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, page 131

3. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report, Item #2, File #XXV11-72, Manufacture Of Solventless Type Smokeless Powder & Nipolit Kraiburg Works, Deutsche Sprengchemie G.M.B.H., G-2 Division, SHAEF (rear) APO 413, October, 1945

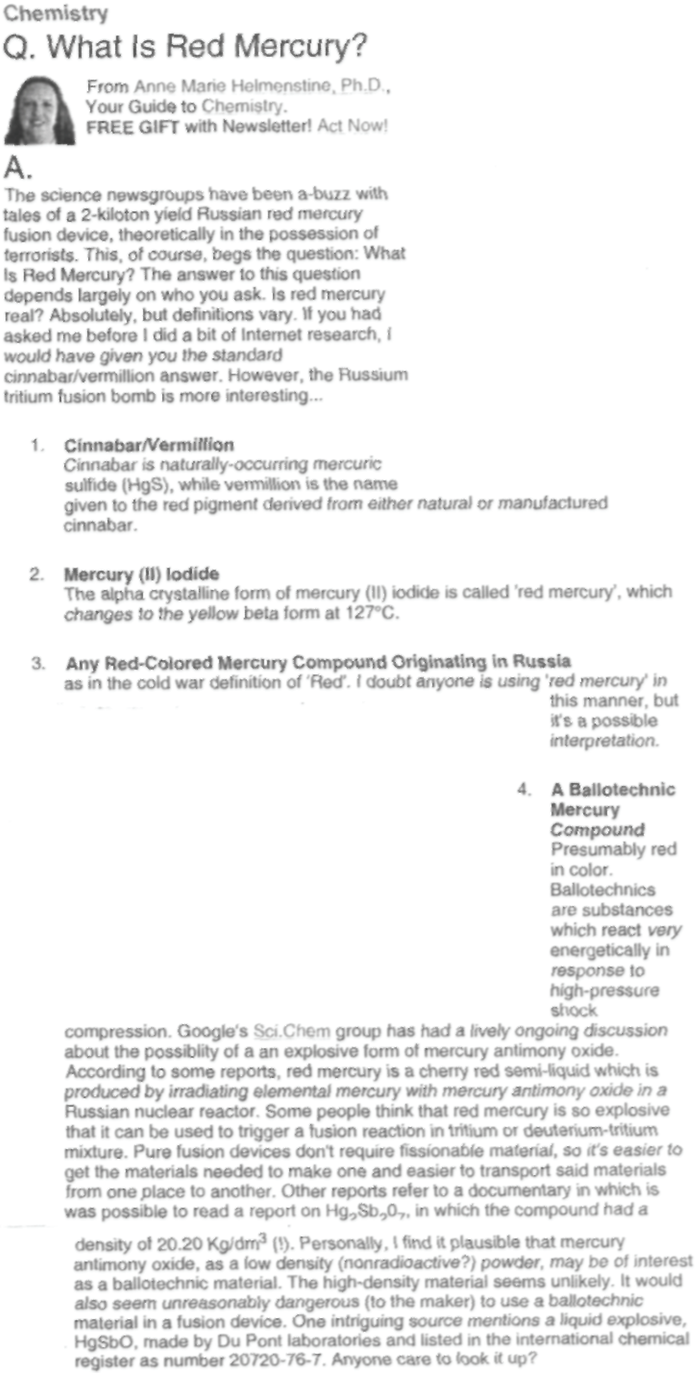
21 Red Mercury

Did the Germans invent red mercury during the war? I have found no records stating that they absolutely did do so but the discussion of red mercury is so closely linked to that of increasing the density of metals, Karl Nowak, and atomic research and methods of making plutonium that mention should be made of the possibility.

What in the world is red mercury? Firstly, it should be said that the U.S. government calls red mercury a hoax and with that denunciation, the discussion of red mercury has been thrown into the realm of the rumor-mill in the United States. The Soviets are said to have invented red mercury, according to the rumor mill, in about 1968. With the fall of the Soviet Union, quantities of red mercury were said to have appeared on the black market. Agents of numerous countries have been trying to buy red mercury from Soviet sources. Other countries may have conjured up their own supply of red mercury, once its existence and samples were made known.

Red mercury is a compound of mercury, antimony and oxygen having the chemical formula of Hg2SB207[1]. At room temperature and pressure it is a powder. It is red in color. But it seems that there is more to red mercury is not a simple chemical combination.

Legend has it that once chemically concocted; red mercury is put into a nuclear reactor for a period of time in order to charge up. During this charging up process while undergoing neutron bombardment in the reactor, the red mercury powder changes into



Chemistry

Q. What Is Red Mercury?

From Anne Marie Helmenstine, Ph.D.,
Your Guide to Chemistry.
FREE GIFT with Newsletter! Act Now!

A.

The science newsgroups have been a-buzz with tales of a 2-kiloton yield Russian red mercury fusion device, theoretically in the possession of terrorists. This, of course, begs the question: What Is Red Mercury? The answer to this question depends largely on who you ask. Is red mercury real? Absolutely, but definitions vary. If you had asked me before I did a bit of Internet research, I would have given you the standard cinnabar/vermillion answer. However, the Russium tritium fusion bomb is more interesting...

1. Cinnabar/Vermillion
   Cinnabar is naturally-occurring mercuric sulfide (HgS), while vermillion is the name given to the red pigment derived from either natural or manufactured cinnabar.

2. Mercury (II) Iodide
   The alpha crystalline form of mercury (II) iodide is called 'red mercury', which changes to the yellow beta form at 127°C.

3. Any Red-Colored Mercury Compound Originating in Russia
   as in the cold war definition of 'Red'. I doubt anyone is using 'red mercury' in this manner, but it's a possible interpretation.

4. A Ballotechnic Mercury Compound
   Presumably red in color. Ballotechnics are substances which react very energetically in response to high-pressure shock compression. Google's Sci.Chem group has had a lively ongoing discussion about the possiblity of a an explosive form of mercury antimony oxide. According to some reports, red mercury is a cherry red semi-liquid which is produced by irradiating elemental mercury with mercury antimony oxide in a Russian nuclear reactor. Some people think that red mercury is so explosive that it can be used to trigger a fusion reaction in tritium or deuterium-tritium mixture. Pure fusion devices don't require fissionable material, so it's easier to get the materials needed to make one and easier to transport said materials from one place to another. Other reports refer to a documentary in which is was possible to read a report on $Hg_2Sb_20_7$, in which the compound had a density of 20.20 Kg/dm^3 (!). Personally, I find it plausible that mercury antimony oxide, as a low density (nonradioactive?) powder, may be of interest as a ballotechnic material. The high-density material seems unlikely. It would also seem unreasonably dangerous (to the maker) to use a ballotechnic material in a fusion device. One intriguing source mentions a liquid explosive, HgSbO, made by Du Pont laboratories and listed in the international chemical register as number 20720-76-7. Anyone care to look it up?

An internet article in which Dr. Anne Marie Helmenstine defines red mercury.

a thick liquid[2]. The charged liquid only has a life of about three months[3], so it must be used within this period of time for it to express its special properties.

Putting material into a reactor to try to change it may seem rather strange. In fact, this is exactly the method used to make plutonium. Uranium 238 is placed into a reactor and irradiated, absorbing neutrons until it finally changes into another element, plutonium. The Germans used this method and made plutonium[4]. Putting things and substances into a reactor in order to change them is a sort of modern alchemy. There have always been rumors of attempts to make gold by the Germans using this method, which is possible but expensive to do using enrichment methods. Following this line of thought, is it is no wonder that these early German nuclear alchemists would think to introduce mercury, a heavy, liquid electric conductor into a reactor for experimentation. If later compounds of mercury were introduced, it should be no surprise.

What is really going on here is that the red mercury put into the reactor is being made denser. The idea is similar to that of Karl Nowak, which is that an attempt is being made to reduce the space between the atoms and so causing the metal, or in this case, a compound, to become more dense. In this irradiation method it is not being done by cooling the existing material but by bombarding it with neutrons, additional material, in a reactor. The red mercury is trapping and retaining neutrons and so becoming denser. Like the Nowak method, the change is only temporary but while it lasts the change causes the compound to have special properties besides being mildly radioactive.

These special properties are numerous and truly unique. Red mercury is said to be able to detonate small nuclear bombs, "mini-nukes". Red mercury is said to burn with very great intensity making it an explosive in its own right[5]. It is also said to be used in the manufacture of semiconductors[6], the production of electricity[7], the production of coatings for military equipment to avoid radar detection[8], and, because of its high-energy explosive content, it is used as a rocket propellant[9].

Of course the main concern here is the use of red mercury for the production of very small nuclear bombs and the use of red mercury for the manufacture of a completely new type of very small nuclear bomb. The historical reason for the concern with mini-nukes is that

Ballotechnics, Pure Fusion and Nuclear Terrorism

According to Sam Cohen, a new type of non-nuclear explosive is potent enough to light off a nuclear fusion reaction between deuterium and tritium. In the usual H-bomb, a fission bomb is needed as a match to light off the fusion. With the new type of explosive, the fission bomb is unnecessary. As nuclear bombs go, the pure fusion bombs have an extremely low blast, equivalent to 1 ton of TNT: a "pop, not a bang."

But they release a flood of neutrons, lethal within 1/3 mile, causing death "from immediately, till shortly after."

They could be made by several countries known to sponsor terrorism, and could be carried in a sandwich bag.

The new type of non-nuclear explosives are called ballotechnic materials. Cohen says that unlike other explosives, they produce no bang, no cloud, keep the same shape while they detonate, "but Boy!, do they get hot!" Ballotechnics may have already led to very small fission bombs as well as pure fusion.

Cohen identifies the mysterious "red mercury" (of TV documentary fame) as a ballotechnic material. He offers this "recipe:" take mercury-antimony oxide, compress it, and bombard with neutrons. He says it is slightly radioactive, with a half-life of a couple of days.

Cohen says the Russians have built and tested mini-nukes, and that Americans and Russians are cooperating on pure fusion. He says that a Russian bomb was brought to Los Alamos ("by Federal Express" from a Russian plane in Washington) and successfully tested.

Dr. Teller agreed with most of this-including the successful test at Los Alamos-but rejected red mercury as "nonsense," possibly "a pure hoax." Cohen was more impressed with the agreement than the disagreement. As he was leaving the building, I heard him say that from now on, he would "quote Teller word for word," and had ordered tapes of the meeting for that purpose.

The terrorist potential of mini neutron bombs is horrifying. One possibility mentioned by Cohen involved a US State Of The Union address. Mere mention of it provoked the founder of DDP, Howard Maccabee to demand that Cohen stop his presentation!

Ballotechnics' potential for good is also great: it could be a route to practical fusion power.

The first page of an internet article Dr. Sam Cohen (father of the neutron bomb) describes making red mercury through compression of mercury-antimony oxide and bombardment of it by neutrons. This densification is reminiscent of Karl Nowak but done more like Joseph Ernst describes in hardening aluminium. Neutron bombardment can happen inside a nuclear reactor or by the neutron generators made by the C.H.F. Muller, A.G. company.

Red Mercury

The WMD no one wants to "officially" talk about... Its deadly potential cannot be ignored!!!

On Friday, September 24, 2004, British police arrested 4 suspects for allegedly trying to purchase a highly powerful, radioactive material, originally made in Russia, know as' Red Mercury'.

These four supposedly were willing to pay $ 541,000 a kilogram, on behalf of a Saudi Arabian, (described as sympathetic to the Muslim cause), whose name was not disclosed.

"The News of the World said that the material was developed by Soviet scientists during the Cold War for making briefcase nuclear bombs that could kill people within a few city blocks."

Sam Cohen, the physicist who invented the neutron bomb, sheds a little more light on the destructive power of red mercury. As quoted from a June 15, 1997 article by Christopher Ruddy of the Tribune-Review, It states:

'Most frightening for Cohen is the relative ease by which neutron bombs can be created with a substance called red mercury. Red mercury is a compound containing mercury that has undergone irradiation. When exploded, it creates tremendous heat and pressure - the same type needed to trigger a fusion device such as a mini-neutron bomb.

Before, an obstacle to creating a nuclear bomb was the need for plutonium, which when exploded could create a fusion reaction In hydrogen atoms. But red mercury has changed that. The cheap substance has been produced in Russia, Cohen said, and shipped on the black market throughout world.

Cohen said that when UN inspectors went to Iraq to examine the Iraqi's nuclear weapons capabilities the U.N. team found documents showing that they had purchased quantities of red mercury. The material means that a neutron bomb can be built "the size of a baseball" but able to kill everyone within several square blocks."

Another article, "The Balance of Terror and the Red Mercury Nightmare" states that 'Iraq possesses "s-megaton" micro-nuclear warheads. These are softball sized two-megaton fusion bombs triggered by an irradiated and compressed compound of mercury antimony oxide. This device doubles the nuclear yield with a hundredfold reduction in weight. Using heavy hydrogen instead of uranium or plutonium to fuel its explosive reaction, this handheld nuclear weapon cannot be detected by U.S. sensors.'

Red Mercury...The CIA says that it does not exist, yet terrorist organizations worldwide are willing to pay outrageous amounts of money to procure it...Scientists have alluded that nuclear weapons containing red mercury, can enter the United States, UNDETECTED, be placed in cities all across the country, and cause cataclysmic destruction...from a nuclear bomb, of incredible power, the size of a softball...l don't know about you folks, but this REALLY scares me!

Now, what bothers me even more, is that last year, confidential Intelligence sources informed me that a Special Ops unit in Iraq had lost track of about a ton of red mercury. I have not heard anything to the contrary, so I am assuming that it is still missing. How could that happen???

According to the research that I have done and talking to the contacts that I have in the Intelligence community, red mercury not only destroys human life, but kills every living thing in Its path for eternity!!! In other words, where its destructive energy has touched, NOTHING will ever live again, not at least in our lifetime!

Let me go one further, my sources inform me that it would only take a teaspoon of red mercury to kill all living creatures in the Great Lakes.

http://www.homelandsecurityus.net/red_mercury.htm 6/2/2005

In another internet article Dr. Samuel Cohen discusses the real danger of red mercury weapons.

the wartime Germans are known to have mentioned nuclear bombs of a very small size. These bombs were sometimes described as the size of small pumpkins or pineapples[10]. This small size greatly confused the Allied Powers when they heard descriptions of it. This is perfectly understandable considering that atomic weapons were usually thought of as being large, heavy and bulky. The description concerning size compares favorably with the description given for a red mercury bomb which is said to be somewhere between the size of a grapefruit[11] and a soccer ball[12]. The question for us is, could red mercury have been one of the missing components in the Allied assessment of the German atomic bomb?

The Americans are said never to have discovered red mercury (or gotten it through any other means)[13]. But how is this possible? We had Robert Oppenheimer. We had Edward Teller. We even had Albert Einstein. We still have Samuel Cohen, "father of the neutron bomb". These people are geniuses. They are icons of our American scientific culture, whose work proves American superiority in the field of nuclear physics. These worked on the Manhattan Project. They know virtually everything about nuclear weaponry. All these individuals, inspire of their denials, spent their life's energy working hard and actively to produce the most efficient killing machines ever invented by man. Like the German rocket scientists who later went on to put man on the moon[14], the American nuclear scientists mentioned above worked, first and foremost, feverishly for the express purpose of killing untold multitudes of people they considered their enemies.

So why, with all this effort and with the financial backing of the government, did the Americans not discover red mercury? Perhaps it is because the role of American discovery in the field of nuclear weaponry has been great exaggerated. This is a theme taken up by many modern European researchers, some cited here and elsewhere in this book. I do not want to open this discussion here, only to mention that this is a possibility.

If the Soviets gained this technology through a German source, then this secret was one of the best-kept secrets of all time, lasting for almost fifty years. The initial secret involved here can be explained by what I call the "Vesco Principle". In Renato Vesco's paradigm, if any one former Allied Power recovered a particular technology and the other three Allied Powers did not recover it, that technology remained secret, perhaps until this very day. He states:

> "In fact, of the numerous revolutionary "new weapons" that the Germans developed in that period, we know only those— fortunately they comprise the majority— that fell into the hands of all, or at least more than one, of the four occupying powers."[15]

So if more than one former Allied country recovered a particular weapon of whole technology, then the secret was out and everybody openly discussed it. But if only own former Allied Power managed to get a particular technology, it guarded that secret very, very closely. How it was possible to keep this secret for so long will be discussed at the end of this chapter.

The Germans had nuclear research facilities spread across Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and portions of modern-day Poland. They were looking for breakthroughs and were willing to try most anything. As we will see in a later chapter, in one of these facilities, "Der Riese" in what is now Poland, there were descriptions of a "metallic liquid, mercury-like substance, violet in colour" being used in experiments there[16]. Red mercury can sometimes be violet in color but what is even more important in this description is its state of matter. It is described as a liquid. Dr. Gordon Freeman, in personal communication to me dated December 18, 2002, stated that under normal atmospheric conditions, all mercury compounds are solid.

By this he means all the known compounds of mercury are solids. The rumor of red mercury is the only compound of mercury ever said to be a liquid. This leaves little doubt in my mind but that the enigmatic violet fluid, in the midst of a wartime German nuclear research facility, was, in fact, red mercury.

One reason why it may have been possible for the Germans to make this breakthrough while the Americans did not is because the Germans and the Americans were working with two different schools of physics in mind. Igor Witkowski, modern-day expert on "Der Riese" and secret German research is quoted by Nick Cook:

> "The Germans ignored Einstein and developed an approach to gravity based on quantum theory." Don't forget that Einsteinian physics, relativity physics, with its big-picture view of the universe, represented Jewish science to the Nazis. Germany was where quantum mechanics was born. The Germans were looking at gravity from a different perspective to everyone else. Maybe it gave them answers to things the pro-relativity scientists hadn't even thought of".[17]

Many, many German atomic scientists went East at the close of the Second World War, either voluntarily or involuntarily, just as in the case of the German rocket scientists. The Soviets spared no effort and no expense in setting up the captured German scientists in the Russian motherland.

But the Soviets were interested in big nuclear bombs. Soviet long-range rockets reflected in their design that they were intended to carry a large payload in the form of a warhead. This heavy lifting ability put the Soviets ahead of the Americans in the space race and was a direct result of Soviet desires to carry a large megaton payload to the enemy. As you may recall, it was the Soviets who tested the heaviest thermonuclear weapon ever detonated. It was estimated at 50 megatons.

If the German scientists brought knowledge of red mercury with them to Russia, it must have been relegated into the cellar in terms of priorities. It was only with the interest in tactical nuclear weaponry that small atomic bombs resurfaced on the scene.

This brings us to the question of how red mercury technology is said to be able to produce small nuclear weapons. First of all, let us take a look at small nuclear weapons, employing less fissionable material than is normally thought of as being enough to form critical mass. Critical mass is the amount of nuclear fuel necessary to sustain a chain reaction. The actual amount varies with the various nuclear fuel used. The fact is that the large values given for critical mass in the first generation of nuclear weapons has been greatly reduced. Even when discussing "conventional" nuclear devices involving widely known ideas of fission and fusion, a decent discussion of the facts of nuclear weapons miniaturization is hard to come by, at least in the popular press.

One atomic bomb dropped on Japan was made of uranium 235. Approximately 50 kilograms of U-235 (about 10 1/4 pounds) were necessary to constitute critical mass. The chain reaction was started using a neutron gun, which was built into the bomb. Once the gun had split the first atom, the mass of uranium was enough to absorb the "split" neutrons, causing others to split in a chain reaction, resulting in a tremendous release of energy.

In order to reduce the amount of uranium necessary to constitute critical mass, that is, to carry this chain reaction, three things can be done. The bomb can be given "tamper", more neutron reflective ability, and/or be made denser.

The bomb can be made stronger (tamper) which makes it hold together longer, giving the chain reaction more concentration. This is done by using an armored coating around the bomb, which physically makes it stronger for a tiny fraction of a second.

The bomb can be made to reflect more neutrons back toward the focus of the chain reaction instead of going off randomly into space. Special neutron-reflective materials can be used to do this. Beryllium is, for example, one of these materials.

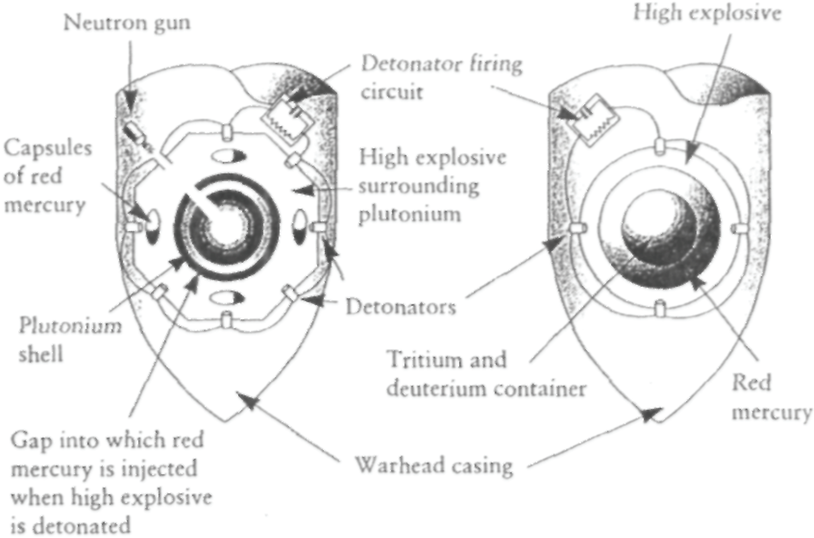
The nuclear fuel itself can be made denser. This is done by surrounding the fissionable material with conventional explosive and detonating it so that the force of the blast focusses the nuclear material inward, on to itself, compressing it. Nuclear scientists sometimes call this "implosion". It is said that Pu-239, used in the Hiroshima bomb must be detonated using the method[18].

Some elements or compounds used for the purposes described above have both the qualities of tamper and neutron reflectability. Some have one or the other. Using these methods the size of atomic weapons have been greatly reduced to the size of large cannon projectiles. The explosive values of these mini-nukes are greatly reduced as compared to the two bombs detonated over Japan.

I promised not to discuss the recent research of the new generation of researchers working on German atomic weaponry but I will say that their interest in mini-nukes is based on German references to their small size and the fact that several detailed, eye-witness accounts of two small nuclear detonations in March of 1945 have been gathered[19].

A fusion bomb is much more powerful than a simple fission bomb. A fusion bomb works by fusing two light nuclei to form a heavier nucleus, which is accompanied by a release of the difference in nuclear binding energy of the products and the sum of the binding energies of the two light nuclei[20]. The materials used for fusion fuel are heavy water (deuterium) and tritium. Tritium is simply lithium which has been placed in a reactor long enough to undergo a transmutation (the same method used to enrich uranium and to make red mercury).

A red mercury based nuclear weapon is a pure study in miniatur-



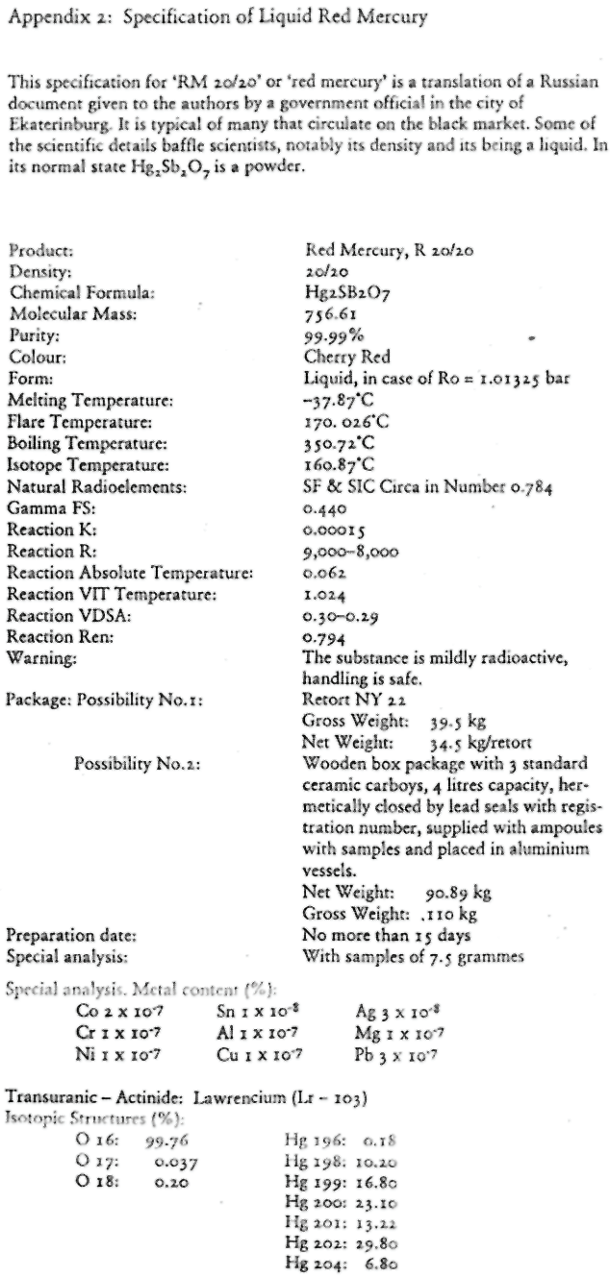
Neutron gun
Detonator firing circuit
High explosive
Capsules of red mercury
High explosive surrounding plutonium
Detonators
Plutonium shell
Tritium and deuterium container
Red mercury
Gap into which red mercury is injected when high explosive is detonated
Warhead casing

The diagrams above illustrate the supposed principles of two types of red mercury nuclear weapon. They were published by International Defense Review in 1994 in an article by the nuclear analyst Dr Frank Barnaby.

On the left is a fission device: an advanced type of atom bomb. Capsules of red mercury are embedded in high explosive surrounding a spherical shell of plutonium. When the explosive is detonated, the red mercury is injected into a gap around the plutonium. It acts as a neutron reflector, increasing the efficiency of the nuclear fission process, and as a tamper, preventing the plutonium from disintegrating too quickly. Neutron rich elements known as actinides (e.g. Californium 252) in the red mercury also give a boost to the fission process, increasing the yield of the bomb for a given quantity of plutonium.

On the right is a pure fusion neutron bomb. An outer layer of high explosive is detonated causing the inner layer of red mercury to release an enormous amount of stored energy. The energy implodes the tritium and deuterium at the centre of the device, producing enough heat to create a fusion reaction and a massive release of high-energy neutrons.

Diagrams of two red mercury weapons from Hounam and McQuillan.



Appendix 2: Specification of Liquid Red Mercury

This specification for 'RM 20/20' or 'red mercury' is a translation of a Russian document given to the authors by a government official in the city of Ekaterinburg. It is typical of many that circulate on the black market. Some of the scientific details baffle scientists, notably its density and its being a liquid. In its normal state $Hg_2Sb_2O_7$ is a powder.

Product:	Red Mercury, R 20/20
Density:	20/20
Chemical Formula:	Hg2SB2O7
Molecular Mass:	756.61
Purity:	99.99%
Colour:	Cherry Red
Form:	Liquid, in case of Ro = 1.01325 bar
Melting Temperature:	−37.87°C
Flare Temperature:	170. 026°C
Boiling Temperature:	350.72°C
Isotope Temperature:	160.87°C
Natural Radioelements:	SF & SIC Circa in Number 0.784
Gamma FS:	0.440
Reaction K:	0.00015
Reaction R:	9,000–8,000
Reaction Absolute Temperature:	0.062
Reaction VIT Temperature:	1.024
Reaction VDSA:	0.30–0.29
Reaction Ren:	0.794
Warning:	The substance is mildly radioactive, handling is safe.
Package: Possibility No.1:	Retort NY 22 Gross Weight: 39.5 kg Net Weight: 34.5 kg/retort
Possibility No.2:	Wooden box package with 3 standard ceramic carboys, 4 litres capacity, hermetically closed by lead seals with registration number, supplied with ampoules with samples and placed in aluminium vessels. Net Weight: 90.89 kg Gross Weight: 110 kg
Preparation date:	No more than 15 days
Special analysis:	With samples of 7.5 grammes

Special analysis. Metal content (%):

Co 2×10^{-7}	Sn 1×10^{-8}	Ag 3×10^{-8}
Cr 1×10^{-7}	Al 1×10^{-7}	Mg 1×10^{-7}
Ni 1×10^{-7}	Cu 1×10^{-7}	Pb 3×10^{-7}

Transuranic – Actinide: Lawrencium (Lr – 103)

Isotopic Structures (%):

O 16:	99.76	Hg 196:	0.18
O 17:	0.037	Hg 198:	10.20
O 18:	0.20	Hg 199:	16.80
		Hg 200:	23.10
		Hg 201:	13.22
		Hg 202:	29.80
		Hg 204:	6.80

Specifications for one type of red mercury from Hounam and McQuillan.

ization. The employment of red mercury increases both the tamper and the neutron reflectability of the bomb. Further, red mercury explodes with such amazing energy that it can be used to surround the fissionable or fusionable material, compressing it to a higher density as it explodes. Red mercury delivers all three necessary qualities of atomic miniaturization.

Red mercury can be used in a fission or fusion bomb. The qualities red mercury brings, especially to the small fusion device, vault it into a class of nuclear weapons all on its own. It is no wonder that the bidding on the Soviet material and its underlying technology became so frantic in the early 1990's[21].

The question for us is not if red mercury, as we have come to know it, was Russian. The question is if red mercury had a German father. Was red mercury actually invented by some alchemist during the Third Reich, working underground in a first generation reactor, desperately searching for a war-winning technology and willing to stop at nothing and to rule nothing out in order to succeed? As we have already seen, the Germans knew of methods to make metals denser. The Germans knew how to turn lithium into tritium and how to enrich uranium 238 into plutonium by putting it into a reactor for a time. Were these ideas tried on other substances? They certainly had a supply of heavy water, deuterium, as there still exist today pictures of heavy water storage tanks from the region of Jonastal[22]. There are reports of small pumpkin or pineapple-sized atomic weapons being under development at that time. The Germans had experimented with, according to the report cited above, mercury compounds, which were liquid and violet in color at a site known as a site of nuclear research. The Soviets gained the services of many of the German nuclear scientists from several different German atomic projects after the war. The Soviets did "discover" red mercury but only after their thirst for truly large nuclear weapons had been slaked. Did they return to the German discoveries when the wanted to develop tactical nuclear weaponry? If this is true, then it is only verified by the "Vesco Principle" which states that if only one former Allied Power gained a particular German technology, as opposed to two or more former Allied Powers having it, then it was kept absolutely secret form the other former Allied Powers.

This scenario would explain the origin and hidden history of red mercury but would not explain why the Americans had no knowledge of this secret until the Soviet Union fell apart. How this secret was kept is a topic, which was promised the reader earlier. With all the Cold War spy vs. spy going on one would think that no important breakthrough or technology could totally escape this spy dragnet. The surprising truth, however, is that secret technologies were kept for decades.

Nothing in the Cold War had higher priority than rocket technology. Yet the Soviets made a huge technological breakthrough in rocket technology in the late 1960s and this breakthrough was kept from the prying eyes of the American spy agencies until after the Cold War ended. Here is what happened.

In the late 1960s the race to the moon was in its final stretch. The Americans were actually in the lead. This lead was based upon the Saturn 5 rocket, the vehicle, which would take man to the moon. The Soviets had suffered a setback. Their ace rocket designer died in 1966. The Soviets were behind in designing a rocket capable of delivering man to the moon. The reason for this lag was the difference between the size of the Saturn 5's rocket engines and anything that had been built before. The Saturn's engines themselves were enormous. The Soviets had nothing comparable off-the-shelf. A new engine had to be built.

Realizing they were behind, the Soviets gambled on reworking an old idea, the closed cycle rocket engine, which the Americans had given up as unworkable. At that time what normally occurred was that a rocket engine expended great amounts of energy venting burnt fuel and oxidizer that powered the turbo-pumps, used for pumping fuel to the main engines. These turbo-pumps were actually small rocket engines and it was only with a rocket engine that it was possible to pump the vast quantities of liquid propellants necessary to lift a rocket of this size to the moon. The problem was that the exhaust gases for these rocket-powered turbo-pumps were not being used as thrust, but being vented out of the sides of the rocket. The Soviets began work on another system.

Instead of a separate feed of liquid oxygen to the turbo-pump, the Soviets fed the entire supply of liquid oxygen, for both the turbo-pump and the main engine, directly into the turbo-pump. The excess or unburnt liquid oxygen was then routed out of the turbo-pump as exhaust and directly into the main combustion chamber of the rocket where it combined with more liquid hydrogen, the fuel. After years of failure, this engine was finally perfected and given the designation NK-33 by the Soviets. Amazingly, this engine was 20-25% more efficient that any rocket engine ever built by the American, even to this day.

After the Americans landed on the moon in 1969, the space race was over and the Soviets saw no political gain in building their own moon rocket. Their program was scrapped. The NK-33 engines were slated for destruction and the order was so given. Fortunately, this order was disobeyed. Many engines were secretly stored in a warehouse inside the Soviet Union. These engines remained in storage and in secrecy for the next thirty years.

It was only well after the fall of the Soviet Union that the information was leaked to the Americans. The Americans, at first, did not believe the efficiency figures their Russian counterparts were giving them concerning the secret NK-33 engines. The Americans brought some of these engines to the USA for testing and found they were exactly as stated by the Russians. The Russians, now in partnership with the Americans, modernized the NK-33 engine and it now forms the basis for the new satellite launch vehicle, the Atlas 2.

This story proves that secret technology can be kept secret for a long time. This was true of the NK-33 engine, which was at the heart of a great space rivalry and the subject of intense espionage. Red mercury was a secret for which no spies were searching. A secret not looked for can be kept a secret for a long time. Red mercury was most likely a unique and fortuitous find for the Soviets, based upon German research. Because they alone possessed its secrets, knowledge of its existence remained a top secret. Like the NK-33, red mercury only surfaced after the fall of the Soviet Union at a time when the Russians became interested in marketing a product.

SOURCES

1. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995, page 190, The Mini-Nuke Conspiracy Mandela's Nuclear Nightmare, Penguin Books, New York.

2. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995, page 58

3. ibid

4. Mayer, Edgar and Thomas Mehner, 2002, page 186, Die Atombombe und das Dritte Reich, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

5. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995, page 130,140

6. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995, page 60

7. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995, pages 60,281

8. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995, page 64

9. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995, page 90

10. Mayer, Edgar and Thomas Mehner, 2002, page 265, Die Atombombe und das Dritte Reich Das Geheimnis des Dreieks Arnstadt-Wechmar-Ohrdruf, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

11. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995, page 129

12. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995, page 134

13. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995, page 195

14. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, pages 41-46, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 2: Star Wars 1947 Teil A: Von der V-1 bis zu A-9: unkonventionelle Kurz-und Mittelstreckenwaffen, Amun-Verlag, Schleusingen

15. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 96, Intercept UFO, Pinnacle Books, New York

16. Cook, Nick, 2001, page 191-192, The Hunt For Zero Point, The Random House Group Ltd., London

17. Cook, Nick, 2001, page 194

18. Mayer, Edgar and Thomas Mehner, 2002, pages 251-254, Die Atombombe und das Dritte Reich Das Geheimnis des Dreiecks Arnstadt-Weckmar-Ohrdruf, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

19. Mayer, Edgar and Thomas Mehner, 2002

20. Van Nostrand's Scientific Encyclopedia, 1958, page 715

21. Hounam, Peter and Steve McQuillan, 1995

22. Faeth, Harald, 1998, page 151, 1945-Thuerigens Manhattan Project Auf der Spurensuche nach der verlorenen V-Waffen-Fabrik in Deutschlands Untergrund, CTT Verlag, Schleusingen

22 Electric Gun or Rail Gun

An electric or rail gun uses forces of magnetic attraction and repulsion to move a projectile. We are all familiar with how opposite poles of a magnet attract and how like poles repel. This idea can be harnessed in what is called a linear motor. This device is set on a rail or rails and alternately attracts and then repels a small car that is set upon the rails. The car is rapidly accelerated down the track. The car's front end is open so that a projectile placed in the car will be shot out when the car reaches the end of its track. The projectile cannot be spun to give it stability in flight as a bullet is spun by the spiral groves in the gun barrel. Instead, fins are attached to the projectile in the manner feathers are attached to an arrow.

The Germans first considered the electric gun for use as a long-range cannon for exactly the same role as the Hockdruckpumpe (HDP), the high-pressure pump or cannon, was ultimately built. This device actually saw service in the Second World War and rained projectiles upon London from facilities located across the English Channel on the west coast of France[1]. The HDP was further developed after the war into long-range weaponry, which finally culminated in the super cannon built by Dr. Gerald Bull.

In 1990, Dr. Bull's nearly completed super cannon was mounted at a 45-degree angle up a hillside in western Iraq and pointed at Tel Aviv. This weapon was capable of launching projectiles the size of Volkswagens into the center of that Israeli city. Fortunately, for the Israelis, the government of the United States, through some slick maneuvering, gave Saddam Hussein the green light to invade Kuwait and then condemned him for it. These events led to the United States's bombing and destruction of the super cannon in the ensuing Gulf war before it could be used against Israel. Dr. Gerald Bull was assassinated by the Israeli Mossad on March 22nd of 1990. The Americans never wanted to disclose the Machiavellian moves leading up to the first Gulf War and the Israelis were never held accountable for the murder of Dr. Gerald Bull. This is another example of how the winners write the history.

Besides the Hochdruckpumpe, the Germans also had the V-1 and the V-2 for use as long distance artillery. For these reasons it was felt that the rail gun might be better put to other uses[2]. Instead, this technology was to be used for anti-aircraft purposes. A Berlin based company, the Gesellschaft fuer Geraetebau, was put in charge of development of this weapon's system.

At first glance, the rail gun, the idea of inventing a whole new class of machine for use as an anti-aircraft weapon sounds like pure science fiction. Indeed, it still sounds like science fiction. Rail guns have recently been proposed for use as one method to shoot down incoming ballistic missiles as part of a "Star Wars" defense system. But this is not fiction. The basic developmental work necessary to field this weapon was done almost sixty years ago. This fact is made clear by the Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report 4/258. The information contained in this report was gathered shortly after hostilities ended and published in mid-June of 1945. This information was based upon a German report issued on 9/10/44.

The CIOS report does two things. It details the finished antiaircraft device itself and it explains in scientific terms exactly how the device works. It has been said that all machines can be reduced to numbers and this is exactly what the author of the report did. Anyone with a serious interest in this technology should avail himself of this report.

The specifics of the weapon to be produced were that it would have a muzzle velocity of 2000 meters per second and rate of fire of 72 rounds per minute. Each shell would weigh 500 grams. Six 10-meter barrels would be linked to a single power device and fired at once. The whole unit was to be mounted on a 12.8 cm AA gun carriage. This battery would have a burst of fire every five seconds[3].

Based on the report, the chief of the OKL-TLR requested that an experimental plant be set up as quickly as possible, consisting of a complete power unit and a three-barrel gun configuration.

In reading the ClOS report, it should be noted that it was based on some rather stale information, that of 9/10/44. Things were moving very fast at this time in Germany. There was only about seven months left in the war in Europe. Using other sources we can trace the gun's development after it left Berlin.

One of the most reliable sources on German secret technology is Rudolf Lusar. Lusar was an engineer who worked at the German Patent Office during the war. After the war was over, the Allies marched into the patent office and took everything. Lusar says 30 boxcar loads of German patents. After the war Lusar wrote a book on German secret weaponry base on his almost photographic memories.

Lusar reports that work on the electric gun moved from Berlin to the mountainous areas bordering between Bavaria and Austria, to the foothills of the Alps and to the slopes of Mt. Wetterstein to be exact.[4,5] Two versions of this weapon were tested. These were a 20 mm and a 40 mm version. A top-end muzzle velocity of 2000 meters per second was achieved, although some variants of these weapons had lower velocities. In one version, the 10-meter barrel was actually surrounded by electromagnetic coils, which were activated in succession as the projectile progressed down the barrel. In this mountain experimentation it was found that the large energy requirements of the weapon necessitated a new type of condenser that was developed. High hopes rode with this weapon but the military collapse brought this and all other weaponry research to an end. In the end, this technology fell into the hands of the Americans.

SOURCES

1. Porezag, Karsten, 1996, Geheime Kommandosache Geschichte der "V-Waffen" und geheimen Militaeraktionen des Zweiten Weltkrieges an Lahn, Dill und im Westenwald, Verlag Wetzlardruck GmbH, Wetzlar

2. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee G-2 Division, SHAEF (Rear), CIOS Target No. 4/258, APO 413, page 5

3. ibid

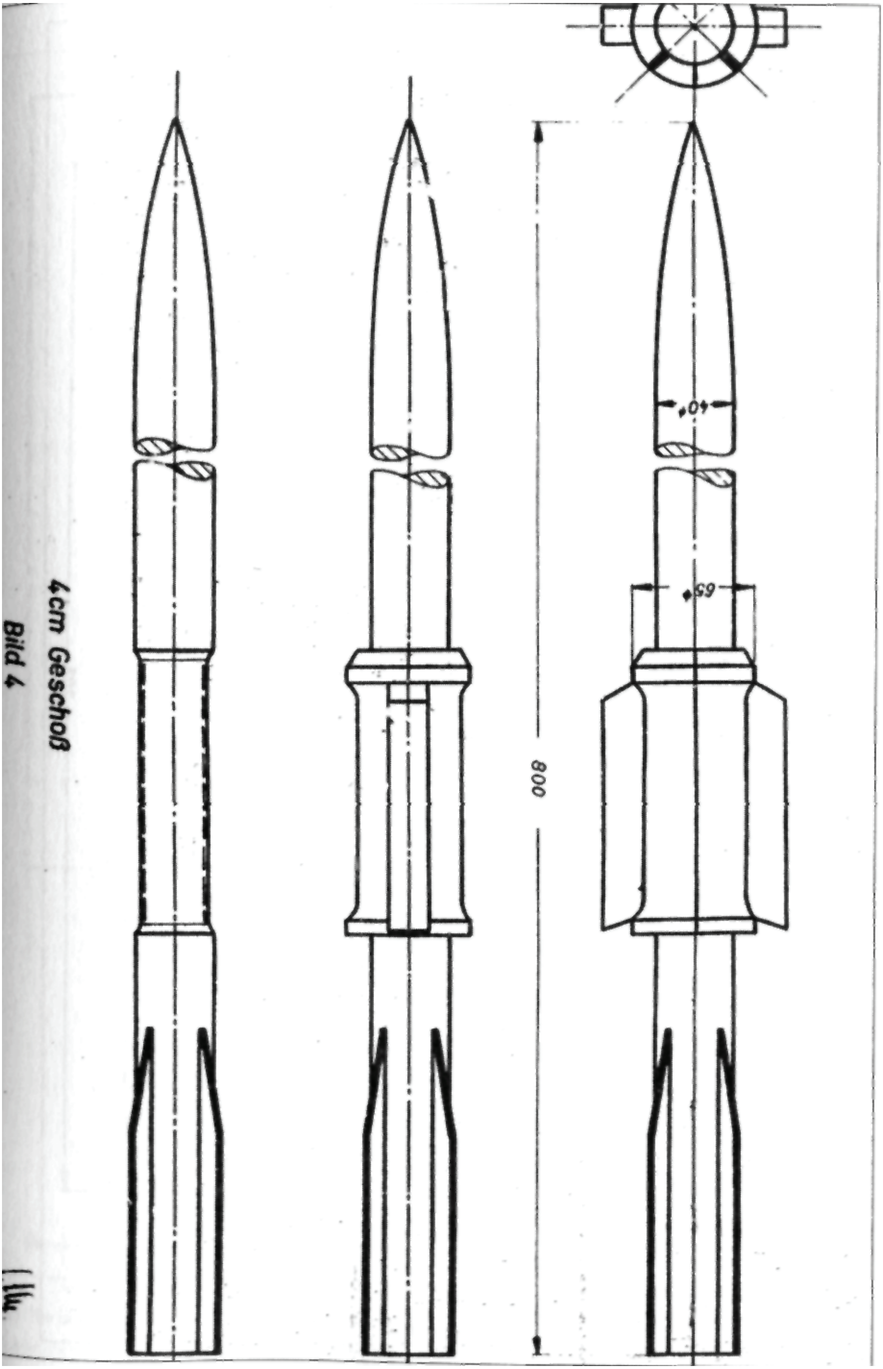
4. Lusar, Rudolf, 1960, German Secret Weapons of the Second World War, page 160, Neville Spearman Ltd., London

5. Lusar, Rudolf, 1964, Die deutschen Waffen und Geheimwaffen des 2. Weltkrieges und ihre Weiterentwicklung, page 211, J.F. Lehmanns Verlang, Munich

23 Electric Gun Part 2

The reason this chapter is called Part 2 is that new information has been received concerning this topic which deserves independent recognition. This information comes by way of Friedrich Georg and consists of two reports from the original company developing the electric gun, Gesellschaft fuer Geraetebau m.b.H. These two reports are dated January 30, 1945 and June, 1945. The Allied CIOS report is dated June 14, 1945 and prepared by H. A. Liebhafsky although a comparison of the two texts from June, 1945 reveals their similarity, even to the signature at the end of the Allied document which reads "J. Hansler". The German language text, titled "Ein Beitrag zum Problem des Elektrischen Geschuetes" was written by Dr. Joachim Haensler and the second text, "Entwurf fuer eine Elektrische 4 cm Flak" is signed by Haensler at its end. Therefore, the Allied CIOS report might be taken for a translation, which it is not. There is certainly a similarity between the two but the German texts are far more detailed and encompassing.

Stated in the reverse, the English text is more general and less specific. Whole discussions have been omitted. This comparison is an example of exactly how Allied post-war security was designed to work. Specific and detailed information was gleaned from German sources about a specific subject. The Americans then would summarize and generalize this specific information that would sometimes even be accompanied by a disclaimer as to the source or accuracy of the information repeated. A name, in this case H.A. Liebhafsky, U.S. Ord. would be attached to



4cm Geschoß
Bild 4
800 ø40
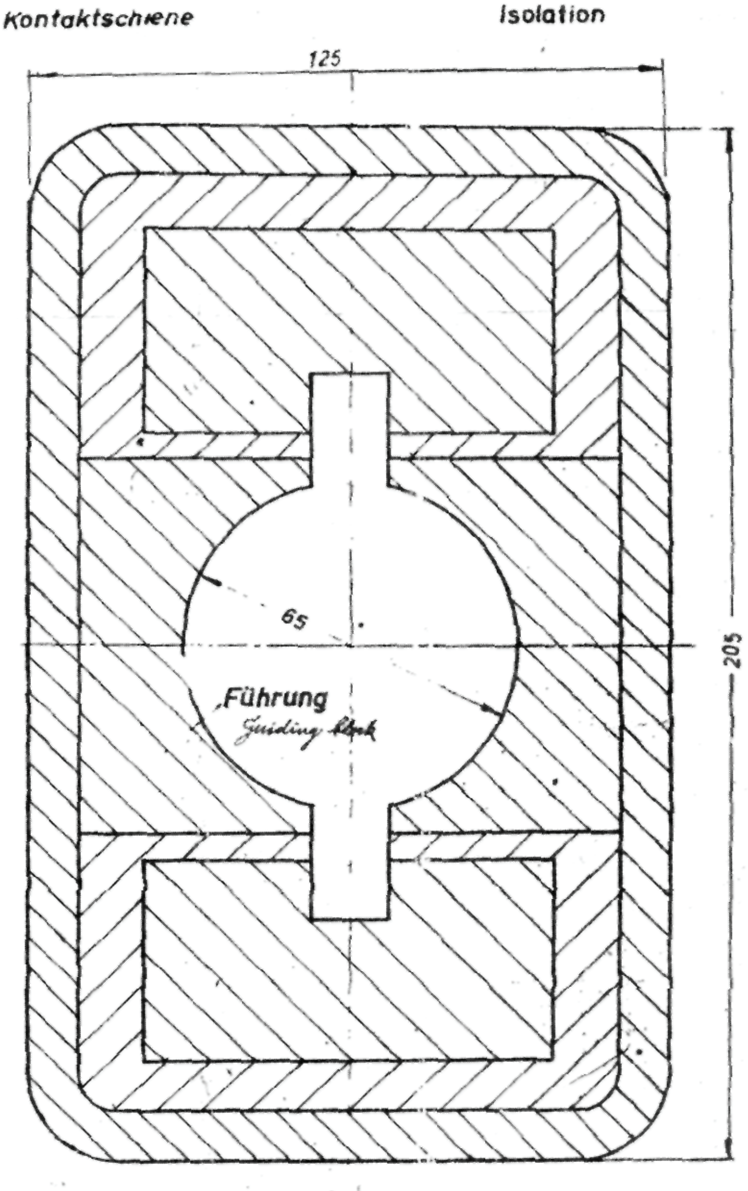
ø65

Diagram showing the cross-section of an iron-free linear motor cannon (German report).



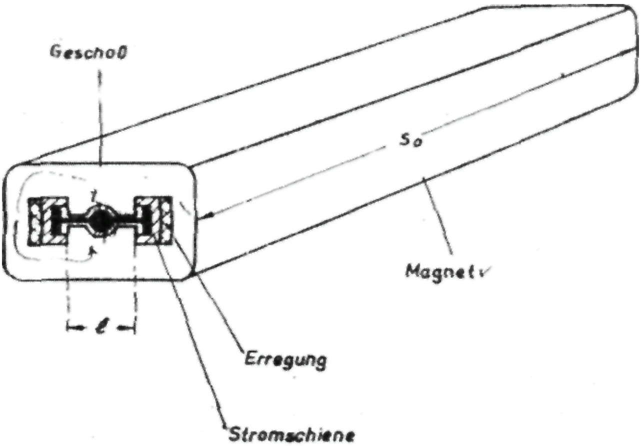
Kontaktschiene
Isolation
125
205
65
Führung
Guiding block

LM 16

Rohrquerschnitt des eisenlosen Linearmotors

Bild 2

Drawings of electric gun (rail gun, or linear motor cannon) projectiles from a German report.



Geschoß
s_o Magnet
ℓ Erregung
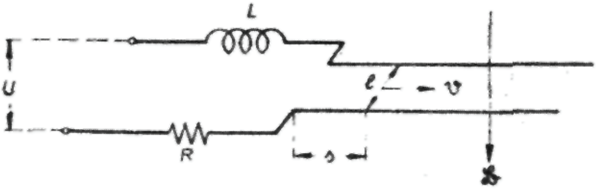
Stromschiene

Linearmotor
Bild 1



Stromkreis des Linearmotors
Bild 2

Top: The barrel of a rail gun. The finned projectile emerges at point marked "e".

Bottom: Schematic of the linear motor's electric circuit.

the report. The purpose was to supply a lead to the technology but not an exact blueprint to it. For precise information one's security clearance had to be appropriate and then one had to contact the "custodian of records", to use a legal term, in this case H.A. Liebhafsky. He would then fill you in on the details not covered in the CIOS report and presumably provide you with whatever technical information he had. These levels of security indicate that even in an official sounding government rendition of the subject, underlying facts and perhaps secrets remain which are the subject of more secretive reports of in the possession of a designated person.

The two German reports do provide fresh insights and specific facts, which are the subject of this chapter. Both are similar in content, and brief. What has happened is that the earlier one was written during the war and the latter on was written after the war, presumably at the request of G-2 Division, SHAEF (rear). Since they are similar and brief, both reports will be treated together without specific page references.

The Germans had determined that the absolute maximum muzzle velocity for a powder-propelled projectile was about 2810 meters per second. In practice the maximum was only about 2790. For comparison, the German Paris Gun of World War One had a muzzle velocity of about 1600 m/sec. The Germans now needed something better. Analysis had shown that an electric gun's muzzle velocity potential was far higher, as high as 6000 m/sec.

The most pressing need was for a more effective anti-aircraft gun, able to deliver a larger charge at higher altitudes. They wanted to deliver 500 grams of explosive in this new flak weapon. To do this a muzzle velocity of about 2000 m/sec was necessary. The projectile itself would have the length of about 20 cm and a 4 cm diameter. It would have to be fin stabilized since spinning the projectile in the bore of the gun was impractical. Several barrels per anti-aircraft unit were desired. Originally, the Germans wanted ten barrels but, as the project progressed, this requirement was relaxed.

One aspect, only briefly discussed in the CIOS report is the other uses the Germans ultimately planned for the electric gun, beyond simply as an anti-aircraft weapon.

Due to the high muzzle velocities attainable, it was believed that long-range artillery could be fashioned using this technology. Mention of huge batteries of electric guns each vaulting one shot per minute are sometimes encountered in Allied prisoner of war debriefings but this information is not specific and was usually and understandably discounted by Allied intelligence as unreliable. These facilities were to be located in Western France and were always confused with the high pressure gun, known to the Allies as under German development and discussed in the previous chapter on this subject.

But besides flak and long-range artillery, there was another consideration in mind. Using a long track and a very powerful linear motor, the Germans believed it would be possible to boost the performance of their existing and future long-range rockets. There is not a lot of detail given but one can imagine a mile long, sloped launching ramp, as with the V-1 only much larger, in which a huge sled powered by a linear motor carried a large missile up to several hundred miles per hour before flinging it into the air. The fuel normally wasted just inching the rocket off the ground could now be used to extend its range. This would have been suitable to start the ram-jet based Tromsdorff-D-6000 missile or the huge intercontinental Saenger designs.

One major problem that was encountered with the linear motor was the problem of self induction. An iron object moving through a magnetic field itself becomes an electromagnet. When two magnetic fields interact, a kind of magnetic resistance is encountered which, in this case, would slow the projectile down considerably. The Germans identified three areas of self induction. These were the power source, the barrel and the electric leads.

The power source was a huge generator of 7800 kw. It consisted of an 8 cylinder diesel motor rated at 16,000 horse power. Besides the power source, unipolar impulse generators of a new type manufactured by Siemens-Schucker, each weighing 150 tons, as well as a new type of battery were necessary to impart energy to the projectile. An electric generator is a source of magnetic energy. Nothing is stated but one wonders how successful efforts were in reducing the self-induction values for these generators.

The barrel could be modified to reduce self-induction. The answer in this case was to make it iron-free. With an iron free barrel there would be no self-induction as the projectile traveled through it.

Likewise, the electric leads themselves were capable of generating field energy. The solution was to use 8 parallel single leads, each two copper bands with insulation material in between them as well as keeping them as short as possible and contained within the machine itself.

From the description given, these guns were going to be heavy. It is hard to believe that they would be mobil units as the famous German 88 millimeter anti-aircraft cannon had been. It seems more likely that once these units became operational, they would have been stationed near high-value targets for use against bomber formations.

The Germans felt that they had worked all bugs out of this weapon and that it could be realized at that time. Perhaps experimental models were utilized as conditions allowed, but by the end of the war there is no official confirmation of the operational use of these weapons. Nevertheless, the technology is certainly ready to be "ramped up" in a "Star Wars" application or for launching heavy payloads into orbit.

Sources

1. Haensler, Joachim, Ph.D., 1/30/45, "Entwurf fuer eine Elektrische 4 cm Flak", privately published by Gesellschaft fuer Geraetebau m.b.H.

2. Haensler, Joachim, Ph.D., 6/45, "Ein Beitrag zum Problem des Elektrischen Geschuetzes", privately published by Gesellschaft fuer Geraetebau m.b.H.

24 Means To Stop Engines

Gas

A large part of the Renato Vesco scenario concerning what he termed the "Kugelblitz" flying disc centered around its unusual means for shooting down enemy aircraft. Vesco described German experiments in producing a gas, not harmful to people, but which would case aircraft to fall out of the sky[1]. The method by which this was to be accomplished were special blowers in the Kugelblitz which shot out this special gas ahead of enemy bombers. The enemy aircraft's engine would inhale a small percentage of this gas, along with atmospheric oxygen needed for combustion. The gas would cause the bomber's engines to pre-ignite. This pre-ignition, also called "pinging" or "knocking", compromises the efficiency of the engine's normal ignition advance curve which fires earlier as revolutions per second increase. The efficiency of the advance curve depends on revolutions per minute, engine load, the compression ratio of the engine and the octane rating of the gasoline. In this case the gas in question functioned as if it lowered the gasoline's octane, thus causing it to ignite prematurely and destructively inside the combustion chamber. Depending on the severity of the pre-ignition, the engine would suffer anything from damage to total failure. Vesco even named the research facility responsible for this work and an individual scientist, the "Luftfahrts-forschungsanstalt" (flight research installation) at Volkenrode and Dr. Hans Freidrich Gold, respectively.

This whole idea remained a myth for years. Vesco was always treated with extreme skepticism concerning the Kugelblitz story and the mysterious gas. Now, while evidence for Vesco's manned flying disc designated Kugelbiltz is still largely lacking, the reality and the facts behind the amazing gas able to swat aircraft out of the sky have become known.

Of course, this did not come easily. Numerous requests have been made of the intelligence agencies of the USA for information concerning the Kugelblitz. It has been described to them in detail with alternate names included. In every instance a "no record" response is generated by the government.

Things did not end there, however. A FOIA request was made concerning the scientist involved, Dr. Hans Friedrich Gold. Again, "no record" responses were generated by the government's spy agencies. Below is an example, written on June 13, 2000 by the National Archives at College Park, MD., which says in part:

* * * * * *

"This is in reply to your May 21, 2000 Freedom of Information Act inquiry regarding documentation on the Austrian scientist Dr. Hans Friedrich Gold.

Please note that our World War 11 records are declassified and in the public domain. It is not necessary to file for access under the Freedom of Information Act.

We have examined name indexes to pertinent records in our custody but were unable to locate any information of Dr. Gold. Many records of the Allied Control Commission, Austria, are not indexed by name. We are not staffed to undertake the substantial research that would be necessary to examine un-indexed material for information of one individual. Our staff would be pleased to assist you or your representative at our College Park, Maryland facility.

Sincerely,

Amy Schmidt
Archivist, Modern Military Records
Textural Archives Services Division

* * * * * * *

First, a request under the provisions of the FOIA is always necessary. This binds them to comply with the law imposed upon them by the Congress.

Second, the National Archive's World War 11 holdings are not all declassified, for example, the German scientist Otto Maurer's file is full of references to material removed from public view because it is still secret. Without a request made under FOIA, the National Archives is under no obligation to make the requestor even aware that portions of the file have been withheld.

Third, files do exist under the name of Dr. Hans Friedrich Gold in the possession of the National Archives. The United States National Archives, have just simply lied. They are just simply liars. They just simply violate the law of the land and get away with it probably hundreds of times per day.

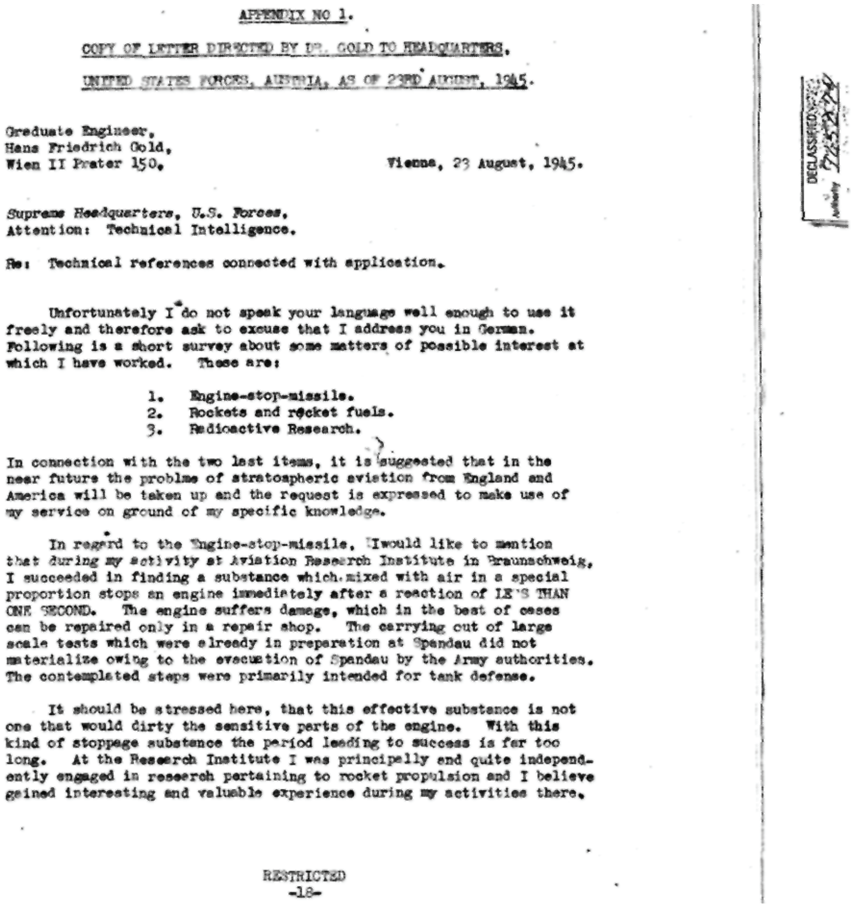
Fourth, the National Archives are under Federal Mandate to comply with all the provisions of the FOIA. Their staffing or their staffing problems are their own concern. Their only obligation as far as FOIA is concerned is to fully comply.

Fifth, the National Archives is not being asked to do "substantial research", they are being asked to pull a file, as any librarian could and should do.

Sixth, nowhere in the FOIA does it specify that requestors must put in an appearance at College Park, Maryland in order to receive a proper response. The location of either the requestor or the requester is irrelevant.

An example is made here to point out the fact that nothing comes easily out of the Federal Government. Everything is kept secret. It is simply their policy. They have no idea why this information is being requested and could not care less. Their policy is secrecy, pure and simple. This applies to everything. The National Archives is simply a de facto reclassification project.

But before turning to Dr. Gold, mention should be made of another government document, which greatly added to our knowledge in this matter. In 1999 a German researcher, Friedrich Georg, found what might be described as a mini-Rosetta Stone concerning secret German research and what the Americans knew about it. This document, "An Evaluation Of German Capabilities In 1945" was written in late 1944 and makes predictions of what to expect, militarily, from Germany in the new year. The relevant entry is shown here under "Gases Appli-



APPENDIX NO 1.

COPY OF LETTER DIRECTED BY DR. GOLD TO HEADQUARTERS,

UNITED STATES FORCES, AUSTRIA, AS OF 23RD AUGUST, 1945.

DECLASSIFIED
Authority 745274

Graduate Engineer,
Hans Friedrich Gold,
Wien II Prater 150,

Vienna, 23 August, 1945.

Supreme Headquarters, U.S. Forces,
Attention: Technical Intelligence.

Re: Technical references connected with application.

Unfortunately I do not speak your language well enough to use it freely and therefore ask to excuse that I address you in German. Following is a short survey about some matters of possible interest at which I have worked. These are:

1. Engine-stop-missile.
2. Rockets and rocket fuels.
3. Radioactive Research.

In connection with the two last items, it is suggested that in the near future the problme of stratospheric aviation from England and America will be taken up and the request is expressed to make use of my service on ground of my specific knowledge.

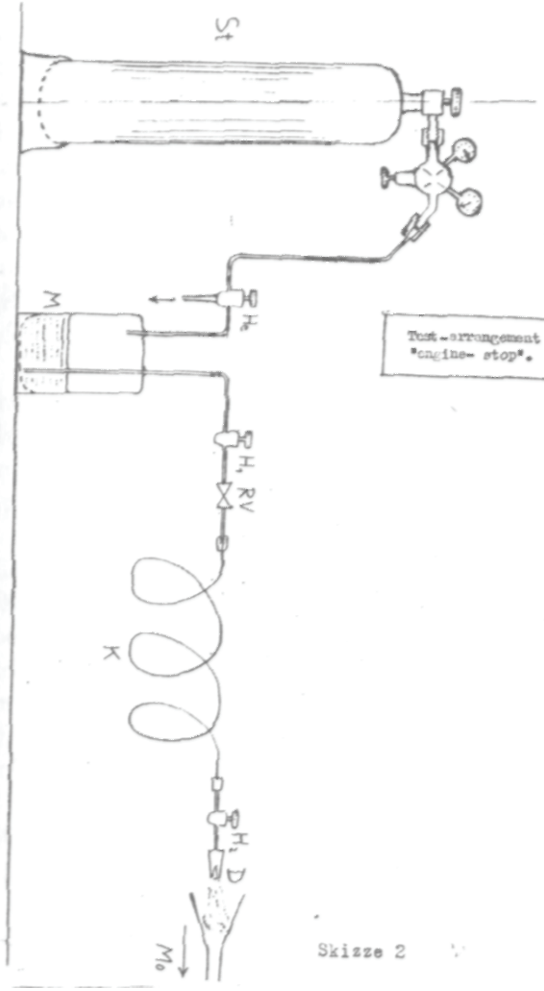
In regard to the Engine-stop-missile, I would like to mention that during my activity at Aviation Research Institute in Braunschweig, I succeeded in finding a substance which mixed with air in a special proportion stops an engine immediately after a reaction of LESS THAN ONE SECOND. The engine suffers damage, which in the best of cases can be repaired only in a repair shop. The carrying out of large scale tests which were already in preparation at Spandau did not materialize owing to the evacuation of Spandau by the Army authorities. The contemplated steps were primarily intended for tank defense.

It should be stressed here, that this effective substance is not one that would dirty the sensitive parts of the engine. With this kind of stoppage substance the period leading to success is far too long. At the Research Institute I was principally and quite independently engaged in research pertaining to rocket propulsion and I believe gained interesting and valuable experience during my activities there.

RESTRICTED
-18-

Dr. Hans Friedrich Gold's post-war letter to U.S. Forces in Austria describing his scientific progress.

Versuchsanordnung zu "Motorstop"



Test-arrangement for "engine- stop".

Skizze 2

DECLASSIFIED
Authority [illegible]

Diagram of the apparatus used by Dr. Gold to produce motor-stopping gas.

cable to Aircraft". As we can read, there were two gases under consideration for attacking Allied aircraft, one which caused pre-ignition of engines and another which caused motor oil the thin out to the point that engine protection disappeared and the engine seized.

From this document we learned that Vesco was not making this all up and that further work in this area was warranted.

The National Archives has always resisted providing any sort of index or catalogue of their holdings. Recently, they have provided a kind of computer index of their holding which they call by an acronym, NAIL. Unfortunately, NAIL will not even list items already produced by the U.S. National Archives under FOIA duress so one has to wonder what the real purpose of such a stealth index is.

Since the year 2000 and under pressure of the FOIA, the National Archives has provided a list, an index, of some titles of the Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee reports. Contained in that list was File Number XXX11-1109, "Interrogation Of Dr. Hans Friedrich Gold"[2]. With this new information an Appeal was filed with the National Archives concerning the previous "no record" Gold request. The National Archives handled this Appeal by ignoring it. Finally, a new request was made and the file was sent. Again, this violates the law.

Dr. Gold did work at the Luftfahrtforschungsanstalt, Hermann Goering, at Volkenrode. He was a chemist and chemical engineer who spent most of his time working on hypergolic fuels. These are fuels developed in pairs, such as "C-Stoff" and "T-Stoff". When both fuels are combined within the combustion chamber, combustion occurs automatically.

Somehow, in July of 1944 Dr. Gold's mind seemed to do a flip-flop because it came to him that it would also be possible to stop and engine using chemical means. Dr. Gold worked on the chemistry to do this as well as developing a test apparatus to measure the efficiency of this idea.

Dr. Gold used methylnitrate in one of his hypergolic rocket fuel mixtures in order to get oxygen into the combustion chamber. It occurred to him that this same chemical might be used to make an engine stop. A mixture of methylnitrate and methanol in a mixture of 75% to 25% respectively was used. With this mixture constitution only 2%, by weight, of the air drawn in by the target engine, a strong knocking occurred. With a 5% concentration, a metallic "hard hitting" and "heavy rattling" occurred. At 8%, within a fraction of a second a "strong bang" occurred, the engine stopped, and suffered a torsion of its crankshaft of about 30 degrees. In other words, it broke the engine apart.

Pictured is Dr. Gold's diagram of the testing device by which he came to these figures. The nitrogen from Bomb "St" presses, according to size, with 29 atmospheres upon the methylnitrate-methenol mixture (75/25) in the small bomb "M", so that the liquid rushes through nozzle "D" with open taps "H1" and "H2", across the check valve "RV" and the copper capillaries "K". A "Bosch" nozzle was used, with a spray angle of about 35 degrees. For the testing engine "M", a rather sturdy 500 cm "FN" motorcycle engine was used, its suction pipe "A" being provided with a funnel. The engine that was generally used for fuel tests was mounted on a test stand and connected with an oscillograph. "H" is a tap for reducing pressure.

Tests were to be carried out in a suburb of Berlin, Spandau, with the projected first use to be against tanks. Full scale testing was never done, according to Dr. Gold, because of the evacuation of that facility in the face of the Soviet advance. It is unclear if other testing or application of this weaponry was ever carried out.

Interestingly enough, there is a footnote to the Dr. Hans Friedrich Gold story. It is an Appendix, Appendix No. 2, to the CIOS report referenced above. This constitutes a statement by Dr. Gold on his personal views on future research. These views might seem fantastic coming from anybody other than such a well respected scientist. It is probably best to postpone Dr. Gold's discussion until a better foundation for his ideas have been built, but we will return to Dr. Gold later in the discussion.

SOURCES

1. Vesco, Renato, 1976, Intercept UFO, pages 137-138, Pinnacle Books, New York.

2. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number XXX11-109, 1946, "Interrogation Of Dr. Hans Friedrich Gold, obtained from the National Archives, College Park, MD.

25 Means To Stop Engines
Magnetic Wave — Motorstoppmittel

There have always been rumors of a secret German weapon which could cause ignition based engines, those with spark plugs, to stop running. These rumors started before World War Two and persisted well into the 1990s.

During the late 1980s or early 1990s, someone called me on the telephone that claimed to be an employee of a large defense firm. He told me that he was part of a group investigating the possibility that the Germans had built a beam weapon, but not directional as a laser beam, but an omni-directional weapon in which waves radiate out from a central point in all directions as does a pebble make waves when it is thrown into a pond. When in the range of this weapon, all ignition-based engines would stop running. He gave me some reports of this device from wartime Germany. I had never heard of such a thing before this time and, in consideration of the circumstances of the telephone call, took the whole thing with a grain of salt. But it did perk my interest and from this moment on, I was on the lookout for such descriptions.

Such descriptions of German devices that stopped engines did appear. Descriptions of this device seemed to abound with the genre of German writers who believed in and wrote of a wartime German technical history which had simply been kept secret after the war. Among the devices they described was something called "Motorstoppmittel", which translated literally is: "means to stop (a) motor".

What they seemed to be describing was different from the method described by Renato Vesco in his book about the history of flying saucers. Vesco described a device which he called "Feuerball", "fireball". This flying device used special chemicals in its fuel resulting in an over-ionized atmosphere near the target aircraft. This over-ionization caused the aircraft's engine to ground itself directly through the atmosphere, short-circuiting out the engine, thus causing it to fail. The difference is that nothing was ever mentioned about fuel or chemicals in reference to Motorstoppmittel.

One of the first accounts of a test involving this device comes from Germany's Axis ally, Italy, in 1936. It involves no less than the electric genius Dr. Guglielmo Marconi, Italian leader Benito Mussolini and Mussolini's wife.

It seems that in June of 1936 Mrs. Mussolini informed her husband of her intention to travel on the Rome-Ostia highway in the afternoon. Mussolini told his wife she would experience a something special if she made the trip between 3:00 and 3:30 P.M. As a matter of fact he said that she would be struck with wonder at seeing something. Mrs. Mussolini was at the prescribed place and time along with dozens of other cars both in front of her and behind her. What happened which was of such wonder was that their cars stopped running. Her Chauffeur as well as other stranded motorists attempted to restart their vehicles but to no avail. At exactly 3:35 P.M. all the cars mysteriously restarted and proceeded normally.

That evening Mussolini gave his wife the story behind her trouble. Marconi had invented something that halted engines. Pope Pius XI got wind of the experiment and called it the work of the devil. Marconi died just over a year later, July 20, 1937.[1]

Of course, numerous Freedom Of Information Act requests were made of U.S. government agencies for information concerning Motorstoppmittel. It was described in as much detail as possible, as a German secret weapon capable of stopping ignition based engines. From every source a "No Record" response was generated.

When Freidrich Georg discovered the mini-Rosetta Stone, as described in the previous section, all this denial changed. Now we knew what the Germans called Motorstoppmittel was called "Magnetic Wave" by the US government. Besides the original document, An Evaluation Of German Capabilities In 1945, which described Motorstoppmittel, many other documents became available.

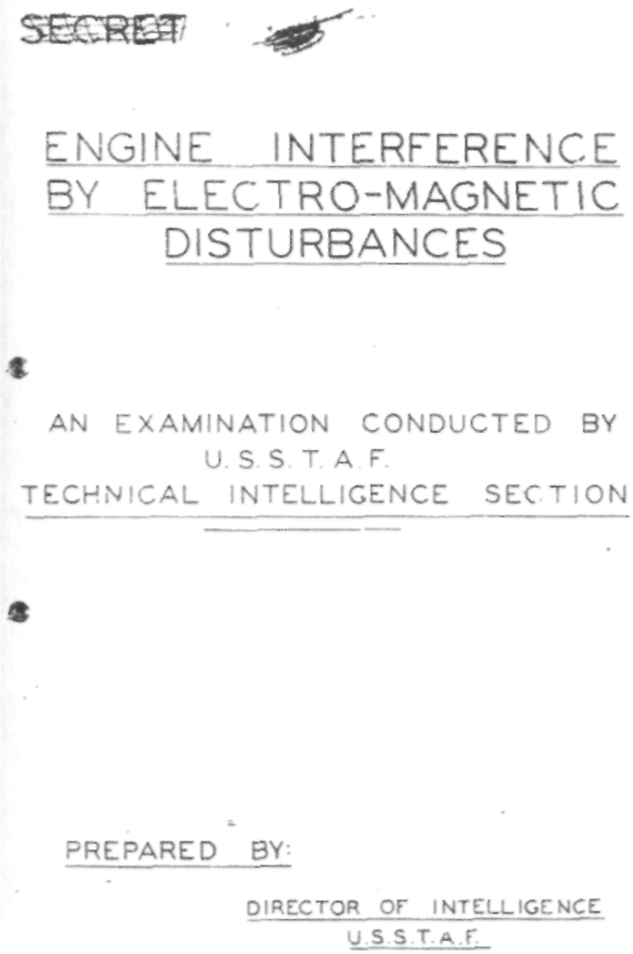
F.O.I.A. REPORTS ON MAGNETIC WAVE

The American intelligence reports are based on many sources. There are reports from German sources, there are reports from captured German scientists, from prisoners of war, and from the American military, all speaking of the same thing. They all describe an alleged German weapon able to make motor vehicles, including airplanes, stop running. Some of these reports are reproduced here.

The Americans and British went to some trouble to get to the bottom of all this. The American military even sent aircraft into areas suspected of being defended by this weapon in order to evaluate it. This is a report dated January 24, 1945, which involves two P-38 aircraft sent to fly over a suspect area near Frankfurt. Nigel Pennick tells us why this area was chosen for the American test[2]:

"In connection with this high-enery research, various mysterious 'transmitters' were erected at several 'key points' in the Reich. In 1938 the Brocken, a celebrated peak in the Harz Mountains, was the site of feverish construction work. Holy mountain of the goddess Freyja, the Brocken is best known for the curious optical phenomenon known as the 'Brocken Spectre', which occurs when the shadow of a person on the summit is cast by the rays of the sun onto a cloud below. Under some conditions, this 'spectre' has a saintly halo around its head.

This 'transmitter' was a strange contraption, a tower surrounded by an array of posts with pear-shapted knobs on top. At the same time a similar system was erected on the peak of the Feldberg near Frankfurt. When it began operation, there were soon reports of strange phenomena in the vicinity of the Brocken tower. Cars traveling along the mountain roads would suddenly have engine failure. A Luftwaffe sentry would soon spot the stranded car, and tell the puzzled motorist that it was no use trying to get the car started at present. After a while, the sentry would tell the driver that the engine would work again now, and the care would then start up and drive away."



~~SECRET~~

ENGINE INTERFERENCE BY ELECTRO-MAGNETIC DISTURBANCES

AN EXAMINATION CONDUCTED BY U.S.S.T.A.F.
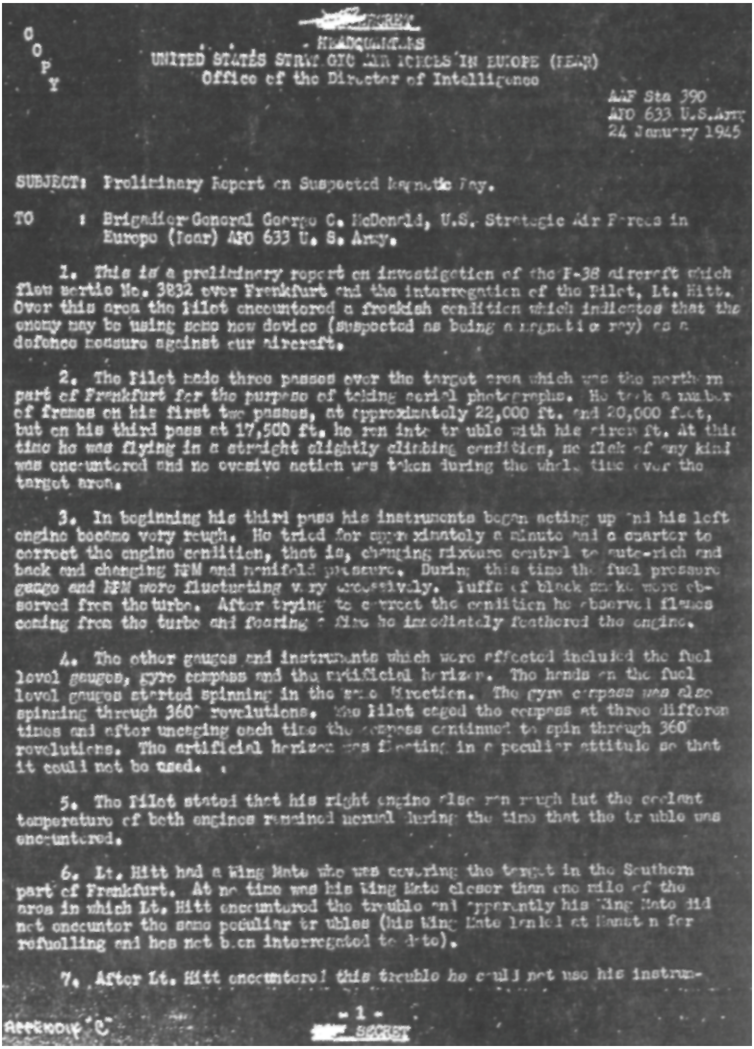
TECHNICAL INTELLIGENCE SECTION

PREPARED BY:

DIRECTOR OF INTELLIGENCE
U.S.S.T.A.F.

Summary reports by American Intelligence on the German magnetic wave weapon.



SECRET

C
O
P
Y

HEADQUARTERS
UNITED STATES STRATEGIC AIR FORCES IN EUROPE (REAR)
Office of the Director of Intelligence

AAF Sta 390
APO 633 U.S.Army
24 January 1945

SUBJECT: Preliminary Report on Suspected Magnetic Ray.

TO : Brigadier General George C. McDonald, U.S. Strategic Air Forces in Europe (Rear) APO 633 U. S. Army.

1. This is a preliminary report on investigation of the F-38 aircraft which flew sortie No. 3832 over Frankfurt and the interrogation of the Pilot, Lt. Hitt. Over this area the Pilot encountered a freakish condition which indicates that the enemy may be using some new device (suspected as being a magnetic ray) as a defence measure against our aircraft.

2. The Pilot made three passes over the target area which was the northern part of Frankfurt for the purpose of taking aerial photographs. He took a number of frames on his first two passes, at approximately 22,000 ft. and 20,000 feet, but on his third pass at 17,500 ft. he ran into trouble with his aircraft. At this time he was flying in a straight slightly climbing condition, no flak of any kind was encountered and no evasive action was taken during the whole time over the target area.

3. In beginning his third pass his instruments began acting up and his left engine became very rough. He tried for approximately a minute and a quarter to correct the engine condition, that is, changing mixture control to auto-rich and back and changing RPM and manifold pressure. During this time the fuel pressure gauge and RPM were fluctuating very excessively. Puffs of black smoke were observed from the turbo. After trying to correct the condition he observed flames coming from the turbo and fearing a fire he immediately feathered the engine.

4. The other gauges and instruments which were effected included the fuel level gauges, gyro compass and the artificial horizon. The hands on the fuel level gauges started spinning in the same direction. The gyro compass was also spinning through 360° revolutions. The Pilot caged the compass at three different times and after uncaging each time the compass continued to spin through 360° revolutions. The artificial horizon was floating in a peculiar attitude so that it could not be used.

5. The Pilot stated that his right engine also ran rough but the coolant temperature of both engines remained normal during the time that the trouble was encountered.

6. Lt. Hitt had a Wing Mate who was covering the target in the Southern part of Frankfurt. At no time was his Wing Mate closer than one mile of the area in which Lt. Hitt encountered the trouble and apparently his Wing Mate did not encounter the same peculiar troubles (his Wing Mate landed at Manston for refuelling and has not been interrogated to date).

7. After Lt. Hitt encountered this trouble he could not use his instrum-

- 1 -

APPENDIX "C"

SECRET

An actual field investigation, using real pilots and aircraft, into a German magnetic wave installation.

So the Americans chose this area near Frankfurt to see if they could determine the source and nature to the interference with their aircraft. At 17,000 feet in altitude and just North of Frankfurt, near the second tower mentioned above on the Feldberg, the pilot mentioned in the report, Lt. Hitt, encountered trouble. One of his engines began to "run rough". His fuel pressure indicator, rpm gauge, gyro gauge, artificial horizon gauge, all started to malfunction. The hands on his fuel level gauge started spinning in the same direction. The gyro compass started spinning through 360 degree revolutions. In the meantime, the pilot's other engine began to run rough.

While Lt. Hitt was experiencing such difficulty, the other P-38 pilot was flying over a Southern portion of Frankfurt. He encountered no trouble but was always at least a mile away from Lt. Hitt. Lt. Hitt began heading for his base. After eight to ten minutes of trouble, Lt. Hitt's aircraft began running normally. Even his instruments returned to normal.

Upon landing an investigation was conducted and a mechanical and electrical inspection of Lt. Hitt's P-38 ensued. The title of the final report reflects the verdict of the inquiry: "Preliminary Report on Suspected Magnetic Ray". This report was given "Secret" status and was produced by Headquarters, United States Strategic Air Forces Europe (Rear), Office of the Director of Intelligence, dated January 24, 1945.

Even prior to this, a report had been generated by the Director of Intelligence, U.S.S.t.A.F, dated 12/6/44 and titled: "Engine Interference By Electro-Magnetic Disturbances". This was sub-titled on the second page: Project 1217, "Investigation Into German Possible Use Of Rays To Neutralize Allied Aircraft Motors".

Another interesting document is worth mentioning. It is marked secret, and from the American British Laboratory of Radio Research, dated January 30, 1945. In it calculations by J.M. Hollywood are discussed. Perhaps his ideas will give us a clue as to the real nature of Motorstoppmittel. It says in part:

"Calculations by J. M. Hollywood of ABL-15 indicated that the most economical means of disturbing an aircraft's ignition system would probably employ electro-magnetic radio frequency transmissions recurrent at a rate near the frequency of the engine's ignition cycle."[3]

The report goes on to conclude that there is no real evidence for the German deployment of such an ignition suppression device but admits that intelligence information suggests that such a device exists and works on a short range basis. It goes on to say that an apparatus necessary to generate the required electromagnetic energy using ground-based coils would be enormous in size and therefore impractical.

Obviously, the actual German device was a little more intelligent, adaptable, flexible and target specific than a simple, huge, ground-based, gigantic coil pumping out a single, steady pulse as envisioned by Hollywood.

REPORTS FROM THE GERMAN SIDE

Thanks to the research in the German language publication "Waffen-Revue", January 1983, we are able to glimpse some of the real German work in this field. They published three documents. The first was from a commercial firm, ELEMAG. The second, a message sent by a sitting member or the Reichs Research Council, Dr. Werner Osenburg to Dr. Brandt of the SS. The third was from Dr. A. Meissner, also with a private research company. Each document is followed with my rough English translation.

English Translation of ELEMAG Document

* * * * * *

ELEMAG ELECTROMAGNETIC DEVICE CONSTRUCTION COMPANY
HILDESHEIM JANUARY 28, 1944

DISRUPTION OF THE FUNCTION OF DEVICES AS A MEANS OF WARFARE

It is to be striven for to put out or bring about or disconnect that material of warfare used by the enemy via the ability to disrupt the function of electronic apparatus .

UNDER THESE WEAPONS OF WAR ARE:

Aircraft and motorized vehicles with an internal combustion engine with spark plug ignition as used in a propulsion method, whole intelligence services or communications such as artillery adjustments.

To the attainment of this goal a long distance influence of the function of electronic devices will be put forward of the following basis.

The construction of electric devices consists of two fundamental elements together, voltage regulation and insulation. Disruption of electronic apparatus and devices is primarily attributed to suspension in voltage regulation or spanning of insulation.

A spanning of insulation, for example, a breakthrough of the blockage of the voltage path or circuit carried to the formation of eddy currents or short circuits and caused as a consequence of the latter interruption of voltage regulation, be it as a result of a melt-through of a fuse and lead or through the disfunction of the consumer of the electric energy itself.

Through a spanning of the insulation there is the possibility to cause the electric device to malfunction.

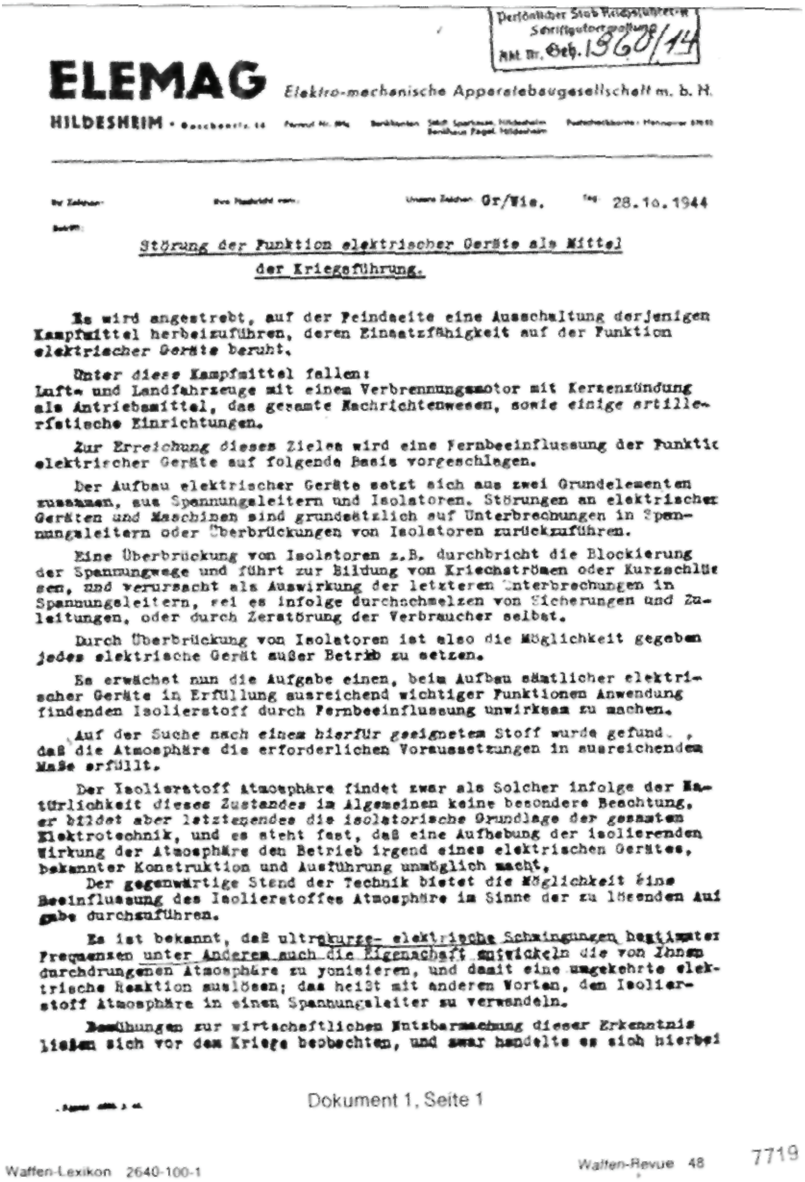
This brings up the problem of building of all electronic devices in fulfillment of finding insulation to make long distance influence ineffectual.

In the search for this suitable material it was found that the atmosphere contained the necessary provisions in sufficient measure.

Insulation atmosphere was found to be such a material, in its natural condition in general with no other special consideration. It produced insulation principle of electrics and without it any electronic device of known construction would be impossible. The present position of applied science offers the possibility of an influence of insulation atmosphere in the sense of accomplishing the solution of this problem.

It is known that ultra-short electronic oscillations or waves of determined frequency, developed under specific proprietary work, and developed to force the atmosphere to ionize can cause an opposite electrical reaction to be released. That is, in other words, to cause the insulation atmosphere to alter in voltage regulation.

Trouble with the economic utilization of this knowledge was observed before the war, and, to be sure, concerns itself with the problem of the wireless communication of electric energy.



Persönlicher Stab Reichsführer-SS
Schriftgutverwaltung
Akt. Nr. Geh. 1360/14

ELEMAG Elektro-mechanische Apparatebaugesellschaft m. b. H.
HILDESHEIM

Unsere Zeichen: Gr/Wie. Tag: 28.10.1944

Störung der Funktion elektrischer Geräte als Mittel der Kriegsführung.

Es wird angestrebt, auf der Feindseite eine Ausschaltung derjenigen Kampfmittel herbeizuführen, deren Einsatzfähigkeit auf der Funktion elektrischer Geräte beruht.

Unter diese Kampfmittel fallen:
Luft- und Landfahrzeuge mit einem Verbrennungsmotor mit Kerzenzündung als Antriebsmittel, das gesamte Nachrichtenwesen, sowie einige artilleristische Einrichtungen.

Zur Erreichung dieses Zieles wird eine Fernbeeinflussung der Funktic elektrischer Geräte auf folgende Basis vorgeschlagen.

Der Aufbau elektrischer Geräte setzt sich aus zwei Grundelementen zusammen, aus Spannungsleitern und Isolatoren. Störungen an elektrischen Geräten und Maschinen sind grundsätzlich auf Unterbrechungen in Spannungsleitern oder Überbrückungen von Isolatoren zurückzuführen.

Eine Überbrückung von Isolatoren z.B. durchbricht die Blockierung der Spannungswege und führt zur Bildung von Kriechströmen oder Kurzschlüssen, und verursacht als Auswirkung der letzteren Unterbrechungen in Spannungsleitern, sei es infolge durchschmelzen von Sicherungen und Zuleitungen, oder durch Zerstörung der Verbraucher selbst.

Durch Überbrückung von Isolatoren ist also die Möglichkeit gegeben jedes elektrische Gerät außer Betrieb zu setzen.

Es erwächst nun die Aufgabe einen, beim Aufbau sämtlicher elektrischer Geräte in Erfüllung ausreichend wichtiger Funktionen Anwendung findenden Isolierstoff durch Fernbeeinflussung unwirksam zu machen.

Auf der Suche nach einem hierfür geeignetem Stoff wurde gefunden, daß die Atmosphäre die erforderlichen Voraussetzungen in ausreichendem Maße erfüllt.

Der Isolierstoff Atmosphäre findet zwar als Solcher infolge der Natürlichkeit dieses Zustandes im Algemeinen keine besondere Beachtung, er bildet aber letztenendes die isolatorische Grundlage der gesamten Elektrotechnik, und es steht fest, daß eine Aufhebung der isolierenden Wirkung der Atmosphäre den Betrieb irgend eines elektrischen Gerätes, bekannter Konstruktion und Ausführung unmöglich macht.

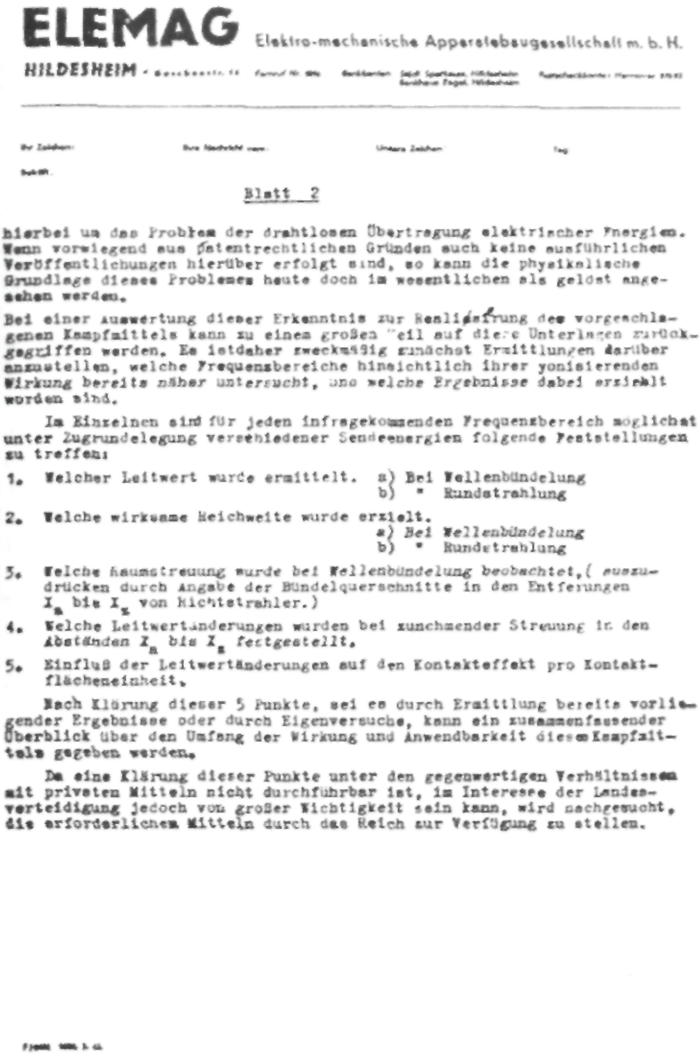
Der gegenwärtige Stand der Technik bietet die Möglichkeit eine Beeinflussung des Isolierstoffes Atmosphäre im Sinne der zu lösenden Aufgabe durchzuführen.

Es ist bekannt, daß ultrakurze- elektrische Schwingungen bestimmter Frequenzen unter Anderem auch die Eigenschaft entwickeln die von Ihnen durchdrungenen Atmosphäre zu yonisieren, und damit eine umgekehrte elektrische Reaktion auslösen; das heißt mit anderen Worten, den Isolierstoff Atmosphäre in einen Spannungsleiter zu verwandeln.

Bemühungen zur wirtschaftlichen Nutzbarmachung dieser Erkenntnis ließen sich vor dem Kriege beobachten, und zwar handelte es sich hierbei

Dokument 1, Seite 1

Three reports concerning stopping engines at a distance which were written during the war. English translations are in the main text.



ELEMAG Elektro-mechanische Apparatebaugesellschaft m. b. H.
HILDESHEIM · [illegible] Fernruf Nr. [illegible] Bankkonten: Städt. Sparkasse, Hildesheim Bankhaus Fagel, Hildesheim Postscheckkonto: Hannover [illegible]

Ihr Zeichen: Ihre Nachricht vom: Unsere Zeichen: Tag Betreff:

Blatt 2

hierbei um das Problem der drahtlosen Übertragung elektrischer Energien. Wenn vorwiegend aus patentrechtlichen Gründen auch keine ausführlichen Veröffentlichungen hierüber erfolgt sind, so kann die physikalische Grundlage dieses Problemes heute doch im wesentlichen als gelöst angesehen werden.

Bei einer Auswertung dieser Erkenntnis zur Realisierung des vorgeschlagenen Kampfmittels kann zu einem großen Teil auf diese Unterlagen zurückgegriffen werden. Es istdaher zweckmäßig zunächst Ermittlungen darüber anzustellen, welche Frequenzbereiche hinsichtlich ihrer yonisierenden Wirkung bereits näher untersucht, und welche Ergebnisse dabei erzielt worden sind.

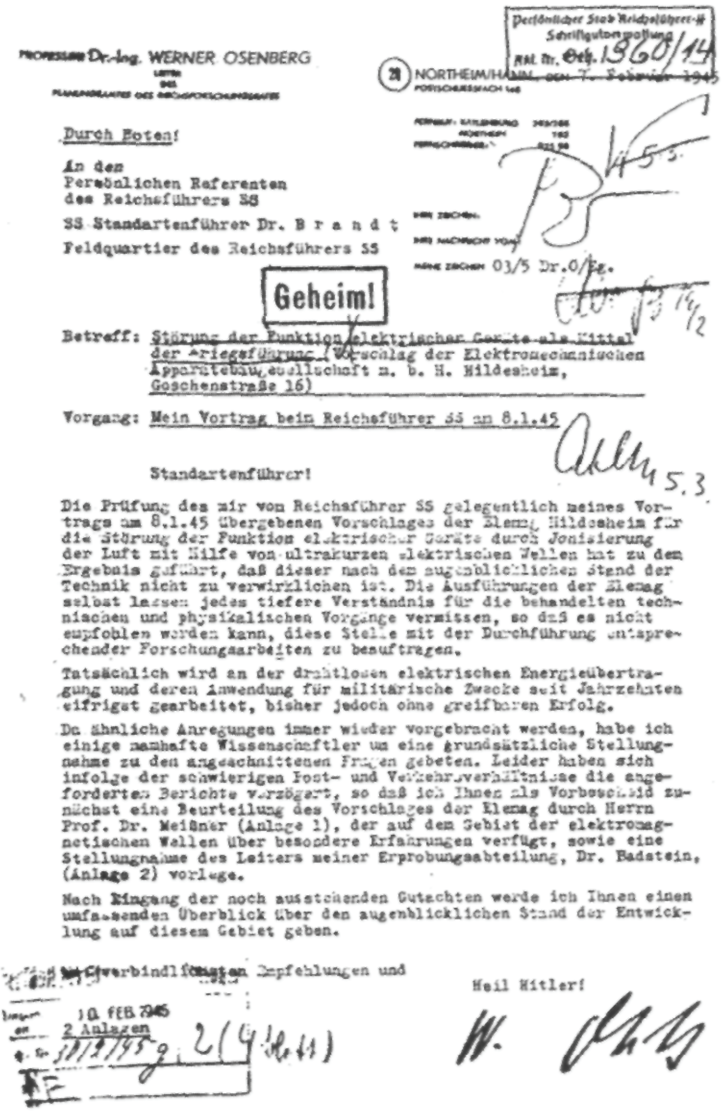
Im Einzelnen sind für jeden infragekommenden Frequenzbereich möglichst unter Zugrundelegung verschiedener Sendeenergien folgende Feststellungen zu treffen:

1. Welcher Leitwert wurde ermittelt. a) Bei Wellenbündelung
   b) " Rundstrahlung
2. Welche wirksame Reichweite wurde erzielt.
   a) Bei Wellenbündelung
   b) " Rundstrahlung
3. Welche Raumstreuung wurde bei Wellenbündelung beobachtet,(auszudrücken durch Angabe der Bündelquerschnitte in den Entfernungen X_a bis X_x von Richtstrahler.)
4. Welche Leitwertänderungen wurden bei zunehmender Streuung in den Abständen X_a bis X_x festgestellt.
5. Einfluß der Leitwertänderungen auf den Kontakteffekt pro Kontaktflächeneinheit.

Nach Klärung dieser 5 Punkte, sei es durch Ermittlung bereits vorliegender Ergebnisse oder durch Eigenversuche, kann ein zusammenfassender Überblick über den Umfang der Wirkung und Anwendbarkeit dieses Kampfmittels gegeben werden.

Da eine Klärung dieser Punkte unter den gegenwertigen Verhältnissen mit privaten Mitteln nicht durchführbar ist, im Interesse der Landesverteidigung jedoch von großer Wichtigkeit sein kann, wird nachgesucht, die erforderlichen Mitteln durch das Reich zur Verfügung zu stellen.

Dokument 1, Seite 2



Persönlicher Stab Reichsführer-SS
Schriftgutverwaltung
Akt. Nr. Geh. 1960/14

PROFESSOR Dr.-Ing. WERNER OSENBERG LEITER
DES
PLANUNGSAMTES DES REICHSFORSCHUNGSRATES

NORTHEIM/HANN., den 7. Februar 1945
POSTSCHLIESSFACH 146

IHR ZEICHEN:
IHRE NACHRICHT VOM:
MEINE ZEICHEN 03/5 Dr.O/Eg.

Durch Boten!

An den
Persönlichen Referenten
des Reichsführers SS
SS-Standartenführer Dr. Brandt
Feldquartier des Reichsführers SS

Geheim!

Betreff: Störung der Funktion elektrischer Geräte als Mittel der Kriegsführung (Vorschlag der Elektrotechnischen Apparatebaugesellschaft m. b. H. Hildesheim, Goschenstraße 16)

Vorgang: Mein Vortrag beim Reichsführer SS am 8.1.45

Standartenführer!

Die Prüfung des mir vom Reichsführer SS gelegentlich meines Vortrags am 8.1.45 übergebenen Vorschlages der Elemag Hildesheim für die Störung der Funktion elektrischer Geräte durch Jonisierung der Luft mit Hilfe von ultrakurzen elektrischen Wellen hat zu dem Ergebnis geführt, daß dieser nach dem augenblicklichen Stand der Technik nicht zu verwirklichen ist. Die Ausführungen der Elemag selbst lassen jedes tiefere Verständnis für die behandelten technischen und physikalischen Vorgänge vermissen, so daß es nicht empfohlen werden kann, diese Stelle mit der Durchführung entsprechender Forschungsarbeiten zu beauftragen.

Tatsächlich wird an der drahtlosen elektrischen Energieübertragung und deren Anwendung für militärische Zwecke seit Jahrzehnten eifrigst gearbeitet, bisher jedoch ohne greifbaren Erfolg.

Da ähnliche Anregungen immer wieder vorgebracht werden, habe ich einige namhafte Wissenschaftler um eine grundsätzliche Stellungnahme zu den angeschnittenen Fragen gebeten. Leider haben sich infolge der schwierigen Post- und Verkehrsverhältnisse die angeforderten Berichte verzögert, so daß ich Ihnen als Vorbescheid zunächst eine Beurteilung des Vorschlages der Elemag durch Herrn Prof. Dr. Meißner (Anlage 1), der auf dem Gebiet der elektromagnetischen Wellen über besondere Erfahrungen verfügt, sowie eine Stellungnahme des Leiters meiner Erprobungsabteilung, Dr. Badstein, (Anlage 2) vorlege.

Nach Eingang der noch ausstehenden Gutachten werde ich Ihnen einen umfassenden Überblick über den augenblicklichen Stand der Entwicklung auf diesem Gebiet geben.

Mit verbindlichsten Empfehlungen und

Heil Hitler!

W.

Eingang 10. FEB. 1945
2 Anlagen
Tgb. Nr. 1012/45 g.

5.3

14/2

Dokument 9

Prof.Dr.A.Meißner
AEG FORSCHUNGS-INSTITUT
Fernsprecher: [illegible]

Persönlicher Stab Reichsführer-SS
Schriftgutverwaltung
Akt. Nr. Geh. 1960/14

Berlin-Reinickendorf-Ost 1, den 1.2.1945
Holländerstraße 31-34

Ergänzung zum Gutachten vom 27.1.1945 zum Erfindungsvorschlag der "Elemag", Elektro-mechanische Apparatebaugesellschaft m.b.H., Hildesheim, Goschenstr.16

Die hier gemachten Vorschläge sind insbesondere im ersten Teil nicht für den Fachmann bestimmt, sondern nur für den Laien. Es ist übrigens nicht zum erstenmal, daß in dieser Art eine Erfindung gemacht wurde, durch Fernübertragung elektrische Apparate unwirksam zu machen. Die Grundlage sollte auch damals sein, daß "die Atmosphäre in außerordentlichem Maße die erforderlichen Voraussetzungen besitzt, daß sie durch Fernbeeinflussung als Isolierstoff ausgeschaltet werden kann." Im vorigen Krieg (~1916) mußten auf höheren Befehl trotz heftigen Einspruchs der Fachkreise mehrere Stellen an der Aufgabe arbeiten, durch Röntgen- oder irgendwelche anderan Strahlen ("Todesstrahlen") die Zündung in Flugzeugen unwirksam zu machen.

Outweighed by patent-right concerns, no ample publications concerning this resulted, so the physical reasons of this problem, even today, in reality can be considered lost. With an evaluation of this knowledge, a realistic proposition of a means of warfare can be reconstructed form this data. Hence, appropriate first research concerning this has not put forth as to which frequency range results in ionizing action. This needs to be more precisely investigated.

In particular for every possible frequency range makes possible various broadcast energies so that the following statements are to be met with:

1. Which values would be ascertained.
   A. By wave packets.
   B. By sweeping radiation.
2. What effective range would be realized.
   A. By wave packets.
   B. By sweeping radiation.
3. What spaces distributions would be observed with wave packets (expressed through statements of packet cross-section in the distance Xa to Xz.
4. What change of values would be established with increasing distribution in the distance from Xa to Xz.
5. What would be the influence of the change of values in the effect of constant per unit area.

Only after clarification of these five points, be it through inquiry into previously submitted results or through individual research, can an inclusive summary concerning the parameters of the workings and applicability of this means of warfare be given.

There is a clarification of these points under the present situation with private means is not feasible. In the interests of the nation's defense, notwithstanding potential greater importance, it will be researched in order to set for the necessary means of enactment throughout the Reich.

* * * * * *

English Translation of the Osenberg Document

Professor Dr. (Engineering) Werner Osenberg

Planning Department of the Reich's Research Council

By Messenger
To the personal Advise of the SS Reichsfuehrers

SS Standartenfuehrer Dr. Brandt
Field Headquarters of the SS Reichsfuehers

Regarding: Disruption of the function of electronic devices as a means of warfare. Proposal of the Electro-Mechanical Device Conductor Company Ltd., Hidesheim, Goschenstrasse 16

Procedure: My report to Reichsfuehrer SS on January 8, 1945

Standartenfuehrer:

The investigation of the proposal of the Elemag Heildesheim Company, that of the disruption of the function of electronic devices through ionization of the atmosphere through the use of ultra-short electromagnetic wave lengths has been brought to a conclusion. I reported to the Reichsfuehrer of the SS concerning this on January 8, 1945. The results are that this can not be realized in technical terms, instantly. The realization of the Elemag itself leaves many deep areas of understanding, concerning procedures of applied technology and physics/ missing, so that it can not be comprehended how these positions correspond with the accomplishment of research work.

Actually, it will take decades to turn the wireless energy transmission to military goals even with zealous work. At this point, it is without tangible success.

There, similar stimulation has frequently been brought forth. I have a notable scientist whom I requested to fundamental opinion in dissection of this question. Unfortunately, as a result of the difficulties of mail and circumstances of communications, the preliminary, an evaluation of the proposal of the Elemag company can be arranged by Professor Dr. Meissner (appendix 1) who works in the area of electromagnetic waves on an especially practical level as well as an option of the leader of my testing division, Dr. Badstein (appendix 2).

After the input of these outstanding assessors, I will give you a comprehensive overview of the current position of development in this area.

Courteous regards and Heil Hitler, Dr Werner Osenberg

* * * * * * *

English Translation of the Meissner Document

Professor Dr. A. Meissner
General Electric Company, Research Institute

Commentary of assessment of January 27, 1945 to the research proposal of "Elemag" Elektro-mechaniche Apparetebaugesellschaft m.b.n.(Electro-mechanical Device Construction Co. Ltd.) Hildescheim, Goschenstrasse 16

The proposal made, especially in the first part is not for the technical person decidedly important. On the contrary, it is meant for the lay person. It is not, moreover, the first time this sort of discovery has been made, through long distance transmission of electromagnetic energy a device being made dysfunctional. The underlying principle was also formerly that the atmosphere, in a strong measure, possessed the necessary prerequisite that in can be influenced remotely through the insulation medium. In the previous war, 1916, an order came from high up, in spite of severe protests, and technical circles worked on various positions concerning this question, which was through Roentgen or some other ray ("death rays") to make the ignition in aircraft unworkable.

* * * * * * *

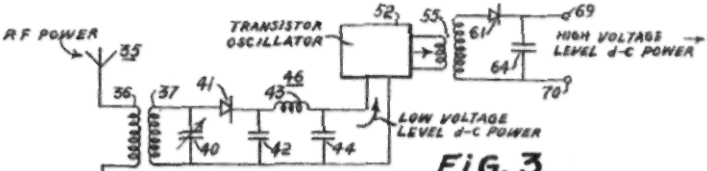
It should be noted that we are going to run into Dr. Meissner again in his position with the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute in which he worked on a project in conjunction with the I.G. Farben company, Ludwigshafen on laser weaponry.

POSSIBLE RELATED PATENT

The first words of a report by the American British Laboratory of Radio Research Laboratory, January 30, 1945, stamped "Secret" read:

"Calculations by J.M. Hollywood of ABL-15 indicated

Nov. 12, 1957 L. R. CRUMP 2,813,242
POWERING ELECTRICAL DEVICES WITH ENERGY
ABSTRACTED FROM THE ATMOSPHERE
Filed March 12, 1954



RF POWER
35
56
37
41
43
46 40
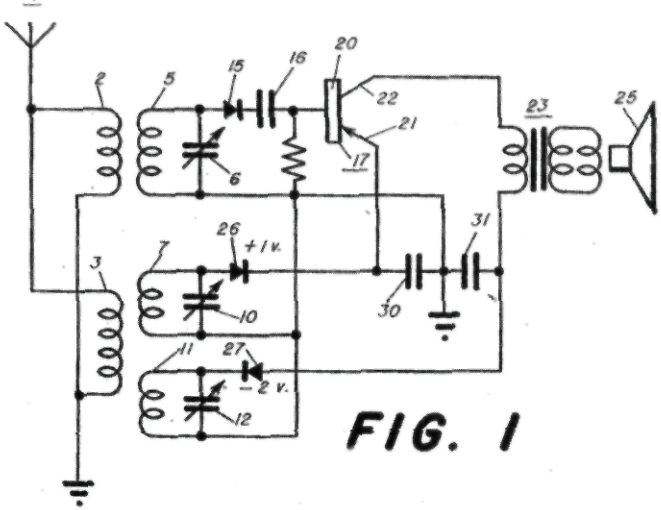
42
44
TRANSISTOR OSCILLATOR
52
55
61
64
69
70
HIGH VOLTAGE LEVEL d-c POWER
LOW VOLTAGE LEVEL d-c POWER

FiG. 3



1
2
5
15
16 20
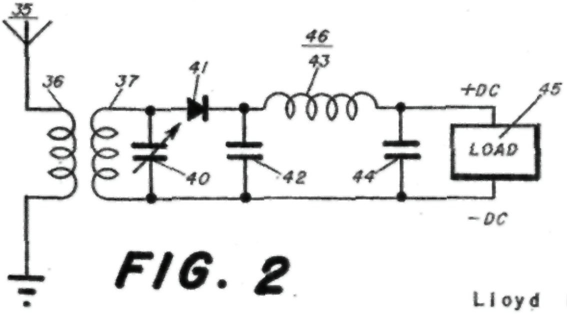
22
21
17
6
23
25
3
7
26
+1 v.
10
30
31
11
27
-2 v.
12

FIG. 1



35
36
37
41
46
43
40
42
44
+DC
45
LOAD
-DC

FIG. 2

INVENTOR
Lloyd R. Crump

BY W.E.Thibodeau + A.W. Dew
ATTORNEYS

Dr. Gordon Freeman look one look at this patent and concluded that a similar principle may have been responsible for the workings of the magnetic wove weapon In the patent, radio waves are received and turned into a small electric current which might charge up a battery, for instance. In the magnetic wave weapon, radio waves, generated by all ignition-based engines, would be received, amplified, and re-broadcast to be absorbed by all the metal parts of that same target engine. Absorption by the engine would cause a short circuit in the same wave frequency and wave length and ignition liming as the original signal coming from the engine. This would result in misfiring of the engine.

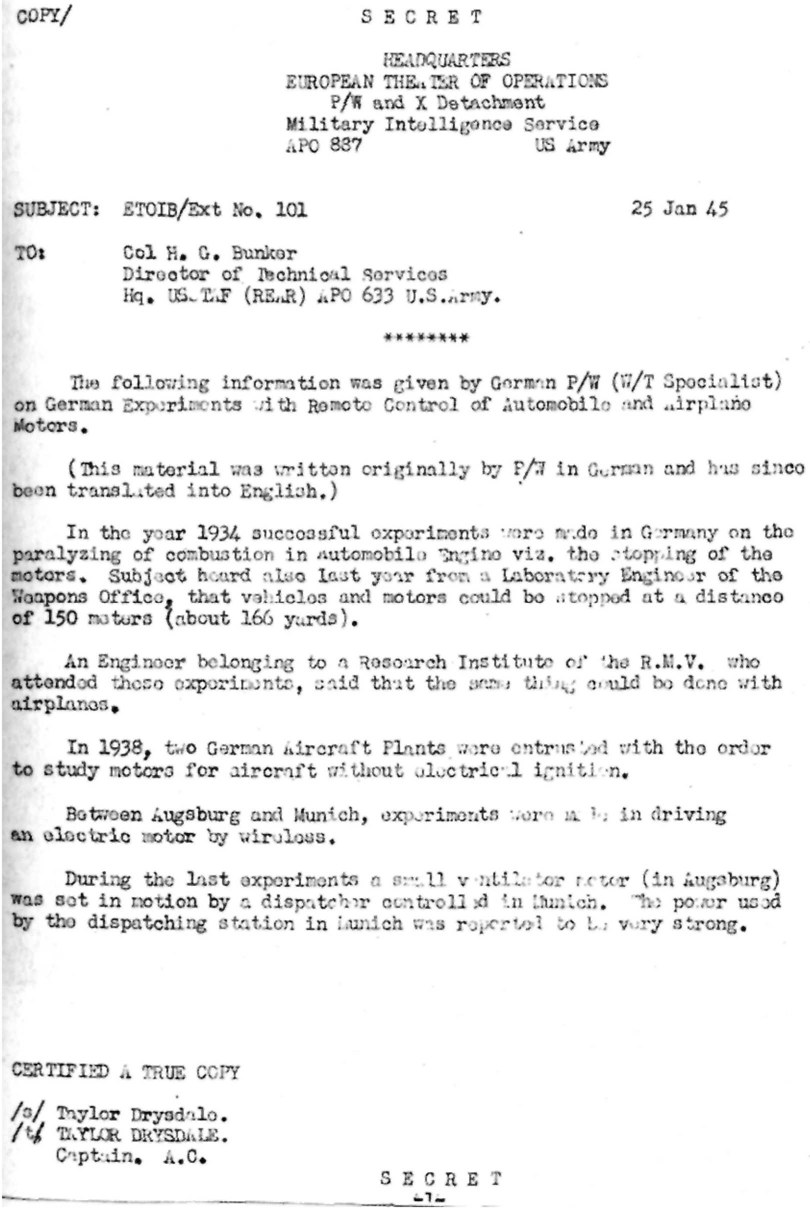
that the most economical means of disturbing an aircraft's ignition system would probably employ electromagnetic radio frequency transmissions recurrent at a rate near the frequency of the engine's ignition cycle."

Something in its name caused this writer to order a copy of a 1954 patent granted L. R. Crump titled: "Powering Electrical Devices With Energy Abstracted Form The Atmosphere"[4]. Diagrams from that patent are shown here. The patent does not quite live up to its promise. Instead of extracting energy from the atmosphere in a free-energy manner, it captures energy from local radio stations, in the form of their radio programming and turns this energy, not into sound as does a radio receiver and speaker system, but into pulses of energy which are gathered and smoothed into a small but useable energy flow. Small electric devices can be powered using this device or small batteries can be recharged using it.

I sent a copy of this patent to Dr. Gordon Freeman as I had told him of the patent's name and its implied promise. Dr. Freeman wrote back to me saying that the patent had value after all. In fact, he said that this patent might have a bearing on the famous Motorstoppmittel device. What he meant might be best illustrated using an automobile engine.

In an automobile's engine it is common practice to keep each ignition wire separate and separated from every other ignition wire in that engine using air as insulating space as well as plastic spacers. The reason for this is that sometimes, especially at high rpms, the firing of one wire, when touching another wire, will induce a current in that second wire which will cause its spark plug to fire out of sequence. This is called misfiring. Misfiring can cause many problems in an engine, including causing it to halt.

Now, suppose a special device were built with an antenna, which could receive the electromagnetic waves generated by an engine instead of a radio transmitter. This is not so hard since ignition engines produce radio frequency signals all through their ignition cycle. Special and specific shielding has to be incorporated into most engines in order for us to hear our car radios as we drive. As soon as our special device received the incoming ignition signals, they were exactly duplicated and amplified. Then they are re-broadcast by a powerful antenna right back to the original source. The source, the



COPY/

SECRET

HEADQUARTERS
EUROPEAN THEATER OF OPERATIONS
P/W and X Detachment
Military Intelligence Service
APO 887 US Army

SUBJECT: ETOIB/Ext No. 101 25 Jan 45

TO: Col H. G. Bunker
Director of Technical Services
Hq. USSTAF (REAR) APO 633 U.S.Army.

****

The following information was given by German P/W (W/T Specialist) on German Experiments with Remote Control of Automobile and airplane Motors.

(This material was written originally by P/W in German and has since been translated into English.)

In the year 1934 successful experiments were made in Germany on the paralyzing of combustion in automobile Engine viz. the stopping of the motors. Subject heard also last year from a Laboratory Engineer of the Weapons Office, that vehicles and motors could be stopped at a distance of 150 meters (about 166 yards).

An Engineer belonging to a Research Institute of the R.M.V. who attended these experiments, said that the same thing could be done with airplanes.

In 1938, two German Aircraft Plants were entrusted with the order to study motors for aircraft without electrical ignition.

Between Augsburg and Munich, experiments were made in driving an electric motor by wireless.

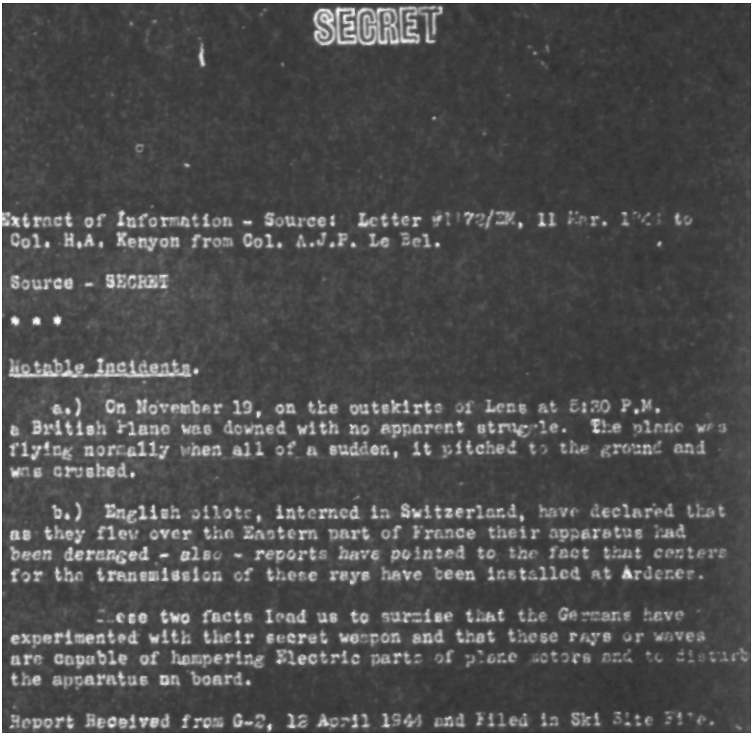
During the last experiments a small ventilator motor (in Augsburg) was set in motion by a dispatcher controlled in Munich. The power used by the dispatching station in Munich was reported to be very strong.

CERTIFIED A TRUE COPY

/s/ Taylor Drysdale.
/t/ TAYLOR DRYSDALE.
Captain. A.C.

SECRET

A military intelligence report describing magnetic wave development.



SECRET

Extract of Information - Source: Letter #1172/ZM, 11 Mar. 1944 to Col. H.A. Kenyon from Col. A.J.P. Le Bel.

Source - SECRET

* * *

Notable Incidents.

a.) On November 19, on the outskirts of Lens at 5:30 P.M. a British Plane was downed with no apparent struggle. The plane was flying normally when all of a sudden, it pitched to the ground and was crushed.

b.) English pilots, interned in Switzerland, have declared that as they flew over the Eastern part of France their apparatus had been deranged - also - reports have pointed to the fact that centers for the transmission of these rays have been installed at Ardenes.

These two facts lead us to surmise that the Germans have experimented with their secret weapon and that these rays or waves are capable of hampering Electric parts of plane motors and to disturb the apparatus on board.

Report Received from G-2, 12 April 1944 and Filed in Ski Site File.

A Secret report describing the downing of a British aircraft by magnetic wave.

engine, picks up our transmission thorough its metal parts and wires. Through these engine parts and wiring electrical energy is induced just as it is with the misfiring ignition wires in our earlier example. The result is the same, a misfiring engine. At best, this engine runs rough. Other small and sensitive electromagnetic devices such as the aircraft's gauges and gyros also malfunction. At worst, the aircraft's misfiring is so bad that the engine stalls or fires in complete opposition to its proper firing order so that it actually breaks apart.

Something similar to this simple description is the probable paradigm for the famous and super-secret Motorstoppmittel.

SOURCES

1. Haarmann, D.H., 1985, pages 26-27, 111 Geheime Wunderwaffen Ueber den Krieg hinaus!, Hugn Gesellschaft fuer Politisch - Philosophische Studien E.V.

2. Pennick, Nigel, 1981, page 169, Hitler's Secret Sciences, Neville Spearman Limited.

3. American British Laboratory of Radio Research Laboratory, Januray 30, 1945, Unexplained Interference with Allied Aircraft Engines over Enemy Territory", Great Malvern, Wores

4. United States Patent, Patent Number 2,813,242,11/12/57, Granted to Lloyd R. Crump, titled: "Powering Electrical Devices With Energy Abstracted From The Atmosphere".

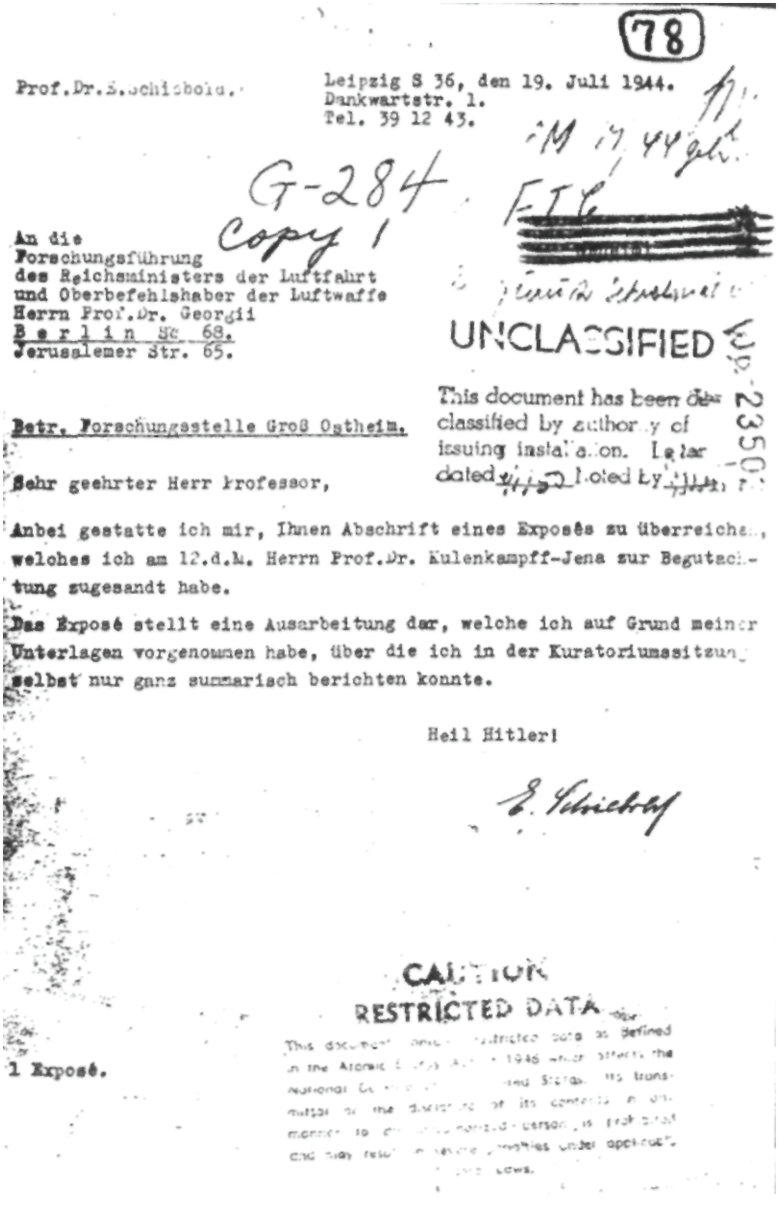
26 "Death Rays"
X-Ray—Gamma Ray Weapon

Sometimes the magnetic wave/Motorstoppmittel is called a "death ray" but it was passive in nature and meant to kill engines, not people. The first type of real death ray we will encounter is of the x-ray or gamma ray type. We know this was worked upon during the Third Reich because we have the actual scientific study detailing the feasibility of such a weapon.

Perhaps most amazing is that the information contained in this chapter comes from the German government itself. This information comes in the form of a report from the Forschungezentrum at Karlsruhe. They graciously provided a copy of a report, upon a simple written request, which is titled: "Ueber die Moeglichkeit biologischer Wirkungen kurswelliger Roentgen-bsw. Gammastrahlen von Roentgenroehren besonderer Bauart auf groessere Entfernungen". This translates into English as something like: "Concerning the possibility of biologic effects of short wave x-rays, respectively, gamma rays from x-ray tubes of special construction at great distance".

This report dates from the Second World War, 1944, is of poor quality, and illegible in many sections. Sometimes reports copied on and off microfilm have the same fuzzy quality of this text, although the real reason for its fuzziness is unknown. Accompanying the document came a letter from the research center explaining that original material itself was of poor quality and was not possible to improve upon the copy as generated. Portions of that document are reproduced here.

This report could properly be called a design study



78

Prof.Dr.E.Schiebold.

Leipzig S 36, den 19. Juli 1944.
Dankwartstr. 1.
Tel. 39 12 43.

G-284
Copy 1

[redacted]

UNCLASSIFIED

This document has been declassified by authority of issuing installation. Letter dated [illegible] Noted by [illegible]

Wp. 2350

An die
Forschungsführung
des Reichsministers der Luftfahrt und Oberbefehlshaber der Luftwaffe
Herrn Prof.Dr. Georgii
Berlin SW 68.
Jerusalemer Str. 65.

Betr. Forschungsstelle Groß Ostheim.

Sehr geehrter Herr Professor,

Anbei gestatte ich mir, Ihnen Abschrift eines Exposés zu überreichen, welches ich am 12.d.M. Herrn Prof.Dr. Kulenkampff-Jena zur Begutachtung zugesandt habe.

Das Exposé stellt eine Ausarbeitung dar, welche ich auf Grund meiner Unterlagen vorgenommen habe, über die ich in der Kuratoriumssitzung selbst nur ganz summarisch berichten konnte.

Heil Hitler!

E. Schiebold

1 Exposé.

CAUTION
RESTRICTED DATA

This document contains restricted data as defined in the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 which affects the National Defense of the United States. Its transmittal or the disclosure of its contents in any manner to an unauthorized person is prohibited and may result in severe penalties under applicable Federal laws.

Cover page of a German design study concerning the utilization of an x-ray anti-aircraft weapon with translation following.

Prof. Dr. E. Schiebold
Dankwartstr. 1 Tel. 39 12 43.

Leipzig, S 36, 7/19/44

On the conducting of research of the Reich Ministry of Aeronautics and Commander in Chief of The Air Force Herrn Professor Doctor Georgii Berlin SW 68 Jerusalemer Str. 65.

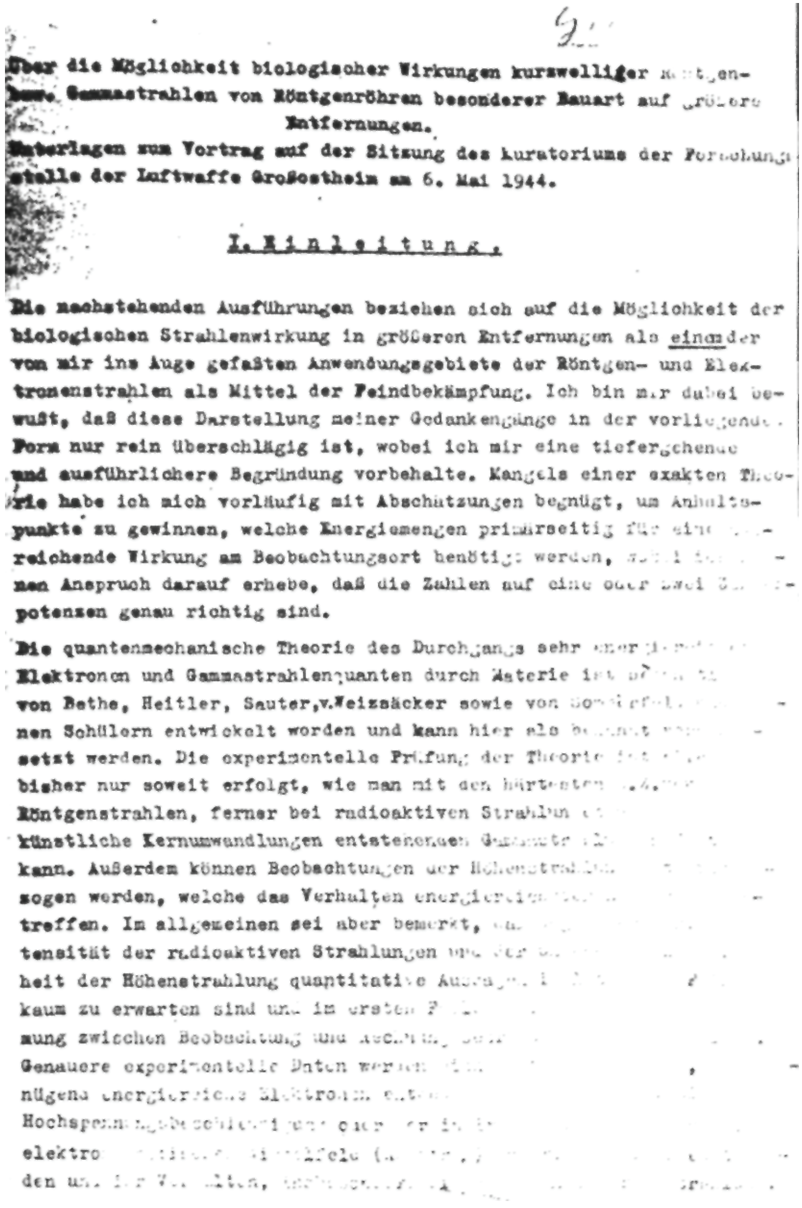
In Reference to the Research Installation Gross Ostheim

Very Honored Herr Professor,

Enclosed permit me to present to you the transcript of an expose which I have sent to Professor Dr. Kulenkampff at Jena for an expert opinion.

This expose describes the carrying out of a plan which for reason of support I have undertaken and about which I in the board of trustees position am only able to report summarily.

Heil Hitler,



92

Über die Möglichkeit biologischer Wirkungen kurzwelliger [illegible]

bzw. Gammastrahlen von Röntgenröhren besonderer Bauart auf [illegible]

Entfernungen.

Unterlagen zum Vortrag auf der Sitzung des Kuratoriums der [illegible]stelle der Luftwaffe Großostheim am 6. Mai 1944.

I. Einleitung.

Die nachstehenden Ausführungen beziehen sich auf die Möglichkeit der biologischen Strahlenwirkung in größeren Entfernungen als einander von mir ins Auge gefaßten Anwendungsgebiete der Röntgen- und Elektronenstrahlen als Mittel der Feindbekämpfung. Ich bin mir dabei bewußt, daß diese Darstellung meiner Gedankengänge in der vorliegenden Form nur rein überschlägig ist, wobei ich mir eine tiefergehende und ausführlichere Begründung vorbehalte. Mangels einer exakten Theorie habe ich mich vorläufig mit Abschätzungen begnügt, um Anhaltspunkte zu gewinnen, welche Energiemengen primärseitig für eine [illegible]reichende Wirkung am Beobachtungsort benötigt werden, [illegible]nen Anspruch darauf erhebe, daß die Zahlen auf eine oder zwei [illegible]potenzen genau richtig sind.

Die quantenmechanische Theorie des Durchgangs sehr [illegible] Elektronen und Gammastrahlenquanten durch Materie ist [illegible] von Bethe, Heitler, Sauter, v. Weizsäcker sowie von [illegible]nen Schülern entwickelt worden und kann hier als [illegible]setzt werden. Die experimentelle Prüfung der Theorie [illegible] bisher nur soweit erfolgt, wie man mit den härtesten [illegible] Röntgenstrahlen, ferner bei radioaktiven Strahlun[illegible] künstliche Kernumwandlungen entstehenden [illegible] kann. Außerdem können Beobachtungen der [illegible]zogen werden, welche das Verhalten [illegible]treffen. Im allgemeinen sei aber bemerkt, [illegible]tensität der radioaktiven Strahlungen [illegible]heit der Höhenstrahlung quantitative [illegible] kaum zu erwarten sind [illegible]mung zwischen [illegible] Genauere [illegible] nügend [illegible] Hochsp[illegible] elektro[illegible] den [illegible]

This is the Introduction to the report. This report was stored on microfilm and the quality is very bad. On the following page is a partial translation.

Concerning the Possibility of Biologic Effects of Short Wave X-Rays, respectively, Gammarays from X-Ray Tubes of Special Construction at Great Range.

1. Introduction

This exposition concerns the possibility of the biologic beam effects at great range as one means I have seized upon as a sphere of application of the x-ray and a beam of electrons as a means of fighting the enemy. I know that this description of my train of thought in the present form is guite rough whereby I reserve a deeper going basis and completeness of detail.

For want of an exact theory I have used a preliminary evaluation in order to obtain which energy admixtures primarily sided for a far reaching effectiveness of an observation spot will be necessary------------ claims arising that a number of one or two--are exactly correct.

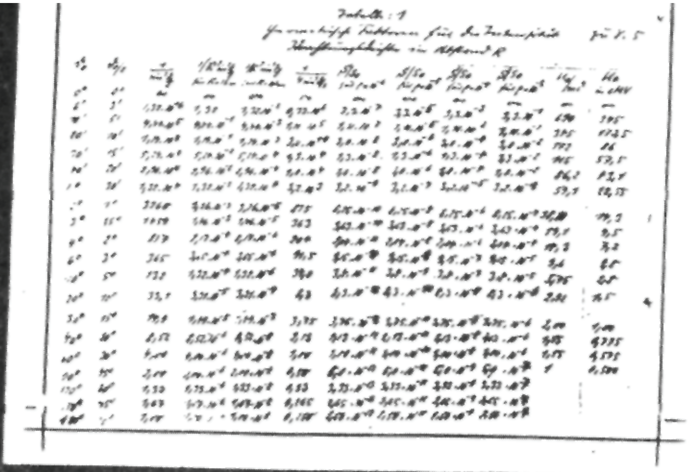
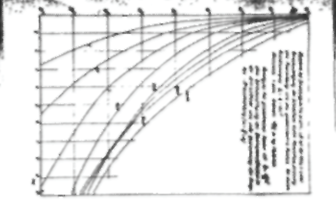
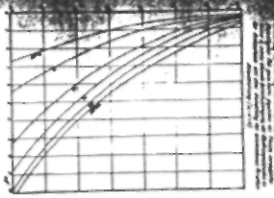
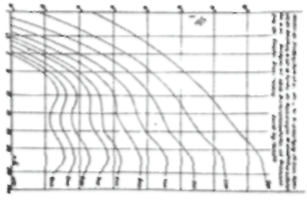
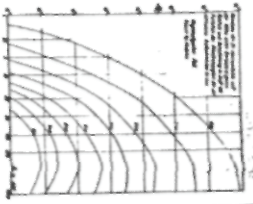
(text not legible)











These are two sample pages of the report.

in America. It was written by a Professor Dr. E. Schiebold to the research effort of the Reich Ministers of the Air Transport and the Supreme Commander of the Air Force, Professor Dr. Georgii on July, 19, 1944.

A stamp on the face of the document, "Caution Restricted Data", which dates from the post-war occupational period, advises the reader that this document involves restricted data as defined by the Atomic Energy Agency as of 1946 and that disclosure of its contents to an unauthorized person is prohibited. Another stamp on the cover dated 1/1/50 or 4/1/50 declassifies the document.

Inspire of the fact that much of: the text of the report is illegible, the summary can be read. From what can be learned Dr. Schiebold used mathematical models to evaluate three types of x-ray weapons. If physical models were constructed in order to obtain mathematical values is unknown to this writer. The weapons were designed for antiaircraft purposes. Much of the report is technical.

These ray guns were to be mounted on an adjustable stand and aimed at enemy aircraft. The objective was not to shoot down the aircraft but to harm the pilot of the aircraft. An effective dose necessary to cause biologic harm was calculated. This dose varied in time depending upon the intensity of the x-ray beam itself. At weaker values the time on target had to be longer to be effective. Intensity of the beam depended upon the energy input, beam thickness and the scattering effect as the beam goes through the atmosphere as well as the distance from the target. Higher values of effectiveness, that is biologic harm, could be achieved with higher voltages and greater beam thicknesses. Beam thickness seems to be dependent upon the size of the anode in the gun's design. In practice one can see that various atmospheric conditions and high-speed aircraft only complicate the picture.

Three different ray-gun designs were evaluated. They were ascribed mathematical values for targets at various altitudes and time on target and given in two scenarios, under most favorable and least favorable circumstances. The first type was unacceptable for antiaircraft purposes. The second type was only marginal under some of the most favorable circumstances. The third type was more acceptable. It featured a large surface anode. A dose of 7 rads per second at a distance of 5 kilometers with a time on target of 30 seconds, which was achievable with this weapon, was considered adequate to inflict irreversible biologic harm to the crew of the aircraft. This is a range of about three miles or a little over 15,000 feet. Of course, shorter time on target periods were possible for nearer targets.

One finding of the report involves the scattering effect. It was found that the metal skin of the aircraft scattered the radiation from this weapon and produced stronger biologic harm to the inhabitants of that aircraft than a dose straight from the beam weapon itself. In other words, the skin of the aircraft acted like a microwave oven, more efficiently cooking the crew.

Also according to the report the most sensitive parts of the human body, thus those most easily harmed, were the gonads which do not repair themselves once damaged in this manner. This means that even should the crew escape with their lives once hit with this weapon, they face the possibility of sterility, cancer or other long-term damage. Employment of this weapon certainly would have had negative effects on the morale of the enemy once these facts were understood.

The weapon was never fielded. The reason was probably the issue of "time on target". It does not seem likely that a weapon could be trained upon an enemy aircraft for the required time duration in a combat situation. One still wonders why it was not considered for ground combat applications. It might have had value defending fixed targets such as mountain passes or bridges.

Nevertheless, the work of Dr. Scheibold constitutes legitimate research into the concept of a death ray. Somehow, Dr. Schiebold found a way to weaponize x-rays and gamma rays. Somehow, they were focussed on a distant target. The possibility of using X-rays has been recently raised again in regards to the proposed "Star Wars" defense shield. This is another matter involving destruction of hardware, not people, but the German success in focussing X-rays should be kept in mind.

SOURCES

1. Schiebold, E. Professor Dr., 1944, Ueber die Moeglichkeit biologischer Wirkungen kurzwelliger Roentgen-bsw. Gammastrahlen von Roentgenroehren besonderer Bauart auf groessere Entfernungen. Forschungszenturm karlsruhe Technik und Umwelt, Karlsruhe, Germany

27 "Death Rays"
Laser Weapon

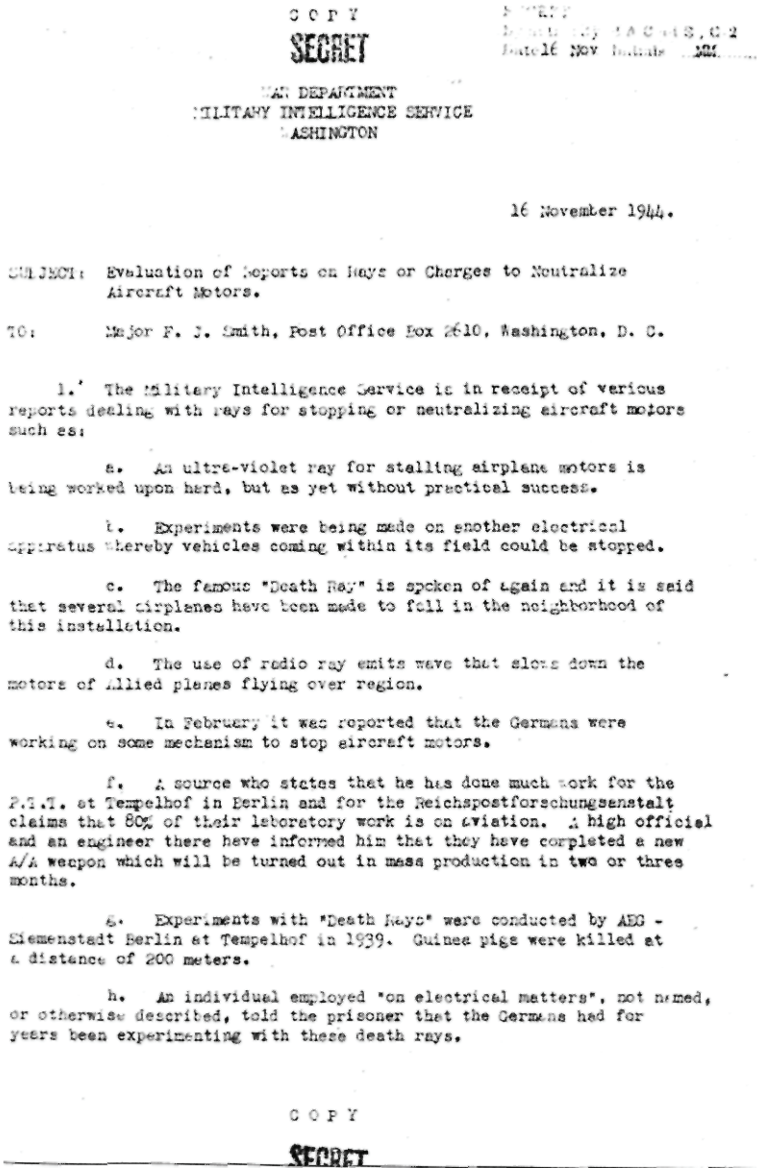
It is almost inconceivable that almost sixty years ago anyone could have developed something with which we are struggling to develop at this very moment. Yet, there are many rumors and some evidence that the Germans were actively working on a laser weapon in the mid-1940s. We will dispense with some of the more vague, sensational evidence and focus on references to which, firstly, a name and a reputation are attached and, secondly, to evidence brought forth by the United States government.

Two bits of information come to us from sources which should have been informed. These are from German U-boat captains. U-boat captains were highly trained, highly selected individuals for whom the German military as well as the culture itself had the utmost respect. They would have received a great deal more information concerning the weaponry than the average citizen or fighting man.

Herbert Werner discusses death rays in his book Iron Coffins. This book was the principal source for the film "Das Boot". Captain Werner needed no sensationalism, his truth was sensational enough. He makes the comments in response to comments by a downed American pilot and explains Zhis thinking:

"I was thinking about our much-discussed new weapons, including death rays and atom bombs, which were now in the development stage".[1]

"Death rays" are called "much-discussed" and



C O P Y

SECRET

[illegible]
[illegible] A C of S, G-2
Date 16 Nov Initials [illegible]

WAR DEPARTMENT
MILITARY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE
WASHINGTON

16 November 1944.

SUBJECT: Evaluation of Reports on Rays or Charges to Neutralize Aircraft Motors.

TO: Major F. J. Smith, Post Office Box 2610, Washington, D. C.

1. The Military Intelligence Service is in receipt of various reports dealing with rays for stopping or neutralizing aircraft motors such as:

a. An ultra-violet ray for stalling airplane motors is being worked upon hard, but as yet without practical success.

b. Experiments were being made on another electrical apparatus whereby vehicles coming within its field could be stopped.

c. The famous "Death Ray" is spoken of again and it is said that several airplanes have been made to fall in the neighborhood of this installation.

d. The use of radio ray emits wave that slows down the motors of Allied planes flying over region.

e. In February it was reported that the Germans were working on some mechanism to stop aircraft motors.

f. A source who states that he has done much work for the P.T.T. at Tempelhof in Berlin and for the Reichspostforschungsanstalt claims that 80% of their laboratory work is on aviation. A high official and an engineer there have informed him that they have completed a new A/A weapon which will be turned out in mass production in two or three months.

g. Experiments with "Death Rays" were conducted by AEG - Siemenstadt Berlin at Tempelhof in 1939. Guinea pigs were killed at a distance of 200 meters.

h. An individual employed "on electrical matters", not named, or otherwise described, told the prisoner that the Germans had for years been experimenting with these death rays.

C O P Y

SECRET

A short summary-report dealing with German "death rays". Note item "g" which clearly deals with the killing of test animals. This is in contrast to the other entries which deal with stopping of ignition engines. Two pages.

C O P Y

SECRET

Date 16 Nov [illegible]

i. It is believed that it is a sort of magnetic beam, capable of stopping the motors of planes at a great distance.

j. Experiments of which he knew, (1) destroying the functions of aircraft motors with induced magnetic fields, (2) exploding aircraft in the air by direct ultra-violet ray.

k. This weapon which emits waves or rays based on piezo-electricity is a development of the death ray. It is known that tests were made in 1938 and that a distance of eight hundred meters an automobile motor was successfully stopped.

l. The Germans will use within next three weeks new generator which is capable of stopping motors.

2. An hypothesis has been received stating that by use of rays or charges the atmosphere surrounding the airplane engine could be ionized, causing the ignition system to spark at joints and also where the insulation has been cracked or broken, thereby causing a short circuit of the spark plug.

3. Any evaluation or opinion you may be able to render on the existence or practicability of any rays or charges, to include probable type of emission, range, size of installation required, would be highly appreciated.

For the Chief, Military Intelligence Service:

MERILLAT MOSES,
Lt. Colonel, F.A.,
Chief, Scientific Branch, MIS.

EIDM - 1st Ind.

War Department, P. O. Box 2610, Washington, D. C., 30 November 1944.

To: Chief, Military Intelligence Service, Washington, D. C.
(Attention: Lt. Col. Merillat Moses, Chief, Scientific Branch, MIS)

Attached herewith is memorandum requested in basic communication.

F. J. SMITH,
Major, C.E.

Inclosure:
Memo., 29/Nov/44.

C O P Y

SECRET

mentioned as concrete reality in the same breath as the German atomic bomb project.

Heinz Schaeffer, Captain of U-977, surrendered his U-boat at Mar del Plata Argentina nearly four months after the war in Europe ended. In making this trip from the North Atlantic to the South Atlantic, he did so almost entirely underwater using the newly installed Schnorkel device. In that era, this was the longest underwater voyage ever made.

In his book, Captain Schaeffer describes a chance meeting and conversation on a train in the twilight days of Nazi Germany:

"Next to me sat an S.S. officer who, in spite of my flatly contradicting him, simply would not stop talking about decisive new secret weapons. I was fed up with secret weapons by now for I knew perfectly well from my own experience that if all the blueprints were there so were the air-raids on our factories. "Well, of course, you aren't really in a position to judge," he said, but he was, naturally, because he was working at some S.S. H.Q. or other and was out watching the tests every day. If I would only come and look him up I would see something that would make me sit up.

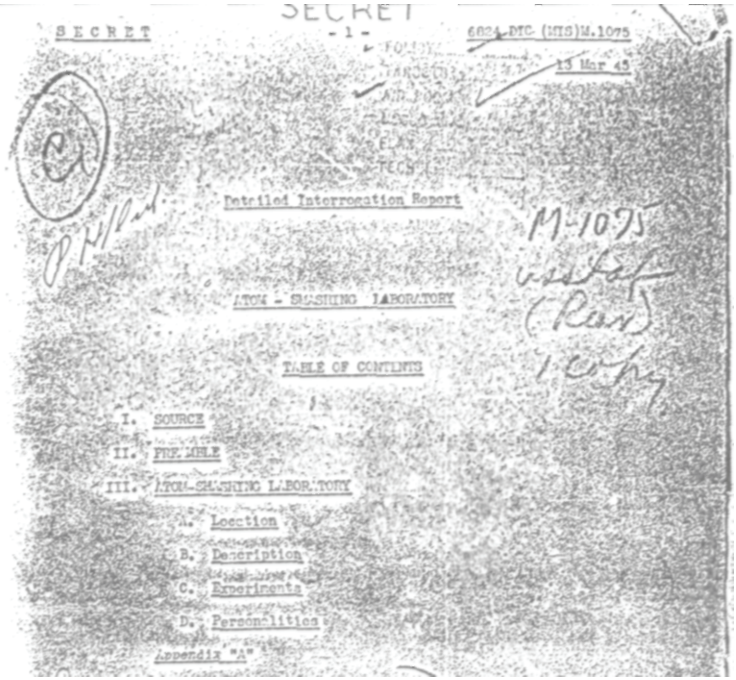
When I got to Berlin I really did look him up, and after I had waited at the H.Q. entrance for some time my new acquaintance appeared and started showing me round. Everybody there was certain we were going to win, with a conviction I'd never seen the like of even after the fall of France. Among the fantastic contrivances of which I was shown photographs was one called a death ray which my friend wanted me to come back and see in action the next day.

But I wasn't wasting any more time. I wanted to see my mother, for it was obvious the Russians were advancing on Berlin and that the last battle was going to be fought there."[2]

Captain Schaeffer saw photographs but missed the actual demonstration. From his account, we know that the project in question was run by the SS and that it was perhaps based in Berlin.

Mention of a death ray of the type under discussion also appears in an unlikely source. Michael Bar-Zohar, writing in the "Nazi Hunter" genre, raises death rays:

"There was also a vague report on the mysterious



SECRET

SECRET - 1 - 6824 DIC (MIS)M.1075

13 Mar 45

M-1075
USSTAF
(Rear)
1 copy

Detailed Interrogation Report

ATOM - SMASHING LABORATORY

TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. SOURCE
II. PREAMBLE
III. ATOM-SMASHING LABORATORY
    A. Location
    B. Description
    C. Experiments
    D. Personalities
Appendix "A"

Laser weapon! This is a Secret prisoner of war interrogation in which the details of the laser weapon experiment were explained including a diagram of the laser testing facility. This was taken from microfilm.

THIS PAGE IS UNCLASSIFIED

DETAILED INTERROGATION REPORT

I. SOURCE

Name : SCHMETTLER, Karl Rank : Unteroffizier
Unit : PANZER 33
Captured : 1 Dec 44, DIFFERTEN -
Interrogation : 6824 DIC (MIS), 2 Mar 45

II. PREAMBLE

An 18 year old technician from LUDWIGSHAFEN. At first, he confirmed his previous story, as given in Report 2/32 (see NOTE, below). He was then questioned as to his technical knowledge of electronics, and it was found that he could not answer even elementary questions on the subject. He then stated that his original story was false.

PW now states that he was never, for any length of time, associated with a German University, or TECHNISCHE HOCHSCHULE, and that he cannot give information concerning the University of HEIDELBERG.

Although it is believed that PW is telling the truth, it is felt that his information should not be given a high reliability rating.

The information contained in this Report has been obtained at this Hq with the assistance of the Technical Liaison Division Office of the Chief Signals Officer, ETO.

Reliability : C-5

(NOTE: This Report should be read in conjunction with Mobile Field Interrogation Unit No 2 PW Intelligence Bulletin No 2/32, dated 30 Jan 45. See para 12, entitled "Atom-Smashing Experiments").

III. ATOM-SMASHING LABORATORY

A. Location

Ref Map: GERMANY 1: 25,000 GSGS 4414
Sheet 6416, FRANKENTHAL, Revised Oct 44

Photo Ref: ACIU Interpretation Report K 3228, 2 Oct 44

5021 0C50 PW stated that the experiments described in Report 2/32 (see NOTE, above) were carried out in an underground structure, located at MR, in the I.G.FARBEN Plant at LUDWIGSHAFEN.

In Sep 44, PW heard that the Experimental Station was to be moved to an unspecified location in either HEIDELBERG, or FREIBURG/Breisgau.

B. Description (See Appendix "A")

The laboratory consisted of a concrete underground shelter, approx 50 meters long, 25 meters wide, and 8 to 10 meters high. Concrete walls were between 75 cms and 1 meter thick. The shelter was entered at ground level, but was not [illegible] visible from the air.

The floor, and a strip 4 or 5 meters wide, along the inside walls approx 2 meters above floor level, were covered with a 3 to 5-cm thick plastic layer know as IGELIT.

One end of the laboratory contained a recess housing 5 or 6 Electronic Tubes, referred to as FANGPOLE and SPRUEHPOLE. These rested on special trolleys, and could be moved foward into the focusing area. The sides and rear of the tubes were shielded by a semi-circular quartz plate.

At the other end of the Laboratory was the Observation and Control Station, shielded in front and at the sides by a semi-cicular, transparent quartz plate. This station contained electrical controls.

Opposite this station was a target stand, consisting of a 1.25 to 1.5-meter high column, surrounded by a 5-cm thick, approx 1.25-meter long and 1.25-meter wide quartz plate. A vacuum system (details unspecified) was incorporated in the target stand. All parts of the stand had been sprayed with the plastic IGELIT.

C. Experiments

FW could add little to the information in Report 2/32.

Experiment with Rats

In the experiment of Apr 44 (See Report 2/32), FW stated that, when the rats were bombarded by the rays, a phosphorescent glow was observed over their bodies, lasting about a fifth of a second. FW believed that the rats had been reduced to a gaseous Sodium (?), which had been drawn into the vacuum system of the test stand.

D. Personalities

The following men took part in the laboratory experiments:

1. KAISER WILHELM Institute

   KALB, Diplom Ingenieur
   MEISSNER, Diplom Ingenieur
   FALKE, Diplom Ingenieur
   HAERINGER, Studienrat

2. I.G.FARBEN/Ludwigshafen

   WENDT, Diplom Ingenieur
   RAITHEL, Diplom Ingenieur
   EDLEFSEN, Ingenieur

WHG (Ed: ARP)

FOR THOMAS C. VAN CLEVE, LT COL
Commanding 6824 DIC (MIS)
Ivo V. Giannini
IVO V GIANNINI
Major, INF,
Army Section

13 Mar 45

DISTRIBUTION

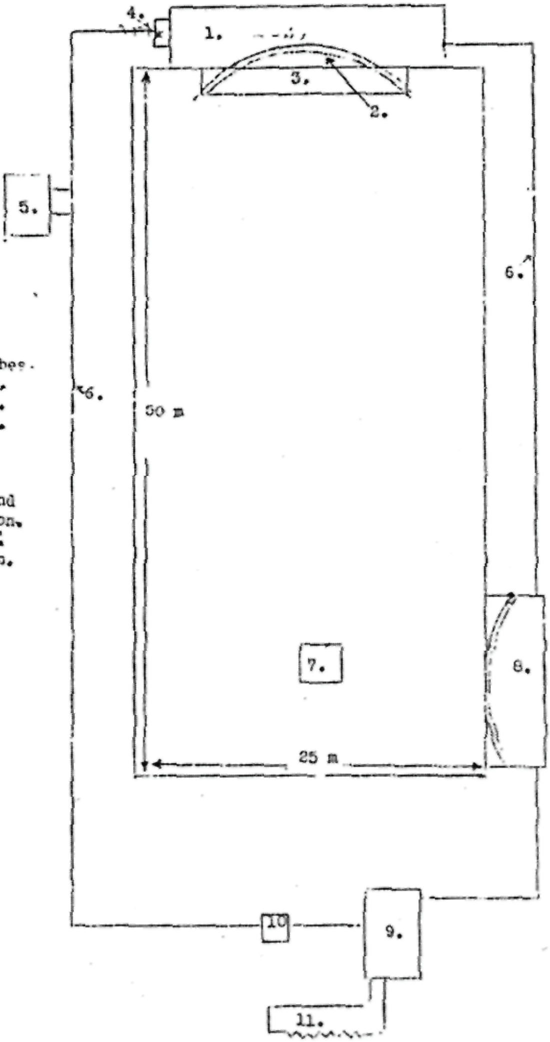
JICA, AFHQ	4
SHAEF	8
ETOUSA	8
6 Army Group	5
12 ArmyGroup	8
21 ArmyGroup	1
7 Army	8
AU 500	2
MI 14 (j)	3
MI 19	3
MIRS	2
G-2 (CI), AFHQ	2
1st French Army	1
C[illegible] Washington D.C.	2
PW &X Det, U.K.	1
U.S.Group C.C.	3
HQ FID	3
O.S.S.	3
P.I.D.	3
Sigs Off Washington D.C.	6
T.I.Div Sigs Off Com Z	8
File	7

THIS PAGE IS UNCLASSIFIED

APPENDIX "A"

ATOM - SMASHING LABORATORY

I.C.FARBEN/Ludwigshafen



LEGEND

1. Recess for Electronic Tubes.
2. Quartz shield.
3. Focusing Area.
4. Power Contact.
5. POLYTRON(?).
6. Power Cable.
7. Target Stand.
8. Observation and Control Station.
9. Power station.
10. Switch Station.
11. Transformer Station.

Zimmermann—the man believed to have invented the "death ray" and even to have used it effectively against the Russian in the Carpathians on 30 August 1944."[3]

Bar-Zohar's focus is on the moral ambiguity of German scientists working in the United States. He asks: "How could they reconcile themselves to their ambiguous moral position?". The point for us is that Bar-Zohar is certainly not interested in aggrandizing the technical achievements of these scientists.

Now that we have picked up the scent of a possible German death ray, we might fairly ask what our government found out when they sent teams of technical investigators into Germany to acquire such exotic technology, even before the final surrender. What they found is obviously still a secret but there are hints. These "hints" are probably nothing more than the failure of government censors to do their job effectively. They simply cannot catch everything, every reference, every off-handed mention of something which appear in the voluminous government record concerning wartime Germany.

German researcher Friedrich Georg made a huge discovery in uncovering microfilm evidence of the laser testing facility at I.G. Farben facility in Ludwigshafen. The reference is reproduced here[4]. The report uses an 18-year-old prisoner of war as an informant for the text of the report. As was the usual practice in using informants, the report tears down his credibility but then ends up using him as a source. The reason for this is that the Allies had no idea if this was the truth or not and wanted to cover their butts either way.

It is also interesting to note that the Allies were given a list of scientists who participated in the laser experimentation at I.G. Farben, Ludwigshafen: engineers Meissner, Ike, and their advisor, Eringer. None of their testimony appears in this report.

Besides the detail of the layout, it is most impressive to note that when the test targets of the weapon, rats, were hit with the ray, their bodies glowed for a fraction of a second before they completely disintegrated.

Also please note that on page three of the government document shown and under the heading Kaiser Wilhelm Institute, we find the name "Meissner, Diplom Ingenieur". This is the same Meissner we encountered in the Magnetic Wave discussion.

SOURCES

1. Werner, Herbert A., Captain, 1978, page 228, Iron Coffins, Bantam Books, Inc., N.Y., NY.

2. Schaeffer, Heinz, Captain, 1952, page 104, U-boat 977, Ballantine Books, Inc., N.Y., NY.

3. Bar-Zohar, Michael, 1967, page 152, The Hunt For German Scientists, Avon Books, N.Y., NY.

4. Detailed Interrogation Report, 3/13/45, "Atom-Smashing Laboratory" report 6824-DTC (MIS)M.1075, taken from U.S. government microfilm

28 Distillation of Crude Oil Using Sound Waves

We have all heard that the Germans made oil from coal using the Fischer-Topische method as well as a method of hydrogenation. Something which is totally unknown is that they may have invented a revolutionary technology to refine the oil, separating it into gasoline, oil, wax, diesel oil, etc., using sound waves of a special kind.

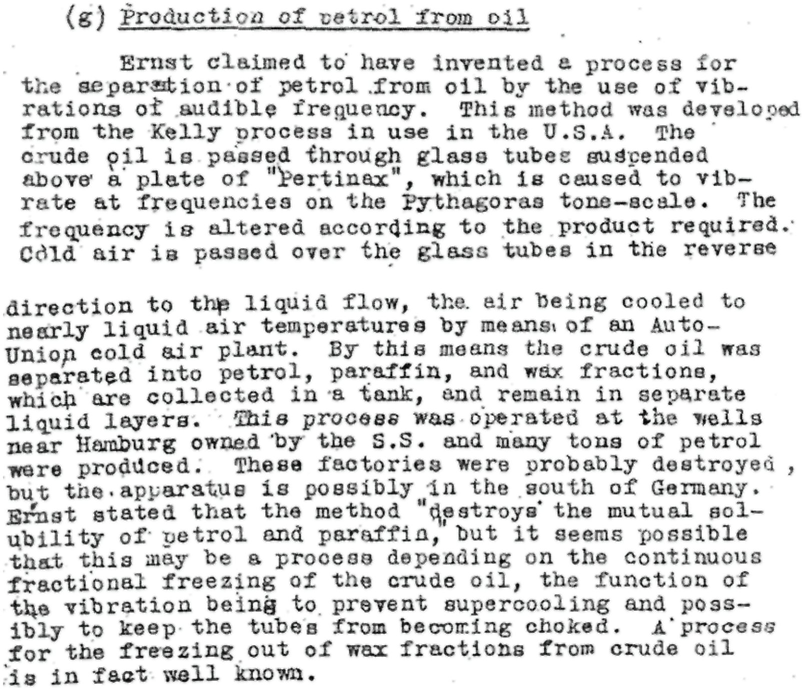
The informant used by the British to get this information was a prisoner of war named Josef Ernst. The British say of Ernst:

"In the course of interrogation it became clear, that Ernst was not at all reliable, and through there may in some cases be a factual basis for some of his claims, they are as a whole inaccurate and of doubtful value".[1]

In spite of their badmouthing of Ernst, the British used him as a primary source on no less than seven different aspects of captured German technology. Like the Americans, the British found it necessary to cover their butts.

There is an error in the report, however. It has to do with the name of the inventor for the distillation process, which is given in the British report as "Kelly". Even from the brief description given, it is evident that the correct name of this inventor is "Keely", as in John Worrall Keely.

Keely was born in Philadelphia in 1837. Therefore, he did most of his work in the latter part of the nineteenth century. Keely put forth a theory of the reso-



(g) Production of petrol from oil

Ernst claimed to have invented a process for the separation of petrol from oil by the use of vibrations of audible frequency. This method was developed from the Kelly process in use in the U.S.A. The crude oil is passed through glass tubes suspended above a plate of "Pertinax", which is caused to vibrate at frequencies on the Pythagoras tone-scale. The frequency is altered according to the product required. Cold air is passed over the glass tubes in the reverse direction to the liquid flow, the air being cooled to nearly liquid air temperatures by means of an Auto-Union cold air plant. By this means the crude oil was separated into petrol, paraffin, and wax fractions, which are collected in a tank, and remain in separate liquid layers. This process was operated at the wells near Hamburg owned by the S.S. and many tons of petrol were produced. These factories were probably destroyed, but the apparatus is possibly in the south of Germany. Ernst stated that the method "destroys the mutual solubility of petrol and paraffin," but it seems possible that this may be a process depending on the continuous fractional freezing of the crude oil, the function of the vibration being to prevent supercooling and possibly to keep the tubes from becoming choked. A process for the freezing out of wax fractions from crude oil is in fact well known.

Refining Oil Using Sound Waves. This is from British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 142. This is yet another SS lost technology.

nance of light and sound. His inventions, which he kept secret, synthesized vibrations into a machine capable of practical value. Some of his machines used rows of vibratory bars, all resonating at a frequency specific to the target material of the machine. Frequencies for hydrogen and oxygen where the targets of a water-based machine, for instance, which caused the cavitation of water using this resonance.

The short text of the British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report is reproduced here. It is clear from the text that it is Keely's theory, which is being used to distill oil.

From the text we are given to understand that SS alchemists are keeping this process to themselves, for themselves, on oil reserves that they themselves exclusively hold. The real question is what became of this technology? Certainly, if it is true, it would be of enormous benefit to the modern world. Is this one of those secret technologies held and kept by the post-war SS to be used as barter with the victorious Allied Powers? Or is this technology already in the hands of one or more of the Allies but being kept secret? Or was this technology given to an employee or consultant of a petroleum giant as a favor for work done during the war? Whatever happened, whatever this report is, fact, fiction or fable, no adequate explanation for it has been offered by the British or anyone else.

Dr. Ronald Richter will say a few words in this respect in an upcoming section.

SOURCES

1. British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report number 142, "Information Obtained From Targets Of Opportunity In The Sonthofen Area, no date given, pages 8 and 9, 32 Bryanston Square, London

29 Synthetic Production of Gasoline

Most everybody has heard that the Germans produced large volumes of gasoline and other petroleum products by chemically cracking coal during the war. Besides gasoline, diesel fuel, lubricating oils and greases were manufactured using this process. Huge underground refineries were rumored to be under construction as the war ended which would have allowed the Germans to fuel their war machine indefinitely. Following the war, this process of coal to gasoline conversion never seemed to materialize in spite of cyclic gasoline shortages which, naturally, threw doubt on the technical and economic feasibility of turning America's vast coal reserves into something other than polluting smoke-stack industry.

From time to time, this subject would re-emerge such as an article in The Dallas Morning News, dated Tuesday, September 4, 1990. This article was titled: "Scientists Seek To Study Nazi Paper" and contained all the often reported statements such as a post-war US plant in Louisiana, Mo. which used this German technology to produce gasoline at 1.6 cents per gallon. Mentioned in the story was a storehouse of German technical documents at Texas A&M University and a Professor Arnold Krammer.

The promise of a treasure of captured German documents was enough for me to attempt contact. Contact was established with Professor Krammer, Professor of Modern German History, as well as Dr. David Chappman, Curator of the Cushing Library, which housed the material. Both gentlemen were very gracious with their time. Professor Krammer sent me a

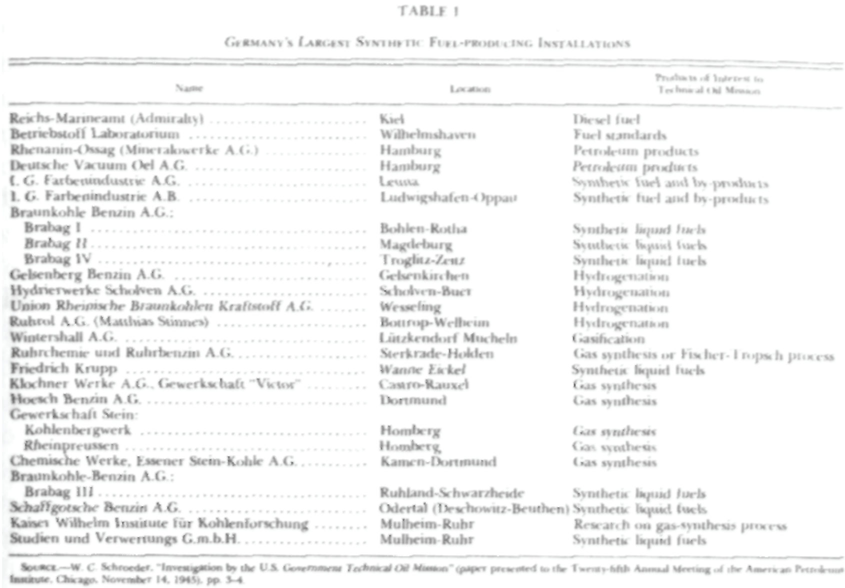


TABLE 1

GERMANY'S LARGEST SYNTHETIC FUEL-PRODUCING INSTALLATIONS

Name	Location	Products of Interest to Technical Oil Mission
Reichs-Marineamt (Admiralty)	Kiel	Diesel fuel
Betriebstoff Laboratorium	Wilhelmshaven	Fuel standards
Rhenanin-Ossag (Mineralowerke A.G.)	Hamburg	Petroleum products
Deutsche Vacuum Oel A.G.	Hamburg	Petroleum products
I. G. Farbenindustrie A.G.	Leuna	Synthetic fuel and by-products
I. G. Farbenindustrie A.B.	Ludwigshafen-Oppau	Synthetic fuel and by-products
Braunkohle Benzin A.G.:
Brabag I	Bohlen-Rotha	Synthetic liquid fuels
Brabag II	Magdeburg	Synthetic liquid fuels
Brabag IV	Troglitz-Zeitz	Synthetic liquid fuels
Gelsenberg Benzin A.G.	Gelsenkirchen	Hydrogenation
Hydrierwerke Scholven A.G.	Scholven-Buer	Hydrogenation
Union Rheinische Braunkohlen Kraftstoff A.G.	Wesseling	Hydrogenation
Ruhrol A.G. (Matthias Stinnes)	Bottrop-Welheim	Hydrogenation
Wintershall A.G.	Lützkendorf Mucheln	Gasification
Ruhrchemie und Ruhrbenzin A.G.	Sterkrade-Holden	Gas synthesis or Fischer-Tropsch process
Friedrich Krupp	Wanne Eickel	Synthetic liquid fuels
Klochner Werke A.G., Gewerkschaft "Victor"	Castro-Rauxel	Gas synthesis
Hoesch Benzin A.G.	Dortmund	Gas synthesis
Gewerkschaft Stein:
Kohlenbergwerk	Homberg	Gas synthesis
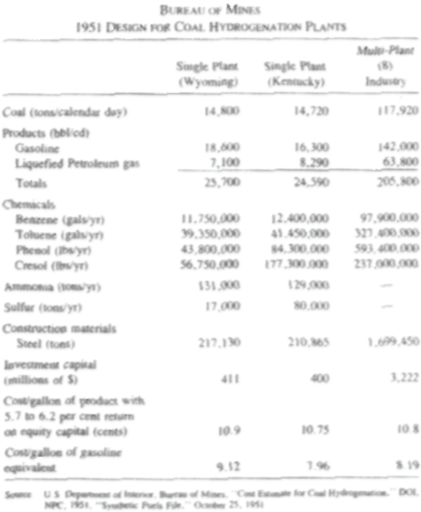
Rheinpreussen	Homberg	Gas synthesis
Chemische Werke, Essener Stein-Kohle A.G.	Kamen-Dortmund	Gas synthesis
Braunkohle-Benzin A.G.:
Brabag III	Ruhland-Schwarzheide	Synthetic liquid fuels
Schaffgotsche Benzin A.G.	Odertal (Deschowitz-Beuthen)	Synthetic liquid fuels
Kaiser Wilhelm Institute für Kohlenforschung	Mulheim-Ruhr	Research on gas-synthesis process
Studien und Verwertungs G.m.b.H.	Mulheim-Ruhr	Synthetic liquid fuels

SOURCE.—W. C. Schroeder, "Investigation by the U.S. Government Technical Oil Mission" (paper presented to the Twenty-fifth Annual Meeting of the American Petroleum Institute, Chicago, November 14, 1945), pp. 3–4.



BUREAU OF MINES
1951 DESIGN FOR COAL HYDROGENATION PLANTS

	Single Plant (Wyoming)	Single Plant (Kentucky)	Multi-Plant (8) Industry
Coal (tons/calendar day)	14,800	14,720	117,920
Products (bbl/cd)
Gasoline	18,600	16,300	142,000
Liquefied Petroleum gas	7,100	8,290	63,800
Totals	25,700	24,590	205,800
Chemicals
Benzene (gals/yr)	11,750,000	12,400,000	97,900,000
Toluene (gals/yr)	39,350,000	41,450,000	327,400,000
Phenol (lbs/yr)	43,800,000	84,300,000	593,400,000
Cresol (lbs/yr)	56,750,000	177,300,000	237,000,000
Ammonia (tons/yr)	131,000	129,000	—
Sulfur (tons/yr)	17,000	80,000	—
Construction materials
Steel (tons)	217,130	210,865	1,699,450
Investment capital (millions of $)	411	400	3,222
Cost/gallon of product with 5.7 to 6.2 per cent return on equity capital (cents)	10.9	10.75	10.8
Cost/gallon of gasoline equivalent	9.12	7.96	8.19

Source: U.S. Department of Interior, Bureau of Mines, "Cost Estimate for Coal Hydrogenation," DOI, NPC, 1951, "Synthetic Fuels File," October 25, 1951

Top: A partial list of German installations producing synthetic petroleum products from coal.

Bottom: A U.S. Bureau of Mines chart showing the actual cost of gasoline produce in their test facilities using the German Hydrogenation method in 1950's money.

letter and some publications explaining the German coal to oil conversion processes and events in the USA after the war.

Before the war there had been processes by which coal was cracked and converted to oil (and so gasoline and so forth). The Germans came up with two new methods for doing so which were an advance on previous methods.

The first method was developed by Friedrich Bergius and for which he won the Nobel Prize. It is sometimes called the "Bergius process" or the "hydrogenation process". It involves forcing a mixture of powdered coal, recycled oil, and a catalyst into a high-pressure vessel filled with hydrogen. This resulted in the liquefaction of the coal. The liquified coal was then separated into gasoline, middle oil and heavy oil. The final products were diesel fuel and gasoline. Four to five tons of coal was necessary to make a ton of gasoline[1].

The second method is often called the "Fischer-Tropsch process", after its inventors, Franz Fischer and Hans Tropsch. In this process, powdered coal was broken up by super heated steam to produce a mixture of hydrogen and carbon monoxide gases. This gas mixture was then purified to remove all sulfur compounds. It was then passed over a metal catalyst to produce low-octane gasoline and high-grade diesel oil as well as wax, the latter being further processed into lubricating oils. This process could be done at lower pressure and temperature than the Bergius process. And like the Bergius or hydrogenation process, it yielded one ton of petroleum product for about four or five tons of coal[2].

In fact, the Germans had 14 separate projects involving synthetic petroleum products made from coal with about 112 separate facilities of various sizes[3]. The plan was to relocate these facilities underground in bombproof shelters. At the cessation of hostilities, 2,708,000 square feet of underground facilities were planned for synthetic petroleum production. Only 689,000 square feet had been completed, however, leaving 2,019,000 under construction[3]. By German standards, underground synthetic petroleum production was not a large project. The SS planned a total of 11,298,000 square feet of underground facilities just for their own private use[4].

Unlike some other German secrets, it seems that the Allies, particularly the British and Americans, got all the information on synthetic petroleum product that they desired. As much as 175 tons of German documents regarding synthetic petroleum production fell into the hands of the Allies[5]. This information was translated, evaluated, and if appropriate, given to the major oil companies without cost[6]. Imagine, two whole new breakthrough energy technologies were simply handed to some of the most wealthy companies which have ever existed without the cost of research and development or even the cost for the patents.

The question arises, what did we do with this technology after the war? The answer is that in 1949 the Bureau of Mines built a demonstration coal conversion plant in Louisiana, Missouri. This facility used the Bergius or hydrogenation process as developed by I.G. Farben in Germany. For three years this plant remained in operation. They first tested various types of coal from all over the United States. After satisfying themselves about the method, they seemed to have focussed on improving the procedure itself. Defrayed by the sale of byproducts, the cost to produce a gallon of gasoline was 10.6 cents per gallon. This meant, at the time, a cost at the pump of about 15. or 16. cents per gallon. Unfortunately, this figure was about 25% higher than the cost of natural petroleum gasoline at the time.

This is the basic problem. At any given time it is cheaper to import crude oil or imported refined gasoline than it is to produce synthetic gasoline at home from coal. Given the flux in the crude oil price, nobody, no oil company, no government, wants to invest the money which large-scale conversion from coal to gasoline requires. The Louisiana, Missouri plant was shut down in 1953 by the Eisenhower Administration as a result of opposition to it from the oil industry itself[7].

The subject comes up, and probably will continue to come up, with each cyclic spike in gasoline prices. Perhaps, once the public realizes that this spike is cyclic and not an aberration, pressure will be placed on industry and the appropriate elected officials and a source of energy at a relatively stable price will finally be made available.

SOURCES

1. Krammer, Prof. Arnold, 1981, "Technology Transfer as War Booty: The U.S. Technical Oil Mission To Europe, 1945", page 69, Reprinted for private circulation from Technology And Culture, Vol.22, No.1, The Society for the History of Technology, The University of Chicago

2. ibid

3. Krammer, Prof. Arnold, 1982, "German Underground Industrial Facilities During World War 11", page 481, ASEE Annual Conference Proceedings.

4. ibid

5. Krammer, Prof. Arnold, 1981, page 97

6. Krammer, Prof. Arnold, 1981, page 110

7. Krammer, Prof. Arnold, 1982, page 467

30 Super Lubricants

You have probably seen the advertisements on late-night television for automobile super lubricants. These additives are touted as doing amazing things. Claims are made for increased gas milage with the addition of a small bottle of their product. Claims are made for reduced engine or transmission wear. Claims are made that an auto's engine will run after the motor oil has been drained out of it with the use of a super lubricant.

We already know the Germans invented synthetic oil during World War Two. They synthesized a standard-size oil molecule out of oil or even coal using one of two processes developed at that time. Naturally occurring crude oil is "cracked" into lighter oils, some of which can be used as motor oil. Even these oils, however, are really a mixture of longer and shorter chains of oil molecules. The viscosity index used to grade oils is, in part, just and average which reflects the average molecular chain length of a mixture of molecules. The German synthetic oil molecules were almost carbon copies of each other and this uniformity led to lubrication benefits for the user. Mobil Oil Company, for instance, used captured German technology to create a synthetic oil, Mobil-One, in the mid-1970s.

This is not the technology under discussion, however. What is under discussion is more than re-working existing oil molecules or even creating oils out of ester base products. What we are talking about is a treatment involving new chemicals.

Of course, these are products surrounded in proprietary secrecy. None of the companies making this class of lubricants advertises or even lists what their products contain. But a clue came from a competitor, Slick 50, which markets the best selling Teflon additive for automobile application. Their advertising compared their product to "chlorinated hydrocarbons", to which Slick 50 fared favorably in terms of bearing corrosion. So we learn that the product in question was some sort of chlorinated hydrocarbon.

These words rang a bell. The reference in question was titled "Secrets By The Thousands" by C. Lester Walker. It concerned astounding yet little-known developments made by the Germans during the war. Interestingly enough, it had appeared in Harper's Magazine. The date of the article is most significant. It is dated from October of 1946.

1946 was a time of good feelings. The war was over and we had won. The Russians were still technically our allies. The Cold War had not, as yet, materialized. There was a thaw in censorship and in the press. For a brief time, only months, not years, things about captured German technology were reported openly, almost proudly, as if to underscore our victory over people who could produce such wonders. The Harper's report was one of these. It described many things. One of these was a night vision device that allowed the viewer to see in darkness as if it was daytime. It ran on a small motor:

> "The diminutive generator—five inches across—stepped up current from an ordinary flashlight battery to 15,000 volts. It had a walnut-sized motor, which spun a rotor at 10,000 rpm—so fast that originally it had destroyed all lubricants with the great amount of ozone it produced. The Germans had developed a new grease: chlorinated paraffin oil. The generator then ran 3,000 hours!"[1]

Chlorinated paraffin oil certainly qualifies as a chlorinated hydrocarbon. There may be others.

Calls were made to each of the four or five companies making these products to ask, point blank, if this technology was of a German origin. All denied any connection to wartime Germany. One company spokesman whispered to me, as if telling a secret, that the technology came from NASA, the space agency. Somehow, their stories did not ring true.

A search of the technical literature of wartime Germany was done to see if my suspicions, and the Harper's article, could be verified.

Without too much difficulty a reference appeared. This was from the Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee[2]. It comprised a report titled: "The Preparation Of Tetrahydrofuran Polymers As A Synthetic Lubricant For Metals".

This report was based upon an interview of Dr. Delfts of I.G. Farben, the largest chemical company in the world at the time. Dr. Delfts reported that tetrayhdrofuran polymers produced desirable properties as a lubricant including a high flash point (temperature at which it will burn), high viscosity index (resists thinning at high temperature), and extremely low pour point (lowest temperature at which it will flow). Polymers were produced from tetrahydrofuran using a catalyst. The best catalysts, it was found, were ferric chloride and thionyl chloride. These are the chlorinated hydrocarbons in question.

The report went on to describe high temperature applications of this product in conjunction with glycol and its esters as crankcase additives for automobile engines. These were surely the chlorinated hydrocarbons described in the Harper's article and in the competitor's advertising.

The CIOS report did not mention bearing wear nor did it endorse or dissuade the use of these additives for automobiles. The producers of these products all denied that they caused bearing corrosion. A maker of manual transmission fluid did mention chlorinated hydrocarbons at a website and seemed to indicate that they were not suitable for a closed system. It indicated that they were better in a vented system, one open to the air. I am not a chemist and cannot recommend or condemn these products. I can only report on their history.

As history, it is certainly safe to say that Dr. Delfts never envisioned his work on super lubricants as providing such wonder late-night info-mercial entertainment.

SOURCES

1. "Secrets By The Thousands", October, 1946, page 331, by C. Lester Walker

2. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report, item no. 30, File no. XXX-70, November 15, 1945, "The Preparation Of Tetrahydrofuran Polymers As A Synthetic Lubricant For Metals".

31 What is Happening in Antarctica?

Recently, an anonymous letter was written to Scientific American describing something very odd. The report came out of Australia's Casey Station in Antarctica. Two women were attempting to ski across Antarctica when they were interrupted. A U.S. Navy Special Forces team, working out American Samoa, abducted the women, against their wishes, and under protest from the crew at the Australian Casey Station. The two adventurers were then held in seclusion for reasons never given[1].

What is going on here? Ufologists are always describing UFOs as originating in Antarctica. Certainly, the theme is familiar to everyone through science fiction movies. Some think Atlantis may be buried deep under the ice. Many nations currently have research bases in Antarctica. The German base at Neuschwabenland was active, at least on some level, during the Second World War and may have served as a last refuge for Nazi die-hards after the conflict.

Not only do these theories exist but there are all sorts of combinations of the theories mentioned above. Did the Germans locate their base in Antarctica because the Ahnenerbe, the SS racial-archeological organization, found evidence of a lost civilization? Or did the Germans or any of the other nationalities involved in Antarctica make contact with an extraterrestrial presence located on that continent, a theory recently revamped by Dr. Michael E. Salla[2].

Geologically speaking, Antarctica is almost split in half by a huge rift valley, which runs from the South Pole toward Africa, then up East Africa to the Dead Sea. This entire rift valley is overflowing with geothermal activity. It was on this very rift valley that the Germans located their Antarctic base. Hot water ponds, named the Schumacher Ponds by the Germans, are teaming with algae, and found on surface rock deep within Antarctica. These ponds never freeze over. Interestingly enough, each pond is populated by a different species of algae, giving each pond a different color. It is not far-fetched to believe that a sustainable base could be located over one of these geothermal vents, especially deep within a large crevice or cave. Also located in a glacial environment, the Icelanders rely of geothermal energy to produce electricity for their daily needs. Why could not have inhabitants of Antarctica?

But recently much more strangeness has been uncovered in Antarctica than some old rumors, geothermal vents or two abducted women.

One strange thing is Lake Vostok. Lake Vostok is one of those poorly kept secrets that no government really wants to deny but, at the same time, doesn't really want to talk about. For example the Jet Propulsion Laboratory (JPL) announced on 1/24/01 that it has terminated all further study of Lake Vostok in Antarctica and deferred study, according to their spokeswoman Debra Shinteller, to the National Security Agency (NSA). The NSA is spook-central, hardly the type of organization one would think equipped to do a scientific study of a lake. But Lake Vostok is no ordinary lake.

Lake Vostok is located 300 miles from the South Pole in Antarctica near the Russian research station, Vostok. Evidently, for some time an international team has been carrying on research at this lake and it is exactly this research that JPL headed. The reason for this mystery becomes apparent as details of the lake emerge. Lake Vostok is not located on the surface rock as are the Schumacher Ponds. Lake Vostok is a very large subterranean lake situated over three-quarters of a mile beneath the Continental Ice Sheet. The lake is up to 2000 feet deep. Thermographic images from space yield a water temperature of 50 degrees Fahrenheit as an average with hot spots going up to 65 degrees. Such high temperatures could only be the result of geothermal activity.

What seems even more astounding is the fact that this lake was completely hidden from view. This is because there is a roof of ice over the lake, forming a dome, which is up to one-half a mile in height. This opaque dome admits enough sunlight during the summer months to allow for a strange, twilight world of continuous morning light. Lake Vostok is a lost world. It is a lost subterranean world so strange it is almost beyond the realm of science fiction writers. Of course JPL is interested in this lake for its unique strangeness. This environment, it seems, may duplicate or at least approximate a frozen moon of Jupiter, covered by a frozen sea and bottom-heated by geothermal energy. Isolated for millions of years, Lake Vostok could also provide some answers concerning the evolution of life on earth. Yet, these reasons alone cannot possibly account for the extreme secrecy evidenced by is take-over by the National Security Agency.

The reason for the NSA's involvement has nothing to do with biology and everything to do with physics. It seems that the lake has been scanned by low-level flights, which for some reason were looking for gravitational and magnetic anomalies. Admiral Byrd did the same thing in his short-lived 1946 Antarctic "invasion". The recent effort was probably related to something Byrd first uncovered. What they found was a huge magnetic anomaly covering the entire Southeast portion of the shore of the lake3. This anomaly's strength registered 1,000 nanoteslas of variance with the surrounding vicinity. One scientist jumped on this publicly and began to debunk its significance[4] but the fact remains that the best and most probably answer as to the origin of this vast magnetic disturbance is the presence of a massive amount of metal. Metal as in a buried city.

This brings us right back to the mystery-school of Antarctica. Is this metal the remains of Atlantis? Is it the underground city said by some to have been built by the Germans, Neu-Berlin? Is this an extraterrestrial base? With the NSA involved, the only thing for certain is that we won't be told the answer to this mystery anytime soon nor will we be allowed to visit the lake without U.S. Delta Orcs swooping down on us as they did with the two women skiers.

But besides Lake Vostok, there is a second strangeness going on in Antarctica. Unlike the Lake Vostok mystery, even you at home can monitor this strangeness.

Countries maintaining Antarctic bases usually do geological research. Among the instruments employed are seismographs. Besides seismographs in Antarctica itself, neighboring countries also monitor seismic events in the frozen continent. Recently, researcher Rainer Daehnhardt, who knows a great deal about Antarctica, sent me a printout of a German language website[5]. Strange and interesting things are explored here, among them the work of two researchers, Kawi Schneider and Christian Saal. What they uncovered and presented are actual Antarctic seismographs that are quite out of the ordinary. These charts show a 24 hour cycle, broken down hour by hour on the vertical axis and minute by minute on the horizontal, so that for any given hour a line running from left to right yields the intensity and duration of earth movement. In fact, this web-site offers links to current seismological monitoring in real time so that the viewer can actually see what typical day in Antarctica looks like in terms of earth movement. What we are talking about, however, is anything but typical.

I would like to first call your attention to these seismological graphs and then repeat what Christian Saal has to say about them.

The first graph is a typical day in Antarctica.

The second, dated 3/19/03, shows massive, intense long-wave movement which is quite unnatural.

The third, dated 3/24/03, shows a strong earthquake for comparison.

The fourth, dated 3/20/03, shows the long-wave activity and a sudden, powerful jolt at 17 hours, 20 minutes.

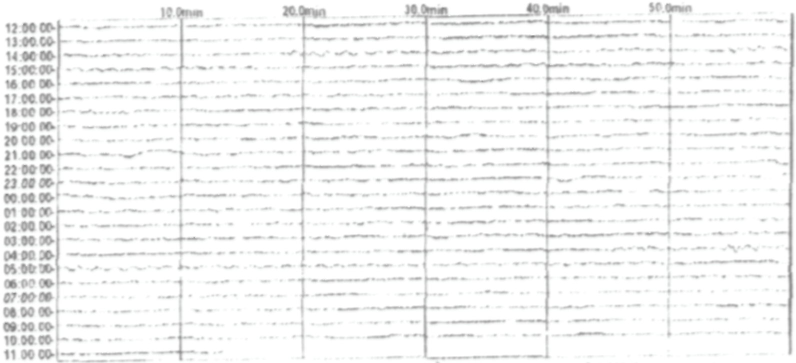
The fifth, dated 3/21/03, shows a somewhat less powerful jolt at 20 hours, 20 minutes.

The Americans at the Amundsen South Pole station took these readings. This station actually consists of three stations, according to the author, which are located surrounding the old German area called Neuschwabenland.

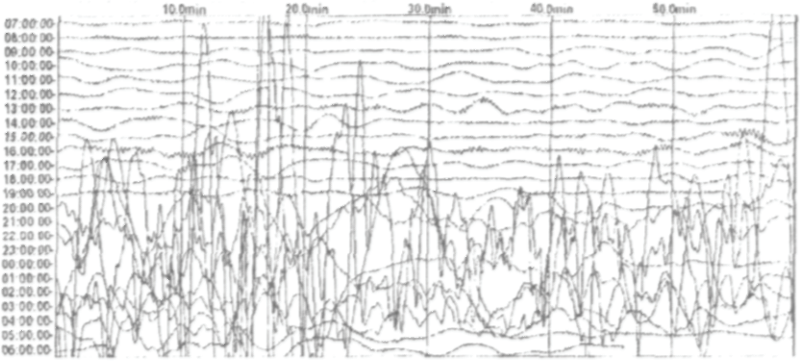
Christian Saal's interpretation is as follows. The first graph is a typical day, a baseline with which to compare abnormal graphs. Graph two shows tremendous long-wave energy, which is unnatural. Saal explains this in a surprising way. He says this energy is being produced at the German facility of Neuschwabenland, apparently by Germans still inhabiting the facility. Christian Saal goes on to suggest that this energy is defensive in nature, an energy umbrella that has been activated by the Germans there in response to an attack.

Graph three shows that graph two is unique, since this is what a naturally occurring earthquake looks like.

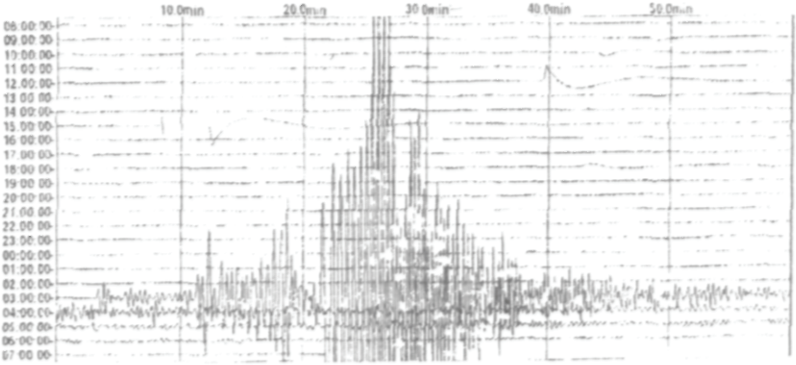
Graph four again shows the long-wave energy but also shows a sharp anomaly at 17.20 hours. Saal interprets this to be an American



PMSA.00/LHZ Start Date:03/23/03 Filter: band-pass Displacement Magnification = 3000.00 @ 0.020 Hz



SPA.00/LHZ Start Date:03/19/03 Filter: band-pass Displacement Magnification = 3000.00 @ 0.020 Hz

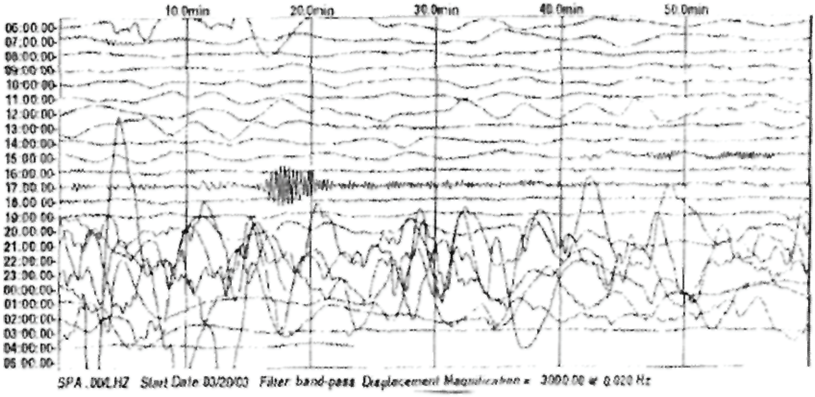


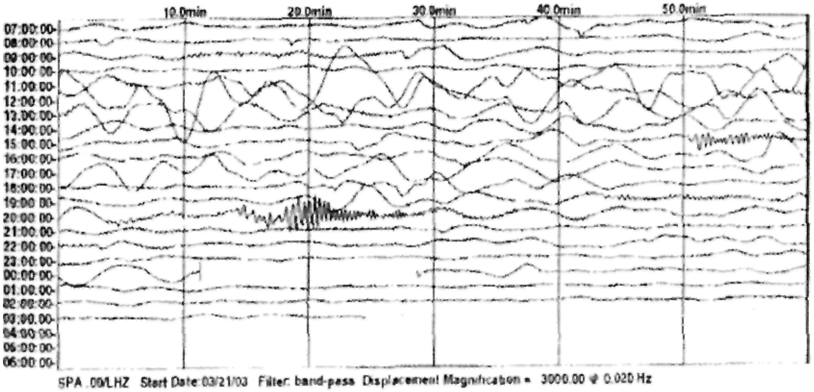
SNZO.00/LHZ Start Date:03/24/03 Filter: band-pass Displacement Magnification = 3000.00 @ 0.020 Hz

Seismological Antarctica.
Top: Typical, quiet day in Antarctica.

Middle: South Pole gone wild! On 3/19/03 there was massive iong wave movement. Is this a Tesla-type standing wave (scalar wave) weapon?

Bottom: This is a strong earthquake, 03/24/03. Notice the difference between this graph and the one above.





Seismological Antarctica.
Top: Dated 3/20/03, this is a graph of a sudden, powerful jolt at 17 hours, 20 minutes.

Bottom: Finally, on 3/21/03, there was a somewhat less powerful jolt at 20 hours and 20 minutes. Was this the U.S. test of an atomic bunker buster bomb and a somewhat less powerful conventional bunker buster on the next day?

attack on Neuschwabenland using the new boring atomic weapon announced at the time of the Iraq invasion. Look at the date on this graph, 3/20/03, the very day the United States began its massive bombardment of Baghdad, the start of the second Iraq war. Saal goes further in suggesting that the Iraq bombing served as a cover, it diverted the world's attention, so that nuclear weapons could be again used in Antarctica.

Evidently, Neuschwabenland's defenses held because as seen in the fourth graph, another, similar but smaller jolt was experienced in this area. Christian Saal again goes back to the words of the Americans who designed "leaks" talking about a MOAB bomb at this time. The MOAB, called popularly "Mother Of All Bombs" is a conventional explosive, an advanced form of the fuel-air bomb designed by Dr. Zippermeyr.

I really don't know if Christian Saal's interpretation is correct or not. What is most important to me is that there is real data here that shows something unusual and unexplained by "the authorities". This hard seismological data, an acknowledged mystery lake in the center of Antarctica, and the interjection of the National Security Agency all point to something as yet unexplained happening on our southernmost continent.

SOURCES

1. "The Secret Of Lake Vostok, William P. Eigles, Atlantis Rising (magazine), number 29, page 60

2. Salla, Michael E., Ph.D., 2003, Foundations for Globally managing Extraterrestrial Affairs-The Legacy of the Nazi Germany-Extraterrestrial Connection, Research Study #6, www.exopolitics.org

3. "The Secret Of Lake Vostok, William P. Eigles, page 60

4. ibid

5. www.unglaublichkeiten.info

32 Large German Mystery Rockets
"The Hammer of Thor"

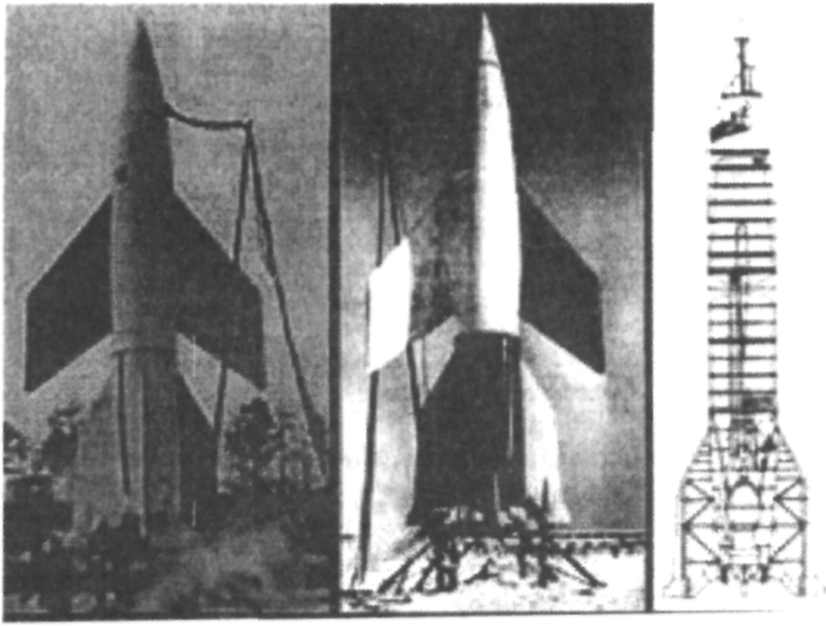
By the term "Large German Mystery Rockets" what is meant here are rockets larger than the V-1 or V-2 with which we are all familiar.

To the best of my knowledge, the first people to raise the possibility that the German ever built anything larger than the V-2 were Colonel Howard A. Buechner and Kapitan Wilhelm Bernhart in 1988[1].

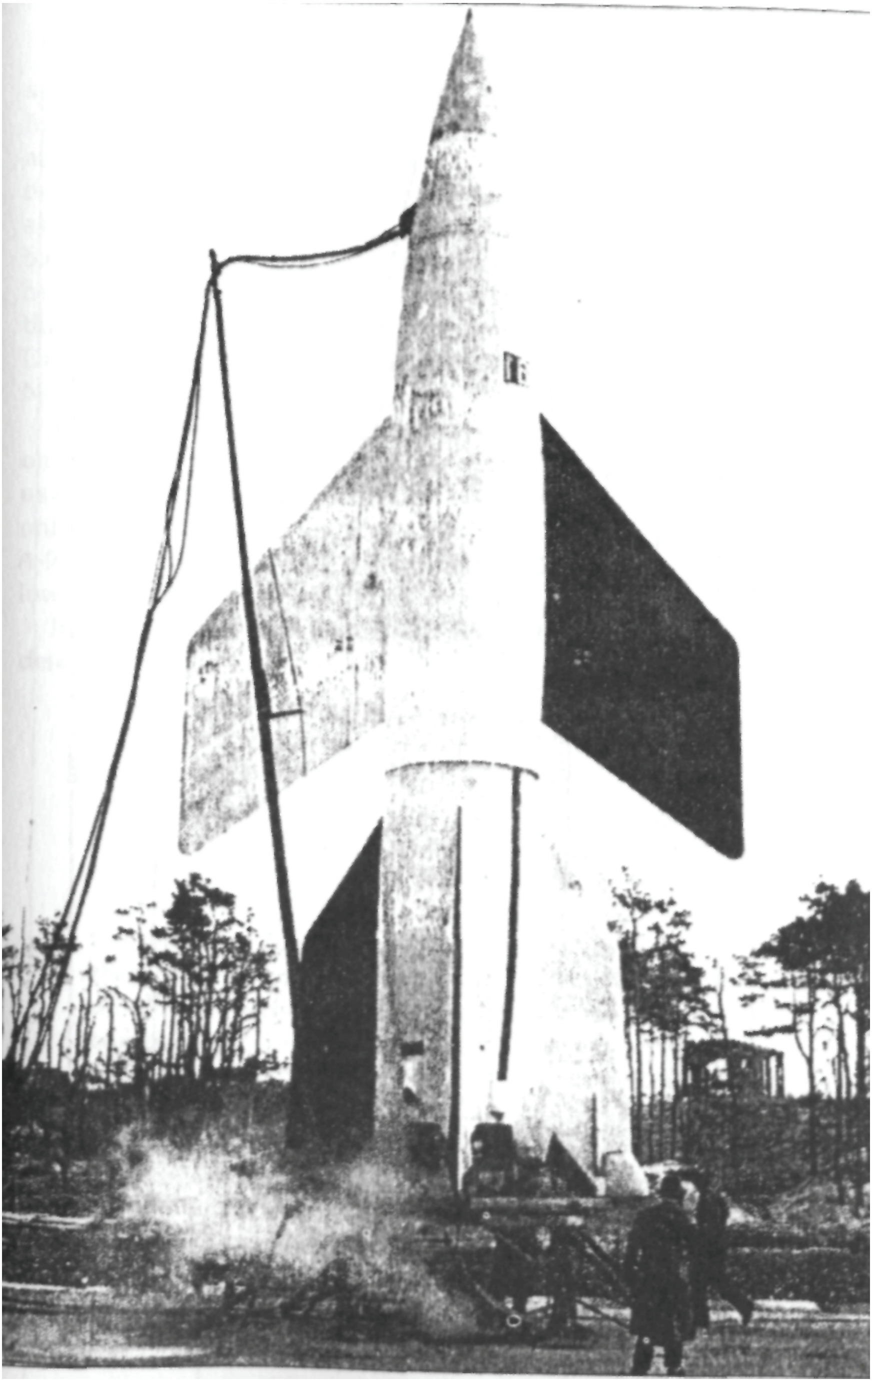
Colonel Buechner was a U.S. Army medical doctor and later Professor of Medicine at Tulane University and Emeritus Professor of Medicine at Louisiana State University. During the war, he was among the first Americans to enter Dachau concentration camp.

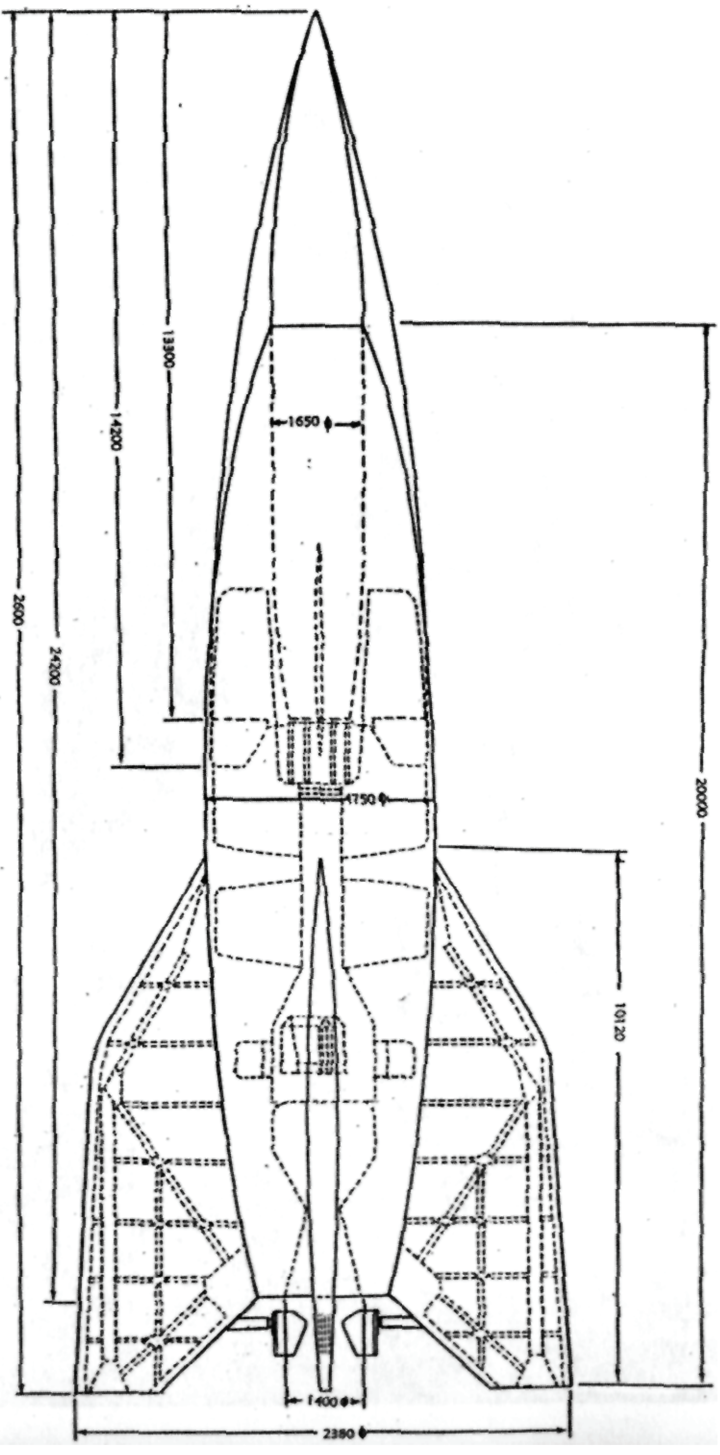
Kapitan Wilhelm Bernhart is an alias. The reason for the use of an alias is obvious as we assess his resume. Bernhart was a German officer who served aboard the famous U-530. U-530 surrendered, not in May of 1945 when the war in Europe ended, but on July 10, 1945 at Mar del Plata, Argentina. The nature of this U-boat and its mission have been the subject of much speculation and controversy. Kapitan Bernhardt is now a U.S. citizen and has been engaged in commercial shipping for 32 years.

The nature of the V-2 controversy starts with its time frame. Dr. Werhner von Braun and his rocket team finished work on the V-2 in August of 1943. After that, the V-2 was taken to the vicinity of Nordhausen in Thuringia. There, in a vast underground factory, it was mass-produced. The question for us is what in the world occupied Dr. von Braun's time between August of 1943 and May of 1945 when he surrendered to the United States military?



Pictures of the A4-b "Bastard" under testing as the war closed. This winged V-2 glided down to its target, increasing its range. The "Bastard" was a halt way measure between the A-9 and the A-4. There is an Enlargement of the A4-b on the following page. On the page following the A-4b enlargement is a diagram of the A-9/A-10. Note how the A-9 is embedded inside the cowling of the A-10. Also, note the lengths of the two rockets and compare these with the prisoner of war testimony.





13300
14200
24200
2600
1650 ϕ
4750 ϕ
20000 10120
1400 ϕ
2380 ϕ

Figure 2.—The A-10 rocket.

We are all familiar with Dr. Werhner von Braun. He was one of our space heros. He, more than anyone else on the planet, was responsible for the trip we earthlings took to the moon in 1969. We remember him as an intelligent, articulate, and energetic scientist and as advocate for the space program. Returning to the wartime situation in late 1943, we again ask ourselves if a man such as this would have simply kicked back and rested on his laurels after developing the V-2 or would he have gone on to other projects? Officially, we are told that he did just this; he sat on his butt for twenty months, doing nothing. And even if Dr. von Braun wanted to kickback and do nothing, do you think the Nazi government would allow him to do so? This is not likely.

What is more likely, much more likely, is that he and his team went on to the next rocket slated for development, the A-9/A-10. Most of us are familiar with that rocket also even though we are told it existed only on paper. It was a huge, two stage rocket. The second stage, the A-9, resembled a modified V-2, which already existed but the larger, lower stage and to be designed and built.

In 1989 the two aforementioned writers, Buechner and Bernhart, described rumors of this project:

"Finally, there was the A-10, the most advanced missile in the series. It was a massive, supersonic rocket with a high stratospheric trajectory, which was designed for Trans -Atlantic bombardment. It had an estimated range of 2800 miles. It was actually a two-stage rocket consisting of a booster and payload similar in principle to the space shuttles of today. Officially the A-10 was never brought to production. However, there are persistent rumors that the A-10 or an even larger intercontinental ballistic missile was produced, although a total of only four were completed. It was called the "Hammer of Thor" and nicknamed The "America Rocket" since it was intended to be fired at major cities in the U.S., such as Washington, Boston, New York and Philadelphia. Four rockets are said to have been launched from the research base at Peenemuende just before the rocket center was captured by Russian soldiers. Three missiles were test fired into the Atlantic Ocean and one was sent into orbit or into outer space for unknown reasons."[2]

In one sense we do know what became of the "Hammer of Thor". Hollywood picked up on the provocative description and used it as the basis of an X-File episode. The plot had nothing to do with a mystery missile, wallowed in sentiment, and was otherwise totally forgettable.

But there is evidence that actual rockets, of the type described by Buechner and Bernhardt, were actually built by the Germans and flown. This voluminous evidence has been produced by three German researchers and published in German language[34]. The evidence that they present is based upon eyewitness testimony of several individuals, but it does not end there. These researchers have some actual photographic evidence and professional photo-interpretation that supports this hypothesis. The evidence has convinced me of the validity of their hypothesis: that the A-9/A-10 rocket was actually built and flown. It is sincerely hoped that anyone deeply interested in this topic who can read German language will go to the books referenced and experience this discovery "first-hand" as the author's tell it. I will not even try to translate and regurgitate their data, second-hand. What I will do is to describe some proof for the existence of this rocket that comes from English language sources.

For this evidence we will go to the U.S. government itself, in the form of a document titled: "Headquarters, United States Strategic Air Forces In Europe Office Of The Director Of Intelligence An Evaluation Of German Capabilities In 1945", or as it has been already called, the "Rosetta Stone". The reality of each and every weapon's system described in this document is proven by a sentence in the first paragraph of this report that reads:

"No consideration is given to those for which there is lacking evidence of possible use for some time to come".

In other words, these are weapons in which we can expect the enemy to employ; now, yet there may be others in the distant future.

After describing the V-2, section 2.b. describes "larger rockets":

"Larger rockets (68 feet in length as against 45 feet) are known to exist, and may appear in small quantities during the year. They would have a considerably larger warhead".

The 45-foot rocket they are describing was the V-2. A 68-foot rocket is officially unknown, but here it is not only acknowledged to have existed but a warning is being posted to the Allied military to watch out for this weapon. It should be mentioned again that this report does not contain speculation. This report is a distillation of intelligence from many sources concerning concrete threats to the Allied war effort. But the question remains, what could this weapon be?

Here are the facts that we are told. It is a rocket. It is 68 feet long. It was produced in small quantities. It has a considerably larger warhead, larger payload, than the V-2. What fits this description?

The one thing that fits this description best is the first stage of the A-9/A-10. The first stage of this project was never built according to official history. The second stage, the A-9, looked like a somewhat modified V-2 (A-4) rocket with longer, swept-back wings. The diagram of the A-9/A-10 shows us that the A-10 was a short, stocky rocket whose upper half encased the A-9.

According to reliable sources, the A-9/A-10, together, stood 30 meters, about 90 feet, in height[5]. The A-9, the second stage, is 45 feet long. If the first stage, the A-10, is 68 feet long, the total length of the rocket would be 113 feet. But the second stage A-9 is set inside the cowling of the A-10 with approximately only half of its surface showing (see diagram). Half of 45 is 22.5 feet. If we add the correct figures together, 68 feet for the A-10 and 22.5 feet for the portion of the A-9, which can be seen, we get the figure of 90.5 feet. This is a good approximation of the height of the combined A-9/A-10. In reality, the 68-foot rocket described in the government report can not be a description of anything other than the A-10.

One more point. The government intelligence report says that these rockets "are known to exist". This obviously means that they were built, not on paper, but in metal. The government intelligence report also says that they "may appear in small quantities during the year". The government is not talking about capturing these rockets at this point in time. The words "may appear" really means "may fly". For a description of the lift-off of the A-9/A-10 please see the sources[3] and[4] listed below.

But if the A-10 was actually built, would not there be some sort of confirmation on the ground from the German rocket scientists themselves? Of course there should be testimony concerning this but it seems that all the testimony was in the negative. The German rocket scientists denied making rockets beyond the V-2. Now, we know that these German scientists were under extreme pressure, pressure generated by the cold war, to do and say exactly what their new employers and benefactors, the government of the United States of America, said they should say. Most of these same scientists, for instance, denied that German flying discs were built during the war. This claim has now turned out to be completely false. Time and research work have put a chink in this cold war propaganda armor.

The question for us here is if there is a chink regarding the A-10? Is there any German source that affirms its existence? Recently, such a source has been found. Not only was such a German source found, it was heavily relied upon by the intelligence agencies of the United States of America. As with many sources within government itself, this one was found by accident, while researching something else.

The topic in question then was the "V-3". A "V" weapon was purely a political designation. "V" stood for Vergeltung which means "vengeance", perhaps better expressed in the vernacular, "payback". It seems there were several weapons on their way to being designated as the V-3. A F.O.I.A. request was made concerning the V-3 since the name appeared in a government index.

The government's source was declassified in 1993 and was a German prisoner of war who fell into the hands of the U.S. Seventh Army[5]. A date stamp indicates this was on or about December 14, 1944. The prisoner was a disgruntled German who had tried to immigrate to Australia before the war but was drafted before this could take place. He was made a paratrooper and later served as a field chemist. He was caught listening to a BBC broadcast and as punishment he was sent to Peenemuende in March of 1943 and placed under the auspices of the Luftwaffe. He was given work described as "dangerous" to complete his punishment. He was later assigned to Nancy, France, where he deserted and contacted U.S. forces.

The information this prisoner provided on Peenemuende was quite wide-ranging, including descriptions of the hardware being developed there, personnel, maps, organizational information, and security information. The prisoner described the V-3 as follows:

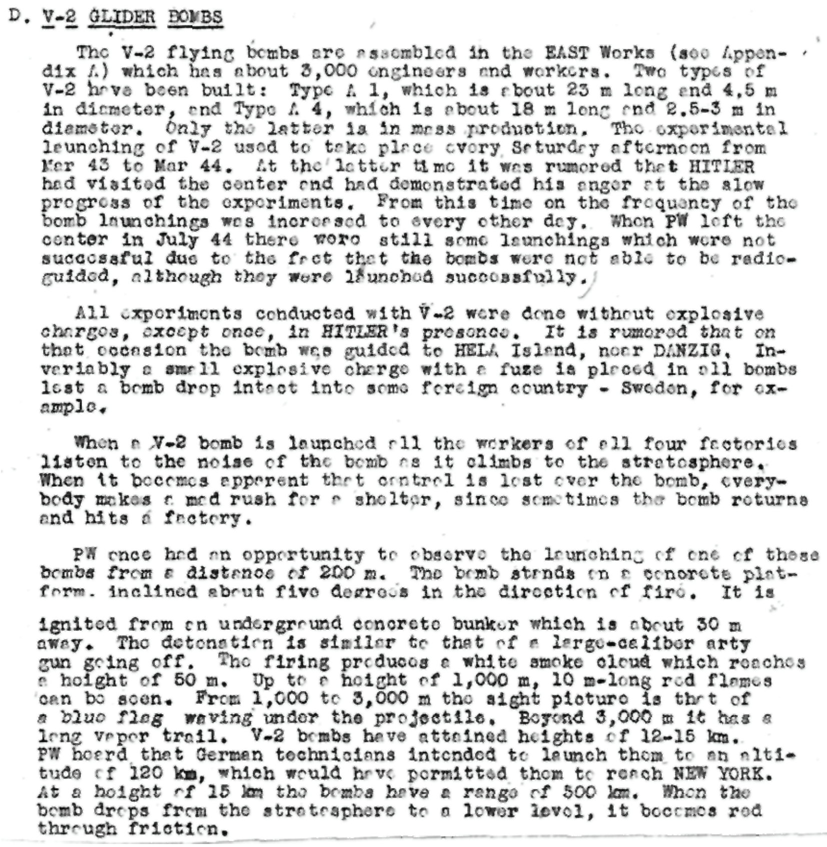
"d) V-3 This is a radio-controlled glider bomb launched by a HE 177 and is intended to be guided into enemy bomber formations. PW, who personally timed it, noted that it remained in the air seven minutes. When PW left PEENEMUENDE in July 44 the bombs were not yet considered satisfactory sometimes dropping into the sea before the seven minutes had elapsed. He believes that this weapon may now have a higher number in the V series."

This little description is important because it will tie in with information about this missile developed from another source, which will be discussed later. The big surprise coming from this F.O.I.A. request did not come from any disclosure concerning the V-3, however, but concerning something the prisoner described under another section, "V-2 Glider Bombs".

In this section the same prison describes two different types of V-2s. One is called the A-4 and is described as about 18 meters long and 2.5-3 meters in diameter. This is the 45-foot V-2 of which we are familiar. But there is a second rocket present. This one is called "Type A 1" It is described as being about 23 meters long and 4.5 meters in diameter. Only the smaller, 18 meter V-2 was in mass production according to the report. The prisoner states that V-2s have attained a height of 12-15 kilometers in altitude. At that altitude, 15 kilometers, its range is said to be 500 kilometer. This is long but otherwise not surprising. What is surprising is that the prisoner says that he heard that technicians intended to launch "them" to an altitude of 120 kilometers, "which would have permitted them to reach NEW YORK." The difference between 15 and 120 kilometers is considerable. Obviously, the difference is the difference between the two rockets under discussion with the higher altitude and range going to the larger rocket.

How big was this larger rocket? Please look at the diagram of the A-9/A-10. A 23-meter rocket is about 70 feet long. Likewise, the diameter, 4.3 meters, corresponds to "about" the dimensions of the A-10 and the source, the prisoner, does use the word "about" in describing these dimensions. The target discussed, New York City, indicates its range and this also corresponds to the A-10.

Now we come to the name given it by the prisoner. He lumps it together with the V-2, indicating that it was a second version of that weapon which was not yet in mass production. He calls it or it is called in this report "Type A 1". Note that there is no hyphen between



D. V-2 GLIDER BOMBS

The V-2 flying bombs are assembled in the EAST Works (see Appendix A) which has about 3,000 engineers and workers. Two types of V-2 have been built: Type A 1, which is about 23 m long and 4.5 m in diameter, and Type A 4, which is about 18 m long and 2.5-3 m in diameter. Only the latter is in mass production. The experimental launching of V-2 used to take place every Saturday afternoon from Mar 43 to Mar 44. At the latter time it was rumored that HITLER had visited the center and had demonstrated his anger at the slow progress of the experiments. From this time on the frequency of the bomb launchings was increased to every other day. When PW left the center in July 44 there were still some launchings which were not successful due to the fact that the bombs were not able to be radio-guided, although they were launched successfully.

All experiments conducted with V-2 were done without explosive charges, except once, in HITLER's presence. It is rumored that on that occasion the bomb was guided to HELA Island, near DANZIG. Invariably a small explosive charge with a fuze is placed in all bombs lest a bomb drop intact into some foreign country - Sweden, for example.

When a V-2 bomb is launched all the workers of all four factories listen to the noise of the bomb as it climbs to the stratosphere. When it becomes apparent that control is lost over the bomb, everybody makes a mad rush for a shelter, since sometimes the bomb returns and hits a factory.

PW once had an opportunity to observe the launching of one of these bombs from a distance of 200 m. The bomb stands on a concrete platform, inclined about five degrees in the direction of fire. It is ignited from an underground concrete bunker which is about 30 m away. The detonation is similar to that of a large-caliber arty gun going off. The firing produces a white smoke cloud which reaches a height of 50 m. Up to a height of 1,000 m, 10 m-long red flames can be seen. From 1,000 to 3,000 m the sight picture is that of a blue flag waving under the projectile. Beyond 3,000 m it has a long vapor trail. V-2 bombs have attained heights of 12-15 km. PW heard that German technicians intended to launch them to an altitude of 120 km, which would have permitted them to reach NEW YORK. At a height of 15 km the bombs have a range of 500 km. When the bomb drops from the stratosphere to a lower level, it becomes red through friction.

This is from a U.S. Army document, declassified 7-1 3-93, titled: Ref No 579, MU 500, CSDIC (West), Seventh Army APO 758 US Army. A prisoner of war, a chemist, tells of work being done in Peenemuende around March, 1943 (over two years before the end of the war). Please note his reference to tow types of V-2s, the A-4 and the A-1. From the description given, we can see that this "A-1" reference is a corruption of the A-10 or a censored deletion of the word by the U.S. Army so it would not surface in a search of records

A and 1. Considering the description in its totality, it can be argued that this "Type A 1" is a mistake or a typographical error or a deliberate deception—an attempt at a cover-up. All this was done simply by omitting one zero. This rocket's true designation certainly should have been given as Type A-10.

This prisoner had no reason to lie. His other information was mostly very accurate. There was no attempt on the part of the U.S. intelligence to hedge his testimony (in case it proved false) as was their most common practice. The U.S. Seventh Army believed it was getting the best information this particular individual could supply. Shouldn't we also? The A-10 was a reality but produced in limited quantity.

SOURCES

1. Buechner, Howard A. Col. and Kapitan Wilhelm Bernhardt, 1989, pages 286-289, Hitler's Ashes, Thunderbird Press, Inc., Metairie, Louisiana

2. Buechner, Howard A. Col. and Kapitan Wilhelm Bernhardt, 1989, pages 162-163

3. Mayer, Edgar and Thomas Mehner, 2002, Die Atombombe und das Dritte Reich Das Geheimnis des Drieiecks Arnstadt-Wechmar-Ohrdruf, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

4. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 2 Star Wars 1947 Band 2, Teil B, Amun-Verlag, Schleusingen

5. MU 500, CSDIC (WEST), SEVENTH ARMY APO 758 US ARMY, reference No. 579, PEEMUENDE EXPERIMENTAL CENTER (KARLSHAGEN), December 14, 1944, Declassified Authority NNO750122, 7/13/93

Note: There are two new books in German language describing in even more detail the reality of the A-10:

A. Georg, Friedrich, 2004, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 2: Star Wars 1947 Teilband B: Von der Amerikarakete zur Orbitalstation-Deustschlands Streben nach interkontinentalwaffen und das erste Weltraumprogram, Amun-Verlag, Schleusingen

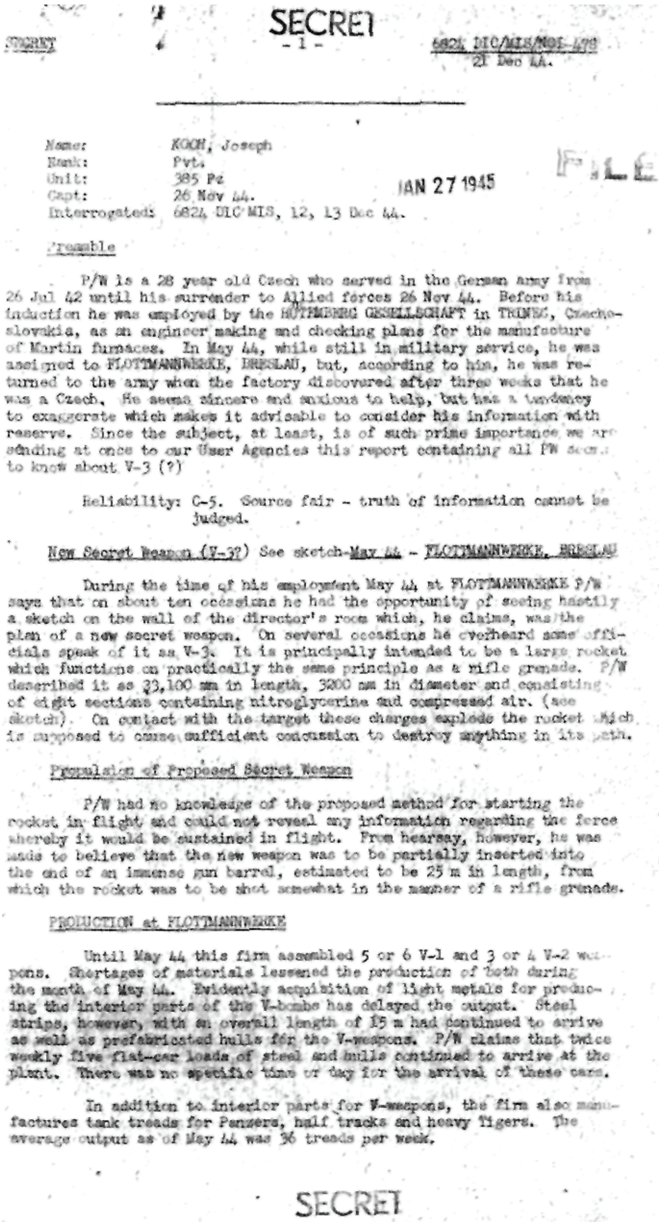
B. Georg, Friedrich and Thomas Mehner, 2004, Atomziel New York Geheime Grossraketen-und Raumfahrtprojekte des Dritten Reiches, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

33 Yet Another "V-3" Rocket

As mentioned earlier, when one speaks of the "V-3" one never knows what the specific response will be. There have been so many weapons called by so many people the V-3. Examples of these are the Hochdruckpumpe, the high pressure cannon, the Me-262 jet fighter/bomber, one of many German flying discs, a further development of the Henschel HS-293 for purposes other than floating targets and various missiles and rockets under development by the Germans at the time. It is one of these latter rockets that is the subject of this report.

While the report described above did mention the V-3, a much better report came bundled up with various other reports under the heading of "Werwolf"[1]. (There is just no figuring out the government's filing system.)

The informant in this case was a prisoner of war, a Czech of German ancestry named Joseph Koch. Koch was an engineer who was assigned in May of 1944 to the Flottmannwerke in Breslau. He worked there for three weeks before it was learned that he was a Czech, which, somehow, made him ineligible for continued employment at Flottmannwerke so he was returned to the Army. During his three-week stint at Flottmannwerke he had access, on about ten occasions, to the director's office. On the wall of that office was a diagram of a new rocket, which he overheard officials speak of as the "V-3". But before describing Flottmannwerke or the V-3 more fully, the reader should be made aware of the unique circumstances of the plant's site itself, Breslau.



SECRET

SECRET - 1 - 6824 DIC/MIS/M01-478
21 Dec 44.

FILE

JAN 27 1945

Name: KOCH, Joseph
Rank: Pvt.
Unit: 385 Pz
Capt: 26 Nov 44.
Interrogated: 6824 DIC MIS, 12, 13 Dec 44.

Preamble

P/W is a 28 year old Czech who served in the German army from 26 Jul 42 until his surrender to Allied forces 26 Nov 44. Before his induction he was employed by the HÜTTENBERG GESELLSCHAFT in TRINEC, Czechoslovakia, as an engineer making and checking plans for the manufacture of Martin furnaces. In May 44, while still in military service, he was assigned to FLOTTMANNWERKE, BRESLAU, but, according to him, he was returned to the army when the factory discovered after three weeks that he was a Czech. He seems sincere and anxious to help, but has a tendency to exaggerate which makes it advisable to consider his information with reserve. Since the subject, at least, is of such prime importance we are sending at once to our User Agencies this report containing all PW seems to know about V-3 (?)

Reliability: C-5. Source fair - truth of information cannot be judged.

New Secret Weapon (V-3?) See sketch-May 44 - FLOTTMANNWERKE, BRESLAU

During the time of his employment May 44 at FLOTTMANNWERKE P/W says that on about ten occasions he had the opportunity of seeing hastily a sketch on the wall of the director's room which, he claims, was the plan of a new secret weapon. On several occasions he overheard some officials speak of it as V-3. It is principally intended to be a large rocket which functions on practically the same principle as a rifle grenade. P/W described it as 33,100 mm in length, 3200 mm in diameter and consisting of eight sections containing nitroglycerine and compressed air. (see sketch). On contact with the target these charges explode the rocket which is supposed to cause sufficient concussion to destroy anything in its path.

Propulsion of Proposed Secret Weapon

P/W had no knowledge of the proposed method for starting the rocket in flight and could not reveal any information regarding the force whereby it would be sustained in flight. From hearsay, however, he was made to believe that the new weapon was to be partially inserted into the end of an immense gun barrel, estimated to be 25 m in length, from which the rocket was to be shot somewhat in the manner of a rifle grenade.

PRODUCTION at FLOTTMANNWERKE

Until May 44 this firm assembled 5 or 6 V-1 and 3 or 4 V-2 weapons. Shortages of materials lessened the production of both during the month of May 44. Evidently acquisition of light metals for producing the interior parts of the V-bombs has delayed the output. Steel strips, however, with an overall length of 15 m had continued to arrive as well as prefabricated hulls for the V-weapons. P/W claims that twice weekly five flat-car loads of steel and hulls continued to arrive at the plant. There was no specific time or day for the arrival of these cars.

In addition to interior parts for V-weapons, the firm also manufactures tank treads for Panzers, half tracks and heavy Tigers. The average output as of May 44 was 36 treads per week.

SECRET

This is the cover page of a secret intelligence report. It is the testimony of a young German-Czech engineer who stumbled upon at least one of Dr. Hans Kammler's pet projects. Pehaps Kammler was building a second long range rocket or series of rockets in his eastern sphere of influence centered upon the Kammler Group Headquarters neat Pilsen/Prague. Was this an SS empire within an empire?

Breslau was a city in the German state of Silesia. Silesia was the eastern-most state or Provence within the German Reich. Breslau was a large city in the west-central part of Silesia that contained, for instance, a large governmental presence and a university. Breslau and this entire Silesian region were also somewhat of a center in the German testing and development of secret weaponry. As the Soviets pushed westward at the end of the war, Breslau became isolated. The Reich propaganda of the times called it as "Fortress Breslau". In fact, it held against the Soviets surprisingly well. Hitler Youth learned new defense tactics during the siege and formed a major component in the defense of Breslau. Hitler Youth were so successful that some of their leaders were flown to Berlin to organize the defense of that city. In fact, Breslau held out against the Soviets longer than Berlin held out. But today neither Silesia nor Breslau no longer exists.

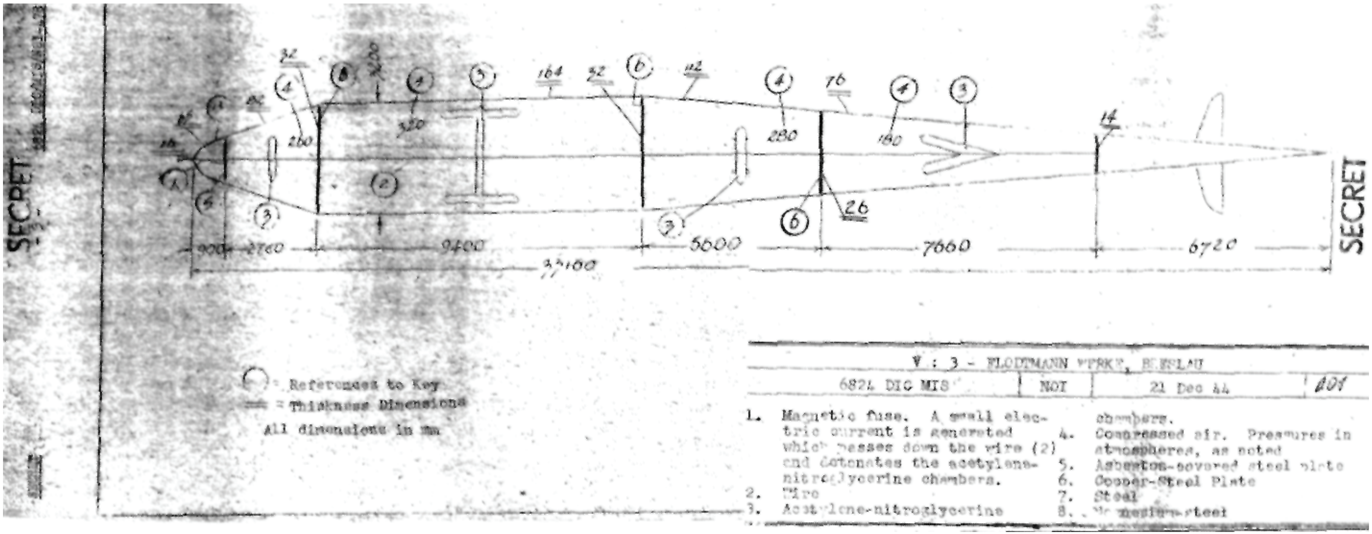
After the war all of Silesia was ceded to Poland and became part of that country. The Germans living in Breslau as well as the remainder of Silesia were all relocated west into the Soviet zone of East Germany. The German population of Silesia and Breslau were entirely replaced, almost overnight by Poles. This movement of peoples brought with it a cultural disconnect. Current residents of western Poland had no connection with the pre-war population whatsoever. Silesia and Breslau, like the American Confederacy after the Civil War, were "gone with the wind".

The point of this history review is that all happenings in Silesia during the war cannot be verified or traced in any meaningful manner. The German industrial plants are gone. The university is gone. The streets and the names of the cities themselves have been changed. All we have of what happened there during the war came out of there on the backs and in the minds of the German refugees who were displaced. This report is, then, one of those scraps of evidence we have concerning this important region.

The Flottmannwerke consisted of thirteen buildings and a work force of 2000 individuals working three shifts per day. A railroad ran directly into the plant from which raw materials were unloaded and, presumable, from which finished weaponry was shipped to its point of insertion. A special police force enforced security and secrecy at the plant.

The Flottmannwerke made tank treads for German tanks and tracked vehicles but its highest priority work concerned making

SECRET



1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
14
16
32
164
112
76
260
320
280
180
26
1200
900
2760
9400
5600
7660
6720
33100

○ = References to Key ═ = Thickness Dimensions
All dimensions in mm

V : 3 - FLODTMANN WERKE, BRESLAU

6824 DIC MIS	NOT	21 Dec 44	001

1. Magnetic fuse. A small electric current is generated which passes down the wire (2) and detonates the acetylene-nitroglycerine chambers.
2. Wire
3. Acetylene-nitroglycerine chambers.
4. Compressed air. Pressures in atmospheres, as noted
5. Asbestos-covered steel plate
6. Copper-Steel Plate
7. Steel
8. Magnesium-steel

SECRET

This is the Flottmann V-3, drawn from memory by the German-Czech engineer, Joseph Koch.

interior parts for V-weapons. Prefabricated hulls for these weapons were delivered by rail along with steel strips measuring 15 meters in length. Shortages were experienced, according to Koch, concerning light metals necessary for finishing the weapons. Five or six V-1s had been assembled by May, 1944 as well as 3 or 4 V-2s.

Koch saw the diagram of the new V-3 weapon well enough to make a drawing of it and memorize some of its details. He said it is intended to be a large rocket that functions on practically the same principle as a rifle grenade. From this description we might say today that this was a ballistic weapon. The rocket itself was 33.1 meters long and 3.2 meters in diameter. These figures put the rocket in the neighborhood of 100 feet long and over 10 feet in diameter. Koch reports it had eight sections containing nitroglycerine and compressed air. This is somewhat confusing since we do not know if he is talking about rocket stages or construction modules. The statement about nitroglycerine and compressed air is further confused by Koch's admission that he had no knowledge of the proposed method for starting the rocket in flight and "could not reveal any information regarding the force whereby it would be sustained in flight. In other words, he did not know its method of propulsion. Koch relayed what he termed "hearsay" on the subject that the new weapon was to be partially inserted into the end of an immense gun barrel, estimated to be 25 meters in length, from which the rocket was to be shot somewhat in the manner of a rifle grenade.

From Koch's description we certainly can see that a large rocket was under consideration. He indicates this was a ballistic device, not a device under continuous power. He admits his lack of understanding concerning its exact propulsion method.

Recently, evidence has surfaced from German sources concerning a large, previously unknown rocket2 which matches this description in many details and yields answers to gaps in Koch's description. This is called the V-101 or "European rocket" as opposed to the A-9/A-10, called the "America rocket".

The V-101 was the result of a design by Dr. Buedewald and Dr. Teichmann at the Skoda works in conjunction with the SS think-tank, the Kammler Group. This was a three-stage, solid fuel rocket with thrust of 100 tons and a range of 1800 kilometers. The rocket was designed to reach an altitude of 200 kilometers. Its payload was most likely larger than that of the V-2[3].

Because it was a solid fuel rocket it was considered superior for storage in rocket silos where complicated liquid fueling was awkward. Dr. Kammler did plan to use this rocket in a large underground launching facility whose exact location remains unknown to this day. Likewise, until Koch's diagram surfaced, no plans of the V-101 had seen the light of public scrutiny. Both the expectation cited by the German language source and Koch's description show that this rocket was far larger than the V-2 and exceeded it in performance.

On the other hand, German researchers who have seen this report are not of the opinion that this rocket was the V-101. They report that there was a V-3 under development at Nordhausen under the direction of the Peenemuende team[4]. This rocket was 26.14 meters long and had a weight of 102 tons.

The V-101, the same researchers report, was strictly a Kammler project run out of Skoda. It was a three-stage, solid fuel rocket, 30.26 meters long, 2.82 meters wide, and 146 tons in weight. It had three wings or vanes (Fluegel). Besides Kammler, Dr. Walter Reidel, Dr. Kurt Diebner and Albert Speer were said to be involved in its development[5]. It may have been this rocket which was the delivery device for the bomb mentioned in the "La Fussee Pilotte 'T'", mentioned in a previous chapter. In fact, it may have been this rocket whose test stand was photographed from the air by the Americans at Rudisleben along with a whole complex devoted to rocketry according to these same researchers.

Rudisleben is in or very near the Jonas Valley. Couple this with their connection of this work to the places mentioned: Skoda, the site of the Flottmannwerke in Breslau documented here and to the Owl Mountains[6] which was the site of the huge "Der Riese" underground complex and a new picture emerges of secret work within Nazi Germany.

It seems that Dr. Hans Kammler and his SS ran its or his own little country or sphere of influence within the Reich. He had his own atomic scientist, Diebner, his own rocket people, his own research and development scientists, his own production facilities, his own intelligence and security, and, of course, he ran all the underground facilities within Germany. His empire within an empire seems to run to the east of Germany's centerline, possibly from the Baltic facility of Stettin to Breslau, through Silesia (what is now Western Poland), into Moravia and Bohemia in what is now the Czech Republic and perhaps even into Austria. The very presence of this rocket under discussion here may point to the nature of the relationship between Kammler's world and the "outside" world of the remainder of Nazi Germany. This inner world may contain secrets that are far stranger than we can imagine, both in the technical sense and in the political sense.

Returning to the rocket, this rocket, whether it is the "V-3" or the "V-101" is the spiritual predecessor for the American Minuteman rocket series, a solid fuel intercontinental ballistic rocket housed in underground silos, throughout the Cold War. It this is true, and it is, then its spiritual godfather of the Minuteman and of those underground bases must be none other than Dr. Hans Kammler.

But, on the other hand, a German researcher just told me he thought the giant rocket was actually a giant torpedo, so the search for the truth of the Flottmann rocket is still the subject of some discussion.

SOURCES

1. C.S.D.I.C. (U.K.) S.I.R. 1632 20 Apr. 45, 5/5/45, Consolidated report on information obtained from various PW, interrogation of whom did not warrant the issue of separate reports, number: 015001 declassification number NND 750122, date illegible

2. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 2: Star Wars 1947-Die Geheimgeschichte der Raketen und Flugkoerper des Dritten Reiches Teilband A: Von der V-1 zur A-9 - Unkonventionelle Kurz-und Mittelstreckenraketen, page 186-187, Amun-Verlag, Schleusingen

3. ibid

4. Georg, Friedrich and Thomas Mehner, 2004, page 259, Atomziel New York Geheime Grossraketen-und Raumfahrtprojekte des Dritten Reiches, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

5. ibid, pages 259-260

6. ibid, page 261

34 "Y" Communication Facilities

There have always been rumors that the Germans developed special ELF wave communications devices by which a U-boat drug a one-mile antenna so that world-wide communications were possible. A further rumor goes that this same system was used, not only for communication, but for recharging the U-boat's batteries via some long distance Tesla-type of technology. In this rumor the mile-long antenna receives electrical energy propagated directly through the earth by a mysterious generator somewhere in Germany. I have even heard it said by a knowledgeable person that Dr. W.O. Schumann was involved in this work. I cannot confirm nor deny these rumors, but I can relate the existence of another rumored secret communication system.

There are hints that the Germans developed a super-secret, high-tech, long distance communication system. This system was said to be new and totally independent of other German communication systems[1]. Thomas Mehner and Edgar Mayer as well as other researchers have investigated a whole series of huge underground installations in and around the Jonas Valley in Thuringia. One of these facilities, code-named "Burg" is generally thought to have, as at least one of its ultimate aims, the function of a huge communications switch-board connecting the Reich together. Keeping this in mind, Mr. Mehner obtained an American intelligence document describing such a communications network (PW Intelligence Bulletin No. 2/32, January 30, 1945, USAF Archives, Alabama, microfilm roll A 5370, Nr. 519.6501-2).

29. Fg-Werk: Telephone Devices (Fernsprechgeraet)	unknown	SPANDAU
30. Y-Werk: amplifying Devices (Verstaerkergeraet)	Dir Dr RABANNUS	Bldg 10
31. EL-Werk: Electrochemical plant (Elektrochemie)	Dir Dr ILLIG

C. Research Laboratory

32. Research Laboratory 33. (Forschungslabor)	Prof Dr HERTZ* Prof TREULENBURG	corner of Rohrdamm & Motardstr., in cellar of new bldg.

* a nephew of Heinrich HERTZ
 accoustic specialist

34. The main research work is at present concerned with the destruction of atoms (Zyklotron). Experiments are conducted in accordance with principles formulated by U.S. scientists. Prof Dr HERTZ witnessed some of these experiments in the States in 1939.

35. According to P/W SIEMENSSTADT was about 50% destroyed as of Oct 44, practically every building suffering considerable damage, but all available space is still being used for production. (Source for III MU 503 AZ)

IV. SIGNALS

A. REIHER

36. This is the code name of a new 10 channel decimeter set developed by SIEMENS & HALSKE and intended for use in RUSSIA, but as far as P/W knows it has not yet been put into production.

37. Specifications as follows:

Code Name	REIHER
Purpose	Directional Link
Capacity	Multi-Channel (10)
Frequency	600-660 MC's
Wave Length	45-50 cm.
Range	5 relays, each having range of 60-100 km.
Antenna	similar to DMG 36, but with fewer dipoles.
Transmitter	2 LD 2's. normal triodes - push pull. Magnetrons not used as they did not give the desired stability.

SECRET

A page of the Secret report: Coil Research Laboratory Siemens Halske Berlin which we first saw in a previous chapter. Here, please notice item number 30, Y-Werk: amplifying Devices and item IV. Signals, which describes the Reiher device. Was this part of the Y-communications system?

This document is based on the interrogation of a German prisoner of war. In summary, he said that there were six facilities in Germany fitted with the "Y" communication system. They were built between 1943 and 1944. These were for communications purposes of a special kind and supported the Luftwaffe.

Using this document and a living informant, Mr. Mehner and Mr. Mayer add that the firm Siemens was the contractor involved in building this top-secret, stand-alone network. Such a network was closely associated with the work going on at the facility named "Burg".

The reason this is being mentioned is that another American document has come to light using the FOIA and search-words involving "Y" and "communications"[2]. This document also uses the information gathered from a prisoner of war. In this case the PW was a graduate engineer of the Technische Hochschule, Dresden where he majored in electrical engineering. In 1938 the subject came to work for Siemens & Halske where he did coil research. From September of 1942 to July of 1943 he worked with a Dr. Heinrich in an ultra-short wave laboratory. They developed a 10-channel decimeter set with the codename of "Reiher". Actually, the entire facility was employed in all aspects of the construction of this system from the ultra-short wave technology itself to the relays, amplifiers, transformers, condensers, transmitters and antennae. One of the production plants was specifically designated "Y Werk". The Reiher system itself was intended for use in Russia, which gives an idea of its intended range. Technical specifications of the system are given in the report.

Of huge interest is the fact that this system was separate from existing systems, secret, long-range, and destined for high-value, secret underground installations such as "Burg". We will return to Burg later, with other rumors.

SOURCES

1. Mayer, Edgar and Thomas Mehner, 2002, pages 71-73, Die Atombombe und das Dritte Reich Das Geheimnis des Driecks Arnstadt-Wechmar-Ohrdruf, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

2. JICA Med. Alhq. No R-1198/45, 6824 DIC/MIS/NOT-533, March 14, 1945, "Coil Research Laboratory Siemens Halske Berlin Oct.44."

35 Experiments in Time

There are a lot of old rumors of work in time experimentation. During the early 1990s one or several individuals went around the country giving lectures at UFO conferences and writing books hyping the "Montauk Project". As time went by, the individuals involved continued to enlarge these rumors at every conference and with every book in a seeming game of one upmanship with each other. As this story evolved it was said to dovetail into the Philadelphia experiment. These were great stories but the problem was always a lack of proof.

There was a German connection to these time experiments, according to these stories. Some of the technology and even some of the funding are rumored to have come from Nazi Germany. German U-boats were said to surface off the New Jersey coast, secretly off-loading mysterious cargos. In our quest for suppressed German science, this is intriguing because most of what has actually proven to be true first originated as a story or rumor. This has happened over and over again as with German flying discs, Magnetic Wave, and beam weapons.

A great example is the story told to me by researcher Friedrich Georg. This came to him by an individual he knows and trusts and in-fact is related to him by marriage. As a young person, this man was a soldier in the German Wehrmacht like thousands of others at the time. And like so many others, at the close of the war, in April, 1945, this person found himself in American-run prison detention camp. There, he met a fellow prisoner, a SS soldier, with a strange tale to tell.

According to the SS man, Hitler had a hidden facility in the mountains of the Harz region. There, deep under a mountain Hitler had constructed a time machine. Unfortunately, this machine was no longer accessable from the surface.

Now, sixty years later, we do know that Hitler had a series of huge underground facilities in the Harz region at the Jonas Valley. Some of the exact functions of some of these facilities are still under debate today. The reason for this, in part, is that these tunnels were sealed with explosives before the American 3rd Army under Patton could secrue them. Later they fell into the Soviet Zone but nobody ever bothered to investigate what went on down there.

As with most rumors stemming from the 3rd Reich, there was usually a kernel of truth to it. There have always been real scientists as well as tinkerers who experiment in time, then as now, so the very fact that some physics laboratory experiments were done in those days by the Germans should be of surprise to nobody. Now, however, some new developments bring these rumors all back into focus.

The first is the work of Igor Witkowski. Witkowski is a Polish researcher who is deeply into finding the truth behind German flying discs. Mr. Witkowski has made a remarkable discovery. He has found a truly unique site or laboratory or test site in Poland, then Lower Silesia, which was a part of Germany during and before the war. It is located at the Wenceslas Mine part of the larger German facility called "Der Riese", The Giant.

Witkowski was visited and interviewed by aerospace writer Nick Cook and the amazing story is featured in Nick Cook's book, The Hunt For Zero Point One Man's Journey to Discover The Biggest Secret Since The Invention Of The Atom Bomb. (This text appears in English, so those interested in more detail may consult the source.) Witkowski had the opportunity to view secret Soviet NKVD files which put him on to the story. The German code name given in the NKVD report was "Laternentrager" and "Chronos". Laternen-trager is lantern-carrier in English. The word Chronos is almost self-explanatory.

Witkowski's research shows that this was a top-secret SS experiment originating from a facility in Leubus, northwest of Breslau (now Wroclaw), but moved to Fuerstenstein (Ksiaz) 34 km to the south in late 1944 because of the Soviet advance. Finally, it was moved south again to Ludwigsdorf (Ludwwikowice) in the Owl Mountains very near Der Riese[1]. Two physical structures are associated with this project. One structure is now gone and one still in existence.

Gone but known to Witkowski through his peek into Soviet intelligence files is "Die Glocke", the Bell. The Bell was just that: a hard, metallic bell-shaped object. Within the bell there were situated two cylinders that were rapidly spun in opposite directions. Each cylinder was filled with a mercury-like substance, code named "Xerum 525"[2]. Other substances included in Xerum 525 were thorium and beryllium peroxides. The substance had a violet color. Here we have a liquid compound of mercury, violet in color, housed at a German nuclear research facility. Does this ring a "bell" with anybody? Mercury has no fluid compounds according to conventional wisdom. So if this liquid is as Witkowski says that it is, then the conclusion is inescapable. It is red mercury.

Still present is a structure that stands above ground and associated with these experiments. This is a circle of Stonehenge-like columns, joined the in the same manner as Stonehenge, at the top. The structure is about ten meters tall and about 30 meters in diameter. Strangely, high-strength steel hooks are set into the tops of the columns[3].

Witkowski's research shows that the Bell was always operated underground. This leaves us to wonder at the purpose of the Stonehenge-like structure with the hooks at its top.

Speculation about the purpose of this experimentation is divided. Some think the Bell was a field propulsion engine destined for some exotic aircraft. Some think the whole apparatus, Bell and stone circle, concerned itself with experiments in time. An alternative is that it was both.

This is because Nick Cook links Russian experiments with spinning superconductors to the spinning, liquid, mercury-like compound contained in the Bell[5] Could red mercury be a superconductor? Could this be its real secret? A superconductor would allow the generation of monstrous magnetic fields and perhaps other types of energy. Cook calls this other type of energy a "torsion field" and says it bends the four dimensions as well as bending time[6].

What makes this account credible? We have physical evidence that something was going on. We have the mysterious Stonehenge-like structure. We have Igor Witkowski whose peek into the NKVD secret files led him to this unexplained place.

This is where I stood in the Winter of 2002 when a chance conversation occurred with a friend of mine. His name is Greg Rowe and I have corresponded with him for several years as the result of a chance contact. Greg is a trained engineer as was his father. Once Greg told me that his father had worked for NASA at the Huntsville, Alabama facility. Knowing that some German Paperclip scientists worked there, I asked Greg if any of these worked with his father.

Greg replied with a list of German scientists with whom his father had worked and a few words about each one of them. One of these, Otto Cerny, seemed particularly interesting from Greg's description so I pressed him for more information. What follows is a compilation of several e-mails on the subject of Otto Cerny.

Cerny was Greg's father's boss. Greg knew the whole family and went to school with Cerny's son whom Greg called by name. Greg also referred to Cerny's wife by her first name and gave other small details of their family life. When he was somewhere between 12 and 14 years old, Greg and his family were invited to dinner at the Cerny's house. This would have been between the years 1960-62. Greg sat and listened as the older men talked.

Otto Cerny was an engineer and physicist. He had worked at Peenemuende on a variety of projects. That was why he was in the United States, to work on rockets, and why he was a Paperclip scientist to begin with. But it is his work prior to coming to Peenemuende, which was the subject of discussion that night. Cerny said that he had worked near Breslau in the early years of the war. It was there that he met his wife who worked in Breslau at a hospital where she was employed doing physical rehabilitation work.

Cerny continued describing this work that night in Alabama, dismissing it at first as "weird experiments on the nature of time". Greg's father must have picked up on this comment because the two men quickly became involved, according to Greg, in a deep discussion concerning the nature of time. Greg told me that it seemed to him now, that, at all times Cerny was a little vague in his statements, choosing his words and being careful of what he said, almost as if he were under some sort of hidden duress.

Greg listened to the two men attentively but did not enter into the conversation himself. At that time and place in polite adult company, as Greg explains, a child did not speak unless spoken to. In considering what follows and what was relayed to me, it should be remembered that Greg had not yet read Nick Cook's book or ever heard of the work of Igor Witkowski.

Greg remembers that Cerny drew a circle of stones, which Greg said was "like a Greek Temple", with a ring around the top". Then Greg added a feature not mentioned by Cook or Witkowski, "and some sort of ring inside of that". This second ring was like a hoop of metal from which something hung—like an oscilloscope or a TV screen. Greg went on to mention the atomic symbol as a means of description. The atomic symbol has a nucleus around which orbit electrons. The electrons have two orbits, one within the other and are moving independently from each other. From this description it follows that this structure contained two movable and independently adjustable fixtures from which something hung, perhaps as with a gyroscope.

Cerny said that it was possible to "go back and witness things". With this statement a Greg's father asked why it was not possible to go forward if it were possible to go backward. Evidently there was some discussion between the two men on this point. Cerny responded that it simply did not work that way.

Greg reports that, after a pause, Cerny cut more pastry and poured another cup of coffee, then changed the subject to a jet engine, which had been built at Peenemuende, for an unmanned rocket other than the V-l.

Naturally, I was dumbfounded by the turn of events. This was mid-January, 2002. Greg had not read my book on German saucers or Cook's book containing discussion of Igor Witkowski. As a matter of fact, Greg had never heard of Igor Witkowski. I told him of these references and sent him a copy of my book. I quickly re-read Cook's passages on the subject. Then something else occurred to me. I quickly found my partial list of Paperclip scientists and looked for Otto Cerny's name. Sure enough, it was there. I wasted no time in ordering the file from the National Archives under the F.O.I.A. I had no idea of what to expect. Greg had provided so much detail into their personal lives that I was a little apprehensive that my friend might have been wrong about some of this. Would the F.O.I.A. file confirm what Greg overheard? Fortunately, Paperclip files are packed with what we would call today "personal information".

Ninety days pass and the file arrives[4]. In it are the names and birth dates of Otto Cerny and all his family. The name Greg gave for Mrs. Cerny was correct. The name Greg gave for his son was correct and his year of birth puts him in Greg's grade in school. They had lived in Huntsville where Otto was employed by NASA. There was no doubt that this was the person Greg had described and his description matched very well.

The file included a time-line and a statement of Cerny's work at Peenemuende. Many "deletion" pages were inserted into the file telling the reader that portions of the file were being withheld for security reasons. But the censor was somewhat uneven. It seemed that sensitive information was pulled out at various times by various censors. Some of these censors only read English, it seemed, because the English translation of Cerny's work history consisted of nine pages while the original had consisted of twenty-five pages in German language. Fortunately, twenty-four pages in the original German edition remained. It included a description of a previously unknown weapon.

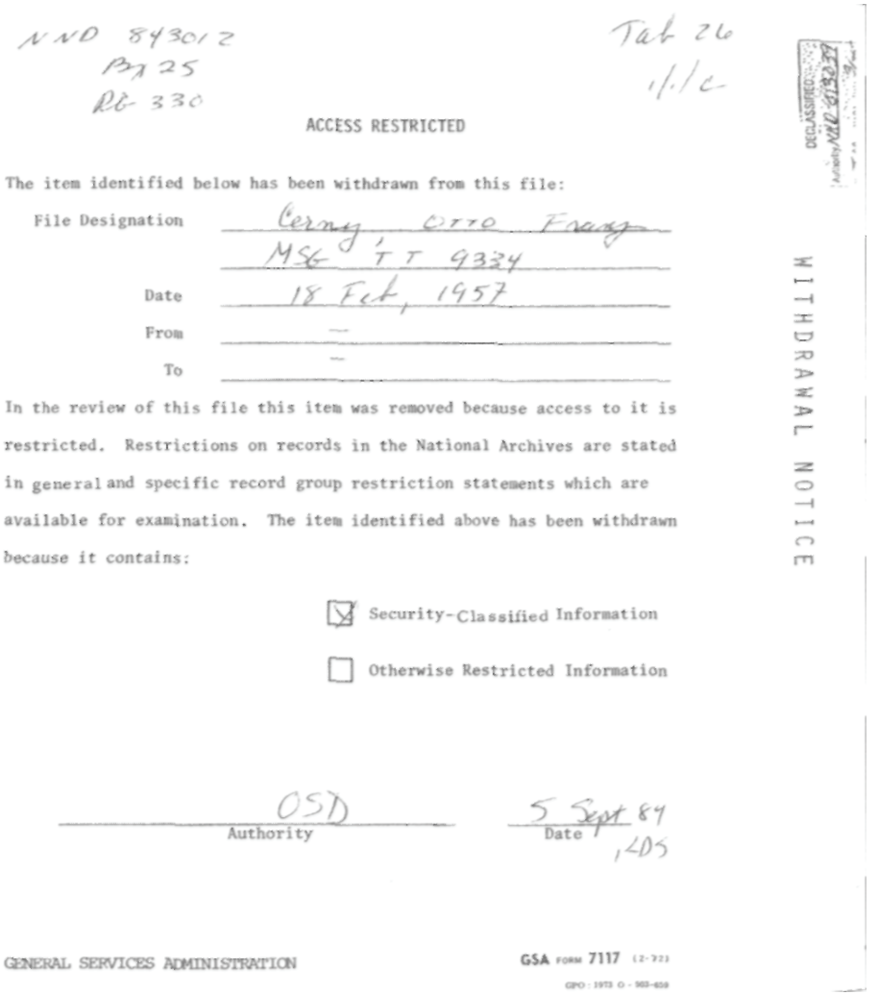
The weapon in question was a special edition of the Henschel HS-292. The regular HS-292 was a air-to-ship guided missile which was fired from a carrier aircraft, such as a two-engine He-III bomber, and steered towards the target ship though the a thin wire linkage and an operator using a joy stick. The new weapon was a high-altitude air-to-air weapon that was again launched from an aircraft and guided via wire and joystick but its target was not a ship beneath it but an enemy bomber formation above it.

Was this the weapon Greg had commented upon?

Unfortunately, no mention is made of experiments in time in the Paperclip file. This could hardly be expected, however. The file had been gone over many times and items pulled for security reasons. But the time-line was very complete and in it Cerny accounts for his every move since college. I went directly to the war years.

From May, 1939 to September, 1939 (September, 1939 was the date Germany invaded Poland, beginning the Second World War), Cerny attended a flight school at Braunschweig, the Deutsche Versuch-sanstalt fuer Luftfahrt (German Flight Research Institution). This is a heavyweight school. Cerny received an A2 Degree (Acrobatics).

From September, 1939 to April, 1940, Cerny worked at three Air Force test bases including one at Rechlin. Rechlin is next door to Peenemuende and was a test site for exotic aircraft. This would put him in the proper region at the proper time. His next assignment, May, 1940 to April, 1945 was at Peenemuende, immediately to the west.



NND 843012
Bx 25
RG 330

Tab 26
l.l.c

DECLASSIFIED
Authority NND 813037

ACCESS RESTRICTED

The item identified below has been withdrawn from this file:

File Designation Cerny, Otto Franz
MSG TT 9324

Date 18 Feb, 1957

From —

To —

In the review of this file this item was removed because access to it is restricted. Restrictions on records in the National Archives are stated in general and specific record group restriction statements which are available for examination. The item identified above has been withdrawn because it contains:

☒ Security-Classified Information

☐ Otherwise Restricted Information

OSD
Authority

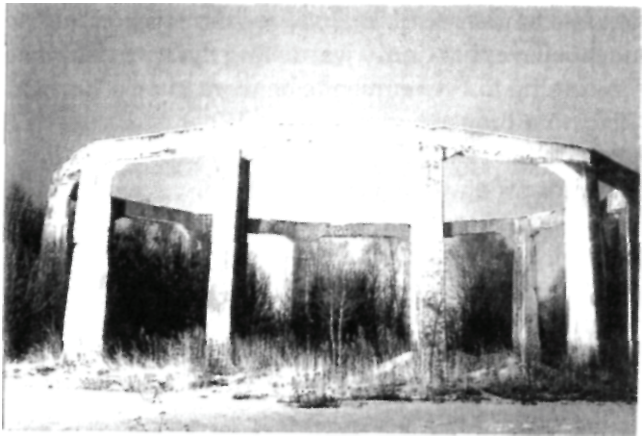
5 Sept 84
Date
LDS

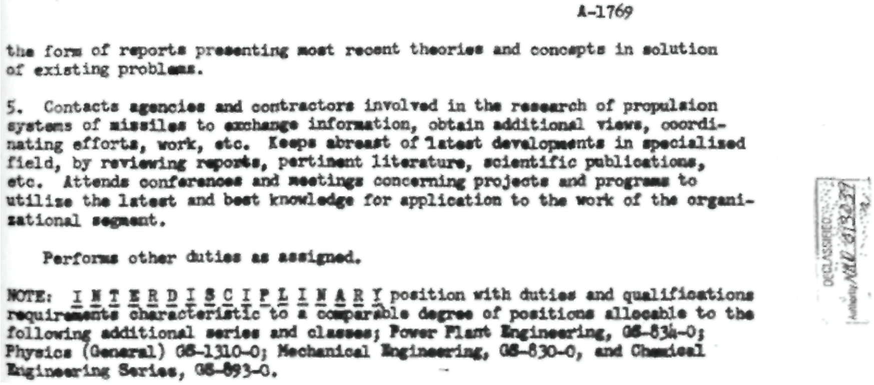
WITHDRAWAL NOTICE

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

GSA FORM 7117 (2-72)
GPO : 1973 O - 503-659

This is a government deletion slip. About 20 or so of these were inserted into the Cerny file and appropriate material withdrawn. Additionally, one page of his twenty-five page employment time-line in German is missing. The English translation omits this altogether and is only nine pages long. This is impressive redaction for a mere mechanical engineer with a master's degree.





A-1769

the form of reports presenting most recent theories and concepts in solution of existing problems.

5. Contacts agencies and contractors involved in the research of propulsion systems of missiles to exchange information, obtain additional views, coordinating efforts, work, etc. Keeps abreast of latest developments in specialized field, by reviewing reports, pertinent literature, scientific publications, etc. Attends conferences and meetings concerning projects and programs to utilize the latest and best knowledge for application to the work of the organizational segment.

Performs other duties as assigned.

NOTE: INTERDISCIPLINARY position with duties and qualifications requirements characteristic to a comparable degree of positions allocable to the following additional series and classes; Power Plant Engineering, GS-834-0; Physics (General) GS-1310-0; Mechanical Engineering, GS-830-0, and Chemical Engineering Series, GS-893-0.

DECLASSIFIED
Authority NND 813037

Top: The "Greek temple" (from Nick Cook) described to me by Greg Rowe, recounting the conversation between his father and Otto Cerny. Greg witnessed and overheard this conversation as a child. Suspended from the top was some sort of concave mirror in which "images from the past" were seen during operation of the mechanism.

Bottom: The end of Cerny's Paperclip resume in which he lists "Power Plant Engineering" as interdisciplinary duties and qualifications. Is this what Cerny did for Projekt Chronos?

Taken as a whole, Greg's account of what Cerny said and what Cerny's Paperclip file show are remarkably consistent. I have to believe that the rendition concerning Cerny's work on an unknown jet engine for use in an advanced missile is factual and possibly be the new type of HS-292 or even the recently described V-4, the replacement for the V-1[7].

I also must believe that Cerny was telling the truth when he said that prior to coming to Peenemuende he worked on a German program involving time experimentation. What he disclosed fits into the evidence provided by Mr. Witkowski and provides some new data. The details of this program remain yet to be discovered as does its place in the German war effort.

Based upon my new respect for the possibility of German time experimentation, I contacted Thomas Mehner, the researcher and publisher famous for his work at the Jonas Valley site in Germany. I asked Mr. Mehner about references to German time experimentation one finds here and there and if he knew of any such evidence coming from the Jonas Valley. Mr. Mehner replied via e-mail on 7/9/03 that there was no hard evidence for German time experimentation, but there were hints. He said that recent opinion among researchers there (so there must be ongoing discussion of the possibility) is that time machine experiments would originate at least 200 meters below the surface. There has been no attempt to describe the technology involved at Jonastal and no attempt yet to dig it up. This area is still, today, a German military base.

The most exciting statement made by Mr. Mehner was that recently, researchers there are of the opinion that the Germans experimented with what he described as "interdimensional trips". If this is ever proven, it would be just as explosive as successful time experimentation itself.

There is another story that comes to mind that now rests squarely in the realm of science fiction. It appeared in a 1997 edition of the magazine "Wissenschaft ohne Grenzen" which was responsible for placing the concept of the lost underground facilities at Jonastal in the public eye.

This tale involves the disappearance of up to 3,000 people. These people included SS personnel and scientists. Just prior to capture by Patton's 3rd Army, these people including their women and children, all of "pure Aryan origins", disappeared DOWN into an underground facility in the Jonas Valley called "Burg". After the people were inside the entrance was then sealed with explosives[8]. It should be noted that this is not referred to as a mass suicide. We are left with the impression that these people wished to escape the 3rd Reich. So many other wild rumors of the past have been based upon fact. Could this escape have been into another time or another dimension? Could it really be true?

SOURCES

1. Cook, Nick, 2001, The Hunt For Zero Point One Man's Journey To Discover The Biggest Secret Since The Invention Of The Atom Bomb, page 188, Century, London

2. ibid, page 192

3. ibid, page 197

4. Project Paperclip "Foreign Scientist Case Files, 1945-1958 (Record Group 330, Box 44, file of Otto F. Cerny

5. Cook, Nick, 2001, page 194

6. ibid, page 228

7. Georg, Friedrich, 2003, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 2: Star Wars 1947 Teil A: Von der V-1 bis zur A-9: unkonventionelle Kurz - und Mittelstreckenwaffen, pages 132, 204-207, Amun-Verlag, Schleusingen

8. Georg, Friedrich, 2000, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 1: Luftwaffe und Marine Geheime Nuklearwaffen Des Dritten Reiches Und Ihre Traegersysteme, page 126, Amun-Verlag, Schleusingen

36 Dr. Ronald Richter

If we remember Dr. Richter today at all, it is not for his stunning achievements in physics, but for a press fiasco involving the Argentine leader Juan Peron in the 1950s. At this time, Richter was employed by Peron to do nuclear research and evidently had some promising results. Peron jumped ahead of the research and prematurely announced that Argentina had bypassed fission power and had succeeded in producing fusion power.

Around the world "experts" were enlisted to condemn Richter's work. It seems the US government was on particularly high alert and wanted this development contained. Peron could not deliver fusion on the spot and Richter suddenly fell out of favor. As a matter of fact, Dr. Richter was jailed by Peron, thus effectively ending the affair and discrediting Richter. After Peron was ousted and Richter released, the incoming political party considered Richter a Peron favorite and as such he could never regain the funds, laboratory or momentum to further his work. Richter ended up in the mid to late 1950s looking for a job. Eventually, he fell off the world scene.

The late Dr. Eugene F. Mallove has written of the affair:

"Magnetic confinement fusion had a very strange beginning. Argentine dictator Juan Peron announced on March 24, 1951, that his country had mastered controlled fusion, bypassing completely the development of fission power that was then in vogue in various nations. Peron, a Germaophile, had set up an island laboratory for a certain obscure German scientist, Ronald Richter, who supposedly had brought the secret fusion work to fruition, or so headlines in the United States had allowed. The press was much less circumspect in those days about amazing scientific claims"[1].

Now, it may seem like everything which is to follow refutes the above paragraph, so it is necessary to point out that it was Dr. Eugene Mallove who originally directed me in Richter's direction when I inquired of him about alleged German scientists working for Peron concerning nuclear power. What has changed my mind about his matter is that the United States government, through various agencies, compiled an intelligence file on Dr. Richter, which was shocking. This file was obtained using the Freedom of Information Act. In fact, it was a Paperclip file, even though Richter never came to the USA to work as a scientist. Equally shocking was the tone of the Paperclip file itself.

Normally, a Paperclip file contains biographical and educational information about the particular scientist. It usually contains a description of his specialty as well as where he worked and who he worked for in Germany. There is a discussion of his alleged political leanings, which are always considered satisfactory. Then there is a background check, again politically motivated. Then, there are immigration details and perhaps which companies or government agencies which are interested in employing this individual. It is then up to the researcher to follow up these leads for additional information.

Sometimes, there is a description of actual work in Germany and actual hardware that was created, but this is rare. Also rare is any discussion about applications of his specialty in the United States or any proposed future research in the United States. Dr. Richter's file is the big exception to all of this.

But even before I had obtained Dr. Richter's Paperclip file from the US National Archives and Record Administration via the Freedom Of Information Act, Dr. Mallove's original letter naming him struck me like my head was a bell. This is because Dr. Ronald Richter was not an "obscure German scientist" to me. His name was a name I had run into repeatedly in investigating German scientific research. In fact, the Austrian physicist, Dr. Friedrich Lachtner, in a letter, published in my last book, names Dr. Richter.

From the Paperclip file, it is evident that the US government and its scientists given the job of investigating Dr. Richter were torn between two opposing poles. There were those who considered Dr. Richter a fraud. There were those who openly admitted that they did not have the expertise to fully evaluated Dr. Richter and clearly wanted to take themselves out of the game of doing so. And there were those who recognized, even in 1957, that Dr. Richter "was working in 1970", an understatement which can only now be fully appreciated.

We should start our investigation of Dr. Richter with his own chronological biography. There are two or three accounts of his personal and professional history in his Paperclip file. Perhaps the best is the Air Intelligence Information Report. Dr. Richter and so states provided the information in this report.

Richter was born February 21, 1909 in Eger, Bohemia. Bohemia was then Austria but was included in Czechoslovakia as it was formed. Dr. Richter entered the German University at Prague in 1928 to study physics, chemistry and geophysics. He graduated on March 2, 1935 with a Doctor of Natural Sciences degree.

Richter's parents were involved in directing a coalmine. It was in this same industry where Dr. Richter was to make his entrance into the world of science and industry. In 1935 Dr. Richter ran a private research laboratory near Falkenau A.D. Eger, "sponsored by industrial circles". In this first venture the foundation was laid for all that followed in Richter's work. In the words of the Air Intelligence Report:

"Research on the activation of catalysts, catalyst -controlled high-pressure coal hydrogenation and coal cracking processes, development of an image-converter-like activity-contract-microscope, based on scanning of hydrogen or deuterium absorbing border surfaces by protons, deuterons, or electrons: for the first time, it became possible to see and to photograph activity contrasts which cannot be made visible by light nor by electron microscopes. Activation of catalysts take place under continuously activity-controlled conditions.

Research work and design studies on electric arc furnaces systems, development of new types of arc plasma analyzing instruments and methods. In 1936, discovery of a plasma shock wave generating process, conception of a completely new type of industrial arc reactor system, based rather on plasma shock wave reactivity than on heat transfer. Development of a basis of operation for testing plasma shock wave conditions by means of plasma-collision-induced nuclear reactions."

Plasma happens when a gas is heated to the point where its electrical structure is somewhat altered. Normally, each element will have a specific electrical charge, either positive or negative. When a gas is heated to the point that plasma is created, that gas is altered in such a way that the numbers of positively and negatively charged particles are the same. Richter did this using shock wave technology.

In the years 1937 to 1938, Richter was in charge of a research laboratory connected to the Berlin-Suhler-Waffen und Fahrzeugwerke at the Gustloff-Werke in Suhl, Thuringia. Suhl and the Gustloff-Werke are in the Jonas Valley which was to become a center of several Nordhausen-sized underground facilities, all doing secret work on weapons and science. In another part of Richter's statement he lists the physical addresses in which he lived. At this time an address of Muehltorstr. 11, Suhl is listed as Richter's home address. German researcher and publisher Thomas Mehner actually went to this address when he received a copy of the Paperclip file. Mr. Mehner reports that the house is now gone but the street still exists. Suhl is Mr. Mehner's home area.

In Suhl, Richter worked on a hydrogen storage system as well as continuing his shock wave research. During this period he complains about the lack of measuring equipment that could withstand such high temperature stress.

With the outbreak of World War Two in 1939, Dr. Richter joined the research staff of the Junkers Aircraft and Motor Works at Dessau, Germany. The Dessau facility for Junkers could be compared to the Skunk Works for Lochkeed. Dessau was the facility for cutting edge research. Dr. Richter worked on vibrational problems associated with supersonic aircraft at Dessau. He found that the instruments needed to do this could be used to benefit his shock wave research, which he obviously had not put aside.

During this time Richter was invited by Dr. Busemann and Prof. Dirksen to join them at the Aircraft Research Facility, Hermann Goering near Braunschweig. Unfortunately, Richter was a Czech citizen and the Gestapo took a dim view of his presence at Braunschweig. They took away Richter's passport and essentially put him under day-to-day scrutiny. This situation simply was not working out well.

By 1942-1943 Richter found himself at the Berlin-Lichterfelde-Ost facility of Baron Manfred von Ardenne. Von Ardenne ran one of the major German nuclear research groups. This group, strangely enough, was the German Post Office. The German Post Office was responsible for communications and was loaded with technical expertise. At this time Dr. Richter met Prof. Abraham Essau, then in charge of all nuclear energy research in Germany. Later in 1943 Richter joined the research staff at the German Research Facility for Air Transport at Berlin-Adershof. This happened after a falling out occurred between Richter and Baron von Ardenne. At Berlin-Adershof, Richter developed turbulence detectors for use in wind tunnels and again furthering his own shock wave research goals.

In 1944 and 1945 Dr. Richter was sponsored by the Speer Ministry for Armament and Munitions as well as by the Reichs Research Council who directed all important war-related research within the Reich. He worked on light-weight battery research at the AEG (General Electricity Company) in Berlin as well as becoming the scientific and technical advisor to Ruhrchemie Aktiengesellschaft at Muehlheim. In addition to his duties in these positions, Richter found time to further his own work in arc plasma experiments using the large test installations available at the AAEG transformer factories at Berlin-Oberschoeneweide.

After the war Richter visited France, England and Holland looking for work. In London, Richter met and became somewhat acquainted with Prof. Kurt Tank, the famous Focke-Wulf aircraft designer, who showed particular interest in the development of nuclear powered propulsion for aircraft. In 1947 Tank went to Argentina.

Dr. Richter went to work for the French Petroleum Institute in Paris but this was not a permanent position. In May 1948, Professor Tank contacted Dr. Richter. He was asked to join with Professor Tank on work in Argentina. The Argentine government also extended an invitation. Richter was being asked to do work involving nuclear reactor development.

By August 1948, Dr. Richter was talking with Juan Peron about the development of nuclear power in Argentina. Argentina had no supply of uranium nor was Dr. Richter interested in developing a fission reactor for Peron. As stated in the Air Intelligence Information Report:

> "...I was not interested in the development of nuclear fission reactor systems but anxious to develop a controllable thermonuclear reactor system; there was a certain probability that the chain-reacting schemes, developed in the fall of 1942, ignited by a shock-wave-controlled arc plasma might turn out to become a controllable reactor system."

"Thermonuclear" means fusion. "Chain-reacting scheme developed in the fall of 1942" mean just that. Dr. Richter had managed to initiate a chain reaction using fusion in 1942. What is the mystery here? Dr. Richter had succeeded in producing fusion power in 1942. What he needed to do was fine-tune the procedure to achieve better control of it.

Dr. Richter states that in October of 1948, he signed a five-year contract with the Argentine authorities and became head of a thermonuclear reactor project. June, 1949 saw start of construction of a laboratory and reactor on Huemul Island. Huemul Island was situated in a mountain lake and virtually isolated from the outside world. The location of this facility was within an area habituated or perhaps even controlled by Germans of the Nazi era. It has even been called "Colonia Dignidad" by some, referring to the fact that perhaps here and no other place on the planet could a former German soldier walk about in uniform without condemnation.

Dr. Richter claimed success in his work on Heumul Island. Again, from the Air Intelligence Information Report:

> "On 16 February 1951 an exponential reactor system was ready for test. In the first test, the injection of lithium-6-enriched lithium into a shock-wave-controlled proton hydrogen plasma, for a short interval, produced series of primary and secondary reactions, the helium-3 helium 3 reaction giving proof for the existence of self-reproducing reaction chains. In a second test, by jetting lithium-6-enriched lithium into avalanche of neutron-reproducing reaction chains were monitored. In both tests, the self-reproducing-reaction chains were analyzed by means of excitation-energy discriminating ultraviolet sensitive proportional counter tubes. At that time, a large-scale reactor system was under construction in which a self-sustaining chain reaction should have been realized; however, this reactor system has never been completed, probably for reasons for sabotage."

This statement is very important. Dr. Richter is saying that he succeeded in sustaining a controlled fusion reaction using his shock wave technology as the containment system.

"Against my strict advice, President Peron announced these results with a great display of propaganda", says Richter. We must remember that although Argentina declared war on Nazi Germany in the final days of the war, being pressured to do so by the United States, Argentina had basically backed the wrong side in World War Two. Peron had marched alongside Hitler in Paris. So, in the 1950s, Argentina and Peron were in a state of somewhat disrepute. Peron saw this development as an instantaneous step to recognition and possibly greatness for himself and Argentina. No great power, not the United States, not the Soviet Union nor Great Britain or France had a fusion reactor. This was a big propaganda coupe for Peron.

Richter returned to reactor tests. On October, 26, 1951 a third test was performed. Richter injected boron into an avalanche of neutron-reproducing reaction chains, which had resulted from the injection of lithium into the shock wave, controlled, neutron producing deuterium plasma. The result was that the boron kept the reaction going. The Air Intelligence Information Report goes on:

"Later on, the plasma-collision-induced isomerization of indium - and rhodium nuckei has been proven by monitoring the radioactive emission of gamma quantums; signal discrimination had to be provided against the shock-wave-induced bremsstrahlung background."

In December, 1951 Richter, according to the report, advised Peron to accelerate development of a commercial reactor by joining with a highly industrialized country "like the United States". Richter was attempting to move away from a political and propaganda usage of his work. Peron was interested in doing just this, and, according to the report, authorized preliminary industrial negotiations.

By March, 1952 the political winds had changed. Richter claims his work was being physically sabotaged on Huemul Island. On September 2, 1952, a commission arrived on the island to investigate progress there. Richter believed its real purpose was to paralyze work there for political reasons having to do with Argentine internal politics. By November, 1952, Richter found himself expelled from his own project and work on it stopped. He was not able to contact Juan Peron.

Dr. Richter now lived day to day in a sort of limbo. He was unable to find work with a private firm for some reason. Richter believed they feared government reprisal. He was forced to sell possessions to put food on the table for his family. Richter was under constant surveillance. In spite of these difficulties, Richter continued with non-nuclear aspects of his research:

"I immediately changed over to intensive design work on shock-wave-controlled industrial chemical arc reactor systems and arc melting furnace systems, which has no bearings on nuclear research at all and, so I hoped, might get me a new position.

At the same time I was developing an improved shock-wave-control ram jet system (a thermonuclear exponential reactor system has so much in common with and looks like a test installation for rocket and jet engines, and all new types of plasma-analyzing and plasma-controlling instruments and processes turn our to be useful in this development)."

In September of 1954 governmental deputies in internal hearings concerning Dr. Richter's alleged negative test results denounced Richter. Dr. Richter responded with a series of telegrams to the President of the Chamber and to President Peron protesting what he saw as unjust accusations made against him. Evidently the President of the Chamber was angered by Richter's telegrams because he was jailed for five days in the congress building without hearings or any sort of trial.

Richter's position did not change with a change in government. The new Lonardi government wanted nothing to do with Richter whom they regarded as a Peron supporter. Richter's state of limbo continued until the date of the Air Intelligence Report, February 18, 1956.

It is quite evident from the tone of Richter's correspondence with the Americans, as evidenced by the full disclosure that he makes, that he was interested in employment in the United States.

Another point, which surfaces again and again in Richter's biography, is his inability to "get along" with co-workers or administrators.

Three other observations should be made about Richter's work, even before we fully review it. First, Dr. Richter was a well know physicist within Nazi Germany and had worked on a wider variety of secret scientific wartime projects within the Reich than most other scientists. Second, Dr. Richter did not follow the standard game plan of physicists of his day. There is no talk of Einstein, except references to a Unified Field Theory, which certainly is not Einstein's domain alone). There is no work in sub-atomic physics, particle accelerators, cyclotrons, neutron generators, etc. Dr. Richter followed completely different path. Third, this path involves shock-wave technology. Everything that Dr. Richter did from day one in 1935 at Falkenau a.d. Eger derived from shock-wave applications. This includes containment of his fusion reaction, which is not the containment via a magnetic field which is and was the vogue in "hot fusion" up until the present.

In this introduction to Dr. Richter, the reader was introduced to Dr. Richter and his work through his biography. One reason for doing this was so that his work will not come as such a "shock" to you, pardon the pun. Dr. Richter advanced science and technology in five areas:

1. The ultra-sound fusion furnace.
2. His ramjet ideas.
3. A sustainable fusion reaction.
4. Direct thermonuclear to electric conversion of energy through plasma induction.
5. Zero Point Energy

Again, quite frankly, the author is more than a little concerned that the reader will simply think these claims and this report is nothing more than a bazaar a fabrication. For this reason, I have decided to use Richter's actual words from his Paperclip file, the file belonging to the United States government, itself. Those interested in verification can obtain a copy of the Paperclip file from the National Archives using the designation given in Sources, below. The topics listed above involve a separate sub-file and statement by Dr. Richter in the overall Paperclip file. Two of these preliminary reports are missing, naturally the latter two, numbers 4 and 5. The reports are out of sequence in internal numbering and so it can safely be surmised that reports do exist which were not included in the National Archive's F.O.I.A. response. These are described, somewhat, in another part of the Paperclip file, however, and that portion will be reproduced also. These preliminary reports will be re-typed here for clarity. Nobody can possibly explain these ideas better than the inventor. A sample page of the original text will be shown. It should be understood that his is a word for word account as if it were enclosed by quotation marks.

* * * * * *

Air Intelligence Information Report IR-79-56

"IMPROVED RAM JET ENGINE"

SUMMARY

Report contains the preliminary report of Dr. Ronald Richter on his work to develop a ram jet engine of radical design by substitution shock waves for the valves of an intermittent ram jet system.

APPROVED: George R. Herrman Colonel USAF Air Attache

1. The following prepared statement was obtained from Dr. Ronald Richter (IR-76-56) and represents his preliminary report on his work to develop a new type of ram jet engine.

IMPROVED RAM JET SYSTEM

The development of an aircraft with a thrust greater than its weight will be the next major step in the evolution of high-speed flight. It is the author's conviction that this goal can be achieved by developing a new type of jet propulsion system, based on the continuously controlled conversion of rocket and ram jet operations within the same propulsion system.

INTRODUCTION

A turbo jet system has many drawbacks. The turbine wheel is in the path of the hot expanding gases. The velocity of the jet increases as the square root of the temperature within the combustion chambers. Besides the constant blast of very hot gases from the combustion chambers with no relief, the high-speed rotation of the turbine subjects the blades to very considerable centrifugal forces, which will pull them out of shape as soon as the metal weakens from the heat attack. The turbine is also subjected to stresses from the aerodynamic effects of the hot gasses which can cause severe vibration and buffeting, and may eventually result in the turbines fluttering to limits at their full rated speed, so that overspeed or overtemperatures, even for a short duration, may be very detrimental. Accordingly, temperature and speed must be controlled with narrow limits and with a high degree of accuracy and stability of the full range of possible operating conditions such as change in altitude, air temperature, air speed, a.s.o., to avoid excess speed or temperature for even a short period. Since the allowable creep stresses are a function of temperature while the actual stresses are a function of speed, both speed and temperature must operate the power controls. At last, the turbo jet system is limited by the ultimate speed of the mechanical revolutions. Therefore, the main problem of the development of turbo jet systems has been and still is to find suitable materials of construction for the turbine to withstand the very high temperatures and stresses.

The ram jet system is based on the straightforward propulsion by thermal energy alone and its propulsive power is not subject to any limitations from moving parts. Whilst in the case of the intermittent ram jet system the air inlet is still controlled by some valves, a steady flow ram jet system has not even a valve as a moving part, but is a simple tunnel in which fuel is burned continuously.

Unfortunately, the thermo-propulsive duct cannot operate at a speed under 200 m.p.h. But at this speed, the ram jet system becomes self-operative, and the faster the forward speed of the aircraft, the greater the compression of air entering the duct and the greater is thrust and efficiency. Since speed automatically breeds more speed, the propulsive power of a ram jet system rises quite extraordinarily with speed, thus leading to power capacities which probably never can be obtained by single turbo jet units. Moreover, the maximum speed to be attained from the thermo-propulsive duct will be limited only by the resistance of the airframe structure to the heat generated by skin friction. Due to the lack of moving parts in the high temperature zone of a ram jet system, ceramics and cerments can be used as materials of construction which would otherwise fail to withstand the combine thermal and mechanical attacks taking place in the moving parts of the turbo jet system.

Besides all the promising aspects of a ram jet system, -no moving parts within the high temperature zone, no centrifugal stresses, no limitation by the ultimate speed of mechanical revolutions, no defects caused by disintegrating moving parts, no losses in turbine and compressor, the theoretically unlimited increase of propulsive power with increasing speed, less control problems, highest climbing speeds, altitude limitation probably in the region of about 100,000 ft, and more (in the case of nuclear powered propulsion), reduced construction costs and easier construction, a.s.o., - there exists a limiting factor which does not allow to take full advantage of such a propulsion system yet; the necessity for some initial means of acceleration, such as rockets or turbo jet systems, until sufficient speed is obtained for the ram jet system to take over its natural thermo-propulsion. For the same reason, it becomes necessary to prevent too low a velocity of the ram jet system with a consequent loss of flight. Owing to the critical velocity by which a ram jet system becomes self-operative, take-off and landing operations are complex.

The reheat device supplies the principle of the ram jet system to the turbo jet system, giving short bursts of extra speed in an emergency as well as at take-off.

A rocket is just another branch of jet propulsion and becomes a ram jet system when the mass (and the oxygen, in case of chemical combustion processes) to be discharged is taken from the outside atmosphere instead of being stored in the aircraft fuselage itself.

A jet propulsion system has to be developed which is operating as a rocket system at take-off and becomes self-operative as an intermittent and steady flow ram jet system gradually with increasing speed of flight. The continuously controlled conversion of one propulsion phase into the other can be achieved by the control of the combustion process itself.

For many years, the author was experimenting with a new shock wave generating process, the shock waves being generated by an electro-magnetically controlled extremely hot arc plasma zone. By the same process technique, shock waves can also be generated in combustion chambers and in gaseous zones heated by the impact of nuclear energy.

The analysis of the injection of gaseous jets into a superposition of powerful shock waves revealed interesting data in regard to the penetrability of shock-wave-controlled zones. In the course of these investigations, it became obvious, for instance, that the valves of an intermittent ram jet system can be substituted by shock waves, thus providing for the continuously controlled conversion of an intermittent into a steady flow ram jet system.

In the explosion phase, an intermittent ram jet system is operating as a rocket system. The explosion closes the entrance valve and the hot expanding gases escape at high speed through the exhaust. In the same way, a shock-wave-controlled intermittent ram jet system, in the very instant of the shock-wave-generation explosion, behaves like a rocket system. On that basis, it should become possible to start an intermittent shock-wave-controlled ram jet system without the help of acceleration-assisting means by a series of shock-wave-generating explosions.

The operation of a shock-wave-controlled ram jet system can be considerably improved by dividing the combustion reactor system into two partial reactor units;

the one reactor unit near the exhaust will be operating as a rocket system as long as the other, shock-wave-controlled reactor, unit will substitute a more or less impenetrable valve. As soon as the shock-wave-controlled ram jet system becomes self-operative as a steady flow ram jet system, both partial reactor units are operating without shock waves.

In the case of chemical combustion processes, the rocket phase of shock-wave-controlled ram jet systems will probably cause an extravagant fuel consumption. In general, the fuel consumption of a rocket system is up to six times the rate of a ram jet system and from ten to twenty times as much as the turbo jet consumption. But in the case of defensive jet fighters, for instance, which need to be airborne with a minimum of delay, economy is a second consideration to performance; the use of rockets to assist take-off and to reduce runways seemed to be the simplest and most economic solution. In the first line, the advantages of a shock-wave-controlled ram jet system lies in the fact that all the different systems of propulsion are combined in one, making also possible the continuously controlled conversion of one propulsion system into the other, in flight. Like in the case of the reheat device, by the conversion of the ram jet phase into the rocket phase in flight, short bursts of extra speed can also be produced, thus providing, for instance, for the highest possible climbing rate, s.s.o.

The continuous covertibility of ram jet and rocket operations in flight will also improve the safe operation of high-speed aircraft and will especially supply the ram jet system with all the flexibility necessary to make it the most powerful and efficient aircraft in atmospheric flight. Even vertical take-off and landing operations could be attainable with shock-wave-controlled ram jet systems.

The problem of fuel consumption, especially in the rocket phase, becomes obsolete in case of the substitution of the chemical combustion system by a nuclear reactor system. Although the heat from nuclear reactor systems can be transferred normally only by means of heat exchange processes and not by direct 'combustion', means can be developed, by which the suitable control characteristics of highly enriched fission reactor systems and of shock-wave-ignited lithium and boron consuming fusion reactor systems and their enormous power capacity can be suitably be used in the operating of shock-wave-controlled convertible ram jet systems.

The economy of shock-wave-controlled ram jet systems will undoubtedly increase with the power capacity of the system; in other words, the author is not in the position yet to estimate accurately whether jet fighter development will be influenced by this new ram jet system at once. But it seems to be reasonable to assume, that the development of larger-hypersonic aircraft (bomber, transport, passenger planes, a.s.o.) will be based on the improved ram jet systems, outlined in this preliminary report.

COMMENTS OF PREPARING OFFICER:

2. Dr. Richter is very desirous of obtaining a position with an aircraft engine manufacturing company in the United States. He would like to continue working on ram jet engine development. This office, if desired can obtain additional information.

VERGIL N. NESTOR Lt. Colonel USAF Assistant Air Attache

* * * * * * *

AUTHOR'S COMMENTS OF THE RICHTER RAM JET

Not only could the ram jet designs of Dr. Richter be used in a standard fighter jet, they could also be used in a vertically rising aircraft, even one powered by nuclear fission or even nuclear fusion. This brings UFOs to mind.

* * * * * *

Air Intelligence Information Report IR-80-56

"THERMONUCLEAR EXPONENTIAL EXPERIMENTS"

1. Report contains a summary of his work by Dr. Ronald Richter in developing a completely new type of arc melting furnace based on a shock wave reactivity rather than a heat transfer process through utilization of a chemical arc reactor system. To prove his theory, he developed a reactor simulator utilizing thermonuclear exponential experiments based on shock-wave-ignited self-reproducing chains consuming lithium and boron isotopes.

2. Approving Officer is not technically gualified to comment on the subject presented. However, Dr. Richter is, in the opinion of qualified German scientists resident in Argentina, a complete fraud who has "parlayed" a limited scientific background and a glib tongue to obtain much publicity: i.e., the explosion of the so-called "Argentine Atomic Bomb" in 1952. In the opinion of these qualified German scientists, the disgrace and obscurity that Dr. Richter now enjoys is better than he deserves.

APPROVED: George R. Herrman Colonel USAF Air Attache
1. The following statement was prepared by Dr. Ronald Richter (IR-76-56) and given to Preparing Officer.

The advantage of a high-speed reaction is that for a given capital investment more product can be run through a chemical or metallurgical plant or a smaller plant can be built to yield a given amount of reaction product.

In general, the reaction rate of a chemical reactor system depends on temperature, pressure, and catalyst. An electric arc between electrodes of carbon is the most intense source of heat used commonly in industrial practice. Such an arc plasma reactor can be operated in any atmosphere at any desired pressure and any kind of material can be introduced into the arc plasma zone and thus vaporized and heated up to plasma temperatures. The operation of a plasma reactor system can be considerably improved by jetting a mixture of reactants through the high energetic arc plasma zone at very high velocities.

Although arc furnaces are used to the greatest extent in the melting of metals and the production of ferroalloys, they figure prominently in the chemical operations requiring high temperatures, such as calcium carbide, elemental phosphorus, a.s.o. Arc furnaces up to 30,000 kw are in service.

In 1936, I was experimenting with reflector-controlled arc reactor systems. When studying self-stabilization of arc plasma zones by instantaneous strong overloading, I quite incidentally observed the occurrence of explosionlike plasma fluctuations, generating powerful shock waves. The analysis of the shock wave promoting factors revealed how to improve the shock wave generating process by means of andyzer-controlled feedback operations.

In the course of these investigations, it has been found, that about 50% of the arc plasma energy can be converted into powerful plasma shock waves, thus creating a completely new type of chemically and metallurgically reactive zone of operation. Such a reflector-controlled superposition of powerful plasma shock waves produces tremendous intensities of sound and ultra-sound, generated by the gaseous plasma zone itself, thus providing for the highest possible rate of energy transfer at all. All the before-known ultra-sound generating methods were characterized by a very poor coupling of the ultrasound energy to be fed into the reacting zone. For all these reasons, a shockwave-controlled reactor plasma is representing the strongest source of ultra-sound. The operation of such a powerful ultra-sound generating arc reactor plasma is quite a simple affair, but precautions have to be taken for preventing structural damage by ultrasound and the shock-wave-induced corrosion. Data-telemetering operations and remote reactor control have to be applied, to avoid a considerable health hazard for the reactor-operating crew.

The combined reaction of non-Maxwellian heat transfer, intense shock wave and ultra-sound reactivity leads to the most radical mechanical disintegration of all the materials to be fed into the reacting zone. In consequence of this, basic physical and chemical conditions can be achieved with never before could be obtained by other reactor systems. Owing to the incomparable high reaction rates that only can be obtained by shock-wave-controlled arc plasma systems, in many industrial chemical and metallurgical processes processing time ad production costs can be considerably reduced.

There exists a wide field of industrial applications, as:

The production of extremely purified and degassified metals and alloys, cheap tonnage processing of zirconium, titanium, beryllium, uranium, thorium and other metals.

Improved steel alloys with reduced production costs, wide range of variation of the mechanical and thermal properties of steel alloys (in general, of any kind of alloy) by applying different shock wave: heat ratios,

The production of completely new types of ultrasound-induced alloys and cements, improved cerments and ceramics for rocket and jet engines, improved ceramics and cerments with desirable nuclear properties of nuclear power reactors,

Ultra-sound-cracking of petroleum, ultra-sound induced disintegration of macromolecules,

De-gasification of liquids and fused materials, a.so.o.,

Considerable increase of the reaction rate of chemical processes induced by the high temperatures and pressure peaks, resulting form the plasma shock fonts, a.s.o.

A reactor simulator has been developed by which industrial application problems can be studied without building up the large-scale reactor system itself, thus reducing initial costs of industrial projects considerably. No further research work is necessary to construct large-scale shock-wave furnaces and reactors.

In brief:

Thermonuclear exponential experiments, based on shock-wave-ignited self-reproducing reaction chains, consuming lithium and boron isotopes. When developing a shock-wave-controlled arc reactor system, one fundamental problem was the thermodynamic analysis of the plasma shock waves.

After a considerable amount of experimenting on the photoelectric analysis of highly luminous shock fronts, it seemed to be promising to improve the thermodynamic analysis of shockwave-controlled arc plasma zones by employing plasma-collision-induced nuclear reactions. Owing to the high temperatures and pressure obtained in a gas behind of strong shock waves, it became very probable that in the case of deuterium gas, some high energetic deutrons might undergo deuteron-deuteron reactions, the reaction yield being a suitable basis for testing non-equilibrium thermodynamics. Since the reaction rate of a thermonuclear reaction depends exponentially on temperature, and since the temperature increases rather rapidly toward the center of the arc plasma zone, especially in the case of shock-wave-induced plasma pulsations, it was to be hoped that a detectable reaction rate might be achieved. But it was unlikely that the detection of statistically fluctuating plasma-collision-induced thermal nuclear reaction chains might become a reality.

In order to improve the deductibility of plasma-shock-wave-induced nuclear reactions in the fall of 1942, - by using nuclear mass data just having been published by J. Mattauch and S. Fluege, (Kernphysikalische Tabellen, Springer Verlag, Berlin, 1942) - I developed nuclear reaction schemes, based on the chain-reacting consumption of the lithium and boron isotopes.

The neutron-induced conversion of lithium-6 into tritium and helium, the neutron-multiplying tritium-tritium reaction, and other neutron-multiplying and lithium-7 into lithium-6 converting secondary reactions were taken into consideration as being useful components of controllable self-reproducing reaction chains. By providing for a sufficient number of initial neutrons and sufficiently high reaction rate of the neutron-multiplying processes, it was to be expected that the ignition of bursts of reaction chains might become feasible by jetting lithium or lithium-6-enriched lithium into a shock wave controlled neutron-producing deuterium high-pressure plasma. Since the reaction rate of such a reaction scheme depends equally on temperature and on multiplication factor, a shock-wave-induced neutron-reproducing reaction chain must be far more sensitive to temperature than a plasma-collision-induced thermal nuclear reaction chain ever can be.

The source of neutrons for the neutron-reproducing thermonuclear exponential experiments was a shock-wave-controlled, 300 kw, deuterium high pressure plasma. In such a deuterium plasma, due to the persistent isotropic plasma-collision-induced bombardment, not only the basic deuteron-deuteron reactions, but also plasma-collision-induced secondary reactions, like the deuterium-tritium and the tritium-tritium reaction will occur. By these reactions a spectrum of fast neutrons is produced. A contribution to the number of plasma-produced neutrons and thus a substantial increase in reactivity can be obtained by surrounding the plasma zone with a neutron-multiplying beryllium reflector. For helium-5 being a strong neutron absorber in the low energy range the balance between neutron-producing and neutron-absorbing processes will finally be controlled by the scattering-induced moderation of the neutron energies and by the plasma-collision-induced reaction rate of the helium-3-producing and helium-3-consuming secondary reactions. Tritium enrichment follows from the two-dimensional bombardment of a deuterium target with deuterons. In the case of the plasma-collision-induced three-dimensional deutron-deutron bombardment, tritium will not only be produced but will also be consumed by secondary reactions. This criterion is useful when it comes to prove the existence of plasma-collision-induced secondary nuclear reactions.

By the injection of lithium into a neutron producing deuterium plasma, an avalanche of tritium-producing and neutron-multiplying primary and secondary processes will develop. The lithium-5 converting reactions, having a relatively high cross section in the low as well as in the high-energy range, with a remarkable capture resonance near 258 kev, starts the avalanche of reaction chains by producing tritium. The Shockwave induced reaction rate of the neutron-multiplying processes (tritium-tritium, tritium-lithium-7, tritium-lithium-6) determines the intensity of the bursts of reaction chains. The tritium-producing process can to a certain extent be controlled by inserting neutron absorption rods into the neutron-reflecting structure, thus controlling back-scattering into the plasma region. For lithium-7 being a poor neutron absorber, there is no parallel to the resonance absorption in uranium-238. The gradual enrichment of helium-4 will increase non-reactive scattering but indications exist, that the enrichment of helium-6 might turn out to be even useful in regard to the safe operation of such a reactor system. The lack of reactor-contaminating radioactive reaction products adds to the outstanding features of neutron-reproducing thermonuclear reactor systems.

As one can see, the shock-wave-controlled arc plasma system became involved in thermonuclear exponential experiments by accident rather than design but turned out to become a useful tool in research on controlled thermonuclear reactor systems. For the first time, an arc plasma has been transformed into a zone of intense shock waves, accompanied by an extraordinarily high degree of plasma turbulence; a practically invisible reactor plasma (as a consequence of the non-Maxwellian characteristics of plasma shock waves, most of the photons emitted belong to the ultra-violet and bremsstrahlung region of the electromagnetic spectrum), emitting an almost unbearable intensity of sound and ultra-sound, the whole reactor structure oscillating under the impact of the feed-back-controlled plasma shock waves, - that's the basis of operation for the ignition of self-reproducing plasma reaction chains, and this shock-wave-induced ignition process will undoubtedly substitute nuclear-fission-induced ignition, and make possible the gradual transformation of a thermonuclear exponential reactor system into a self-sustaining chain-reacting system.

On February 15, 1951, an exponential reactor system was ready for test. In the first test, a series of primary and secondary nuclear reactions was produced for a short interval by jetting lithium-6-enriched lithium into a shockwave-controlled proton hydrogen plasma. Some of the reactions (the helium-3, helium-3 reaction) were multiplying the primary protons by ejecting two high energetic protons.

In a second test, a rapidly developing avalanche of neutron-reproducing reaction chains was produced by jetting lithium-6-enriched lithium into a shock-wave-controlled deuterium high-pressure plasma.

In both tests, the self-reproducing reaction chains were analyzed by means of excitation-energy-discriminating ultraviolet-sensitive proportional counter tubes, a tele-analyzing method, having been developed and applied for the first time in 1938, when analyzing powerful plasma shock fronts.

By these exponential experiments, it has been demonstrated (1) that the shock-wave-induced ignition of self-reproducing thermonuclear reaction chains is possible, and (2) that the ignition of such reaction chains can be accomplished under controllable conditions.

On October 26, 1951, in a third decisive exponential experiment, it has been proven that the avalanche of neutron-reproducing reaction chains, resulting from the injection of lithium into a shock-wave-controlled neutron-producing deuterium high-pressure plasma, can be kept going on by injecting boron. Boron-11 like lithium-7 is an excellent neutron-multiplier when being bombarded with tritium particles. The fast-neutron-induced conversion of boron-10 into tritium and helium and the slow-neutron-induced conversion of boron-10 into the neutron-multiplying lithium-7 and helium are providing for tritium production and neutron multiplication. It might be of interest to note that the mechanism of the hydrogen bomb is based on the same reaction schemes. As has already been mentioned, a lithium and boron injected deutrerium plasma is a chain-reacting source of fast neutrons. When injecting natural uranium into such a plasma zone, fast-neutron-fission of uranium-238 occurs, the so-called 'thermo-fission'.

A serious disadvantage from the point of view of reactor control seems to be arising from the fact that in all the plasma-induced neutron-reproducing reaction chains only prompt neutrons are emitted. It is evident that the absence of delayed neutron emission would demand an exceedingly fine and extremely fast operating adjustment of the reactor controls. Fortunately, ignition, control and heat exchange of thermonuclear reactor systems can considerably be improved by providing for a reflector-controlled pulsating reactor plasma. In the case of a nuclear fusion reactor system, not a critical size of reactive material by a critical compression of the reactive plasma will be responsible for reaching a sufficiently high reaction rate of the neutron-multiplying processes, thus developing a controllable self-repeating cycle of plasma pulsation. In other words, during the compression period, the central temperature of the compressed reactor plasma should become comparable with the temperature needed for a sufficiently high reaction rate of the neutron-reproducing reaction chains, to make the reactor system a self-sustaining one. The absence of delayed neutrons will only alter rise time and delay time of the compression-induced impulse of reaction chains. The self-stabilizing features of pulsating reactor operation will suitably control supercritical bursts of self-reproducing reaction chains. By compressing the reactive plasma zone briefly to supercriticality, the gaseous zone quickly heats up and then cools itself by expansion, thus eliminating the formidable heat transfer obstacles.

Much work has been done in regard to the control of chain-reacting plasma zones by magnetically and electro-dynamically induced plasma deformation, magnetically-controlled plasma pulsation, electronic simulation of pulsating reactor plasma conditions, a.s.o.

Monte Grande February, 1, 1956

COMMENTS OF PREPARING OFFICER:

2. Material contained above is beyond the technical ability of the Preparing Officer to evaluate.

Vergil N. Nestor Lt. Colonel USAF Assistant Air Attache

* * * * * * *

Air Intelligence Information Report IR-145-56

"THERMONUCLEAR PROPULSION SYSTEM"

Report describes the work and theory of Dr. Ronald Richter in development of aircraft thermonuclear propulsion system.

APPROVED: George R. Herrman Colonel UFAF Air Attache

1. The following is extracted from a paper written by Dr. Ronald Richter (IR-76-56):

In nuclear fission powered propulsion systems, thermal energy cannot be generated by 'direct combustion' but has to be applied to the propulsion system by means of indirect heat transfer. For this reason, the efficiency of such a propulsion system - jet or rocket system - depends mainly on the technology on the heat-transfer-promoting materials of construction.

The gradual contamination of the hermetically sealed-off reactor system with highly radioactive nuclear fission products and the protection of the flight personal against neutron, gamma, and radioactive hazard, demands for voluminous any heavy shielding structures. Leakage or fully destruction of the reactor system by flight accident causes severe contamination of the atmosphere by radioactive fission products.

In nuclear fission powered propulsion systems - homogeneous or heterogeneous systems - only highly enriched and very costly reactor fuels can be used. Based on the results of shock-wave-ignition controlled thermonuclear exponential experiments, the conception for a thermonuclear propulsion system has been developed.

The shock-wave-controlled arc plasma system of project 1 became involved in thermonuclear exponential experiments by accident rather than design. A fundamental problem connected with the development of shock-wave-controlled reactor systems was the thermodynamic analysis of the plasma shock waves produced. After a considerable amount of experimenting of the photoelectric analysis of highly luminous shock fronts, it seemed to be promising, to improve the thermodynamic analysis of shock-wave-controlled arc plasma zones by employing plasma-collision-induced nuclear reactions.

Owing to the high temperatures and pressures obtained in a gas behind strong Shockwaves, it was very probable that in the case of a deuterium high pressure plasma, some high energetic deuterons might undergo deuteron-deuteron reactions, and even secondary tritium-deuteron and tritium-tritium reactions, the reaction yield being a suitable basis for testing non-equilibrium thermodynamics. Since the reaction rate of a thermonuclear reaction depends exponentially on temperature, and since the temperature increases rather rapidly toward the center of the arc plasma zone, especially in the case of shock-wave-induced plasma pulsations, it was to be hoped, that a detectable reaction rate might be achieved. The detection of statistically fluctuating plasma-reaction rate might be achieved. The detection of statistically fluctuating plasma-collision-induced thermal nuclear reaction chains was unlikely then (in 1936).

In order to improve the deductibility of plasma-shock-wave-induced nuclear reactions, I developed nuclear reaction schemes, (in 1942), based on the chain-reacting consumption of the lithium and boron isotopes.

The neutron-induced conversion of lithium-6 into tritium and helium, the neutron-multiplying tritium-tritium reaction, and other neutron-multiplying and lithium-7 into lithium-6 converting secondary reactions were taken into consideration as being useful components of a controllable self-reproducing reaction chain. By providing for a sufficient number of initial neutrons and a sufficiently high reaction rate of the neutron-reproducing processes, it was to be expected that the ignition of bursts of reaction chains might become feasible by jetting lithium or lithium-6-enriched lithium into a shock-wave-controlled neutron-producing deuterium high pressure plasma. The reaction rate of such a reaction scheme depends equally on temperature and reproduction factor, a shock-wave-induced neutron-reproducing chain of reactions must be far more temperature-sensitive than a plasma-collision-induced thermal nuclear reaction can ever be. The experimental analysis of the non-Maxwellian thermodynamic conditions in a shock-wave-controlled arc plasma zone by shock-wave-ignited self-reproducing nuclear reaction chains is practically a thermonuclear exponential experiment.

By injecting lithium into a neutron-producing deuterium plasma, an avalanche of tritium-producing and neutron-multiplying primary and secondary reactions develops. The lithium-6 converting reaction, having a relatively high cross section in the low as well as in the high-energy range, with a remarkable capture resonance near 258 kev, starts the avalanche of reaction chains by producing tritium. The shock-wave-induced reaction rate of the neutron-reproducing processes (tritium-tritium, tritium-lithium-7, tritium-lithium-6) will determine the intensity of the bursts of reaction chains. The tritium-producing process can to a certain extent by controlled by inserting neutron absorption rods into the neutron-reflecting structure, thus controlling back-scattering into the plasma region. For lithium-7 being a poor neutron-absorber, there is no parallel to the resonance absorption in uranium-238. The gradual enrichment of helium-4 will increase non-reactive scattering but indications exist, that helium-4 enrichment might turn out to be even useful in regard to the safe operation of such a reactor system, when it becomes self-sustaining. The lack of reactor-contaminating radioactive reaction products adds to the outstanding features of neutron-reproducing thermonuclear reactor systems.

The avalanche of neutron-reproducing reaction chains, resulting from the injection of lithium into a shock-wave-controlled neutron-producing deuterium high-pressure plasma, can be maintained by injection boron. Boron-11 like lithium-7 is an excellent neutron-multiplier, when bombarded with tritium. The fast-neutron-induced conversion of boron-10 into tritium and helium and the slow-neutron-induced conversion of boron-10 into the neutron-multiplying lithium-7 and helium are providing for tritium production and neutron multiplication.

A serious disadvantage from the point of view of reactor control seems to be arising from the fact that in all the plasma induced neutron-reproducing reaction chains, only prompt neutrons are emitted. It is evident that the absence of delayed neutron emission would demand for an exceedingly fine and extremely fast operating adjustment of the reactor controls. Fortunately, ignition, control, and heat exchange of thermonuclear reactor systems can be considerably improved by providing for a reflector-controlled pulsating reactor plasma. In the case of a nuclear fusion reactor reactant plasma will be responsible for reaching a sufficiently high reaction rate of the neutron-reproducing processes, thus developing a controllable self-repeating cycle of plasma pulsation. The absence of delayed neutrons will only alter rise time and decay time of the compression-induced impulse of reaction chains. The self-stabilizing features of pulsating reactor operation will suitably control supercritical burst of self-reproducing reaction chains. By compressing the reactant plasma zone briefly to supercrit-icality, the gaseous zone quickly heats up and then cools itself by expansion, thus eliminating the formidable heat transfer obstacles.

(Much work has been done in regard to the control of chain-reacting plasma zones by magnetically and electro-dynamically induced plasma deformation, magnetically-controlled plasma pulsation, the direct conversion of nuclear energy into electricity in plasma reactor systems due to the high ionization rate of the plasma zone and its interaction with a static magnetic field.)

Development of a pulsating plasma reactor system, the compression period providing for a sufficiently high reaction rate and reproduction factor, the expanding period providing for thrust and heat dissipation. Such a pulsating thermonuclear propulsion system, based on the chain-reacting consumption of the lithium and boron isotopes, depends in the first line of the realization of a shock-wave-controlled ignition process. It is to be expected that in the very near future the United States or Russia will demonstrate, by exploding a thermonuclear device, that such an explosion can be ignited by Shockwaves, i.e. without the use of an initial nuclear fission device.

Since there are no highly radioactive reaction products, the tail-pipe can be directly connected to the reactor vessel, thus avoiding indirect heat transfer. The critical diameter of such a 'direct combustion' system depends on reaction rate and reproduction factor of the compression period of the plasma pulsation, which in turn depends on the isotope ratio of the reactant materials injected.

Accurate neutron dosage by accurate injection dosage of the reactant materials reduces shielding volume and weight considerably.

Practically no reactor contamination. No atmospheric contamination.

Vertical start and landing operations.

Near target, the propulsion reactor system of a guided missile can be converted automatically into a thermonuclear bomb reactor system by providing for the necessary overloading of the reactor system.

PROGRAM OF DEVELOPMENT

Installation and operation of a shock-wave-controlled arc plasma reactor system (like project 1),

Shock-wave-ignition controlled thermonuclear exponential experiments, based on the injection of lithium and boron into the shock-wave-controlled deuterium plasma, analysis of injection characteristics,

Performance of a self-sustaining neutron-reproducing reactor system when directly connected to the tail-pike, they representing a thermonuclear propulsion system, combine injection and thrust analysis, analysis of control characteristics,

Development of a safe ignition process,

Minimum diameter of the reactor vessel vs. isotope ration, a.s.o.

INSTALLATIONS AND EQUIPMENT

Reactor system, analyzing and controlling equipment practically the same as in project 1.

Tele-operating nuclear reaction analyzer of special design,

Non-equilibrium thermodynamics-analyzer of special design,

Reactor controls of special design,

Plasma turbulence analyzer of special design,

Digital computer components, pressure-analyzing equipment,

Photoelectric cell of special design,

Sealers, counting rate meters, pulse height analyzers,

Neutron, gamma, and radioactivity detecting and analyzing equipment,

Shock-wave-ignition reactor bombs,

Thrust analyzing equipment as in project 2, a.s.o.

As you can see, all the three projects have shock-wave-operations in common. In all the projects, an explosion-proof structure for the reactor system and an explosion-protected control station are needed. Most of the analyzing and controlling equipment (also that of special design) is practically the same in 11 the projects. The task is to build up an automatically self-recording test installation, providing for a maximum of automatically plotted characteristics curves of the reactor system in question, thus requiring just a minimum of scientifically trained personnel. In all the three projects, operational progress can be achieved faster by setting up electronic analog systems.

2. The project number 1 referred to in the above was reported in IR-80-56. Installation and equipment for this project is as follows:

A tele-controlled reactor system,(shock-wave-induced noise hazard),

Reactor vessel and electrodes immersed in an explosion-proof structure of reinforced concrete.

Dimensions and shape of the reactor structure depend on the power input and industrial application of the reactor system (melting furnace, chemical reactor system, a.s.o.),

Although principal demonstrations of the process in question can be carried out with a rector system consuming around 100 kw, it is recommended to start the shock-wave-reactor program with a power input of about 1,000-5,000 kw, for higher power input means higher output of reaction products, alloys, ceramics, cermets, a.s.o., i.e. to arrive at large-scale operations (and large-scale business faster,

Power transformer, rectifier installations, power controls, stabilizing equipment, rectifier controls, electrode controls,

Shock-wave-analyzers of special design,

Shock-wave-controls of special design,

Blowers, cooling water installations,

A travelling crane for handling the reactor system,

Explosion-protected control station, containing all the controls, analyzers, automatic power switches,

Injection systems, electromagnetically controlled valves,

Relays and automatic switches, switchboard instruments,

Electronic instruments of special design.

Recording multichannel galvanometers and cathode ray detectors,

Ultra-sound spectrum analyzers, ultra-sound intensity meters,

Polar-coordination recorders for ultra-sound field recording,

Pulse height analyzers, pulse counting rate meters (recording),

X-Y recording instruments and plottingboards, digital computer components,

D.C.-D.C. cathode ray oscilloscopes, with cameras,

Microwave spectrum analyzers (Plasma oscillation spectrum),

Height-speed framing camera, Kerr cell cameras, Television equipment, monitoring the reactor core,

Multichannel magnetic data recorder,

Reaction product analyzers (when the reactor system is used as a chemical reactor system-recording infrared and mass spectrometer analysis,

Carbon electrodes,

Reactor simulation for design work on industrial reactor system,

3. The project number 2 referred to in the above was reported in IR-79-56. Installation and equipment for this project is:

A complete ram jet system with a flight simulator (compressor unit for the performance of subcritical, critical, and supercirtical flow conditions) , immersed in an explosion-proof test-pit,

Injection systems of special design, electromagnetically controlled valves,

Fuel and oxygen tanks,

Explosion-protected control station,

Thrust-analyzing equipment (recording),

Shock-wave-analyzers of special design,

Shock-wave-controls of special design,

Most of the analyzing and controlling equipment of project 1, especially multichannel recording instruments, pulse height analyzers, pulse spectrum and ultra-sound analyzers, pulse counting rate meters, a photoelectric reaction analyzer of non-equilibrium thermodynamics,

Temperature and pressure recording instruments,

Flow recording instruments.

COMMENTS of Preparing Officer:

4. The material contained in this report is beyond the technical ability of the Preparing Officer to evaluate. Conversation with dr. Cooper and Dr. Multhopp, scientists of The Glen L. Martin Company of the United States who have interviewed Dr. Richter, revealed that there may be something of value in the work and theory of Dr. Richter. Vergil N. Nestor Lt. Colonel USAF Assistant Air Attache

COMMENTS of Approving Officer:

5. Material contained in this report was submitted to the Air Attache by Dr. Ronald Richter, whose scientific reputation in Argentina is not good. (See IR-80-56).

G. R. H.

* * * * * * *

These are the three main reports submitted by Dr. Richter to the American authorities, obviously hoping for employment. The reports have been reproduced as accurately as possible, including minor spelling errors. The positive and negative comments of the American personnel preparing these reports indicate either a split opinion of Dr. Richter's value or an attempt to cover all contingencies. In other words, if Dr. Richter and his work were to turn out to be of great value, then these individuals would be in line for credit for his "discovery". On the other hand, if naught came from all of this or something negative developed, the same command could say "I told you so".

All three examples of Dr. Richter's work involve shock waves. Ultra-sound was harnessed and set into a feedback loop to accomplish his ends. Two projects that he has written on above involve fusion. The ignition procedure and the containment field are provided for by means of his a shock wave technology. If this were all Dr. Richter had done, he would have been guaranteed inclusion in this book for that work alone, but Dr. Richter's mind had already moved beyond the production of a sustained fusion reaction and the technological implication, thereof. A clue to this broader thinking is given in his specialties:

"...development and testing of highly-turbulent, magnetic-field-controlled fission and fusion plasma systems, Experimental approach to solar flare conditions and to the explosion-tendency of the solar plasma, ultraviolet excess analysis, excitation of space structure by pulsation-controlled plasma implosion, testing the limitations of quantum mechanics and quantum dynamics, Experimental approach to the unified field theory and to the velocity of propagation of gravity, a.s.o."

Dr. Richter was thinking on a much grander scale. It is clear that Dr. Richter's method was experimentation, not merely conducting "research" by scribbling mathematical babble on a chalkboard and then insisting on a Spinosian set of definitions of exactly what the physical universe actually is.

Dr. Richter's laboratory work led to two striking spin-offs of the shock-wave research. He was working on furthering both this concepts as well as refining the work already described in 1956, contemporaneously with the creation of the Paperclip file by the US intelligence services.

The first is the direct conversion of nuclear energy into electric energy. Again, this was an offshoot of the research already described above. It involves venting the moving plasma through a magnetic field, which causes a plasma induction of electric energy.

Dr. Richter indicates that the concept and testing occurred in 1951 with the original experimentation being derived from his work in Germany in 1944. Dr. Richter did "Preliminary work" in 1953 and he cites an unpublished letter to the editor of "Nucleonics" on September 22, 1956 as documentation. Dr. Richter mentions that the charge carried by some of the substances he worked with might prove to be better than others.

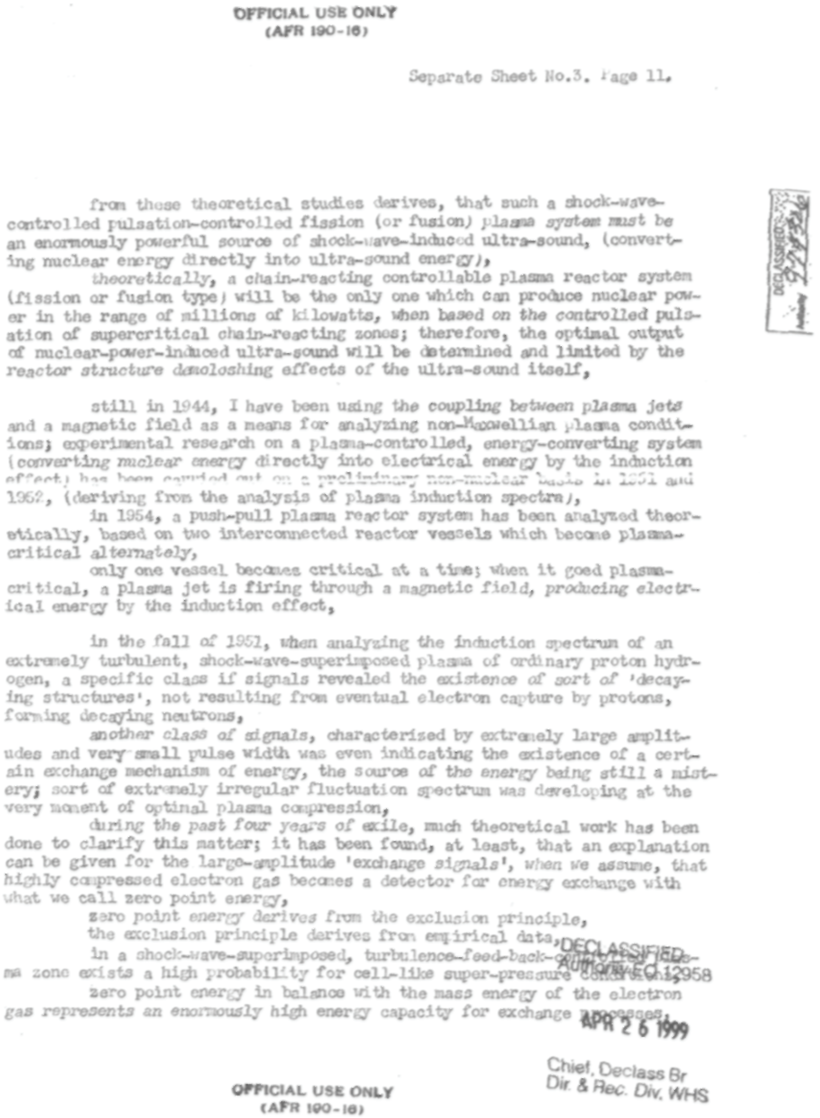
Dr. Richter also mentions direct conversion of nuclear energy into radio frequency energy in fission and fusion plasma systems. He claims the year of the concept was 1949 and the report, again, in 1956. We have all heard of this phenomena; it is the pulse of electromagnetic energy that occurs during detonation of a nuclear or thermonuclear bomb. This pulse knocks out sensitive electronic equipment and radio communications devices.

But there was another discovery made by Dr. Richter that dwarfs everything except, perhaps, controlled fusion. This discovery is of another and entirely different sort of energy whose discovery also resulted from Dr. Richter's work on shock waves. Dr. Richter even coined a phrase for it, (although he is never given credit for doing so), and it is a term which we hear frequently now. It is called "Zero Point Energy". Dr. Richter writes:

"experimental approach to zero point energy (and probably to a new source of energy at all), deriving from the analysis of exponential fusion experiments in 1951,"

So, Dr. Richter was working on fusion experiments when he hit upon something else. In another statement we learn that the experiments that led to the discovery of zero point energy were the experiments of directly converting plasma energy into electrical energy (as he wrote it minor errors included):

"...still in 1944, I have been using the coupling between plasma jets and a magnetic field as a means for analyzing non-Maxwellian plasma conditions; experimental research of a plasma-controlled, energy-converting system (converting nuclear energy directly into electrical energy by the induction effect) has been carried out on a preliminary non-nuclear basis in 1951 and 1952, (deriving from the analysis of plasma induction spectra), in 1954, a push-pull plasma reactor system has been analyzed theoretically, based on two interconnected reactor vessels which become plasma-critical alternately, only one vessel becomes critical at a time; when it goes plasma-critical, a plasma jet is firing through a magnetic field, producing electrical energy by the induction effect, in the fall of 1951, when analyzing the induction spectrum of an extremely turbulent, shock-wave-superimposed plasma of ordinary proton hydrogen, a specific class if signals revealed the existence of sort of 'decaying structures', not resulting from eventual electron capture by protons, forming decaying neutrons, another class of signals, characterized by extremely large amplitudes and very small pulse width was even indicating the existence of a certain exchange mechanism of energy, the source of the energy being still a mystery; sort of extremely irregular fluctuations spectrum was developing at the very moment of optimal plasma compression, during the past four years of exile, much theoretical work has been done to clarify this matter; it has been found, at least, that an explanation can be given for the large-amplitude 'exchange signals' when we assume, that highly compressed electron gas becomes a detector for energy exchange with what we call zero point energy, zero point energy derives from the exclusion principle, the exclusion principle derives from empirical data, in a shock-wave-superimposed, turbulence-feed-back controlled plasma zone exists a high probability for cell-like super-pressure conditions, gas represents an enormously high energy capacity of exchange processes, about 10 to the 10th kwh per unit volume, on the basis of exchange coupling, it seems to be possible to 'extract' a compression-proportional amount of zero point energy by means of a magnetic-field-controlled exchange fluctuation between the compressed electron gas and sort of cell structure in space (dimensions about 10 to the minus 13th cm) (author's note: Dr. Richter abbreviated this figure as scientific notation), representing the source of what we call zero point energy, it seems even possible that the large-amplitude fluctuation signals derive from a mechanism of energy-conversion unknown to us yet which becomes detectable only in highly compressed electron gas, (it would be of interest to repeat these experiments not with a proton hydrogen plasma-proton spin and electron spin identical - but with a helium-4 plasma, the spin discrepancy supporting energy extraction, it would also be worth-while to search for exchange signals in high-power pulsating fission plasma systems), in case, all these interpretations are fully correct, plasma implosion analysis might turn out to become an approach to a completely new source of energy, probably superior to nuclear energy, the present status of this matter can best be compared with the situation when nuclear fission was discovered, but when the development of a chain-reacting fission reactor system was still depending on the realization of controllable neutron reproduction, (the compression-induced 'decay signals' can be explained as resulting from wave-mechanical coupling of groups



OFFICIAL USE ONLY
(AFR 190-16)

Separate Sheet No.3. Page 11.

DECLASSIFIED

from these theoretical studies derives, that such a shock-wave-controlled pulsation-controlled fission (or fusion) plasma system must be an enormously powerful source of shock-wave-induced ultra-sound, (converting nuclear energy directly into ultra-sound energy), theoretically, a chain-reacting controllable plasma reactor system (fission or fusion type) will be the only one which can produce nuclear power in the range of millions of kilowatts, when based on the controlled pulsation of supercritical chain-reacting zones; therefore, the optimal output of nuclear-power-induced ultra-sound will be determined and limited by the reactor structure damoloshing effects of the ultra-sound itself,

still in 1944, I have been using the coupling between plasma jets and a magnetic field as a means for analyzing non-Maxwellian plasma conditions; experimental research on a plasma-controlled, energy-converting system (converting nuclear energy directly into electrical energy by the induction effect) has been carried out on a preliminary non-nuclear basis in 1951 and 1952, (deriving from the analysis of plasma induction spectra), in 1954, a push-pull plasma reactor system has been analyzed theoretically, based on two interconnected reactor vessels which become plasma-critical alternately, only one vessel becomes critical at a time; when it goed plasma-critical, a plasma jet is firing through a magnetic field, producing electrical energy by the induction effect, in the fall of 1951, when analyzing the induction spectrum of an extremely turbulent, shock-wave-superimposed plasma of ordinary proton hydrogen, a specific class if signals revealed the existence of sort of 'decaying structures', not resulting from eventual electron capture by protons, forming decaying neutrons, another class of signals, characterised by extremely large amplitudes and very small pulse width was even indicating the existence of a certain exchange mechanism of energy, the source of the energy being still a mistery; sort of extremely irregular fluctuation spectrum was developing at the very moment of optimal plasma compression, during the past four years of exile, much theoretical work has been done to clarify this matter; it has been found, at least, that an explanation can be given for the large-amplitude 'exchange signals', when we assume, that highly compressed electron gas becomes a detector for energy exchange with what we call zero point energy, zero point energy derives from the exclusion principle, the exclusion principle derives from empirical data, in a shock-wave-superimposed, turbulence-feed-back-controlled plasma zone exists a high probability for cell-like super-pressure conditions, zero point energy in balance with the mass energy of the electron gas represents an enormously high energy capacity for exchange processes,

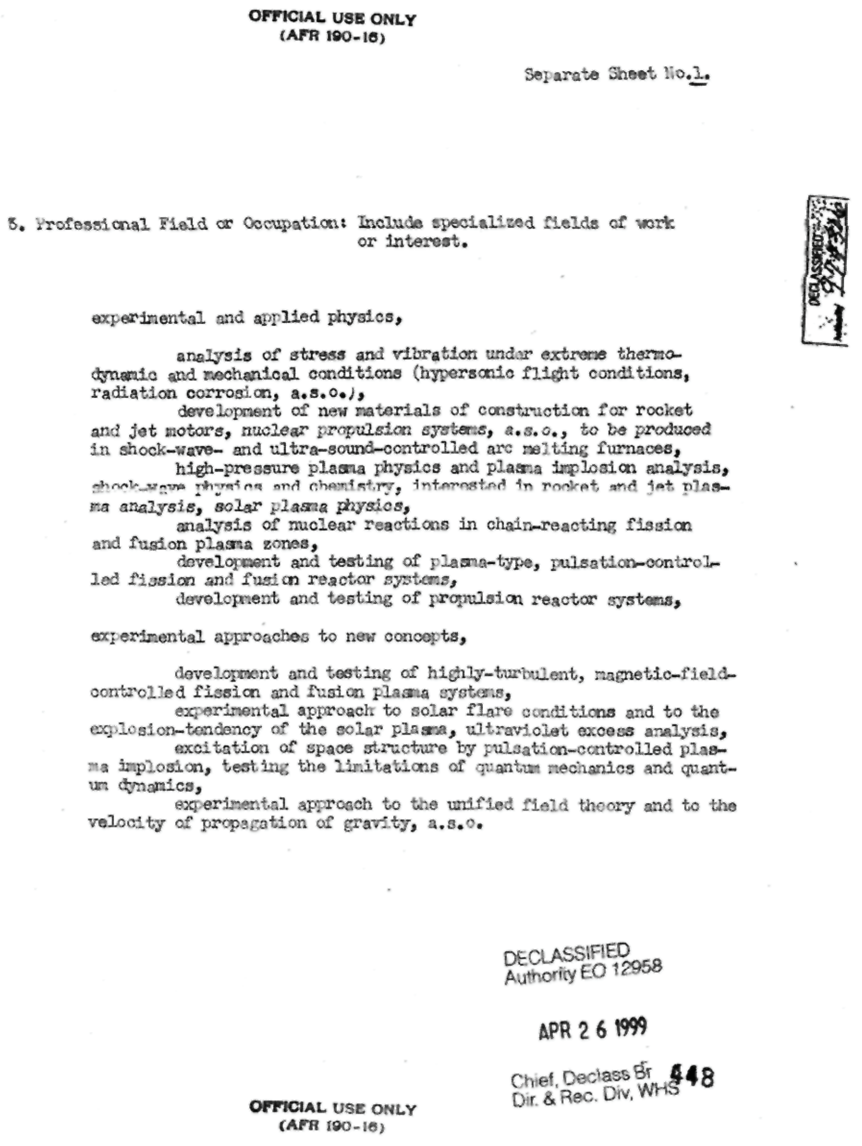
DECLASSIFIED
Authority EO 12958
APR 2 6 1999
Chief, Declass Br
Dir. & Rec. Div. WHS

OFFICIAL USE ONLY
(AFR 190-16)

This is a copy of the actual text written by Dr. Richter. Did he coin the words "Zero Point Energy" sometime between 1956 and 1958? This text was declassified for the author on April 26, 1999.



OFFICIAL USE ONLY
(AFR 190-16)

Separate Sheet No.1.

5. Professional Field or Occupation: Include specialized fields of work or interest.

DECLASSIFIED

experimental and applied physics, analysis of stress and vibration under extreme thermodynamic and mechanical conditions (hypersonic flight conditions, radiation corrosion, a.s.o.), development of new materials of construction for rocket and jet motors, nuclear propulsion systems, a.s.o., to be produced in shock-wave- and ultra-sound-controlled arc melting furnaces, high-pressure plasma physics and plasma implosion analysis, shock-wave physics and chemistry, interested in rocket and jet plasma analysis, solar plasma physics, analysis of nuclear reactions in chain-reacting fission and fusion plasma zones, development and testing of plasma-type, pulsation-controlled fission and fusion reactor systems, development and testing of propulsion reactor systems, experimental approaches to new concepts,

development and testing of highly-turbulent, magnetic-field-controlled fission and fusion plasma systems, experimental approach to solar flare conditions and to the explosion-tendency of the solar plasma, ultraviolet excess analysis, excitation of space structure by pulsation-controlled plasma implosion, testing the limitations of quantum mechanics and quantum dynamics, experimental approach to the unified field theory and to the velocity of propagation of gravity, a.s.o.

DECLASSIFIED
Authority EO 12958

APR 2 6 1999

Chief, Declass Br
Dir. & Rec. Div, WHS

448

OFFICIAL USE ONLY
(AFR 190-16)

This is another page of Dr. Richter's declassified text highlighting some of his accomplishments.

DECLASSIFIED

about 10^{10} kwh per unit volume, on the basis of exchange coupling, it seems to be possible to 'extract' a compression-proportional amount of zero point energy by means of a magnetic-field-controlled exchange fluctuation between the compressed electron gas and sort of cell structure in space (dimensions about 10^{-13} cm), representing the source of what we call zero point energy, it seems even possible that the large-amplitude fluctuation signals derive from a mechanism of energy-conversion unknwon to us yet which becomes detectable only in highly compressed electron gas,

(it would be of interest to repeat these experiments not with a proton hydrogen plasma - proton spin and electron spin identical - but with a helium-4 plasma, the spin discrepancy supporting energy extraction, it would also be worth-while to search for exchange signals in high-power pulsating fission plasma systems), in case, all these interpretations are fully correct, plasma implosion analysis might turn out to become an approach to a completely new source of energy, probably superior to nuclear energy, the present status of this matter can best be compared with the situation, when nuclear fission was discovered, but when the development of a chain-reacting fission reactor system was still depending on the realisation of controllable neutron reproduction,

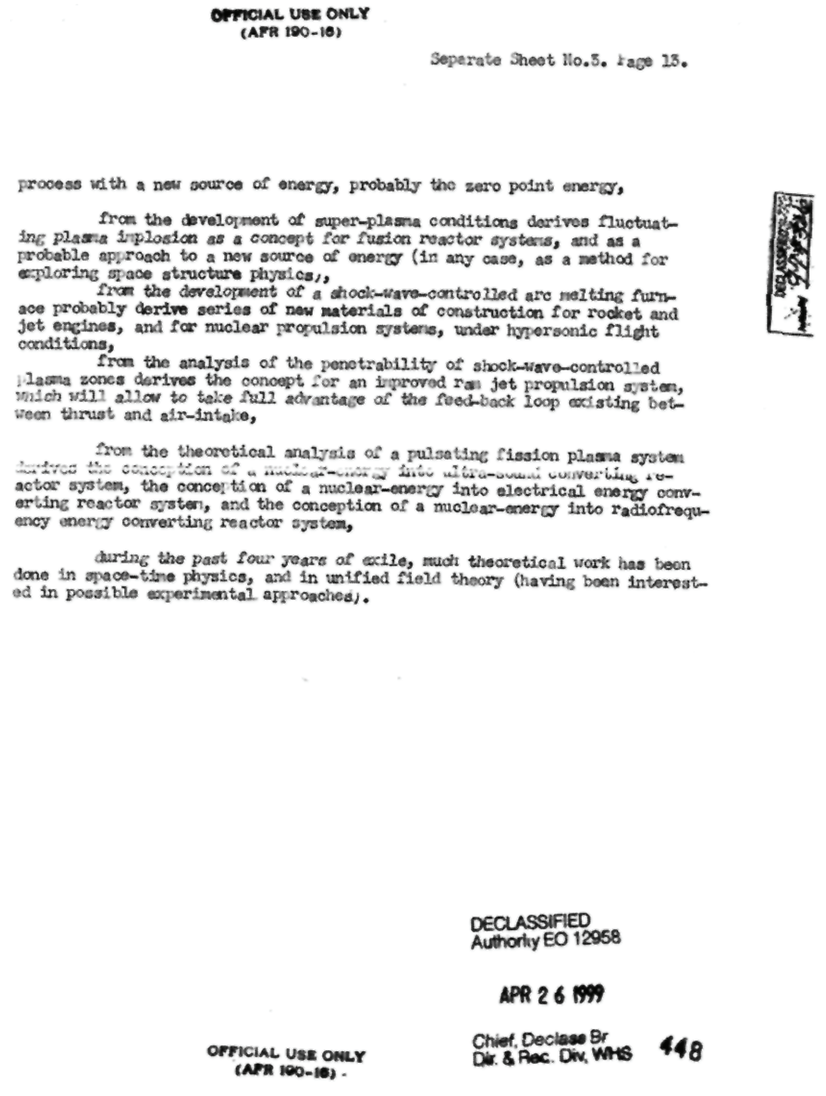
(the compression-induced 'decay signals' can be explained as resulting from wave-mechanical coupling of groups of electrons, the repulsive forces between the electrons becoming neutralized gradually by wave-mechanical coupling with increasing compression), first, there was the discovery of the shock-wave-generating process in 1936, the discovery of a feed-back loop between shock-wave-induced plasma turbulence and plasma-turbulence-induced promotion of shock-wave-generating plasma explosions, the concept of testing shock-wave conditions by means of plasma-collision-induced nuclear reactions, the development of nuclear reaction schemes, based on the chain-reacting consumption of the lithium and boron isotopes in 1942, the concept of a controllable fusion reactor system, ignited by a shock-wave-controlled deuterium high-pressure plasma, then came the first series of exponential fusion experiments in February, 1951, and the second series of exponential fusion experiments in October, 1951, giving proof for the existence of self-reproducing reaction chains, from these experiments derived the discovery of field-interaction-accelerated particles, initiating a completely new conc[illegible] reactor systems, and the discovery of two specific classes of f[illegible]s, the 'decaying type', deriving from wave-mechanical coupling of electron groups, and the 'large-amplitude-type', deriving from a possible exchange

DECLASSIFIED
Authority: EO 12958
APR 2 6 1999
Chief, Declass Br
Dir. & Rec. Div, WHS

This is more of Dr. Richter's 1958 discussion about extracting zero point energy.



OFFICIAL USE ONLY
(AFR 190-16)

Separate Sheet No.3. Page 13.

process with a new source of energy, probably the zero point energy, from the development of super-plasma conditions derives fluctuating plasma implosion as a concept for fusion reactor systems, and as a probable approach to a new source of energy (in any case, as a method for exploring space structure physics), from the development of a shock-wave-controlled arc melting furnace probably derive series of new materials of construction for rocket and jet engines, and for nuclear propulsion systems, under hypersonic flight conditions, from the analysis of the penetrability of shock-wave-controlled plasma zones derives the concept for an improved ram jet propulsion system, which will allow to take full advantage of the feed-back loop existing between thrust and air-intake, from the theoretical analysis of a pulsating fission plasma system derives the conception of a nuclear-energy into ultra-sound converting reactor system, the conception of a nuclear-energy into electrical energy converting reactor system, and the conception of a nuclear-energy into radiofrequency energy converting reactor system, during the past four years of exile, much theoretical work has been done in space-time physics, and in unified field theory (having been interested in possible experimental approaches).

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED
Authority EO 12958

APR 26 1999

Chief, Declass Br
Dir. & Rec. Div, WHS

448

OFFICIAL USE ONLY
(AFR 190-16)

More of Dr. Richter's text. Standing ultrasound waves were the basis for all of his work.

of electrons, the repulsive forces between eh electrons becoming neutralized gradually be wave-mechanical couplings with increasing compression,"

This has been a glimpse into the mind of Dr. Ronald Richter. It has also been a glimpse into a probable post-war world if the Nazi government had survived and Dr. Richter has gone on with his work, in Germany, without breaks in funding.

The media, especially the American media, wanted to brand Dr. Richter as a charlatan. The American intelligence services which put together the Paperclip report on Dr. Richter, spent a great deal of time and effort researching Dr. Richter while, at the same time, repeating negative things said about him in an effort to cover their butts no matter what became of him and his work. This tactic should not surprise us. We have seen them do this time and time again.

The question arises as to what we are to think of Dr. Richter today. Opinion was split in the mid-1950s. As an example of this, there is a technical evaluation of Dr. Richter included in the Paperclip file. It is a report from The Foreign Service of the United States of America, Office of the Air Attache, United States Embassy (Argentina). It is dated 7/3/56 and so is concurrent with the file and reports cited A whole group of scientists were sent by the US government to Argentina to evaluate Richter. Interestingly enough, a medical doctor also accompanied the team. Cold war political implications are noted. The report was done for and directly submitted to the Director of Intelligence, USAF, and it must be concluded that this is a high-level intelligence report. It is re-written here word for word:

* * * * * * *

CONFIDENTIAL

The Foreign Service of the United States Of America
Office of the Air Attache
United States Embassy
Buenos Aires, Argentina
175-R&D 3 July 1956
(Ucl)

SUBJECT: Dr. Ronald Richter (See IR-76-56, 79-56, 80-56 and 145-56)

TO: Director of Intelligence

Headquarteres, USAF ATTN: Air Attache Branch Washington 25, D.C.

1. A recent visit by a group of U.S. atomic energy scientists to Argentina, headed by Dr. John Hall, resulted in a conversation among Dr. Richter, Dr. Hall and two other scientists in the group. The undersigned officer attended a meeting with Dr. Hall subsequent to this conference and the following items of interest relative to Dr. Richter are being forwarded for information and whatever action is required:

a. Dr. Richter is considered by Dr. Hall to be "a mad genius". Along the same lines Dr. Hall stated that Dr. Richter is thinking in the year 1970. Dr. Hall was quite impressed with the knowledge, theories and work of Dr. Richter. He will attempt to send to Argentina an atomic scientist thoroughly familiar with Dr. Richter's field of work to further interrogate Dr. Richter and thus properly evaluate his capabilities. One of the visiting group who attended this conference was a medical doctor and has diagnosed Dr. Richter as being close to the verge of a complete breakdown

b. Dr. Richter has visited the undersigned officer several times during the past four months. He has become increasingly concerned about his future inasmuch as he cannot secure employment in Argentina and has completely exhausted all his personal funds. Dr. Richter has repeatedly indicated his desire to work for the U.S. or for any country that is opposed to the Communists. It isknown to this officer that Dr. Richter has been approached four times in the past six months by "pink" Germans residing in Buenos Aires and has been urged to visit the Russian attache who would completely solve all of his problems. His condition at present is such that the undersigned feels that unless he has some definite encouragement for obtaining employment in the U.S. or with a Western Bloc country, he will accept employment with the Communist Bloc.

175-R&D, USAIRA, Buenos Aires, Argentina,
Subj Dr. Ronald Richter

2. It is urged that this office be advised if there is any interest on the part of private concerns or governmental agencies in securing Dr. Richter's services. Dr. John Hall of the Atomic Energy Commission may be contacted on this subject.

Vergil N. Nestor Lt. Col USAF Air Attache

* * * * * * *

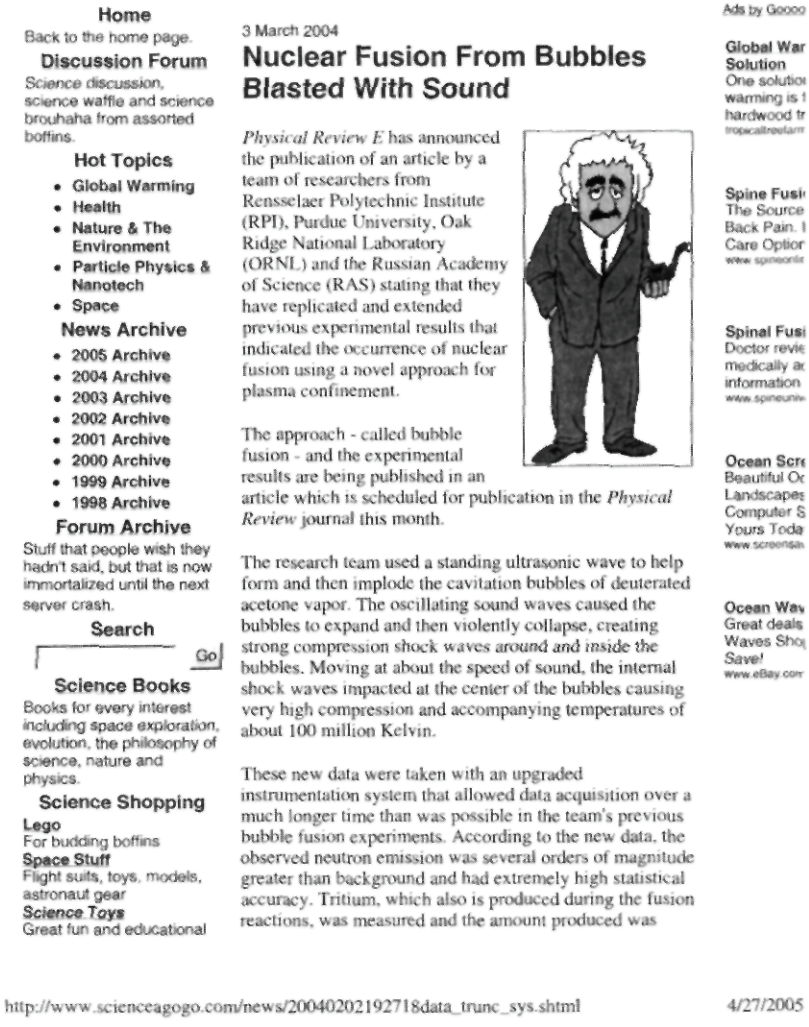
A second memo of the exact same date, July 3, 1956 contains a significant paragraphs:

3. Dr. Richter's work in Argentina should be reviewed by a competent specialist. The recommendation of Dr. Hall to interrogate Dr. Richter is concurred in. Specifically, this headquarters desires the following information:

a. Technical data, diagrams and plans concerning his experiments in Argentina and Germany in 1943 (reference IR-76-56) with discussion of his problems and results.

b. Resume of his research activity, problems and results while at Berlin-Suhler-Waffen-und-Fahrzeugwereke during 1937/38 (reference IR-76-56).

4. The headquarter's interest in foreign activities in the nuclear field covered by Dr. Richter in Argentina requires the utilization of technically qualified persons. Should there be no interest in other government agencies or private industry of Dr. Richter's services, this headquarters would attempt to retain Dr. Richter, either in the U.S. if he can be permitted to enter, or in Argentina. Dr. Richter's evaluation of unclassified literature of various foreign nations in this field would



Home
Back to the home page.
Discussion Forum
Science discussion, science waffle and science brouhaha from assorted boffins.
Hot Topics

- Global Warming
- Health
- Nature & The Environment
- Particle Physics & Nanotech
- Space

News Archive

- 2005 Archive
- 2004 Archive
- 2003 Archive
- 2002 Archive
- 2001 Archive
- 2000 Archive
- 1999 Archive
- 1998 Archive

Forum Archive
Stuff that people wish they hadn't said, but that is now immortalized until the next server crash.
Search
Go
Science Books
Books for every interest including space exploration, evolution, the philosophy of science, nature and physics.
Science Shopping
Lego
For budding boffins
Space Stuff
Flight suits, toys, models, astronaut gear
Science Toys
Great fun and educational

3 March 2004

Nuclear Fusion From Bubbles Blasted With Sound

Physical Review E has announced the publication of an article by a team of researchers from Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute (RPI), Purdue University, Oak Ridge National Laboratory (ORNL) and the Russian Academy of Science (RAS) stating that they have replicated and extended previous experimental results that indicated the occurrence of nuclear fusion using a novel approach for plasma confinement.

The approach - called bubble fusion - and the experimental results are being published in an article which is scheduled for publication in the Physical Review journal this month.

The research team used a standing ultrasonic wave to help form and then implode the cavitation bubbles of deuterated acetone vapor. The oscillating sound waves caused the bubbles to expand and then violently collapse, creating strong compression shock waves around and inside the bubbles. Moving at about the speed of sound, the internal shock waves impacted at the center of the bubbles causing very high compression and accompanying temperatures of about 100 million Kelvin.

These new data were taken with an upgraded instrumentation system that allowed data acquisition over a much longer time than was possible in the team's previous bubble fusion experiments. According to the new data, the observed neutron emission was several orders of magnitude greater than background and had extremely high statistical accuracy. Tritium, which also is produced during the fusion reactions, was measured and the amount produced was

Ads by Goooo

Global War
Solution
One solutio warming is hardwood tr
tropicaltreefarm

Spine Fusi
The Source
Back Pain. I Care Optior
www.spineonlin

Spinal Fusi
Doctor revie medically ac information
www.spineuniv

Ocean Scre
Beautiful Oc
Landscapes
Computer S
Yours Toda
www.screensav

Ocean Wav
Great deals
Waves Sho
Save!
www.eBay.com

Three pages describing "new" fusion research using standing ultrasound waves.

Dinosaurs
Dinosaur everything!

found to be consistent with the observed neutron production rate.

Earlier test data indicated that nuclear fusion had occurred, but these data were questioned because they were taken with less precise instrumentation.

"These extensive new experiments have replicated and extended our earlier results and hopefully answer all of the previous questions surrounding our discovery," said Richard T. Lahey Jr. at Rensselaer and the director of the analytical part of the joint research project.

Other fusion techniques, such as those that use strong magnetic fields or lasers to contain the plasma, cannot easily achieve the necessary compression, Lahey said. In the approach to be published in Physical Review E, spherical compression of the plasma was achieved due to the inertia of the liquid surrounding the imploding bubbles.

Professor Lahey also explained that, unlike fission reactors, fusion does not produce a significant amount of radioactive waste products or decay heat. Tritium gas, a radioactive by-product of deuterium-deuterium bubble fusion, is actually a part of the fuel, which can be consumed in deuterium-tritium fusion reactions.

Researchers Rusi Taleyarkhan, Colin West, and Jae-Seon Cho conducted the bubble fusion experiments at ORNL. At Rensselaer and in Russia, Professors Lahey and Robert I. Nigmatulin performed the theoretical analysis of the bubble dynamics and predicted the shock-induced pressures, temperatures, and densities in the imploding vapor bubbles. Robert Block, professor emeritus of nuclear engineering at Rensselaer, helped to design, set up, and calibrate a state-of-the-art neutron and gamma ray detection system for the new experiments.

In the first experiments, with the less sophisticated equipment, the team was only able to collect data during a small portion of the five-millisecond intervals between neutron pulses. The new equipment enabled the researchers to see what was happening over the entire course of the experiment.

The data clearly show surges in neutrons emitted in precise timing with the light flashes, meaning the neutron emissions are produced by the collapsing bubbles responsible for the flashes of light, Taleyarkhan said.

"We see neutrons being emitted each time the bubble is imploding with sufficient violence," Taleyarkhan said.

Fusion of deuterium atoms emits neutrons that fall within a specific energy range of 2.5 mega-electron volts or below, which was the level of energy seen in neutrons produced in the experiment. The production of tritium also can only be attributed to fusion, and it was never observed in any of the control experiments in which normal acetone was used, he said.

Whereas data from the previous experiment had roughly a one in 100 chance of being attributed to some phenomena other than nuclear fusion, the new, more precise results represent more like a one in a trillion chance of being wrong, Taleyarkhan said.

"There is only one way to produce tritium - through nuclear processes," he said.

The results also agree with mathematical theory and modeling.

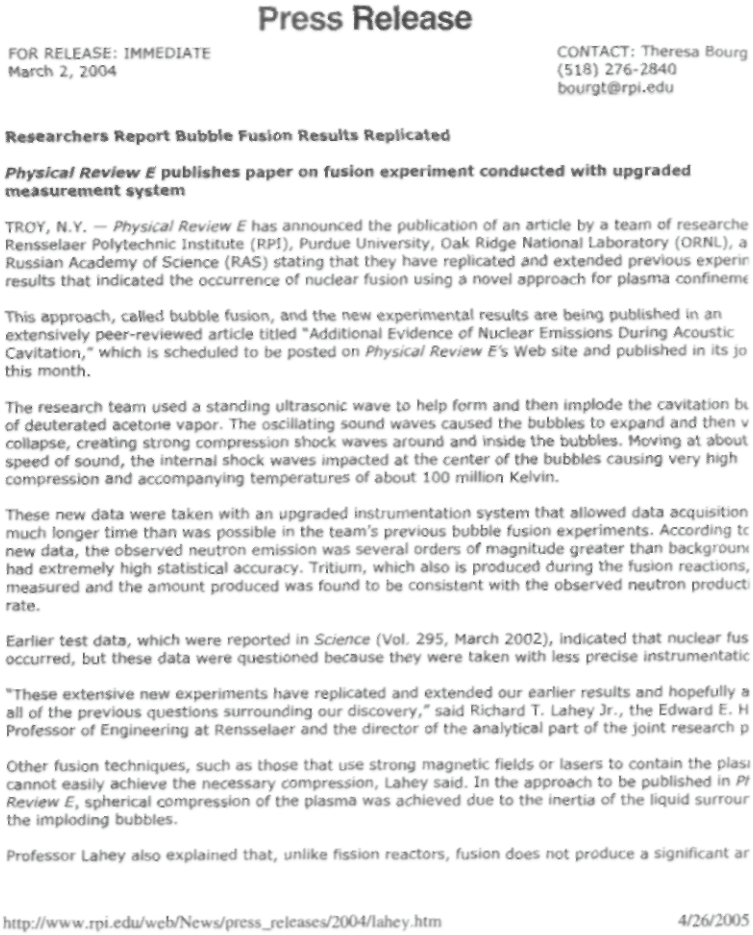
Future work will focus on studying ways to scale up the device, which is needed before it could be used in practical applications, and creating portable devices that operate without the need for the expensive equipment now used to bombard the canister with pulses of neutrons.

| HOME |
| SCIENCE DISCUSSION FORUM |
| SCIENCE DISCUSSION FORUM ARCHIVE |
| SCIENCE BOOKS | CONTACT US |

HOT TOPICS
| GLOBAL WARMING | HEALTH | NATURE AND THE ENVIRONMENT |
| PARTICLE PHYSICS AND NANOTECH | SPACE |

NEWS ARTICLE ARCHIVE
| 2005 | 2004 | 2003 | 2002 | 2001 | 2000 | 1999 | 1998 |

Copyright © 1997 - 2005 Science a Go Go and its licensors. All rights reserved.



Press Release

FOR RELEASE: IMMEDIATE
March 2, 2004

CONTACT: Theresa Bourg
(518) 276-2840
bourgt@rpi.edu

Researchers Report Bubble Fusion Results Replicated

Physical Review E* publishes paper on fusion experiment conducted with upgraded measurement system

TROY, N.Y. — Physical Review E has announced the publication of an article by a team of researche Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute (RPI), Purdue University, Oak Ridge National Laboratory (ORNL), a Russian Academy of Science (RAS) stating that they have replicated and extended previous experin results that indicated the occurrence of nuclear fusion using a novel approach for plasma confineme

This approach, called bubble fusion, and the new experimental results are being published in an extensively peer-reviewed article titled "Additional Evidence of Nuclear Emissions During Acoustic Cavitation," which is scheduled to be posted on Physical Review E's Web site and published in its jo this month.

The research team used a standing ultrasonic wave to help form and then implode the cavitation bu of deuterated acetone vapor. The oscillating sound waves caused the bubbles to expand and then v collapse, creating strong compression shock waves around and inside the bubbles. Moving at about speed of sound, the internal shock waves impacted at the center of the bubbles causing very high compression and accompanying temperatures of about 100 million Kelvin.

These new data were taken with an upgraded instrumentation system that allowed data acquisition much longer time than was possible in the team's previous bubble fusion experiments. According tc new data, the observed neutron emission was several orders of magnitude greater than backgroun had extremely high statistical accuracy. Tritium, which also is produced during the fusion reactions, measured and the amount produced was found to be consistent with the observed neutron producti rate.

Earlier test data, which were reported in Science (Vol. 295, March 2002), indicated that nuclear fus occurred, but these data were questioned because they were taken with less precise instrumentatic

"These extensive new experiments have replicated and extended our earlier results and hopefully a all of the previous questions surrounding our discovery," said Richard T. Lahey Jr., the Edward E. H Professor of Engineering at Rensselaer and the director of the analytical part of the joint research p

Other fusion techniques, such as those that use strong magnetic fields or lasers to contain the plas cannot easily achieve the necessary compression, Lahey said. In the approach to be published in Pł Review E, spherical compression of the plasma was achieved due to the inertia of the liquid surrour the imploding bubbles.

Professor Lahey also explained that, unlike fission reactors, fusion does not produce a significant ar

http://www.rpi.edu/web/News/press_releases/2004/lahey.htm 4/26/2005

Other internet article describing replication of the sonofusion experiments.

of radioactive waste products or decay heat. Tritium gas, a radioactive by-product of deuterium-de bubble fusion, is actually a part of the fuel, which can be consumed in deuterium-tritium fusion rea

Researchers Rusi Taleyarkhan, Colin West, and Jae-Seon Cho conducted the bubble fusion experim ORNL. At Rensselaer and in Russia, Professors Lahey and Robert I. Nigmatulin performed the theor analysis of the bubble dynamics and predicted the shock-induced pressures, temperatures, and der in the imploding vapor bubbles. Robert Block, professor emeritus of nuclear engineering at Renssel helped to design, set up, and calibrate a state-of-the-art neutron and gamma ray detection system new experiments.

Special hydrodynamic shock codes have been developed in both Russia and at Rensselaer to suppo interpret the ORNL experiments. These computer codes indicated that the peak gas temperatures a densities in the ORNL experiments were sufficiently high to create fusion reactions. Indeed, the the shock code predictions of deuterium-deuterium (D-D) fusion were consistent with the ORNL data.

The research team leaders are all well known authorities in the fields of multiphase flow and heat tr technology and nuclear engineering. Taleyarkhan, a fellow of the American Nuclear Society (ANS) a program's director, held the position of Distinguished Scientist at ORNL, and is currently the Ardent Bement Jr. Professor of Nuclear Engineering at Purdue University. Lahey is a fellow of both the ANS the American Society of Mechanical Engineers (ASME), and is a member of the National Academy o Engineering (NAE). Nigmatulin is a visiting scholar at Rensselaer, a member of the Russian Duma, president of the Bashkortonstan branch of the Russian Academy of Sciences (RAS). Block is a fello ANS and is the longtime director of the Gaerttner Linear Accelerator (LINAC) Laboratory at Renssel The bubble fusion research program was supported by a grant from the Defense Advanced Researc Projects Agency (DARPA).

About Rensselaer

Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, founded in 1824, is the nation's oldest technological university. Th school offers degrees in engineering, the sciences, information technology, architecture, manageme and the humanities and social sciences. Institute programs serve undergraduates, graduate studen working professionals around the world. Rensselaer faculty are known for pre-eminence in research conducted in a wide range of research centers that are characterized by strong industry partnershi Institute is especially well known for its success in the transfer of technology from the laboratory to marketplace so that new discoveries and inventions benefit human life, protect the environment, ar strengthen economic development.

be quite valuable considering his reported first hand experience.

* * * * * * *

Two points emerge form this. The U.S. government wanted to know more about his early fusion research, the chain-reaction consumption via jetting lithium and boron isotopes into the Shockwave ignited fusion reaction and he research done at the (spelled correctly) Berlin-Suhler-Waffen und Fahrzeugewerk, Gustloff-Werke, Suhl, Thuringia, Germany. In other words, the research work he did for the Gustloff Aircraft Works in Suhl, in the Jonas Valley, Nazi Germany's Area 51.

On November 21, 1956, the USAF declined sponsoring Dr. Richter but left the door open to other U.S. governmental or private agencies if they wished to do so. In the meantime, it was their recommendation that Dr. Richter be kept under lock and key, either in the USA or in Argentina.

As said earlier, the statement saying that Dr. Richter was "thinking in the year 1970" turns out to be one of the greatest understatements of the scientific 20th Century. Even today, after billions and billions of dollars and the careers of two generations of atomic scientists have been poured into sub-atomic particle research, we still do not, today, have controlled atomic fusion.

Anyone having doubts the validity of Dr. Richter's work should review the articles below concerning the state of nuclear fusion research from almost a half-century later.

Somehow, for some reason, Dr. Richter and his work were simply allowed to fade away into history.

SOURCES

The National Archives and Records Administration, 8601 Adelphi Rd., College Park, MD. 20740-6001, Foreign Scientist Case Files 1945-1958, Paperclip File of Dr. Ronald Richter, Box 54 of record Group 330.

37 Dr. Friedrich Gold, Again

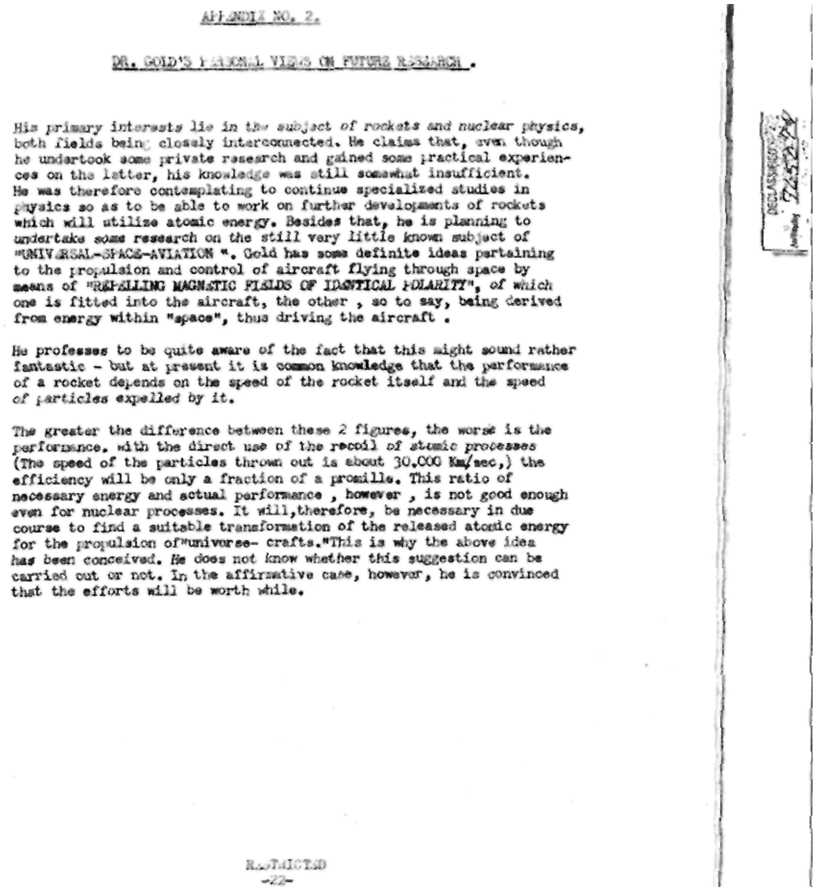
Once the reader has had time to re-read and digest the magnitude of Dr. Richter's discoveries, one small item should be injected into consideration concerning the future implications of his work. This small item comes from Dr. Friedrich Gold, which we encountered in the discussion of gaseous means to stop engines from running.

In addition to his research on gas, Dr. Gold had given considerable thought to the limitations of rocketry, nuclear propulsion, the conversion of nuclear energy into other forms of energy as well as travel through deep space. This is such a short document that it is better posted in its entirety.

The reason for the consideration of these ideas at this point is that they can only be considered in light of Dr. Richter's innovations. In particular are the similar ideas concerning nuclear propulsion, utilization of Dr. Richter's method direct conversion of atomic plasma energy to electrical energy and the utilization of "energy within 'space'" as Dr. Gold seems to call zero point energy.

While we are comparing Dr. Richter's "zero point energy" to Dr. Gold's "energy within 'space'", we might throw in Hans Coler's energy source for his machine, "Raumenergie" or "space energy". Coler's work was reviewed by both Dr. Frolich and Dr. Schumann at an early date. This means that thought about this new form of energy would have had years to foment within Nazi Germany.

In fact, these scientist's ideas dovetail so perfectly that one has to wonder as to whether there was actual



APPENDIX NO. 2.

DR. GOLD'S PERSONAL VIEWS ON FUTURE RESEARCH .

His primary interests lie in the subject of rockets and nuclear physics, both fields being closely interconnected. He claims that, even though he undertook some private research and gained some practical experiences on the latter, his knowledge was still somewhat insufficient. He was therefore contemplating to continue specialized studies in physics so as to be able to work on further developments of rockets which will utilize atomic energy. Besides that, he is planning to undertake some research on the still very little known subject of "UNIVERSAL-SPACE-AVIATION ". Gold has some definite ideas pertaining to the propulsion and control of aircraft flying through space by means of "REPELLING MAGNETIC FIELDS OF IDENTICAL POLARITY", of which one is fitted into the aircraft, the other , so to say, being derived from energy within "space", thus driving the aircraft .

He professes to be quite aware of the fact that this might sound rather fantastic - but at present it is common knowledge that the performance of a rocket depends on the speed of the rocket itself and the speed of particles expelled by it.

The greater the difference between these 2 figures, the worse is the performance. with the direct use of the recoil of atomic processes (The speed of the particles thrown out is about 30.000 Km/sec,) the efficiency will be only a fraction of a promille. This ratio of necessary energy and actual performance , however , is not good enough even for nuclear processes. It will,therefore, be necessary in due course to find a suitable transformation of the released atomic energy for the propulsion of"universe- crafts."This is why the above idea has been conceived. He does not know whether this suggestion can be carried out or not. In the affirmative case, however, he is convinced that the efforts will be worth while.

DECLASSIFIED
Authority

RESTRICTED
-22-

Another internet article describing replication of the sonofusion experiments.

personal communication between them. Further, one has to wonder at the general level of communication and mutual understanding of all those scientists involved in cutting-edge, high technology during the Third Reich. Also, one has to ask about the very underpinnings of how this communication and understanding could take place.

SOURCES

Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report, Item No. 1,4,&5, file No. 32-109, page 22, Interrogation Of Dr. Hans Friedrich Gold, Jan. 17, 1946, G-2 Division, SHAEF (Reer) APO413

38 Why?

Let's finish the question raised in the previous chapter.

What was the reason for so many scientific and technical breakthroughs in Germany at this time? Was it simply the result of the educational system of the time? Was it the pressure of the losing war effort? Was it a culture of high expectation?

I think it was all these things and yet something else. What I mean by this statement is that the Germans anticipated making breakthroughs as a matter of course because they believed in paradigms unique to Nazi Germany. In other words, one of the answers to my question could be Nazi culture itself. Of course the words "Nazi culture" does not mean something monolithic inspite of propaganda efforts to say exactly that. It involved many paradigms.

But one of these paradigms comes specifically to mind in our discussion of German science and technology. It has to do with new energy. Contemporaries might have relegated this paradigm to the world of the occult even as they reviewed the technical achievements of the 3rd Reich immediately after the war—and so discarded. Or, it might never have been recognized as a part of Nazi thought at all, and so overlooked. Today, using a wider viewing perspective, it may be worth reconsideration.

Dr. Richter was responsible for several lines of new research. Most of us who have read his FOIA file would conclude that his work on atomic fusion was the most important. But that might not be the case in the long run. Dr. Richter coins the term "zero point energy" in 1957. Now, almost 50 years later, this is a concept is receiving a great deal of attention from researchers today who are interested in new ways of energy production.

But, it is quite obvious from his commentary that Dr. Richter first had to reconstitute his laboratory and confirm his results from earlier work. Dr. Richter, for instance, began his shock wave fusion research in Germany in 1942. His work was decades old before coming to the attention of the American CIA. Is it not reasonable to assume that the basic work done to formulate his ideas on zero point energy were from those times also? And is it not reasonable to conclude from the comments of Dr. Gold and his "energy within 'space'", that knowledge of Dr. Richter's work was desciminated though inner circles of the Reich?

"Zero point energy" is today a buzzword of a kind of fringe, cutting-edge, physics. At first glance, it seems almost impossible for this word-phrase to have been coined by an old Nazi-era German scientist. But zero point energy would not have been quite such a strange concept in Germany during the Nazi period as it seems to some now.

The Germans were working on alternative means to produce energy. Karl Schappeller, discussed in my first book, was a great example. His work was continued to the Nazi period through the Reichsarbeitsgemeinschaft. Viktor Schauberger received state funding and facilities from the Nazi government. Hans Coler continued his work during those years and his continuing research was eventually was funded by the German Navy while at least one of his devices was being produced by a division of Siemens. He called the source of energy "Raumenergie" which is "space energy" in English. In the discovery of zero point energy, Dr. Richter may have been looking for experimental confirmation of theoretical ideas already held for some time within some circles. Dr. Gold went so far as to try to explain ideas of energy within space to the Americans but they were obviously not ready to listen.

The point we should keep in mind is that all of these devices and ideas involved the vortex. A vortex device produces a torsion field according to Nick Cook, Aviation editor of Jane's Defense Weekly. Drawing from Igor Witkowski, the Bell was a machine that spun cylinders of a violet, liquid, mercury-compound-based substance. Known mercury compounds are all solids. We are left to conclude that the material used in the Bell was red mercury, which also can be violet in color.

Cook compares properties of the Bell with experiments done on spinning superconductors[1]. We already know that red mercury could be used as a semiconductor. Inserting impurities into other substances such as silicon makes semiconductors.

But was a pure form of red mercury a superconductor? Or perhaps stated better: Are certain types of red mercury superconductors? Mercury is a great conductor of electricity and used for that purpose in a variety of electric switches, including household thermostats. If red mercury is even close to being a superconductor then a vortex of red mercury given a shot of electric current would have induced a huge electric/magnetic field in the surrounding area or field.

Cook mentions that a torsion field bends 4 dimensions and so bends time. It also radiates energy, including electromagnetic energy throughout the spectrum[2]. With a vortex, it is simple. If energy goes in, then energy must come out. Think of the energy implications for tornados and hurricanes, for instance. The energy coming out doesn't necessarily take the same form of what went in. A conversion takes place. Cook mentions that efforts at tuning the bell were taking place[3]. "Tuning" means converting the output energy into a form you want.

Cook points out that a torsion field is capable of directing zero point energy. Zero point energy is aether, or ether energy by another name. A machine that can also generate an electromagnetic field is especially valuable in directing this energy[4].

Cook describes the torsion field as being something like a mixer found in a kitchen. In this analogy, the mixer puts the batter or whatever is being mixed into motion, which is the same as that of the torsion field. But instead of batter, energy itself is being put into this new pattern of motion. The result is a huge increase in the field energy being moved and so a huge increase in the energy available to be put to use.

Returning to tuning a tuned output means that a field of electromagnetic energy or perhaps even zero point energy is possible. This would certainly power any machine including one that flies. Such a powerful torsion field could also bend space and alter time. It would also function as an energy device since it would activate more energy than was inputted, just as did the simpler Schauberger vortex machines that used only air and water.

Now we can return to the question posed at the beginning of this chapter: Why did this and other breakthroughs come during the period of the Third Reich? Do you think this is all an accident? Do you think this came about, step by step, as a series of random, non-directed, unrelated discoveries that somehow got pieced together into a coherent whole? Do you think there was no overall game plan involved?

"The Germans ignored Einstein and developed an approach to gravity based on quantum theory, Wikowski said. Don't forget that Einsteinian physics, relativity physics, with its big-picture view of the universe, represented Jewish science to the Nazis. Germany was where quantum mechanics was born. The Germans were looking at gravity from a different perspective to anyone else. Maybe it gave them answers to things the pro-relativity scientists hadn't even thought of."[5]

"Some of it, however - notably the non-conventional science pursued by the SS - came from a different culture altogether."[6]

"When the Americans tripped over this mutant strain of non-linear physics and took it back home with them, they were astute enough to realize that their homegrown scientific talent couldn't handle it. That it was beyond their cultural terms of reference. That's why they recruited so many Germans. The Nazis developed a unique approach to science and engineering quite separate from the rest of the world, because of their ideology, unrestrained as it was, supported a wholly different way of doing things. Von Braun's V-2s are a case in point, but so was their understanding of physics. The trouble was, when the Americans took it all home with them they found out, too late, that it came infected with a virus. You take the science on, you take on aspects of the ideology, as well."[7]

This is a huge point. German science was influenced by German culture - a German culture of those Nazi times. To understand how all these futuristic ideas came into being, an understanding of that esoteric culture must be considered. Fortunately, the concepts under consideration, the vortex, the torsion field, zero point energy and the singularity illustrate an important aspect in their belief system.

The SS took inspiration from older mysterious groups. So did the parent organization, the Nazis themselves. The swastika, for instance, is now almost universally interpreted as a sun sign. No doubt this is true. But the swastika, as Hitler chose the symbol, was black and tipped on its side. The impression is of a spinning, hooked cross. This is the best static representation one can make of a vortex in motion. Yet, it was a black vortex. Why?

The swastika as we know it is not the only swastika to surface in Nazi Germany. The SS used round swastikas. The SS, Heinrich Himmler's rather strange creation, also drew swastikas with many more arms than the four we are accustomed to seeing.

In fact, at the SS headquarters Himmler built, Wewelsberg Castle, there is a huge stylized swastika mosaic that forms a floor of a central rotunda. This swastika has twelve arms and they are bent twice. This is the Black Sun swastika.

The Black Sun was a kind of all-seeing eye in the minds of the SS. It was allegedly located at the center of the galaxy around which our sun and all other stars made one rotation every 26,000 years. The Black Sun was a huge vortex. It could not be seen by the naked eye as our solar sun is seen. Instead, they believed, it emitted invisible radiation that extended throughout the galaxy all the way to earth. Only the initiated knew of the Black Sun.

For these initiated, the very words upon which the abbreviation "SS" is based was not the commonly held "Schutz Staffel" or bodyguard in English, but "Schwarze Sonne" or Black Sun in English. So, the SS was really the Schwarze Sonne in the minds of initiates while for the masses it was Schutz Staffel. Each group gave the symbol a totally different meaning.

Today we know the Black Sun is no idle myth. Today we know that at the heart of each galaxy there lies what we call today a black hole. Today we know that this black hole and the galaxy surrounding it are part of an integrated system. We know today that there is a precise mathematical relationship between the speed of the outermost stars orbiting the black hole and the strength of that black hole itself. We know the black hole sucks in matter via a huge vortex and yieldsa tremendous amount of energy, including electromagnetic radiation right across the spectrum. It also produces a tremendous magnetic field.

But the speed of the outer stars has nothing to do with the "attraction" of gravity produced by the black hole. That black hole is much too far away. Nor does it have anything to do with the huge magnetic field generated by the black hole. Yet, the mathematical relationship is so strong that there does exist a cause and effect relationship between

A New Theory That
Unifies The Forces of Nature

By
Prof. A. Zielinski*

The earth is expanding. All celestial bodies have magnetic fields that are circular or polar dependent on spin. The magnetic north- and south poles are produced by the earthís spin. The magnetic poles are moving but are on the same spot at the same hour. Every galaxy has more or less a "black hole" that is not a hole at all. The universe is not expanding, there was never a "BIG BANG". Electric power can be generated from eather.

Abstract

A new exciting discovery of the existence and behavior of aether leads to a new concept of the essence of aether, that is able to explain why the famous Michelson-Morley aether experiment of 1887 failed, explain and unify the forces of nature, explain why quantum theory works and even explain where the universe comes from, and last but not least, shows the gateway to the new source of energy of the future.

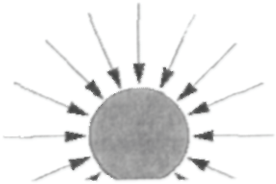
THE MICHELSON-MORLEY AETHER EXPERIMENT

Introduction

In 1887, Albert Michelson and Edward Williams Morley [1,2], assuming that aether was uniform and at rest in space, wanted to measure the absolute motion of the earth in space. In order to do so, a special sensitive interferometer was pointed in various compass directions. The interferometer readings, however, indicated that the earth had no relative motion to the aether in any horizontal direction. The interpretation of the result of the experiment was that it would mean that the earth had no relative motion in space, which was obviously not the case. Michelson and Morley could not explain this mystery and, therefore, thought that their experiment had failed. Even today, many scientists believe that the Michelson-Morley aether experiment is probably the most important experiment that did not work, in the entire history of science. One of the explanations given by numerous physicists, including Albert Einstein, is that there is no such thing as aether at all. Unill today, many mysterious forces and phenomena are still puzzling the minds of astronomers and physicists because of the unsolved mystery of the aether, that kept concealed the nature of mass, inertia, gravity, the powers of attraction and repulsion, magnetism, light, heat, electricity, superconductivity, twin stars, the source of energy of stars, volcanic and tectonic activities, black holes, and the expansion of the universe.

The mistake in the experiment

The assumption of Michelson and Morley that aether was uniform and at rest in space, was a fundamental error [1,2]. Had Michelson and Morley pointed their interferometer in a vertical plane, they would have concluded that the earth is moving in a perpendicular direction to the surface of the earth into space. A worldwide verification of their experiment would have indicated that the earth is moving everywhere simultaneously in a vertical direction into



This is an internet article in which Professor A. Zielinski proposes a unifying aether explanation of energy, matter and gravity. This is a densification and transmutation explanation of aether in which matter is a aether/gravity shield. If we add re-radiation, as in a black hole, and the theory is complete. Scientists within the 3rd Reich must have known or must have been moving toward this realization.

http://www.viewzone.com/unified.field.html space, which is, of course, not possible. The only conclusion therefore is: aether is constantly moving towards the earth in straight perpendicular lines, just like reversed rays of energy (Fig. 1). I have termed this phenomenon the "Charan effect." The Charan effect is the cause of many sub-effects, as we shall discover further on. Consequent experiments and observations were so coherent that the existence of aether could not be ignored any longer, and the need of a concept or theory that would describe the essence, qualities and behavior of aether, was required for me to continue my own research in the field of quantum electrodynamics, which is my field of activity.

A concept of the nature of aether, based on the Charan effect.
The true nature of aether cannot be conceived by the human intellect since it cannot be perceived by human senses. However, conclusions may be drawn based on the actions of aether or on phenomena caused by aether actions that probably may be true or closer to the truth than present assumptions. In this view, I have developed the following theory with which almost all the phenomena mentioned earlier can be explained in a logical, coherent, and conclusive manner: Aether is a pure form of subtle, active energy, in which all the forces of nature are vested. Aether is the subtle energy tissue out of which matter has been made and is still being made and sustained. Subatomic interaction of aether and matter causes the phenomena of inertia, mass, gravity, cohesion and all the forces in nature. On its way to the center of cosmic systems such as galaxies, the solar system, and atoms, the density of aether increases, causing higher speeds of the solar planets and of the subatomic particles interacting with it. The Charan effect is fundamental for the movement, control, and equilibrium of the cosmos.

The consequences of the Charan effect
The Charan effect, as simple and innocent as it may look, may have a bearing on science and stir up many aspects of it, even in industry, economy, and society. Many ideas, theories, concepts, formulae, definitions and units in physics, even of such great men as Isaac Newton and Albert Einstein, may have to be reviewed, redefined, adjusted, or corrected. The following examples may clarify what the logical consequences could be if the Charan effect were applied just in physics and astronomy:

Inertia would mean subatomic interaction with aether.

Mass would mean concentration of aether, due to the Charan effect, which is mainly in the center of a subatomic particle or the center of a celestial body, because of the higher density (concentration) of aether there. Consequently, mass may be just a flow of aether, a flow of energy, or an absorption of aether, a phenomenon, an effect, a force. It also means that mass is not a function of velocity, as postulated by Albert Einstein, but a function of aether concentration (aether density), which subsequently causes the velocity of a particle or a celestial body.

Mass is also an indication of the amount of aether that is being absorbed by the subatomic particle or the celestial body. The closer to the sun, the higher the speeds of the solar planets, because of the higher density of aether, caused by the Charan effect.

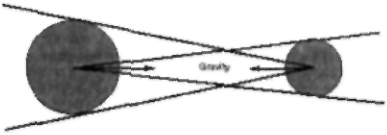


Fig. 3

Gravity would mean obstruction of the flow of aether, a kind of "aether shadow" that bodies or particles cast upon each other; less energy on one side as a result of the Charan effect (Fig. 3).

Binding energy or cohesion of matter would mean gravity on a molecular level, which means aether energy.

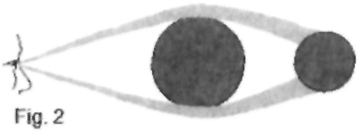

Fig. 2

Bending of light, caused by the Charan effect, may be the cause for all sorts of distortions if objects move between the eye of an observer and a source of light - twin stars? pulsars? (Fig. 2).

Magnetism would be caused by the movement of matter in space (in aether) or of electrons in matter (in aether).

Fig. 4a

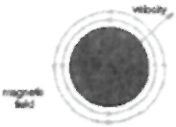

Fig. 4b

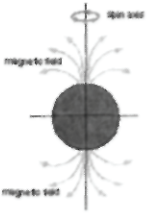

Fig. 4c

The magnetic poles of spinning celestial bodies or of spinning subatomic particles are vested in aether (Fig. 4a, 4b, and 4c).

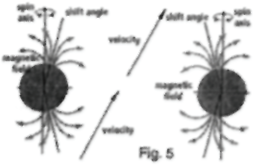

Fig. 5

Shift angles between magnetic axes and spin axes of celestial bodies are caused by the relative motion of the body to the aether motion (Fig. 5). Since aether is not at rest in space, nor uniform, measuring the shift angle and its position would not reveal the absolute movement of the body in space. There is no such thing as a fixed point in space; everything is moving, magnificently controlled by one law, vested in aether.

The solar energy and the temperature of celestial bodies may be caused by the concentration of aether due to the Charan effect; the bigger the star, the higher the aether density and the higher the temperature.

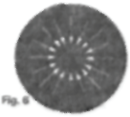

Fig. 6

Volcanic and tectonic actions may be caused by the concentration of aether inside or at the center of the earth (Fig 6). The earth may be growing, its mass may be increasing and its temperature may be rising.

Black holes may not be black holes at all, but gigantic concentration of masses in the center of galaxies, absorbing aether at such enormous speed, causing a Doppler shift of the light frequency far beyond the sensitivity of our eyes and therefore creating the impression of a black hole.

The big bang, presumably causing the expansion of the universe, may be just an impression caused by the movement of aether towards the center of our galaxy. Most probably, there has never been such a thing as a big bang. The Doppler red shift of light is not only the foundation of the big bang theory, it is also the fundamental basis of measurements in astronomy. Now, if the movement of aether in space may cause a Doppler red shift, then a review of all the data in astronomy is due.

Electric power can be generated from aether

Great scientists such as Nikola Tesla [right], Paul Dirac and Werner Heisenberg have predicted the introduction of a new source of energy, which they called:

"electromagnetic quantum energy," "zero-point energy" and also "vacuum-field energy," which are different names for aether energy. Recently, I successfully concluded fundamental research in the field of aether energy conversion, which has resulted in a new technology for producing engines, generators and batteries, in an economical and technically feasible manner. The very high energy density of aether allows such a flexibility of the aether absorption/conversion units, that they can be integrated on a silicon chip, for powering the chip of a wrist watch or a computer, but can also meet the requirements of a 4,000 megawatt power plant. This means that soon a new source of energy will be powering automobiles, trains, ships, aircraft, tractors, electric power plants, homes, industries, portable computers, telephones, etc. The aether technology in which I am involved, is environmentally clean and unlimited. Its application is neither restricted nor limited by materials or resources.

Once again in history, the cards are being shuffled anew and distributed in industry, like in the days of Thomas Alva Edison, and hopefully without too much turbulence at the international stock exchanges. Let us hope that the first application of aether energy will not be for military purposes, or for one nation to take advantage of other nations, as has so often been the case in history with epochal discoveries and inventions, but for the improvement of the conditions of humanity.

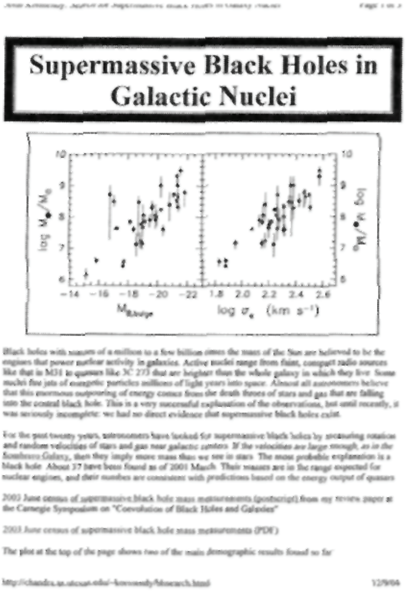
References:

[1] A.A. Michelson, Am. J. Sci. 3rd ser., 22, 252-253 (1881), and Univ. of Chicago Press, 1902.

[2] A.A. Michelson & E.W. Morley, Am. J. Sci. 3rd ser., 34, 277 (1887).

Prof. Zielinski conducts research i.a. in the field of quantum electrodynamics. He is an active member of the Russian Academy of Science and is ambassador of the International Scientists Club with its headquarters at St. Petersburg, Russia. Prof. Zielinski can be contacted via the Internet at the Email address: scorpionsyndrome@hotmail.com

ViewZone || Comments? || Read Comments



Supermassive Black Holes in Galactic Nuclei log $M_\bullet/M_\odot$

10
9
8
7
6
−14 −16 −18 −20 −22
$M_{B,bulge}$
1.8 2.0 2.2 2.4 2.6
log σ_e (km s^{-1})

Black holes with masses of a million to a few billion times the mass of the Sun are believed to be the engines that power nuclear activity in galaxies. Active nuclei range from faint, compact radio sources like that in M31 to quasars like 3C 273 that are brighter than the whole galaxy in which they live. Some nuclei fire jets of energetic particles millions of light years into space. Almost all astronomers believe that this enormous outpouring of energy comes from the death throes of stars and gas that are falling into the central black hole. This is a very successful explanation of the observations, but until recently, it was seriously incomplete: we had no direct evidence that supermassive black holes exist.

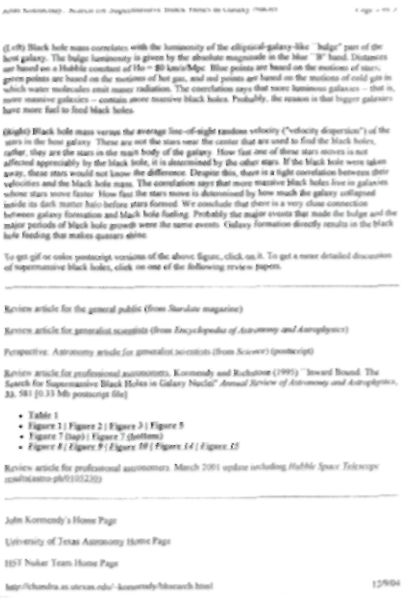
For the past twenty years, astronomers have looked for supermassive black holes by measuring rotation and random velocities of stars and gas near galactic centers. If the velocities are large enough, as in the Sombrero Galaxy, then they imply more mass than we see in stars. The most probable explanation is a black hole. About 37 have been found as of 2001 March. Their masses are in the range expected for nuclear engines, and their numbers are consistent with predictions based on the energy output of quasars.

2003 June census of supermassive black hole mass measurements (postscript) from my review paper at the Carnegie Symposium on "Coevolution of Black Holes and Galaxies"

2003 June census of supermassive black hole mass measurements (PDF)

The plot at the top of the page shows two of the main demographic results found so far

http://chandra.as.utexas.edu/~kormendy/bhsearch.html 12/9/04



(Left) Black hole mass correlates with the luminosity of the elliptical-galaxy-like "bulge" part of the host galaxy. The bulge luminosity is given by the absolute magnitude in the blue "B" band. Distances are based on a Hubble constant of Ho = 80 km/s/Mpc. Blue points are based on the motions of stars; green points are based on the motions of hot gas, and red points are based on the motions of cold gas in which water molecules emit maser radiation. The correlation says that more luminous galaxies -- that is, more massive galaxies -- contain more massive black holes. Probably, the reason is that bigger galaxies have more fuel to feed black holes.

(Right) Black hole mass versus the average line-of-sight random velocity ("velocity dispersion") of the stars in the host galaxy. These are not the stars near the center that are used to find the black holes; rather, they are the stars in the main body of the galaxy. How fast one of these stars moves is not affected appreciably by the black hole; it is determined by the other stars. If the black hole were taken away, these stars would not know the difference. Despite this, there is a tight correlation between their velocities and the black hole mass. The correlation says that more massive black holes live in galaxies whose stars move faster. How fast the stars move is determined by how much the galaxy collapsed inside its dark matter halo before stars formed. We conclude that there is a very close connection between galaxy formation and black hole feeding. Probably the major events that made the bulge and the major periods of black hole growth were the same events. Galaxy formation directly results in the black hole feeding that makes quasars shine.

To get gif or color postscript versions of the above figure, click on it. To get a more detailed discussion of supermassive black holes, click on one of the following review papers.

Review article for the general public (from Stardate magazine)

Review article for generalist scientists (from Encyclopedia of Astronomy and Astrophysics)

Perspective: Astronomy article for generalist scientists (from Science) (postscript)

Review article for professional astronomers. Kormendy and Richstone (1995) "Inward Bound: The Search for Supermassive Black Holes in Galaxy Nuclei" Annual Review of Astronomy and Astrophysics, 33, 581 [0.33 Mb postscript file]

- Table 1
- Figure 1 | Figure 2 | Figure 3 | Figure 5
- Figure 7 (top) | Figure 7 (bottom)
- Figure 8 | Figure 9 | Figure 10 | Figure 14 | Figure 15

Review article for professional astronomers. March 2001 update including Hubble Space Telescope results(astro-ph/0105230)

John Kormendy's Home Page

University of Texas Astronomy Home Page

HST Nuker Team Home Page

http://chandra.as.utexas.edu/~kormendy/bhsearch.html 12/9/04

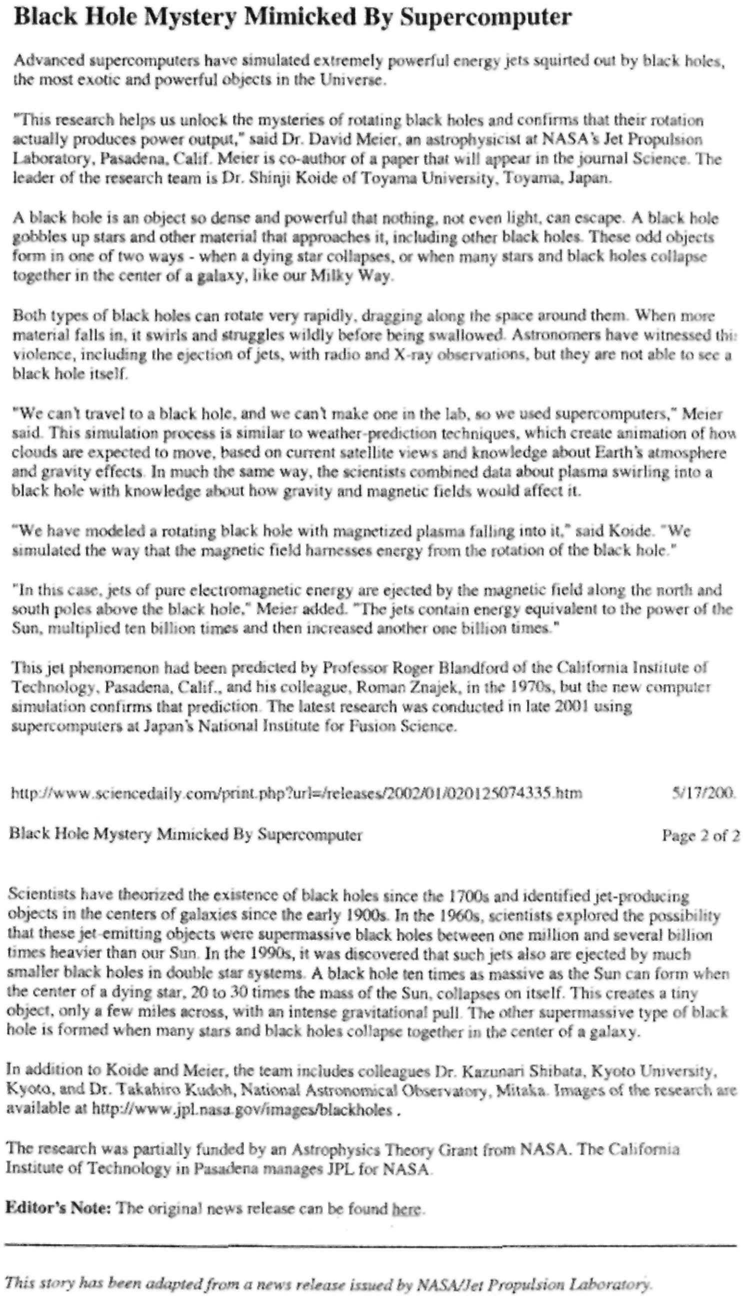
The larger the galaxy, the stronger the black hole; the stronger the black hole, the faster the stars in that galaxy rotate. But, the star speed is not accountable through the effects of "gravity". Does a black hole re-radiate the energy it captures, thereby generating energy with glues the galaxy together? Is this energy glue aether and is not aether what we call "gravity" when aether is being absorbed (or shielded) locally, by matter?

Date: 2002-06-04

Black Hole Dynamo May Be Cosmos' Ultimate Electricity Generator

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.J une 3, 2002 -Researchers at the U.S. Department of Energy's Los Alamos National Laboratory believe that magnetic field lines extending a few million light years from galaxies into space may be the result of incredibly efficient energy-producing dynamos within black holes that are somewhat analogous to an electric motor. Los Alamos researchers Philipp Kronberg, Quentin Dufton, Stirling Colgate and Hui Li today discussed this finding at the American Astronomical Society meeting in Albuquerque, N.M.

This is an internet article with compares the energy output of a black hole to an electric motor.



Black Hole Mystery Mimicked By Supercomputer

Advanced supercomputers have simulated extremely powerful energy jets squirted out by black holes, the most exotic and powerful objects in the Universe.

"This research helps us unlock the mysteries of rotating black holes and confirms that their rotation actually produces power output," said Dr. David Meier, an astrophysicist at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory, Pasadena, Calif. Meier is co-author of a paper that will appear in the journal Science. The leader of the research team is Dr. Shinji Koide of Toyama University, Toyama, Japan.

A black hole is an object so dense and powerful that nothing, not even light, can escape. A black hole gobbles up stars and other material that approaches it, including other black holes. These odd objects form in one of two ways - when a dying star collapses, or when many stars and black holes collapse together in the center of a galaxy, like our Milky Way.

Both types of black holes can rotate very rapidly, dragging along the space around them. When more material falls in, it swirls and struggles wildly before being swallowed. Astronomers have witnessed thi violence, including the ejection of jets, with radio and X-ray observations, but they are not able to see a black hole itself.

"We can't travel to a black hole, and we can't make one in the lab, so we used supercomputers," Meier said. This simulation process is similar to weather-prediction techniques, which create animation of how clouds are expected to move, based on current satellite views and knowledge about Earth's atmosphere and gravity effects. In much the same way, the scientists combined data about plasma swirling into a black hole with knowledge about how gravity and magnetic fields would affect it.

"We have modeled a rotating black hole with magnetized plasma falling into it," said Koide. "We simulated the way that the magnetic field harnesses energy from the rotation of the black hole."

"In this case, jets of pure electromagnetic energy are ejected by the magnetic field along the north and south poles above the black hole," Meier added. "The jets contain energy equivalent to the power of the Sun, multiplied ten billion times and then increased another one billion times."

This jet phenomenon had been predicted by Professor Roger Blandford of the California Institute of Technology, Pasadena, Calif., and his colleague, Roman Znajek, in the 1970s, but the new computer simulation confirms that prediction. The latest research was conducted in late 2001 using supercomputers at Japan's National Institute for Fusion Science.

Scientists have theorized the existence of black holes since the 1700s and identified jet-producing objects in the centers of galaxies since the early 1900s. In the 1960s, scientists explored the possibility that these jet-emitting objects were supermassive black holes between one million and several billion times heavier than our Sun. In the 1990s, it was discovered that such jets also are ejected by much smaller black holes in double star systems. A black hole ten times as massive as the Sun can form when the center of a dying star, 20 to 30 times the mass of the Sun, collapses on itself. This creates a tiny object, only a few miles across, with an intense gravitational pull. The other supermassive type of black hole is formed when many stars and black holes collapse together in the center of a galaxy.

In addition to Koide and Meier, the team includes colleagues Dr. Kazunari Shibata, Kyoto University, Kyoto, and Dr. Takahiro Kudoh, National Astronomical Observatory, Mitaka. Images of the research are available at http://www.jpl.nasa.gov/images/blackholes .

The research was partially funded by an Astrophysics Theory Grant from NASA. The California Institute of Technology in Pasadena manages JPL for NASA.

Editor's Note: The original news release can be found here.

This story has been adapted from a news release issued by NASA/Jet Propulsion Laboratory.

This is a NASA/JPL internet article. It describes the energy output of a black hole. It says in part: "This research helps us unlock the mysteries of rotating black holes and confirms that their rotation actually produces power output.' In other words, a spinning black hole is a vortex and it is the vortex which makes power output possible.

the two. The black hole's sphere of influence extends to its outermost stars, which demonstrates that the whole thing, the black hole, stars and vortex galaxy are part of one huge system—one huge field.

We all know that a black hole sucks in matter and energy. Now we know that this input is matched by a huge output of energy. Along with the energy output from this black hole is it not reasonable to assume that these Nazi theoreticians might also speculate that it was the source for the mysterious, all pervasive, zero point energy? Would they have not considered this huge, powerful black hole, the Black Sun, to be a source of this power just as an electric motor generates an electric field?

Somehow, the SS had this knowledge. Somehow this concept found its way into their lore. Should the Nazis have won the war, one triangular section of Wewelsberg Castle was to form the tip of a huge architectural spear. Forming the remainder of this spear was to be something like a whole city. This city was to be a university. This university would have been dedicated to the teaching of concepts that are totally unknown, forgotten, or little appreciated today. It would have been a center for Nazi thought, culture, alternative leaning and new science.

Given their belief in the Black Sun and zero point or aether energy, is it not reasonable to assume that they would seek experimental confirmation of the basic vortex concept? Is it not reasonable to assume that, once confirmed, scientific validation and actual technical exploitation of this new source of power would be a high priority for an energy-staved country at war? In other words, is it not reasonable to assume that the Germans were pre-disposed to making the break-through that they did and, conversely, isn't it reasonable to assume that the Western Allies, for instance, were not even close to this mindset? Further, isn't it reasonable to assume that even when confronted by the hardware and ideas of this vanquished group of scientists, these ideas would be minimized or rejected out-of-hand by outsiders simply because it had gone far beyond their own circle of thinking?

"As above, so below" is an old occult saying. In fact, the Schauber-ger devices, the Schappeller device and well as the Bell function as miniature versions of our galaxy following this line of thought. The Germans brought the knowledge of the larger concept, literally their world-view, and applied it to their specific technology.

This brings us full circle back to the SS fountainhead in Skoda/Pilsen, the Kammler Group, and to its scientific overseer and spiritual father, Dr. Hans Kammler.

SOURCES

1. Cook, Nick, 2001, page 194, The Hunt for Zero Point One Man's Journey to the Biggest Secret Since the Invention of the Atom Bomb, Random House Group, Ltd., London

2. ibid, pages 229,232

3. ibid, page 233

4. ibid, page 232

5. ibid, page 194

6. ibid, page 251

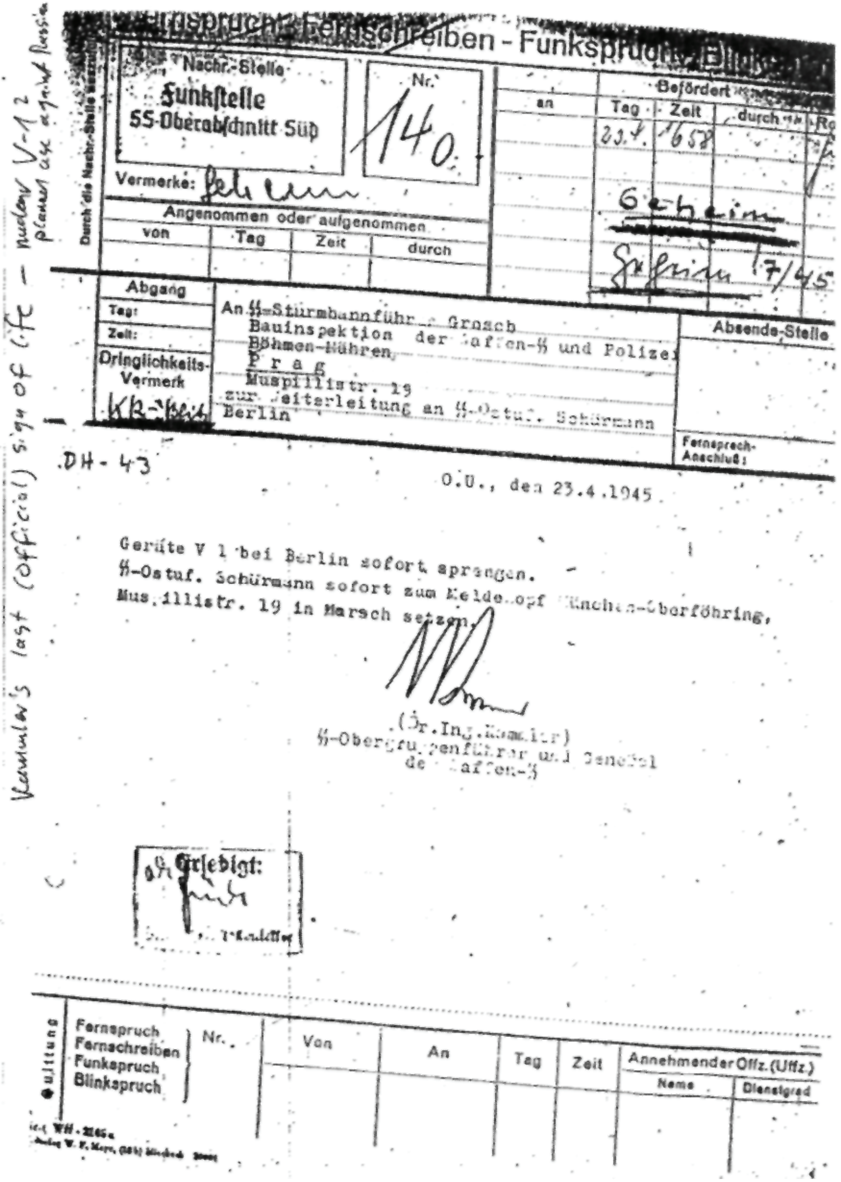
7. ibid, page 270

39 Kammler Again

As mentioned in our first discussion of Kammler, all the science, technology and weaponry we have seen so far as well as much, much more awaiting to be re-discovered, were all part of the Kammler hoard hidden somewhere near Pilsen and the Skoda Works.

Kammler was careful in amassing this technological treasure. He certainly had enemies or at least those within government who were jealous of his rapid rise and the power he had taken. It is almost certain that Nazi bigwigs were kept "out of the loop" regarding this technological magic. Kammler would be, then, in a position to unveil his wonder weaponry and save the Reich, forever securing his position within the Nazi Party. The fact that this would never be realized is more chance and circumstance which was out of Kammler's control, although there are hints that he recognized political uncertainties and was involved in that arena also[1]. This part of Kammler's history, as well as his many "deaths" and possible post-war survival and hidden ascendence, should properly await telling by the researchers responsible for this startling information, hopefully, in English[2].

The immediate problem we will deal with now is attempting to make the advanced science and technology, which has been discussed in these pages, concrete, in the eyes of the reader. This is especially difficult since this same information has purposely been suppressed by all those interests who have had access to it. Only small dribbles of this vast sea of knowledge have oozed their way to the surface in the last sixty



Kammler's last (official) sign of life – nuclear V-1 2 planned use against Russia

Fernspruch - Fernschreiben - Funkspruch - Blinkspruch

Durch die Nachr.-Stelle auszufüllen

Nachr.-Stelle: Funkstelle SS-Oberabschnitt Süd

Nr. 140.

Vermerke: Geheim

Angenommen oder aufgenommen
von	Tag	Zeit	durch

an	Befördert Tag	Zeit	durch
	23.4.	1658

Geheim

Geheim 7/45

Abgang
Tag:
Zeit:
Dringlichkeits-Vermerk	KR-Geh.

An SS-Sturmbannführer Grosch
Bauinspektion der Waffen-SS und Polizei
Böhmen-Mähren
Prag
Muspillistr. 19
zur Weiterleitung an SS-Ostuf. Schürmann
Berlin

Absende-Stelle

Fernsprech-Anschluß:

DH - 43

O.U., den 23.4.1945

Geräte V 1 bei Berlin sofort sprengen.
SS-Ostuf. Schürmann sofort zum Meldekopf München-Oberföhring, Muspillistr. 19 in Marsch setzen.

(Dr.Ing.Kammler)
SS-Obergruppenführer und General
der Waffen-SS

Erledigt:

Quittung	Fernspruch Fernschreiben Funkspruch Blinkspruch	Nr.	Von	An	Tag	Zeit	Annehmender Offz. (Uffz.) Name	Dienstgrad

This documenl is really the last trace of Dr. Hans Kammler. It is dated April 23, 1945. It orders SS Sturmbanfueher Grosch in Prague to order another SS officer, Schuermann, in Berlin, to immediately blow up something called a "V-1 device" there and to then report to a command in Munich. Why Kammler would waste time with a single V-1 buzz-bomb in Berlin at this time seems more than a little strange. Perhaps this was not a standard V-1 or this device was not a Vergeltungs weapon at all and so the "V" stood tor something else entirely. This order is marked with a handwritten "Geheim" (Secret) and is signed by Kammler, personally, not simply issued by his office in his name. This is a strange way to exit the world stage.

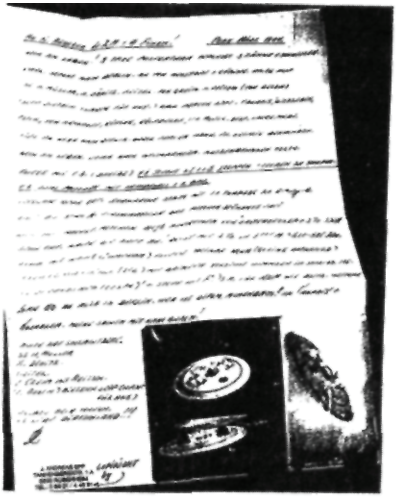
years, and all that has surfaced has done so with a false and/or clouded developmental history.

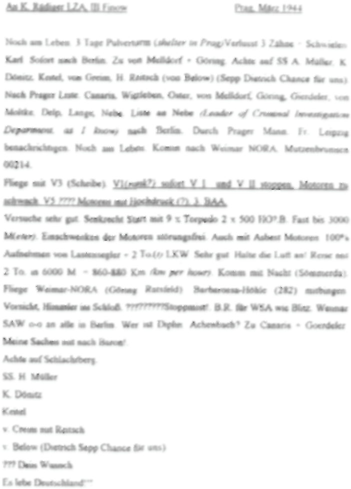
Perhaps the reader will remember the discussion in my first book, Hitler's Flying Saucers, of a strange letter from Prague dated March, 1944[3]. This cryptic letter began with the words which, in English are: "Still Alive" and go on to describe recent events in Prague. It was of interest in the previous book because this letter recounted developments in one of the German flying discs at Prague.

Klaus-Peter Rothkugel has pointed out something else about this letter and it is something very important to the larger story of lost German technology. It is the first mention of the name "Achenbach". Achenbach's name is affixed by the word "Diplom.". This might either mean he was a diplomat or it might mean he had received a degree in engineering although in the latter case it is usually written with the word for engineer, "Ing.", added. Achenbach's name is written in same paragraph as describes the progress made with the flying disc and in the company of other names about which questions of their current presence and status are asked. In the case of Aschenback, it is asked "Where is Diplom. Achenbach? To Canaris -". Admiral Wilhelm Canaris was in command of the Abwehr, the German military intelligence. So connecting the dots here, Ashenbach was among a knowledgeable inner circle who knew of secret weaponry under development and had connections to the highest levels of German military intelligence.

Now, let's quickly review page 133, third and fourth paragraphs, of Hitler's Flying Saucers. These two paragraphs are based on a 1998 book in Czech by Dr. Milos Jesensky and Robert Lesniakiewicz[4]. These two paragraphs are reproduced here:

"On October 13, 1945, over five months after the hostilities in Europe had ended, the French embassy in Prag notified the Czechoslovakian Foreign Ministry that an SS officer in a French detention camp had given them information that a cache of secret documents existed near Prag. This cache took the form of a tunnel in which 32 boxes of secret documents were hidden and were wired with explosives before being sealed at its opening. The French offered their services and the information given to them by the SS officer in question, Guenther Achenbach.





An K. Rüdiger LZA III Finow   Prag, März 1944

Noch am Leben. 3 Tage Pulverturm (shelter in Prag)Verlusst 3 Zähne - Schwieler Karl. Sofort nach Berlin. Zu von Mellidorf + Göring. Achte auf SS A. Müller, K. Dönitz, Keitel, von Greim, H. Reitsch (von Below) (Sepp Dietrich Chance für uns). Nach Prager Liste: Canaris, Witzleben, Oster, von Mellidorf, Göring, Goerdeler, von Moltke, Delp, Lange, Nebe. Liste an Nebe (Leader of Criminal Investigation Department, as I know) nach Berlin. Durch Prager Mann. Fr. Leipzig benachrichtigen. Noch am Leben. Komm nach Weimar NORA. Mutzenbrunnen 00214.

Fliege mit V3 (Scheibe). V1(rank?) sofort V 1 und V II stoppen. Motoren zu schwach. V5 ???? Motoren mit Hochdruck (?). 3. BAA.

Versuche sehr gut. Senkrecht Start mit 9 x Torpedo 2 x 500 HO?.B. Fast bis 3000 M(eter). Einschwenken der Motoren störungsfrei. Auch mit Asbest Motoren. 100% Aufnehmen von Lastensegler + 2 To.(t) LKW. Sehr gut. Halte die Luft an! Reise mit 2 To. in 6000 M. = 860-880 Km (km per hour). Komm mit Nacht (Sömmerda). Fliege Weimar-NORA (Göring Rotsfeld). Barbarossa-Höhle (282) mitbringen. Vorsicht, Himmler im Schloß. ?????????Stoppmist!. B.R. für WSA wie Blitz. Weimar SAW o-o an alle in Berlin. Wer ist Diplm. Achenbach? Zu Canaris + Goerdeler. Meine Sachen mit nach Buron!

Achte auf Schlachtberg.

SS. H. Müller

K. Dönitz

Keitel

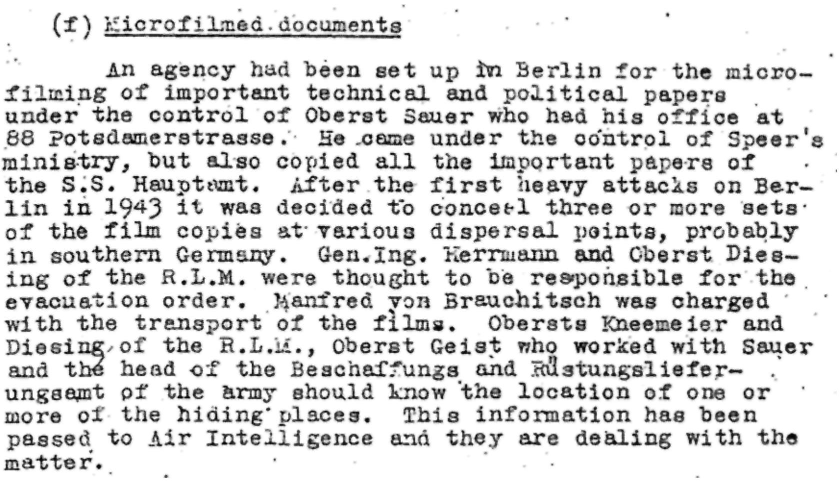
v. Creim mit Reitsch

v. Below (Dietrich Sepp Chance für uns)

??? Dein Wunsch

Es lebe Deutschland!!!

The "Still Alive" letter from Prague, March, 1944. This letter was in the possession of Josef Andreas Epp until his death in 1997. It describes the developmental progress on a German flying disc in Prague as well as poor conditions in Prague to a person named K. Ruediger. Of interest now is the mention of a Diplm. Achenbach. The writer asks where he is now, to Canaris and Goedeler? Canaris ran the Naval Intelligence Agency, the Abwehr. He was later hung for treason. Today, there are rumors and a novel linking Canaris to a contingency plan in the event that Germany lost the war as well as secret, high technology. Achenbach was involved in the post-war leaking of a secret cache of information on microfilm to French authorities. Evidently, the French did not act but the Americans did once they got wind of the tip. This action provoked an international incident between the East and West. Thanks to Gerhard Petak (Kadmon) who set this letter into legible text which appears a the right.



(f) Microfilmed documents

An agency had been set up in Berlin for the microfilming of important technical and political papers under the control of Oberst Sauer who had his office at 88 Potsdamerstrasse. He came under the control of Speer's ministry, but also copied all the important papers of the S.S. Hauptamt. After the first heavy attacks on Berlin in 1943 it was decided to conceal three or more sets of the film copies at various dispersal points, probably in southern Germany. Gen.Ing. Herrmann and Oberst Diesing of the R.L.M. were thought to be responsible for the evacuation order. Manfred von Brauchitsch was charged with the transport of the films. Obersts Kneemeier and Diesing, of the R.L.M., Oberst Geist who worked with Sauer and the head of the Beschaffungs and Rüstungslieferungsamt of the army should know the location of one or more of the hiding places. This information has been passed to Air Intelligence and they are dealing with the matter.

This is a British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report, number 142, which describes a cache of secret documents on microfilm.

But even after months of waiting, the French from the Czechoslovakian Foreign Ministry received no response.

Somehow the Americans got wind of this information. Incredibly, the Americans on February 13, 1946, mounted an armed incursion into Czechoslovakiam, which was in the Soviet sphere of occupation, retrieved this hoard of information and escaped back into occupied Germany. Naturally the Czechoslovakians were furious and demanded and got an apology from the Americans. They also demanded the return of the German documents stolen from their sovereign territory. The Americans did return documents but probably not those sensitive documents for which the expedition was mounted."

Achenbach was the source of a piece of intelligence describing a hoard of documents near Prague, which, as it turned out, interested the Americans enough to mount in incursion, that is, mount an invasion, breaking international law at a very sensitive moment in time. The only reasonable explanation for this series of events is that this hoard of documents represented the microfilmed records of the Kammler Group and the entire cache of secret German weapons, science and technology.

Now, new evidence has surfaced that the Americans did have prior knowledge of this cache of documents. This evidence takes the form of an intelligence report produced by the United States Strategic Air Force In Europe, Office Of The Assistant Chief of Staff A-2, Exploitation Division APO 033 dated July 29, 1945[5]. This report deals with any possible information or weaponry produced at Skoda by the Germans, which could have been sent to the Japanese. In late July, 1945, the atomic bomb had not yet been dropped on Hiroshima, so hostilities were still on-going in the Pacific. The report has been edited using a favorite method of the government. They have made much of the report illegible. Because it was taken off microfilm the government feels it has plausible deny-ability in rendering it illegible. Fortunately, the first few and last page can be made out and with some processing, read. The very last paragraph jumps out. The last page is reproduced here and the last paragraph reads:

"4. Investigation should be undertaken of report that microfilms of 2 1 /2 million Skoda drawings had been hidden in three caves immediately East of SRBSKO (L-5863) in the event that Ordnance personnel are not satisfied with completeness of previous investigations."

What is meant by "not satisfied" is what was described in the first two pages of the report. The basic problem is that at least two American intelligence units were sent to Skoda but got little cooperation from the Czechs in charge of the facility. These Czechs quickly realized how their bread was buttered. They and their country would remain in the Soviet sphere so it was with the Soviets that their future lay, not the Western Allies. Giving sensitive information to the Americans would not be viewed upon favorably by the Soviets.

Once the war with Japan was over, the Americans returned to the topic of the Kammler Group and its files. They realized that the Czechs had given them less than the truth. They also had intelligence of a large cache of sensitive documents, intelligence that was confirmed by the French. Apparently, the Soviets had not been given this information for whatever reasons. The Americans did act, seizing the microfilmed documents, some of which were later returned.

As to the question if the Americans, British, French or Russians ever found all of the German secret high-technology they sought, well, the answer is that it certainly has to be doubted[6].

Another source, Kurt Kreutzfeld, a German prisoner of war interviewed and cited in the British Intelligence Sub-Committee report number 142, page 4, shows us how widespread microfilming of this type was:

"An agency had been set up in Berlin for the microfilming of important technical and political papers under the control of Oberst Sauer who had his office at 88 Potsdamerstrasse. He came under the control of Speer's ministry, but also copied all the important papers of the S.S. Hauptamt. After the first heavy attacks of Berlin in 1943 it was decided to conceal three or more sets of the film copies at various dispersal points, probably in southern Germany. Gen. Ing. Herrmann and Oberst Diesing of the R.L.M. were thought to be responsible for the evacuation order. Manfred von Brauchitsch was charged with the transport of the films. Obersts Kneemeier and Diesing of the R.L.M., Oberst Geist who worked with Sauer and the head of the Beschaffungs and Ruestungslieferungamt of the army should know the location of one or more of the hiding places. This information has been passed to Air Intelligence and they are dealing with the matter."

Indeed, one witness claims that still, today, the 2.5 tons of archival material remain under the control of former SS members and are still intact[7].

Sources

1. Mayer, Edgar and Thomas Mehner, 2002, page 19, Die Atombombe und das Dritte Reich Das Geheimnis des Dreiecks Arnstadt-Wechmar-Ohrdruf, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

2. ibid

3. Stevens, Henry, 2003, page 50, 135, Hitler's Flying Saucers A Guide To German Flying Discs Of The Second World War, Adventures Unlimited Publishing, Kempton, Illinois

4. Jesensky, Milos Ph.D., and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, page 98-102, "Wunderland" Memozemske Technologie Treiti Rise, Aos Publishing

5. United States Strategic Air Forces In Europe Office Of The Assistant Chief Of Staff A-2 Exploitation Division APO 033, Maxwell AFB, microfilm roll A5730, 1955, Maxwell AFB

6. Mayer, Edgar and Thomas Mehner, 2002, page 23

7. Georg, Friedrich and Thomas Mehner, 2004, page 257, Atomziel New York Geheime Grossraketen - und Raumfahrtprojekte des Dritten Reiches, Jochen Kopp Verlag, Rottenburg

40 Conclusion

Does our government keep files of German technology suppressed to this day? I certainly think so. In fact, I think there is a whole history of World War Two German scientific and technical development that has been kept from us.

As has been mentioned, rarely are the implications of any technology discussed in government files. There seems to be some unwritten system by which only a general description of the technology is given in a government report. From there government people must go to a more secret and detailed report or contact the individuals responsible for compiling that report. Should their security clearance suffice, a briefing might follow. The final stage might involve a trip to the government facility involved with further development of this technology.

People high up in government often retire to work for private industry. It is suspected that sometimes a reward is given to these individuals if they have distinguished themselves and endeared themselves in some way while in government service. What better way to reward someone than to throw a technological pearl their way, or rather, in the way of the private industrial firm in which they are now employed and in which the individual in question has stock options. In this way German technology was slowly and secretly spread throughout American industry to the benefit of certain insiders. We have already touched upon one example involving exactly this scenario, but let me go over this excellent example again, making this second point.

German tank crews on the Eastern Front found that low temperature winter conditions turned their crankcase oil into asphalt. The tanks wouldn't start. German soldiers actually had to build fires under their tanks to heat the oil in order for their tanks to start in the morning. Starting each day by building a fire under your tank isn't exactly safe. German chemists needed to get busy.

Oil gets thicker as it cools. This is one measure of oil, its flow rate, which is called viscosity. This is familiar to as by numbers: 30 weight oil, 10w-30 oil, as so forth. The lower the number, the thinner the oil. Longer oil molecules flow more slowly than shorter ones. Actually, each "weight" of oil is an average containing both long and short molecular strands. The average strand length for 10w oil is shorter than for 20w oil but each grade represents an average, each contains both long and short oil molecules.

What the German chemists did was to re-synthesize new oil molecules from existing mineral oil. The new re-synthesized molecules were more uniform in length as compared with normal mineral oil. They found that the new synthetic oil flowed much better at low temperatures because of this internal consistency. This meant that the tanks were able to start in cold weather. As a byproduct of this new process it was found that the new molecules were much tougher than conventional oil and could lubricate at much higher temperatures. After the war this technology disappeared for thirty years.

Then, in 1975, Mobil Oil Company announced a new product, "Mobil One". This was based upon the German process for re-synthesized mineral oil. It was a huge financial success. Somehow, and for some reason, Mobil Oil got the secrets to the German synthetic oil process after a lapse of thirty years and made a ton of money. This revelation spawned a whole new lubrication industry, that of synthetic motor oil.

Another factor is timing. With new times come new priorities. After May, 1945, the priority was using German technology to defeat the Japanese, as we did with the atomic bomb. Later, the priority was deterrence of the Communist Block. Energy has become a priority. It is interesting that the British only made the discovery of Hans Coler public after the first energy crisis of the early 1970s. Evidently they were afraid of the accusation of suppression of this technology and wanted to come clean before the next energy crisis.

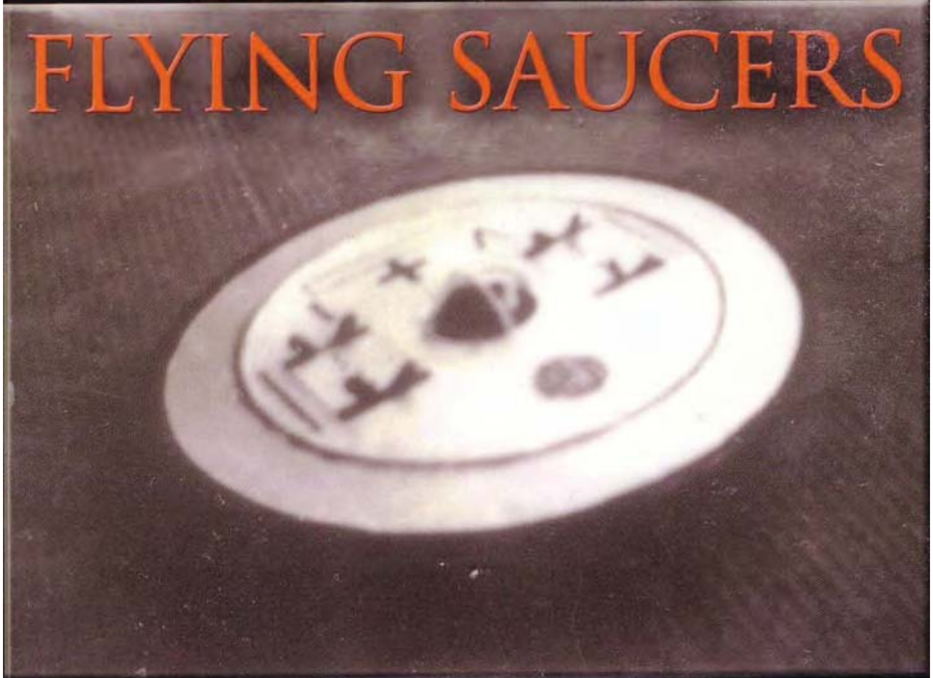
I think we can expect large American companies to "invent" some of these technologies in the near future as the need arises. I also think that any further economic deterioration in the lands of the former Soviet Union also might produce some of this technology on the open or black market as was the case with red mercury. There is also the possibility that the former Allied Powers did not corner all of this German technology. To this day the Germans keep secrets, even from other NATO and EU countries. The underground high-tech facilities at Jonastal are proof that there remains an untold story or two.

Besides the technology itself, I think whole suppressed or hidden histories of how this technology came to pass will slowly surface as it become feasible to do so in the political climate. The final history of World War Two has not yet been written.

Thanks

I have many people who have helped me with this book to thank. Some have contributed material. Some have contributed information, opinions, ideas or even done translation work. These include: Joseph Altairac, Dr. David Chapman, Remy Chavilier, Rainer Daehnhardt, Dr. Gordon Freeman, the late Heiner Gehring, Friedrich Georg, Professor Arnold Krammer, "Leo", Lea McDonald, Thomas Mehner, Gerhard Petak, Jeff Rense, Klaus-Peter Rothkugel, Greg Rowe and Milos Vnenk. Special thanks to Lisa Stevens for proofreading/editing this book.

HITLER'S FLYING SAUCERS



A GUIDE TO GERMAN FLYING DISCS OF THE SECOND WORLD WAR

BY HENRY STEVENS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PREFACE 1

CHAPTER ONE: 13
THE SITUATION WITHIN NAZI GERMANY

CHAPTER TWO: 29
RELIABLE SOURCES

CHAPTER THREE: 41
AN OVERVIEW OF THE GERMAN CONVENTIONAL SAUCER PROJECTS
- THE SCHREIVER-HABERMOHL PROJECT(S)
- THE MIETHE-BELLUZZO PROJECT
- FOO FIGHTERS
- THE PEENEMUENDE SAUCER PROJECT
- CHAPTER SUMMARY

CHAPTER FOUR: 121
THE GERMAN FIELD PROPULSION PROJECTS
- THE VICTOR SCHAUBERGER MODELS
- THE KM-2 ROCKET
- FIELD PROPULSION SAUCERS
- A GERMAN EYE WITNESS
- A COMBINED INTELLIGENCE OBJECTIVES SUB-COMMITTEE REPORT
- THE SMOKING GUN: AN F.B.I. REPORT
- DISCUSSION OF GERMAN FIELD PROPULSION SAUCER
- ATOMIC SAUCERS AGAIN
- THE KARL SCHAPPELLER DEVICE

CHAPTER FIVE: 203
LORE AND LOOSE ENDS: A DISCUSSION OF GERMAN SAUCERS

CHAPTER SIX: 233
"SONDERBUERO"

CHAPTER SEVEN: 241
DISPOSITION OF GERMAN SAUCER TECHNOLOGY AFTER THE WAR

CHAPTER EIGHT: 261
CONCLUDING THOUGHTS

PREFACE

This book is a guide into the world of German flying discs. You may have picked up this guide because you are unfamiliar with the German production of flying saucers during World War Two. The basics of this production will be revealed to you in the following pages. An adventure awaits you.

On the other hand, you may be looking for nothing more than a rational explanation of the UFO phenomenon. The UFO phenomenon involves sightings of unidentified flying objects. This means that any unidentified flying object is a UFO, regardless of its alleged source. Because the object is unidentified, the object's source is also undetermined. Only a leap of faith can connect UFOs to an extraterrestrial course without first introducing proof. A radical hypothesis such as an extraterrestrial origin of UFOs requires overwhelming proof in order to be generally accepted. No such overwhelming extraterrestrial proof has ever been offered which has stood up to scrutiny. No crashed alien craft have ever been produced by anyone, inside or outside government. Likewise, no alien bodies have ever been found. No extraterrestrial culture, or alien technology has ever been uncovered by anyone. There is simply no actual evidence at all linking UFOs with an extraterrestrial source. Therefore, no such leap of faith should be made. We need to start all over again. All rational earthly explanations need to be exhausted before any extraterrestrial theories are even put forth.

Unfortunately, the simple truth is that, for the most part, UFO research has done a leap-frog to the extraterrestrial explanation without ever adequately exploring and exhausting a terrestrial origin. This statement is inclusive of everyone regardless of background or education. It applies to the charlatan UFO attention-getters as well as to former NASA scientists with Ph.D.s. This is the condition of our current state of affairs in the UFO world.

Let me expound on this. For over fifty years, the UFO research paradigm has been fundamentally wrong. A proper attempt to explain the UFO phenomenon would involve a gathering or the evidence and then explanation by proceeding from simple solutions involving known facts and conditions and totally exhausting these as possibilities before postulating explanations, conditions, or entities not represented by fact. Only after known facts fail us can we move on to postulate explanations beyond our realm of experience.

Even then, an idea which may fit the observed facts but which is not in evidence itself cannot be accepted as fact until it is tested. This is nothing new. This is simply the way logic and science test new explanations of reality. This method is the foundation of our modern western technological culture.

Unfortunately, research in the field of flying saucer phenomena has never been undertaken with this principle in mind. More and more frequently, UFOs are attributed to an extraterrestrial source by the media, or the "witnesses", as a sort of knee-jerk reaction. It seems if one sees something for which he has no prior reference, then it must be extraterrestrial as a matter of course. Over the years sightings have become "encounters," then "abductions." Such reports are increasing even as the use of regression hypnosis replaces the scientific method for finding the truth. The same individuals often have repeated "experiences" each of which becomes stranger than the last.

If no real research has ever been done on the UFO phenomena, then how has thesis extraterrestrial theory crept into popular culture? One simple answer is the media. The media loves extraterrestrials. Why? It is because the extraterrestrial hypothesis is marketable. It sells copy. Just look at the number of books, magazines, movies and television programs devoted to this explanation. Look at your check-out counter in the supermarket.

The government itself is another answer. The word "government" from here on will basically mean the government of the United States of America but will sometimes include other governments, as specified. The government has used "flying saucers" to cover its own testing of secret aircraft. It uses the UFO-extraterrestrial ploy superbly. When a UFO is seen by civilians, a controlled procedure is enacted. This procedure plants or encourages witnesses who expound an extraterrestrial origin in a given sighting. The government may even go so far as to fund television programming and magazines devoted to this explanation. After all, a huge part of the C.I.A.'s budget goes into such covert conditioning of the American people. However, Americans are not the first to be fooled, as we shall see.

In most cases, any extraterrestrial hypothesis is acceptable to government manipulators, especially if it is so ridiculous that the witnesses end up discrediting themselves. The government is so successful at this that the entire topic of UFOs has become somewhat of a joke. This is done deliberately. Thus, serious people with "something to lose" are afraid to stake their reputations on a public announcement of their UFO experience, no matter how real it may have been. At this point the government has achieved its purpose which is to discredit and suppress all serious inquiry into the UFO question.

Supposedly, UFO research has been left to large, well-financed UFO 'research organizations". The largest of these is MUFON (Mutual UFO Network). This organization "trains" people to report sightings, then collects the data and organizes it using some sort of multi-variant analysis into something meaningful. Over the years MUFON has had the opportunity to collect and "organize" thousands of sightings into something meaningful.

In reality, the information is organized into gibberish. After a body of knowledge has been studied and organized, usually, certain facts or at least generalizations can be gleaned form this kind of work. In its fifty years of existence can anyone name one new fundamental fact that MUFON has provided us? They have provided us with nothing. Someone once said that MUFON is really a black hole into which information is attracted and does not have the power to escape on its own. We will return to MUFON and explain this reasoning at a later point.

If we are to seek any real explanation of the UFO phenomenon, we must make a clean break with the past. We must go back to the basics of simplicity and logic. One basic question is this: could we humans be capable of making the unidentified flying machines which have been seen in abundance in the sky since the Second World War? Until we answer that question in the negative, there is no reason to postulate an alien origin for UFOs.

One purpose of this book is to give an individual new to this subject an overview into the study of German flying discs. Never fear, this is not a disjointed spook-hunt, chasing sightings and abductions. There are real facts in this field. There are real people with real names and histories and there are real saucer designs.

Another purpose is to give the reader references, upon which statements in this book are based. Given these references, the reader may then research the topics of particular interest in more detail.

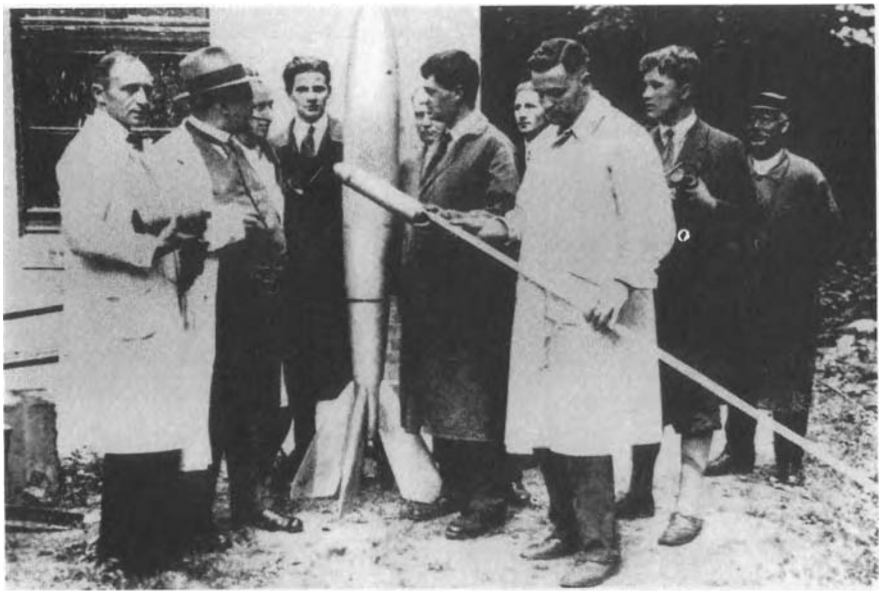
The research methodology is straightforward. We will listen to what is claimed about German saucers by Germans of those times or from other individuals who are in a position to know something about this topic. We then attempt to verify it using an independent historical source. Corroboration from other independent sources, especially from witnesses, is also acceptable and important. Photographs are important but nowadays pictures can be manufactured on a computer. Well-documented pictures which appeared before the modern computer age are perhaps best. Also, pictures accompanied with negatives may be considered better documents than those without negatives.

Government documents can be great sources of confirmation. Unfortunately, governments cannot be trusted and have historically attempted to manipulate UFO research. Therefore, these sources are best not used to formulate ideas but to confirm ideas first developed through independent sources.

Politically, time is on our side. Since the Berlin Wall fell, more and more German researchers are going public with their findings. There is more freedom to research this subject now than at any time in the past sixty years. As each piece fits into the puzzle, a consensus of public acceptance acknowledging the reality of German flying discs grows. All we really have to do is find the pieces, confirm them and eep putting them together. The truth will emerge by itself and in the end nobody, no special interest of any sort, will be able to deny this basic truth.

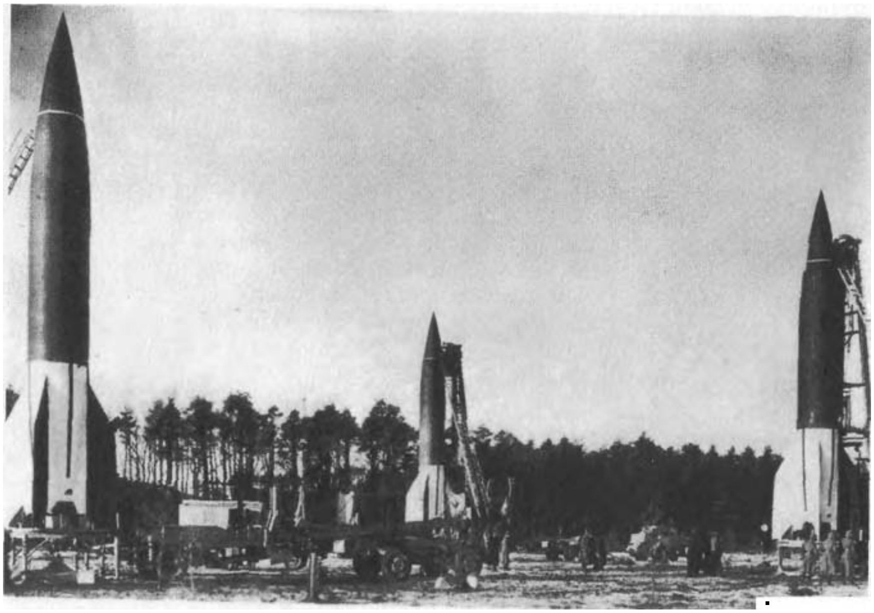
The writer of this book is not an authority to be believed upon face-value alone. New assertions made in this book about German saucers will be accompanied with documentation. Assertions made by others will be accompanied with their references. This book will briefly touch upon most of the facts, ideas, writers and researchers in this field. With the sources given, the reader will be able to confirm the veracity of the position put forth independently.

In an attempt to explain the field of German saucers to someone new to it some background is necessary. First, we will discuss the situation within wartime Germany. Then, there will follow a discussion concerning reliable sources in this field. An overview of German flying discs will follow. Finally, various trains of thought or schools or thought in this field will be presented in a discussion section along with some odds and ends which do not fit into any neat pattern. At that point, the post-war disposition of German saucer technology will be discussed before concluding with some thoughts on the topic.



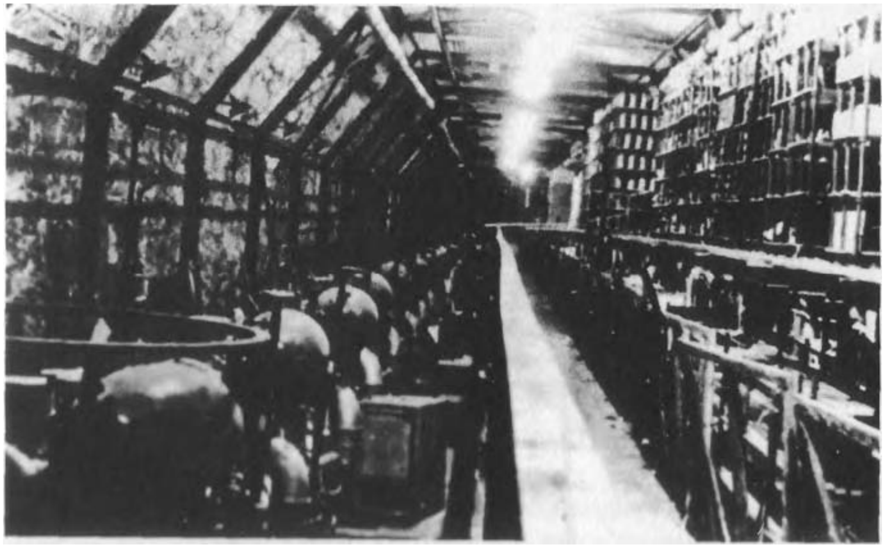
A meeting of Germany's early rocket pioneers, including Rudolph Nebel at left, Hermann Oberth, to the right of the rocket, Klaus Riedel, holding the small rocket, and behind him the dapper young Wernher von Braun.

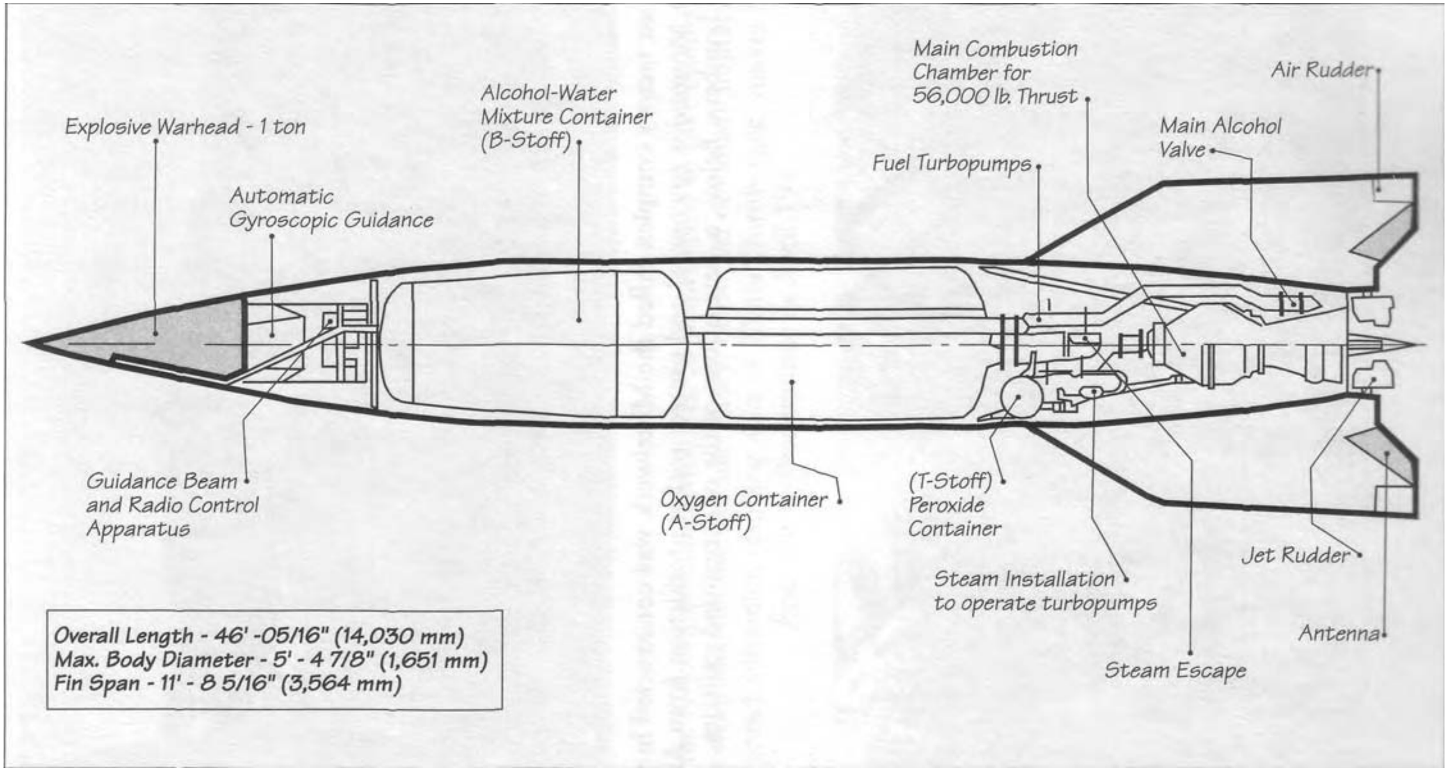
After the rise of Hitler, von Braun found himself with a new circle of acquaintances, as well as a new research facility at Peenemunde.



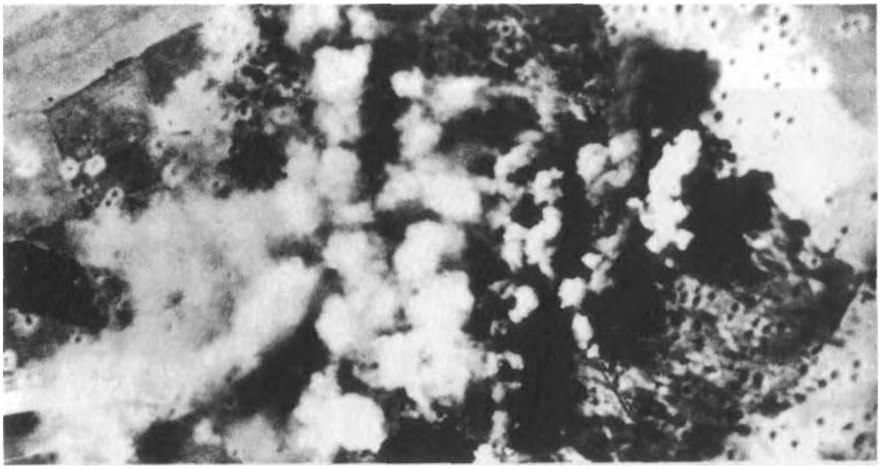
As the A-4 neared completion, the SS maneuvered to take control of the weapon from the German Army. Below, an obviously impressed Heinrich Himmler, standing next to Walter Dornberger, makes his first visit to Peenemiinde in April 1943.

A vast factory complex called the Mittelwerk was constructed in the Harz Mountains to conceal and protect rocket production from Allied bombers. Below, a view of one of the underground galleries.





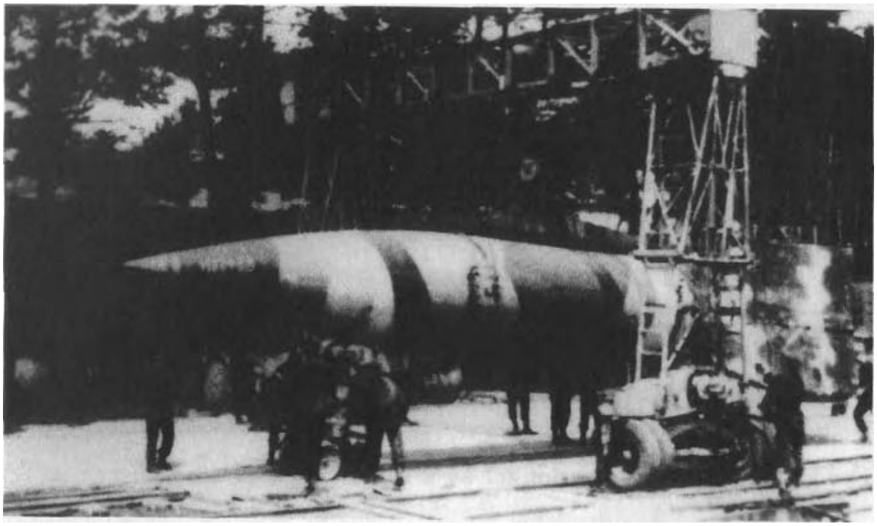
Explosive Warhead - 1 ton
Automatic Gyroscopic Guidance
Alcohol-Water Mixture Container (B-Stoff)
Main Combustion Chamber for 56,000 lb. Thrust
Fuel Turbopumps
Main Alcohol Valve
Air Rudder
Guidance Beam and Radio Control Apparatus
Oxygen Container (A-Stoff)
(T-Stoff) Peroxide Container
Steam Installation to operate turbopumps
Steam Escape
Jet Rudder
Antenna
Overall Length - 46' -05/16" (14,030 mm)
Max. Body Diameter - 5' - 4 7/8" (1,651 mm)
Fin Span - 11' - 8 5/16" (3,564 mm)



Allied intelligence was able to identify the "ski sites" originally designed to launch the V-1. While Operation Crossbow unleashed thousands of bombers against the sites, the Germans meanwhile switched to more flexible, and inconspicuous, launch methods.

The gigantic V-2 storage bunker at Wizernes, France after absorbing 14 Allied air attacks. Today the bunker is a museum run by the French government called La Coupole. It contains originals of the V-l and V-2 and also celebrates space travel.

Carefully considered German camouflage schemes were designed to conceal the weapons among trees.



CHAPTER ONE:

THE SITUATION WITHIN NAZI GERMANY

CHAPTER ONE

The Situation Within Nazi Germany

Thanks to the American media and what passes for history, most Americans have no idea of wartime conditions within Germany. The topics most germane to this discussion are the means of wartime industrial production and transportation within Germany.

After the Battle of Britain, Germany's air domination over Europe began to decline, sliding down a slippery slope which ultimately resulted in one major reason for its defeat. German means of industrial, arms, and energy production became increasing venerable to attack by Allied bombers. The munitions plants needed to produce the arms to maintain the war effort, such as tanks, airplanes and cannons were all targets of Allied air bombardment. Likewise, high priority targets included oil production and refining facilities which produced the fuel and lubricants needed to make the war effort possible.

One way Germany responded to air attacks was by moving munitions facilities and high-value industrial plants underground (1). Some of these facilities were vast, encompassing miles of underground tunnels. They housed both the industrial means of war production and the workers themselves. The facilities at Nordhausen in Thuringia are well known as the site of production for the V-l and V-2, but there were others. The newly discovered underground complexes of the Jonas Valley south of Nordhausen in Thuringia constitute another vast complex (2)(3). This facility was to serve as a center of government and most probably a research center for advanced weaponry. This is also true for the many underground complexes in what is now Poland. Notable among these is a facility called "Der Riese" (The Giant). Der Riese served as a uranium mine, uranium processing facility, and research and development facility for secret weapons (4). Underground facilities for weapons production were found throughout Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia and Poland. Underground production facilities were also set up to refine synthetic petroleum products from coal and to generate electricity.

In addition to underground facilities, camouflage was used to hide numerous smaller facilities. These many camouflaged and underground plants formed a web of sub-assembly producers. Each sub-assembly facility sent their product to a larger or a more centrally located facility for further work. From there it might be transported again for final assembly. As an example, type XXI U-boats were modular, being produced in pipe-like sections throughout Germany. They were transported by rail to sites near the North Sea and only finally assembled at water's edge. Likewise, some types of aircraft were only finally assembled near the runway.

Further confusing Allied air intelligence, the plants were constantly moving. Eventually everything of value was to be moved underground, to bomb-proof shelters. Facilities were kept on the move until space was available for this underground relocation. These tactics worked for the Germans. There were simply too many moving targets for the Allies to completely stop German war production.

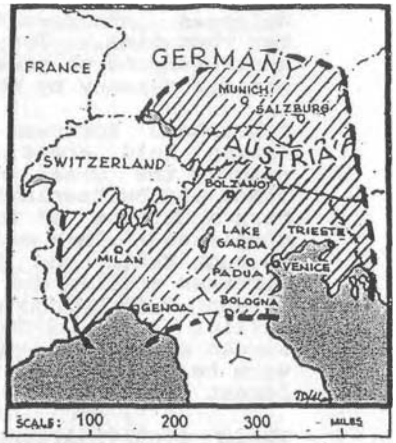
Of course the weak link in this scheme was transportation. The railroad system was the only practical and most energy efficient method of moving all these sub-assemblies. Trucking material was done but in a petroleum-starved Third Reich, it was not possible to sustain a truck-based transportation system necessary to meet all the requirements of wartime Germany. Recognizing this, the Allies bombed railroad centers using the heavy, four-engine B-17 bombers.

By mid-1943 the American P-51 Mustang was introduced into the field of play. This aircraft could be thought of as a Spitfire which could fly for eight hours. Its range allowed it to escort Allied bombers to their targets throughout the Reich. After escorting the bombers to their targets the P-51s were released to attack "targets of opportunity". A P-51 can fly close to the ground and attack individual trains, which they did. Perhaps you will recall the many wartime film clips showing these P-51s destroying German trains as they traveled. By mid-1944, it is a wonder that any trains within Germany could move at all. Some were forced to hide in mountain tunnels, as they did near the Jonas Valley, running at night or when there were no enemy aircraft reported.

As a result of these day and night air attacks, Germany found itself increasingly the victim of shortages of material and fuel, limiting its ability to make war.

Though Germany's air defence system was the best of any warring nation, it was clear that if Germany was to survive, improvement was imperative. Germany experimented with radically new types of air defense systems. Anti-aircraft rockets, guided both from the ground and by infra-red homing devices were invented. Vortex cannons, sun cannons, air-explosive turbulence bombs, rockets trailing long wire to ensnare enemy propellers, numerous electronic jamming devices, electronic devices designed to stop ignition-based engines, magnetically repulsed projectiles and long-range x-ray "death rays" were all under development as the conflict ended (5) (6). Among these exotic solutions were saucer-shaped interceptor aircraft.

The Germans already had jet and rocket interceptors as well as jet and rocket attack vehicles. German skies were full of these and other exotic aircraft so this new saucer shape was not considered as important then as we do today looking back upon it from a UFO perspective. To the German military and civilians alike these were just more new weapons.



FRANCE
GERMANY
MUNICH
SALZBURG
AUSTRIA
SWITZERLAND
BOLZANO
LAKE GARDA
TRIESTE
MILAN
PADUA
VENICE
GENOA
BOLOGNA
ITALY
SCALE: 100 200 300 MILES

FOR THE LAST STAND.—The "Redoubt" area planne by the Germans.

LAKE GARDA
(RELIEF MAP)
OVER 6000 FT.
5,000-6,500 FT.
3,500-5,000 FT.
2,000-3,500 FT.
UNDER 2,000 FT.
RIVA GARGNANO
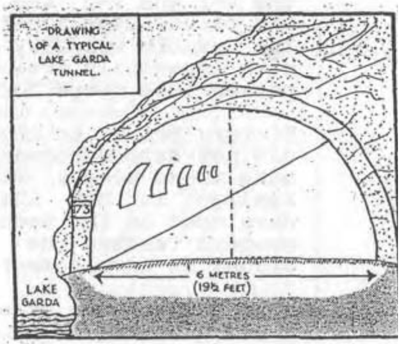
74 TUNNELS CONVERTED INTO AERO-ENGINE FACTORY (FIAT)
6 TUNNELS CONVERTED INTO AIRCRAFT COMPONENTS FACTORY (CAPRONI)
LAKE GARDA
SALO
GARDA
SERMIONE
DESENZANO
PERSCHIERA
SCALE: 4 6 8 10 12 14 16 18 MILES

How the factories were laid out along the lake roads.



DRAWING OF A TYPICAL LAKE GARDA TUNNEL.
73
6 METRES (19½ FEET)
LAKE GARDA

From top to bottom, right to left are: The "Alpenfestung" which was the southernmost island of defense planned by the Germans; Diagram of the Fiat underground facility at Lake Garda in Northern Italy which worked under direction of the Germans; A cross section of the tunnel. It was in this facility where Renato Vesco worked during the Second World War.

As the conflict drew to its conclusion, military planners in Germany considered the idea of concentrating their ground and air defenses into specific fortresses for a last stand. This would buy them time. They needed time to perfect new "Siegerswaffen", super-weapons so powerful that they could turn the course of the war for Germany by themselves.

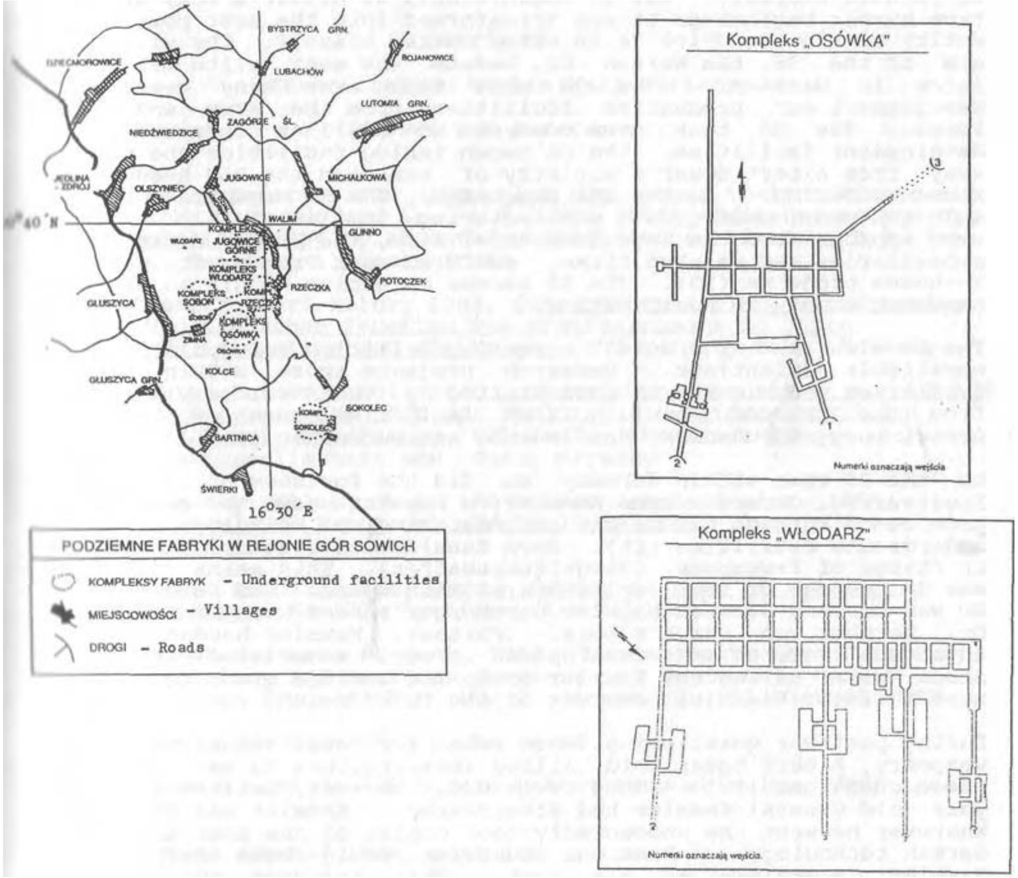
A mountain fortress or "Alpenfestung" was to be set up in the German held areas of Northern Italy, Austria and Germany in roughly the areas in which these countries converged with each other and Switzerland (7). A fortress was to be set up in the Harz Mountains of Thruingia including several large underground complexes. This would extend from Nordhausen in the north down through Kahla and into the Jonas Valley. Another similar fortress complex was scheduled for the Owl Mountains separating Poland from Czechoslovakia including "Der Riese" mentioned earlier (8). Another fortress was to be set up in the Black Forest of Southern Germany. Other minor islands of resistance were to be set up in Norway, the Bohemian forest and the Bavarian forest (9).

These fortifications were to house soldiers, mostly SS units. They would also provide underground hangers and bomb-proof overhangs for aircraft take-offs and landings. Missiles, such as the V-l and V-2, and other weapons were to be mass produced there and fired automatically, right off the automated assembly line. The exotic weaponry mentioned above was to be employed, along with especially trained mountain troops, defending the mountain passes into these fortresses (10).

History tells us the Alpenfestung never actually happened. It did not happen because German construction was simply not able to make these places ready in time. What is important for us to realize is that the weaponry for these fortresses was being developed as the Second World War drew to a close. Few of these weapons reached the operational stage but many were in various stages of development.

When Hitler took power in 1933 one of his first decisions was to rebuild the German Air Force, the Luftwaffe. This new organization was to make a clean break with the old and this reasoning was reflected in its research and development facilities, the RLM, which were the finest of any branch of the German military. Two brilliant research facilities were also in the possession of the Luftwaffe, the Lilenthalgesellschaft and the Academy of Air Research. Besides the Luftwaffe, there was the Army which did develop such things as the V-l cruise missile. There was the Speer Ministry of Arms which did research. In addition, a system of research and development facilities was set up headed by a research council, the "Reichsforschungrat". Their job was to coordinate the technical schools and universities, the military and governmental research groups, and the research and development facilities into a concerted effort (11).

The Underground Complex "Der Riese"



BYSTRZYCA GRN.
BOJANOWICE
DZIECMOROWICE
LUBACHÓW
LUTOMIA GRN.
ZAGÓRZE ŚL.
NIEDŹWIEDZICE
JEDLINA - ZDRÓJ
JUGOWICE MICHAŁKOWA
OLSZYNIEC
40´N
WALIM
KOMPLEKS JUGOWICE GÓRNE
WŁODARZ GLINNO
KOMPLEKS WŁODARZ
RZECZKA
POTOCZEK
KOMPLEKS SOBOŃ
KOMPL. RZECZKA
GŁUSZYCA
SOBOŃ KOMPLEKS OSÓWKA
ZIMNA OSÓWKA
KOLCE GŁUSZYCA GRN.
SOKOLEC
KOMPL. SOKOLEC
BARTNICA
ŚWIERKI
16°30´E
PODZIEMNE FABRYKI W REJONIE GÓR SOWICH
KOMPLEKSY FABRYK - Underground facilities
MIEJSCOWOŚCI - Villages
DROGI - Roads
Kompleks „OSÓWKA"
3
2
1
Numerki oznaczają wejścia
Kompleks „WŁODARZ"
2
1
Numerki oznaczają wejścia.

"Der Riese", ("The Giant" in English), is located in the "Gory Sowie" or Owl Mountains of modern-day Poland. It consisted of seven undergound complexes which concerned themselves with the mining, refining, research and development of uranium both for energy producing machines and weapons of war. The tunnels of the larger complexes are almost two miles in length. Courtesy of Robert Lesniakiewicz. Mr. Lesniakiewicz is a Polish engineer and a member of the research group responsible for opening, exploring and maping of "Der Riese".

Another fact that influences our story was the ascendance of the SS (Schutz Staffel). The SS began simply as Hitler's body guard. From humble beginnings it was transformed into the most powerful entity within the Third Reich after Hitler himself. The military arm of the SS, the Waffen SS, became the most elite military force in Germany. The SS also took over many research, development and production facilities from the Army and Air Force. The SS took over control of civilian research and development facilities. The SS began taking facilities and power away from Albert Speer's Ministry of Arms and the RLM headed by Hermann Goering. As the war progressed, the SS organized, built and ran many underground manufacturing facilities (12). They even appropriated the huge industrial firm, the Skoda Works, its subsidiaries and related firms, centered near Prague, for their in-house projects (13). The SS became an empire within an empire answerable only to Adolf Hitler.

The SS also set up special research facilities for politically unreliable scientists. Research projects arose within these facilities which were in part staffed by technical people drawn from the prisoner pool. Such facilities were set up at Oraneinburg, Nordhausen, Mechlenburg and Mathausen (14).

As the SS rose within Germany, so did the fortunes of Doctor of Engineering, General Hans Kammler. Kammler seems to come into prominence through his talent at designing and building massive underground facilities (15). Soon Kammler was placed, by Hitler, in charge of V-weapons (Vergeltungswaffen). This means Kammler was in charge of the facilities at Peenemuende and Nordhausen. He was Dr. and General Walhter Dornberger's boss who, in turn was Dr. Wernher von Braun's boss. Further, Kammler headed up an advanced research and development group, associated with the Skoda Works, called the Kammler Group (16). This group held the most advanced technical secrets of the Third Reich.

During post-war questioning, when asked for details concerning V-weaponry, Albert Speer told Allied interrogators to ask Kammler these questions (17). They never did, however, because the 42 year old General Kammler had disappeared. Kammler was no fool. Wherever he went he undoubtedly took copies of the most advanced German technology. Numerous countries would have dealt with Kammler, regardless of his past. This includes the U.S.A. Couple this with the fact that no search was ever made for General Kammler in spite of the fact that he extensively employed slave-labor in his projects.

Did Kammler do a secret deal with an Allied government, exchanging information for a new identity? Or did Kammler escape Allied clutches to some safe haven such as South America? It is known that the Nazis set up shop in large, secure tracts of land between Chile and Argentina. It is also known that UFOs were seen earlier in that region than in the USA after the war. Many post-war stories involve German scientists relocating in South American countries formerly friendly to the Nazis and there building and flying German saucers.

CHAPTER ONE

The Situation Within Nazi Germany

Sources and References

1. Vesco, Renato, 1976, Intercept UFO, pages 90-110, Pinnacle Books, 275 Madison Ave, N.Y., NY. 10016 Reissued as Man-Made UFOs 1944-1994 by Adventures Unlimited Publishing, P.O. Box 74, Kempton, Illinois 60946

2. Zunneck, Karl-Heinz, 1998, Geheimtechnologien. Wunderwaffen Und Irdischen Facetten Des UFO-Phaenomens 50 Jahre Desinformation und die Folqen. CTT-Verlag, Suhl, Germany

3. Faeth, Harald, 1998, 1945 - Thuerinqens Manhattan Project Auf der Spuerensuche nach der verlorenen V-Waffen-Fabrik in Deutschlands Unterarund, CTT-Verlag, Heinrich-Jung-Verlagsgesellschaft mbH, Suhl, Germany

4. Jesensky, Milos, Ph.D. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, "Wunderland" Mimozemske Technoloaie Treti Rise. AOS Publishing, 1 Vydani

5. Lusar, Rudolf, 1960, German Secret Weapons Of The Second World War. Neville Spearman, London, England

6. German Research Project, 1999, "German Death Rays Part Two: The German And American Governmental Evidence", German Research Project, P.O. Box 7, Gorman, CA. 93243-0007, USA

7. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 95-98

8. Jesensky, Milos, Ph.D. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, page 37

9. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 106

10. ibid, pages 90-111

11. Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee Evaluation Report 20, Planning Board Of Reich Research Council

12. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 90-93

13. Agoston, Tom, 1985, Blunder! How the U.S. Gave Awav Nazi Supersecrets To Russia , pages 12-15, Dodd, Mead & Company, New York

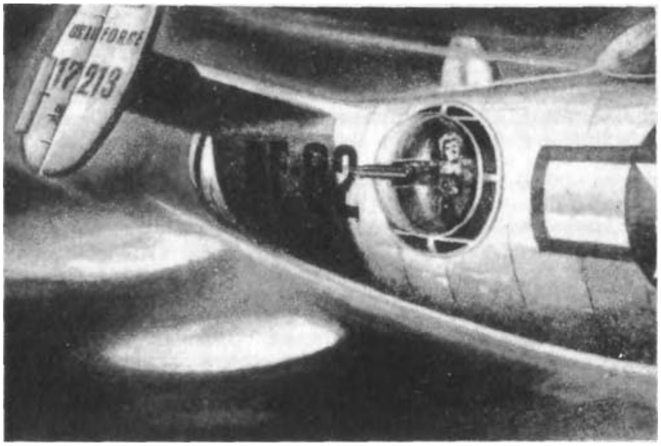
14. British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee, Report Number

142, Information Obtained From Targets Of Opportunity In The Sonthofen Area, pages 1 and 3

15. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 93-95

16. Agoston, Tom, 1985, page 13

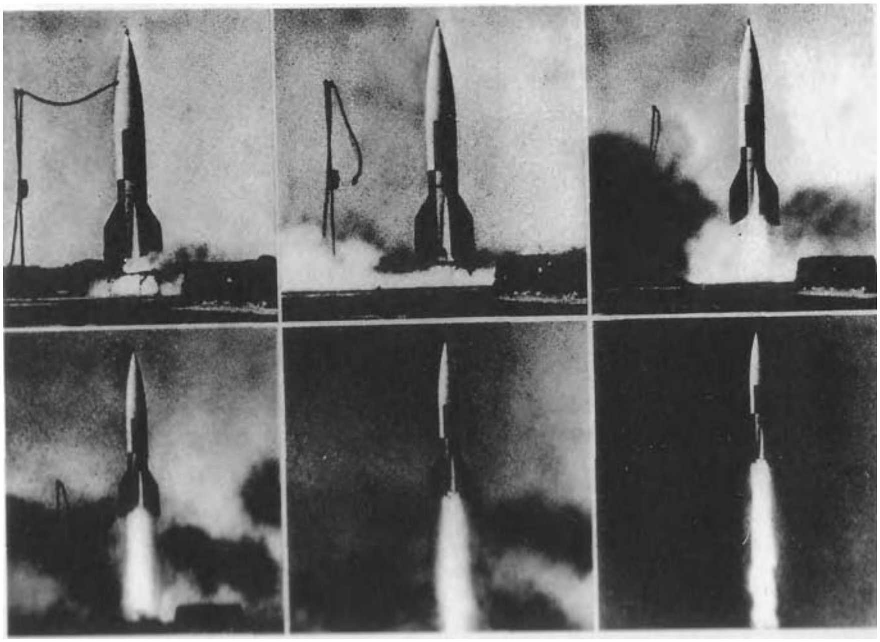
17. Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee Evaluation Report Number 53(b), Interrogation of Albert Speer, Former Reich Minister of Armaments, page 3

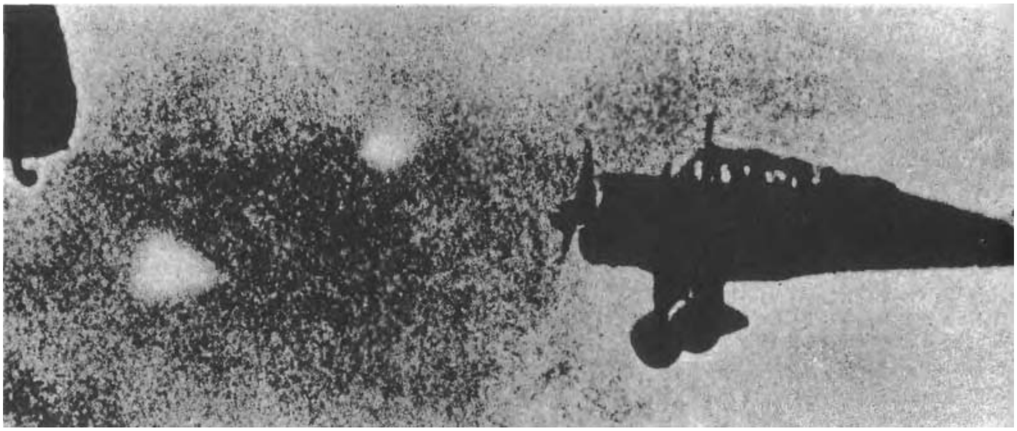


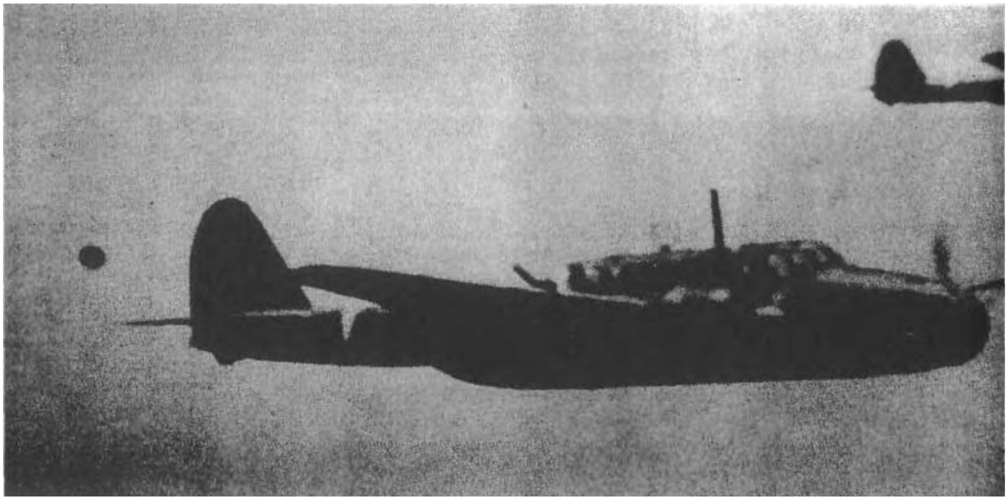
Some of the earliest forms of UFOs, reported during the 1940s, were the ball of light phenomena known as 'foo fighters,' as depicted here.

Walter Dornberger, Wernher von Braun (in cast) and other scientists after surrendering to the U.S. Seventh Army in May 1945.

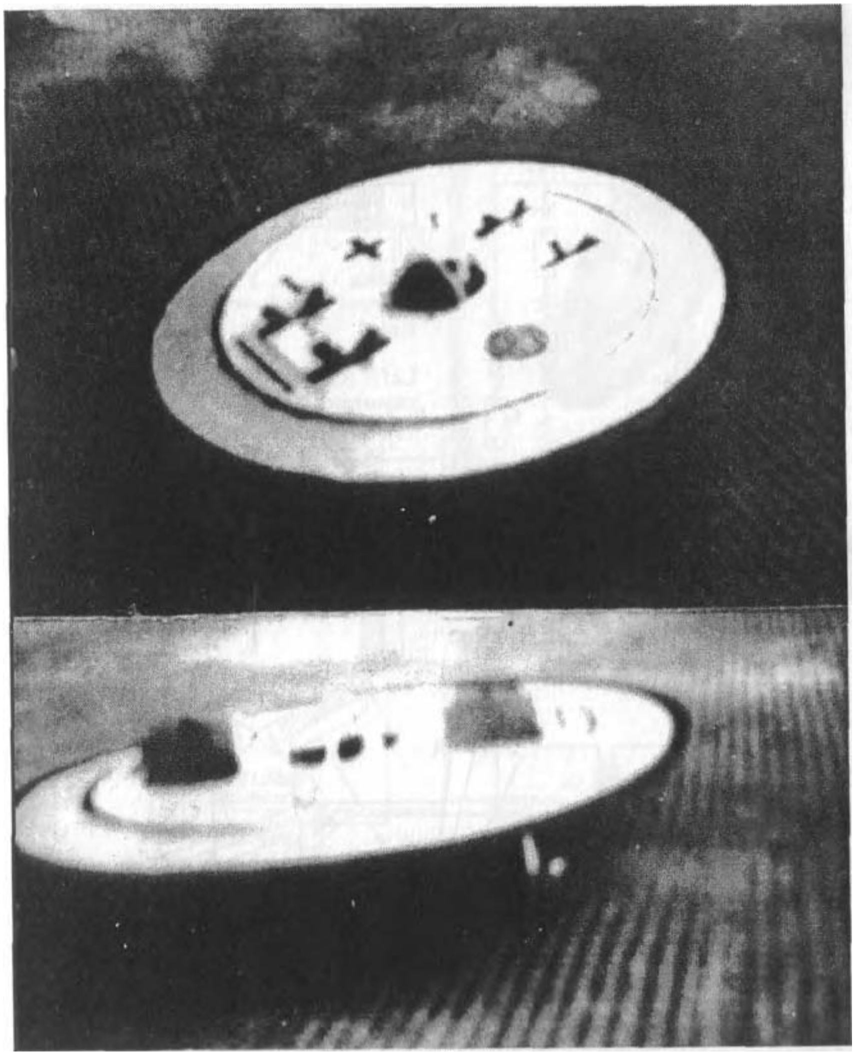
Below, in May 1946, the Americans fire off a captured V-2 at the White Sands proving ground in New Mexico.





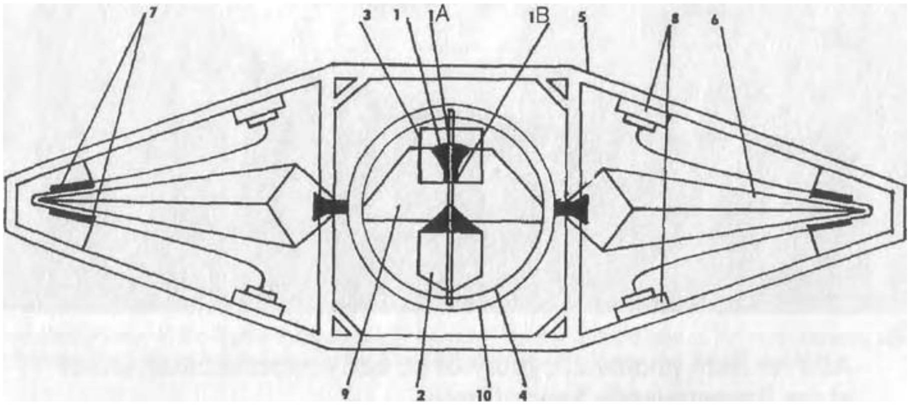


Above: Few photos of foo fighters are currently known. The top photo is one of the most famous, taken over Europe; the bottom was taken over the Sea of Japan between Japan and Korea in 1943.



Above: Rare photos allegedly of an early experimental saucer at the Peenemuende Space Center.

Left: Rare photo allegedly of an early experimental saucer at the Peenemuende Space Center in flight.



Above: Internal plans for a "Vril-1" saucer, according to Polish historian Igor Witkowski.

S N binding soldered & bound binding
Note: Paper insulation between magnet and coil.
Rys.1
B
A
C
D
S
N
I (Right)
IV (Right)
VI (Left)
(Left) III
II (Right)
V (Right)
OUTER (Right)
INNER (Left)
Rys.2
B
A I
IV
R
R
R
R
II
V
L
L
III
VI
OUTER (R)
INNER (L)
Rys.3
R.
U P.
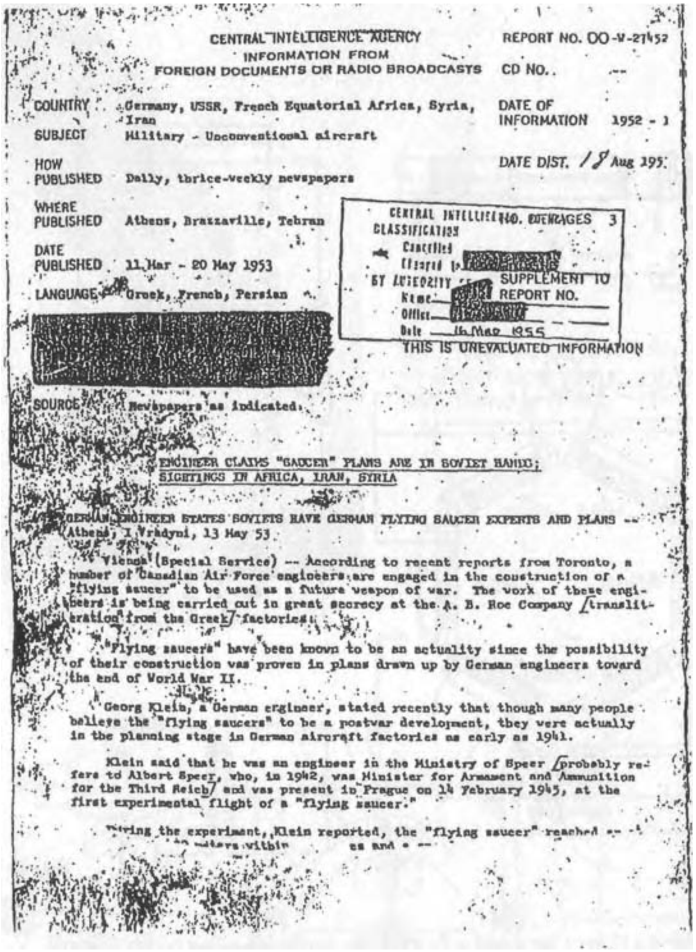
S.
Sch.
O
X
T
Rys.4

Patent for the Coler Converter, a free energy device designed by Hans Coler in 1937.



CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY
INFORMATION FROM FOREIGN DOCUMENTS OR RADIO BROADCASTS

REPORT NO. 00-W-27452
CD NO. --

COUNTRY Germany, USSR, French Equatorial Africa, Syria, Iran
SUBJECT Military - Unconventional aircraft
HOW PUBLISHED Daily, thrice-weekly newspapers
WHERE PUBLISHED Athens, Brazzaville, Tehran
DATE PUBLISHED 11 Mar - 20 May 1953
LANGUAGE Greek, French, Persian

DATE OF INFORMATION 1952 - 1
DATE DIST. 18 Aug 195

[redacted]

CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY CLASSIFICATION Cancelled
Changed to [redacted]
BY AUTHORITY OF [redacted]
Name
Office [redacted]
Date 16 Mar 1955

NO. OF PAGES 3

SUPPLEMENT TO REPORT NO.

THIS IS UNEVALUATED INFORMATION

SOURCE Newspapers as indicated.

ENGINEER CLAIMS "SAUCER" PLANS ARE IN SOVIET HANDS;
SIGHTINGS IN AFRICA, IRAN, SYRIA

GERMAN ENGINEER STATES SOVIETS HAVE GERMAN FLYING SAUCER EXPERTS AND PLANS -- Athens, I Vradyni, 13 May 53

Vienna (Special Service) -- According to recent reports from Toronto, a number of Canadian Air Force engineers are engaged in the construction of a "flying saucer" to be used as a future weapon of war. The work of these engineers is being carried out in great secrecy at the A. B. Roe Company [transliteration from the Greek] factories.

"Flying saucers" have been known to be an actuality since the possibility of their construction was proven in plans drawn up by German engineers toward the end of World War II.

Georg Klein, a German engineer, stated recently that though many people believe the "flying saucers" to be a postwar development, they were actually in the planning stage in German aircraft factories as early as 1941.

Klein said that he was an engineer in the Ministry of Speer [probably refers to Albert Speer, who, in 1942, was Minister for Armament and Ammunition for the Third Reich] and was present in Prague on 14 February 1945, at the first experimental flight of a "flying saucer."

During the experiment, Klein reported, the "flying saucer" reached [illegible] meters within [illegible]es and a [illegible]

A C.I.A. document dated August 18, 1952 mentioning that the Germans were building "flying saucers" as early as 1941. From the German book Die Dunkle Seite Des Mondes (The Dark Side of the Moon) by Brad Harris (1996, Pandora Books, Germany).

CHAPTER TWO:

RELIABLE SOURCES

CHAPTER TWO

Reliable Sources

Much has recently been written concerning German flying discs. To the best of my knowledge, no single source has all the answers. To piece this puzzle together information from various sources must be used. Of course, some sources are better than others. Categories of sources, in a somewhat descending order of reliability are:

1. Those actually involved with these projects.
2. Witnesses of flying saucers who had prior knowledge that the sighting was of a German saucer as opposed to an unidentified flying object.
3. Those who at the time had good reason to know of German saucers.
4. Third-party intelligence sources which verify claims made by the higher categories above.
5. Researchers who have interviewed principals involved in German saucer research.
6. Studies or scientific papers published by individuals identified as participants in these projects.

Sources without names are not as good as sources with names. Information, data, or pictures without a "chain of evidence" linking them to the event are not as good as those with proper documentation.

After almost sixty years, nothing is going to be perfect. These categories are not meant to be absolute. Some sources fit into multiple categories. Some reports have value even though they are not rigorous simply because they were later corroborated by other sources.

When reading allegedly factual statements, the reader should always be looking for the source documentation for these statements. A writer's opinion or interpretation may be valuable but it should always be made clear which is who.

Examples of the first category are those who worked on German saucer projects:

Among these is Rudolf Schriever. Schriever was involved in a German saucers project which sometimes bears his name. As a source of information, he wrote an article on German saucers for the very respected Der Spiegel magazine (1).

Likewise, Joseph Andreas Epp was a self-admitted consultant for both the Schriever-Habermohl project at Prag and the Miethe project in Dresden and Breslau. Mr. Epp wrote to me personally (2) and has written several articles and a book about German saucers before he died in 1997 (3).

An example of a witness who had prior knowledge of German saucers would be Georg Klein. Klein was an engineer, an eyewitness to a saucer lift-off on February 14, 1945. He was also Special Commissioner in the Ministry of Arms Production who oversaw both the Schriever-Habermohl and Miethe-Belluzzo projects for Albert Speer. Mr. Klein has written some newspaper articles about these facts such as his article in Welt am Stonntag, titled "Erste "Flugscheibe" flog 1945 in Prag" (The First Flying Disc flew in Prag in 1945)(4) . Other newspaper references of Mr. Klein will be mentioned. He has also written under the pen-name of Georg Sautier.

Another example would be the unnamed eyewitness provided by researcher Horst Schuppmann and first reported in Karl-Heinz Zunneck's book Geheimtechnoloaien. Wunderwaffen Und Irdischen Facetten Des UFO-Phaenomens (Secret Technology, Wonder-weapons and the Terrestrial Facts of the UFO Phenomenon). In this report the informant relates a wartime experience in which he witnessed several small flying saucers in a hangar (5).

George Lusar is an example of a source falling under category three. Lusar worked for the German Patent Office during World War Two. He saw many secret patents as they came into his office. After the War he wrote a book and some articles concerning this technology which was taken by the Allies (6).

Likewise, Italian engineer Renato Vesco worked with Germans while at a secret division of Fiat housed in an underground facility on Lake Garda, right in the middle of the proposed Alpenfestung. After the war, Vesco also researched British Intelligence data. This data was volumnous. Of course, Vesco knew what to look for based upon what he had learned while working in a secret Axis underground facility. Vesco is an example of category three and the next one, category four.

Category four involves intelligence information obtained from governmental sources. This information mostly comes from the very entities who are trying to suppress this information. It should always be suspect. It should be used only to verify information obtained from higher sources (categories 1 through 3) or from governmental sources of another government. For instance, information concerning flying objects which Renato Vesco called "Fireballs" was verified using information obtained from the U.S. government under laws forcing it to divulge some types of information (Freedom Of Information Act) (7).

Category five would include, for instance, Callum Coats whom spent three years with mathematician and physicist, Walter Schauberger, son of Viktor Schauberger. Mr. Coats consequently learned a great deal of information concerning the ideas of Viktor Schauberger. Mr. Coats is a scientist and architect. Coats wrote Living Energies about the ideas of Schauberger and his saucer models (8).

In the same category we find Michael X. Barton, who, through a translator, Carl F. Mayer, received information from an informant in German, Hermann Klaas, who claimed to have actually been involved with some of the German saucer projects. Klaas' peripheral knowledge (category three) also seems to have extended into other aspects of secret German research and technology. Barton wrote one of the earliest books on this topic, The German Saucer Story in 1968 (9).

One unique source is Wilhelm Landig. Landig wrote three novels dealing with the Second World War. Following the title of each novel, Landig tells the reader that this is a "novel based on realities". The reader is given to understand that the technology described was based on hard fact. Landig's works contain more than cold facts, however. Landig deals with a large variety of topics in his books. Sometimes facts or opinions are stated or "stories behind the story" are told. He writes, unashamedly, from the National Socialist perspective. Landig was obviously a Nazi and an intellectual insider. His history always remained unclear, at least to this writer, until his recent death. Because of his unclear background and the fact that he wrote in novel form, there has been a reluctance to ascribe full creditability to the statements he makes regarding the technology of the Third Reich.

This all changed in 1999 as a result of research done by Margret Chatwin with an organization called "Informations diesnst gegen Rechtsextremismus" (Information service against the extreme right) (10). Coming in from this perspective, they, certainly, would not be accused of aggrandizing Landig's career. Some details of Landig's biography are now filled in. In that article we learn that Landig, an Austrian, took part in the unsuccessful Vienna Putsch of 1934. Thereafter, he fled to Germany and was inducted into the SD, the SS and the Waffen SS. There he rose to the rank of "Oberschafuehrer". Eventually, Landig was detailed to oversee government security concerns and given a position in the Reichs Security Department. Landig, in this position, was assigned to cover the security for the development of "UFOs" (11). It turns out that Landig was not only a source but a great source concerning the development of German saucers.

Returning to unnamed sources, they should never be given the weight as named sources are given. Many times writers use unnamed sources to advance a radically new and fantastic hypothesis in the UFO world. This type of source may sound convincing, given the "secret" nature of the message, but they should only be accepted if they yield new information which can be verified independently. This goes double for unnamed government sources. Government has a history of manipulation of information concerning UFOs and UFO origin theories. One of the most famous was the Majestic 12 or MJ 12 affair which was based on unnamed government sources. This house of card finally fell apart but the real issue before us is why this house of cards, the MJ-12 affair, was ever allowed so much attention in the first place.

Government information should, therefore, never be used as the primary basis for a UFO hypothesis. It should only be used to verify a hypothesis developed, ideally, from multiple, independent sources. Concerning German saucers,this means that information or ideas from German sources might be checked using U.S. or British governmental archives, but not the reverse. Similar assertions given by official records of two different countries is notable. If both United States and British or German governmental sources agree upon something, then something might be said of the assertion. Of course there are those that say this only points to a conspiracy between the two governments to conceal a deeper truth. This may be true in some cases. These are all really judgment calls which the reader will have to make for himself, in the end.

Regarding individual sources cited, an effort will be made to describe the type of evidence each cited reference uses when that information is available.

CHAPTER TWO

Reliable Sources

Sources and References

1. Der Spiegel, March 30, 1959, Article and interview of Rudolf Schriever
2. Epp, Joseph Andreas, telephone communication and personal letters
3. Epp, Joseph Andreas, 1994, Die Realitaet der Flugscheiben Ein Leben fuer eine Idee, EFODON e. V., c/o Gernot L. Geise, Zoepfstrasse 8, D-82405 Wessobrunn, Germany
4. Klein, Georg, in Welt Am Sontag, 4/26/53, "Erste Flugscheibe Flog 1945 in Prag
5. Zunneck, Karl-Heinz, 1998, pages 120-122
6. Lusar, Rudolf, 1960, German Secret Weapons Of The Second World War, Neville Spearman, London
7. Headquarters, United States Strategic Air Forces In Europe,

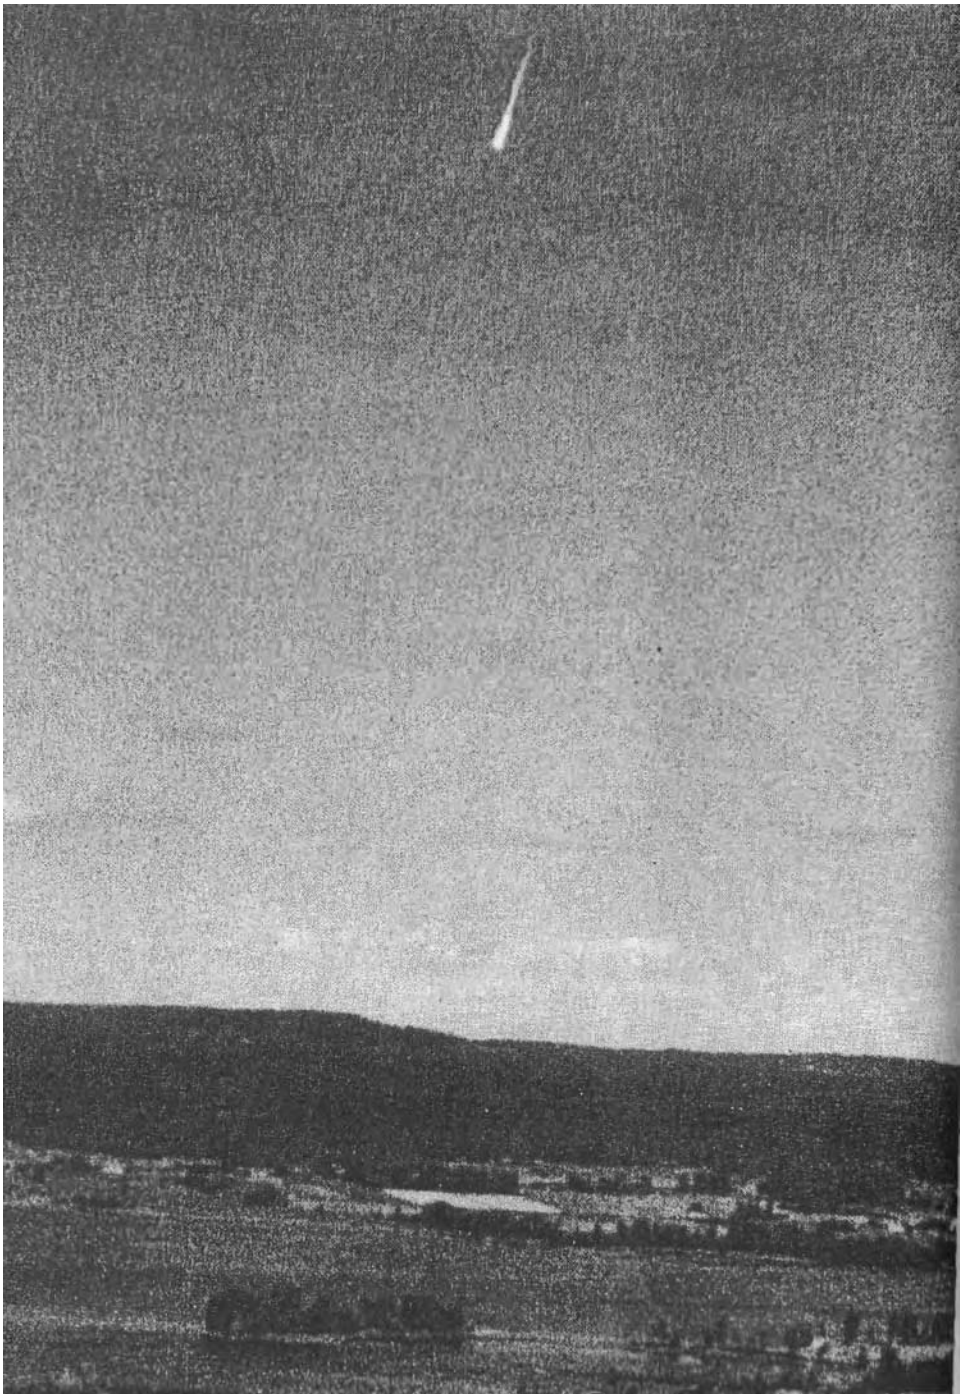
Office Of The Director Of Intelligence, 1944, report titled: "An Evaluation Of German Capabilities In 1945"

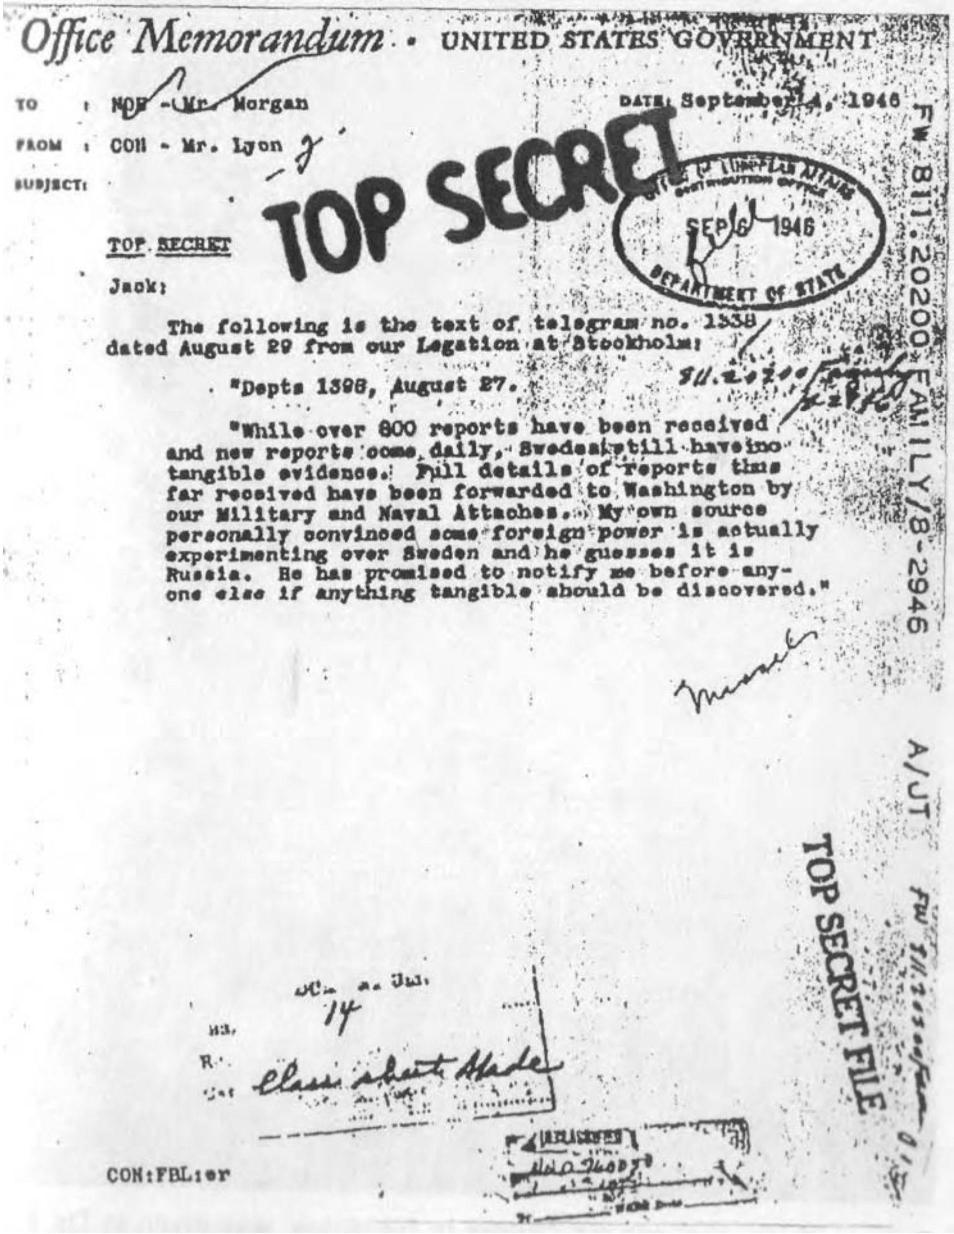
8. Coats, Callum, 1996, Living Energies. National Book Network, 4720 Boston Way, Lanham, MD. 20706

9. Barton, Michael X., 1968, The German Saucer Story. Futura Press, 5949 Gregory Ave., Los Angeles, CA. 90038

10. Chatwin, Margret, 1999, page 1, Ahnenerbe, Ufos, Neonazis: Wilhelm Landig, Informationsdienst gegen Rechtsextremismus, http://www.idgr.de/texte-1/esoterik/landig/landig. html

11. ibid





Office Memorandum • UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

TO : NOE - Mr. Morgan

DATE: September 4, 1946

FROM : CON - Mr. Lyon

SUBJECT:

TOP SECRET

TOP SECRET

DEPARTMENT OF STATE SEP 6 1946

Jack:

The following is the text of telegram no. 1338 dated August 29 from our Legation at Stockholm:

"Depts 1398, August 27.

"While over 800 reports have been received and new reports come daily, Swedes still have no tangible evidence. Full details of reports thus far received have been forwarded to Washington by our Military and Naval Attaches. My own source personally convinced some foreign power is actually experimenting over Sweden and he guesses it is Russia. He has promised to notify me before anyone else if anything tangible should be discovered."

FW 811.20200 FAMILY/8-2946

A/JT

TOP SECRET FILE

14

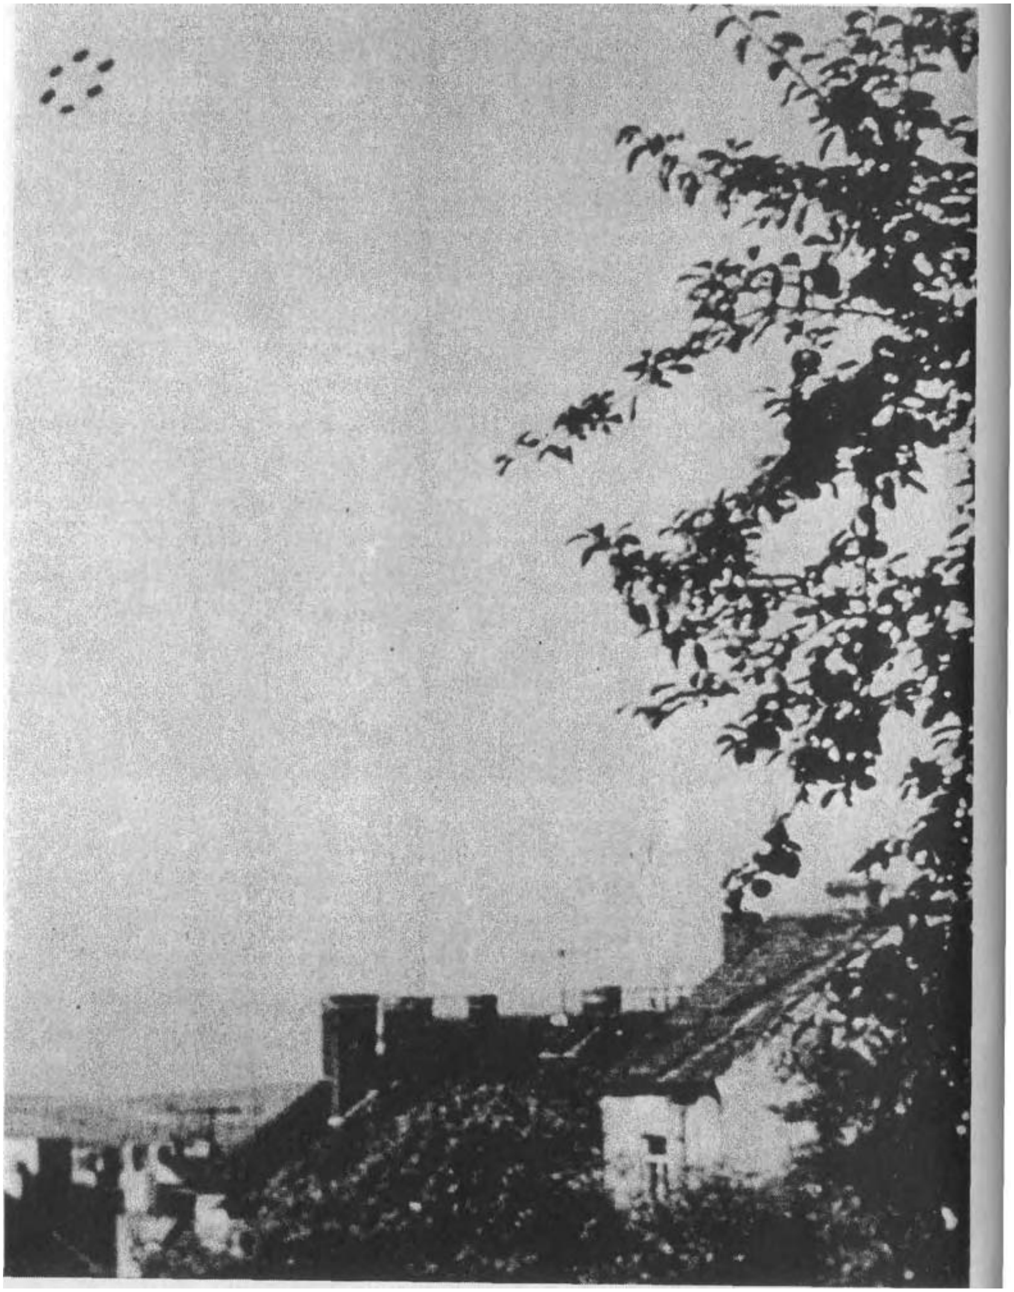
Class. sheet Made

DECLASSIFIED

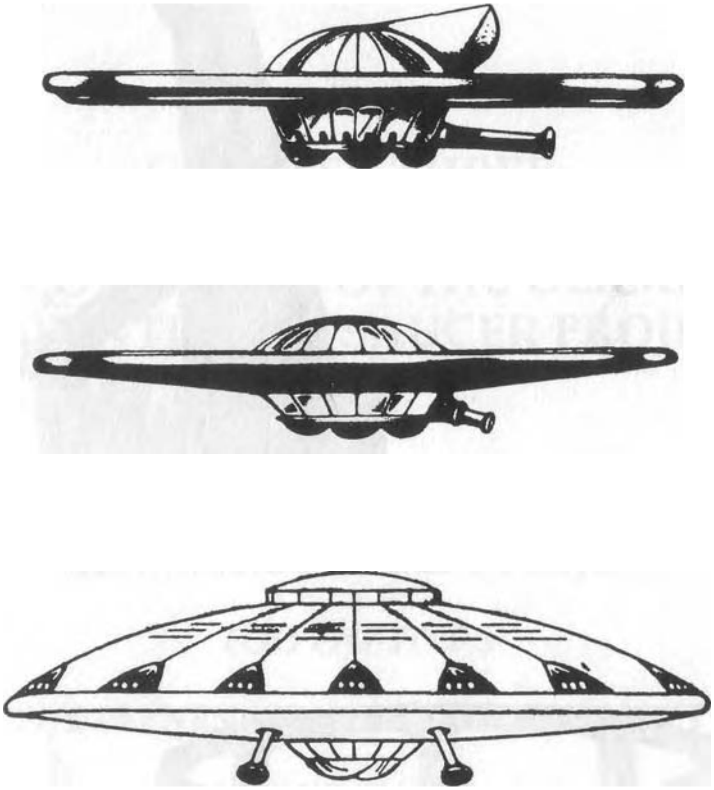
NND 760057

CON:FBL:er

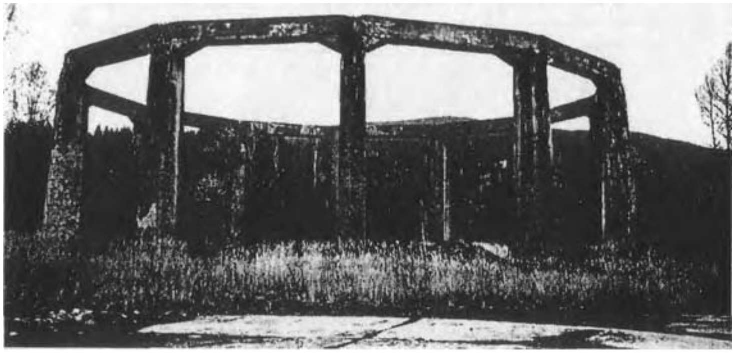
A September, 1946 Top Secret Memorandum on Ghost Rockets.



The above photo, showing six saucers in formation, was given to Dr. J. Allen Hynek in the early 1950s by the director of the Ondrejov Observatory in Czechoslovakia. No details of the sighting are available, but the photo is thought to have been taken near Prague, perhaps during WWII.



Above: Drawings of the Project Saucer craft designed in 1941 by Rudolf Schriever, a Luftwaffe aeronautical engineer, and his three colleagues, Habermohl, Miethe and Bellonzo. The first prototype was flown in June 1942 and larger versions were apparently designed and manufactured at the BMW factory near Prague, Czech Republic.



Above: The circular "Mucholapka" building in Poland. According to Polish Military Historian Igor Witkowski it was used for testing saucer-type craft.

CHAPTER THREE:

AN OVERVIEW OF THE GERMAN CONVENTIONAL SAUCER PROJECTS

THE SCHREIVER-HABERMOHL PROJECT(S)

THE MIETHE-BELLUZZO PROJECT

FOO FIGHTERS

THE PEENEMUENDE SAUCER PROJECT

CHAPTER SUMMARY

CHAPTER THREE

An Overview of the German Conventional Saucer Projects

In this section we will progress from saucer projects with are absolutely factual and of which detail is known and proceed to projects which are less known.

Several types of flying craft we would call flying saucers were built by the Germans during the Second World War. The exact number is still open for debate but it certainly must vary from between three to seven or possibly eight different types. These different types do not mean experimental models or variants of which there were many. What is meant here is that there were very different lines of flying machines being built in wartime Germany at different places by different groups of people. Since more than one saucer-type may have been produced by a single group, we will review this data group by group. We will progress from saucer projects which are factually better known and which deal in conventional propulsion methods and then move to lesser known projects which deal in more exotic propulsion methods which are less well documented and so more controversial.

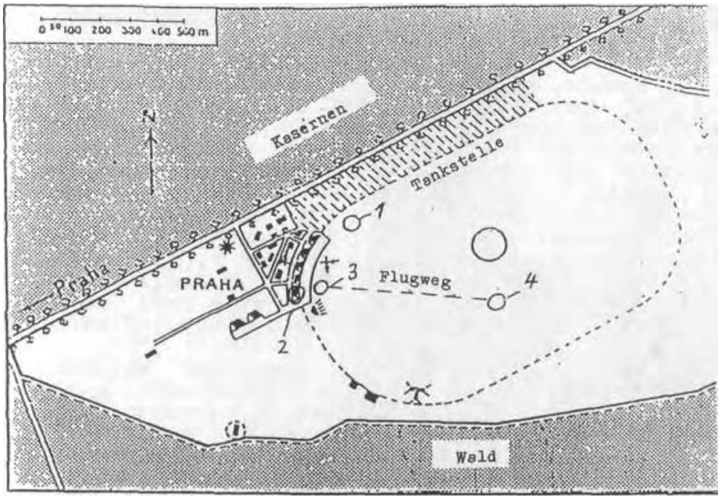
The Schriever-Habermohl Project(s)

The best known of these projects is usually referred to as the Schriever-Habermohl project although it is by no means clear that these were the individuals in charge of the project. Rudolf Schriever was an engineer and test pilot. Less is known about Otto Habermohl but certainly he was an engineer. This project was centered in Prag, at the Prag-Gbell airport (l)(2). Actual construction work began somewhere between 1941 and 1943 (3)(4). This was originally a Luftwaffe project which received technical assistance from the Skoda Works at Prag and at a Skoda division at Letov (5) and perhaps elsewhere (6). Other firms participating in the project according to Epp were the Junkers firm at Oscheben and Bemburg, the Wilhelm Gustloff firm at Weimar and the Kieler Leichtbau at Neubrandenburg (7). This project started as a project of the Luftwaffe, sponsored by second-in-command, Ernst Udet. It then fell under the control of Speer's Armament Ministry at which time it was administered by engineer Georg Klein. Finally, probably sometime in 1944, this project came under the control of the SS, specifically under the purview of General Hans Kammler (8).

According to his own words, Georg Klein saw this device fly on February 14, 1945 (9). This may have been the first official flight, but it was not the first flight made by this device. According to one witness, a saucer flight occurred as early as August or September of 1943 at this facility. The eyewitness was in flight-training at the Prag-Gbell facility when he saw a short test flight of such a device. He states that the saucer was 5 to 6 meters in diameter (about 15 to 18 feet in diameter) and about as tall as a man, with an outer border of 30-40 centimeters. It was "aluminum" in color and rested on four thin, long legs. The flight distance observed was about 300 meters at low level of one meter in altitude. The witness was 200 meters from the event and one of many students there at the time (10).

Joseph Andreas Epp, an engineer who served as a consultant to both the Schriever-Habermohl and the Miethe-Belluzzo projects, states that fifteen prototypes were built in all (11) (12). The final device associated with Schriever-Habermohl is described by engineer Rudolf Lusar who worked in the German Patent Office, as a central cockpit surrounded by rotating adjustable wing-vanes forming a circle. The vanes were held together by a band at the outer edge of the wheel-like device. The pitch of the vanes could be adjusted so that during take off more lift was generated by increasing their angle from a more horizontal setting. In level flight the angle would be adjusted to a smaller angle. This is similar to the way helicopter rotors operate. The wing-vanes were to be set in rotation by small rockets placed around the rim like a pinwheel. Once rotational speed was sufficient, lift-off was achieved. After the craft had risen to some height the horizontal jets or rockets were ignited and the small rockets shut off (13). After this the wing-blades would be allowed to

The Airport at Prag-Gbell



0 50 100 200 300 400 500 m
N Kasernen
Tankstelle
Praha
PRAHA
1
2
3 Flugweg
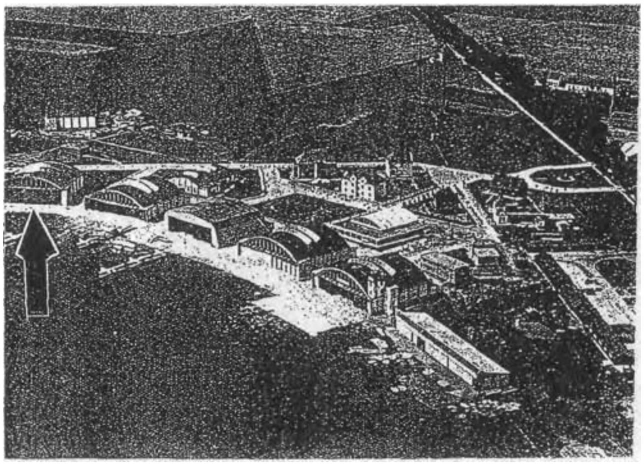
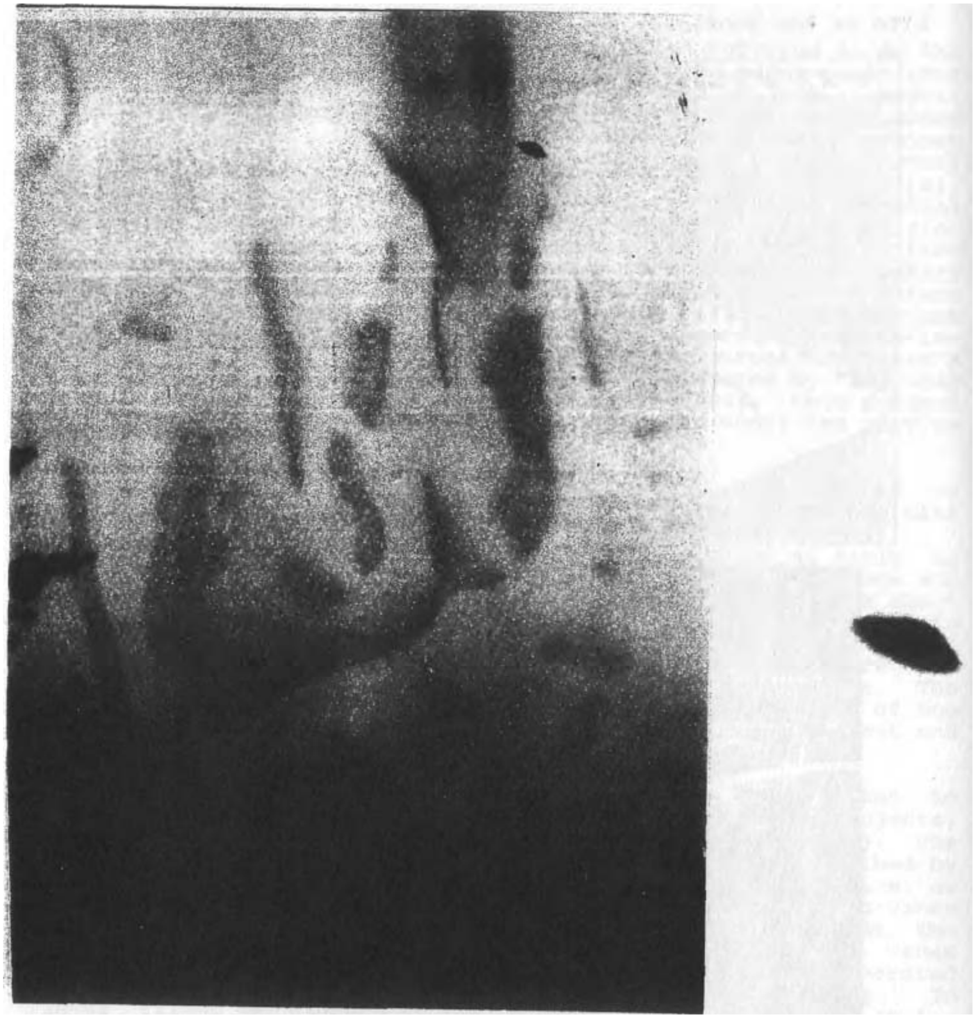
4
Wald



Site of the Schriever and Habermohl Flying Saucer Projects

In the top diagram the hanger which was the site of the research is marked as number 2. The same hanger is indicated in the picture below with an arrow.

The Habermohl Saucer In Flight



To the left is the closest shot of the two taken by Joseph Andreas Epp as he drove to the Prag airport in 1944. To the right is a blow up (400 times) of that same saucer. Epp remembers a date of November, 1944 but the foliage on the trees argues for a date earlier in the year.

rotate freely as the saucer moved forward as in an autogyrocopter. In all probability, the wing-blades speed, and so their lifting value, could also be increased by directing the adjustable horizontal jets slightly upwards to engage the blades, thus spinning them faster at the digression of the pilot.

Rapid horizontal flight was possible with these jet or rocket engines. Probable candidates were the Junkers Jumo 004 jet engines such as were used on the famous German jet fighter, the Messerschmitt 262. A possible substitute would have been the somewhat less powerful BMW 003 engines. The rocket engine would have been the Walter HWK109 which powered the Messerschmitt 163 rocket interceptor (14). If all had been plentiful, the Junkers Jumo 004 probably would have been the first choice. Epp reports Jumo 211/b engines were used (15). Klaas reports the Argus pulse jet (Schmidt-duct), used on the V-l, was also considered (16). All of these types of engines were difficult to obtain at the time because they were needed for high priority fighters and bombers, the V-l and the rocket interceptor aircraft.

Joseph Andreas Epp reports in his book Die Realitaet der Flugscheiben (The Reality of the Flying Discs) that an official test flight occurred in February of 1945. Epp managed to take two still pictures of the saucer in flight which appear in his book and are reproduced here. There is some confusion about the date of these pictures. In the video film "UFOs Secrets of the 3rd Reich", Epp states these pictures were taken in the Fall of 1944. In his book the date is given as the official date of February 14, 1945. In personal correspondence to me of December, 30, 1991, he indicated the date of the pictures as August, 1944. In that correspondence he further revealed that the official flight had been February 14, 1945 but an earlier lift-off had taken place in August of 1944. The pictures show a small disc-like object in the distance at some altitude posed above a landscape. The saucer is at too great a distance and altitude to show any mechanical detail. As Klaus-Peter Rothkugel points out, the foliage on the trees indicates the August date as being the most accurate.

Very high performance flight characteristics are attributed to this design. Georg Klein says it climbed to 12,400 meters (over 37,000 feet) in three minutes (17) and attaining a speed around that of the sound barrier (18). Epp says that it achieved a speed of Mach 1 (about 1200 kilometers per hour or about 750 miles per hour) (19). From his discussion, it appears that Epp is describing the unofficial lift-off in August, 1944 at this point. He goes on to say that on the next night, the sound barrier was broken in manned flight but that the pilot was frightened by the vibrations encountered at that time (20). On the official test flight, Epp reports a top speed of 2200 kilometers per hour (21). Lusar reports a top speed of 2000 kilometers per hour (22). Many other writers cite the same or similar top speed. There is no doubt of two facts. The first is that these are supersonic speeds which are being discussed.

Second, it is a manned flight which is under discussion.

But at least one writer has discounted such high performance (23). It is argued that the large frontal area of one of the possible designs in question makes Mach 2 flight impossible. The argument seems to be that given the possible power plants the atmospheric resistance caused by this frontal area would slow the craft to a point below the figures stated earlier.

Some new information has come to light regarding the propulsion system which supports the original assessment. Although actual construction had not started, wind-tunnel and design studies confirmed the feasibility of building a research aircraft which was designated Project 8-346. This aircraft was not a saucer but a modern looking swept-back wing design. According this post-war Allied intelligence report, the Germans designed the 8-346 to fly in the range of 2000 kilometers per hour to Mach 2. (24). Interestingly enough, it was to use two Walther HWK109 rocket engines. This is one of the engine configurations under consideration for the Schriever-Habermohl saucer project.

As an aside, it should be noted that there are those who will resist at any attempt to impugn the official breaking of the sound barrier by Chuck Yeager in 1947 in the Bell X-l rocket aircraft. They had better brace themselves. This record has also been challenged from another direction. This challenge was reported in February, 2001, by the Associated Press, Berlin. It seems that a certain Hans Guido Mutke claims he pushed his Messerschmitt jet fighter, the Me-262, through the sound barrier in 1945. This occurred during an emergency dive to help another German flyer during air combat. At that time he experienced vibrations and shaking of the aircraft. According to the report, a Hamburg Professor is working on a computer simulation in order to check the validity of this claim.

Returning to the topic at hand, Schriever continued to work on the project until April 15, 1945. About this time Prag was threatened by the Soviet Army. The Czech technicians working on this project were reported to have gone amuck, looting the facility as the Russians approached. The saucer prototype(s) at Prag-Gbell were pushed out onto the tarmac and burnt. Habermohl disappeared and presumably ended up in the hands of the Soviets. Schriever, according to his own statements, packed the saucer plans in the trunk of his BMW and with his family drove into Southern Germany. After cessation of hostilities Schriever worked his way north to his parents house in Bremerhaven-Lehe. There Schriever set up an inventor-workshop. On August 4, 1948 there was a break in to the workshop in which Schriever's plans and saucer model were stolen (25). Schriever was approached by agents of "foreign powers" concerning his knowledge of German saucers. He declined their offers, preferring rather menial work driving a truck for the U.S. Army (25).

Schriever is reported to have died shortly thereafter in 1953.

There is a report, however, that his death was reported prematurely and that he was identified by a witness who knew him in Bavaria in 1964 or 1965 (26). The publisher of this book, Thomas Mehner, was so kind as to send me a copy of the statement by a Bavarian woman who knew Schriever and made this claim (27). This means that there is a possibility that Schriever did do post-war work on flying saucers.

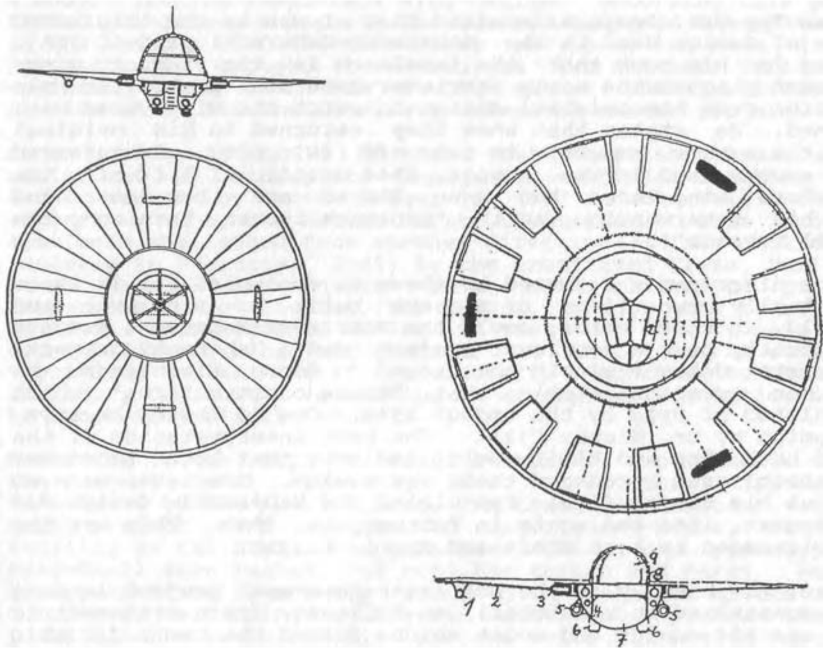
Interestingly enough, Schriever never claimed that his saucer ever flew at all! If this true, Schriever's saucer was still in the pre-flight stage at the time of the Russian advance and its ultimate destruction on the Prag-Gbell tarmac. This is in direct contradiction to the sources cited above and the photographic evidence. How can this seeming inconsistency be explained?

J. Andeas Epp has always maintained that it was he who originated the type of design used in the Schriever-Habermohl project (28). He states in his book that the imbalance in the ring of wing-vanes which plagued the early Schriever-Habermohl prototypes was a deviation from his original design in which the wing-vanes were lengthened. He states that when they returned to his original design, the saucer was able to take off (29) (30). He referred to the saucer used in the August, 1944 unofficial lift-off, the saucer whose wing-vanes had been altered and then corrected through his intervention, as the "Habermohlischen Version", the Habermohl version (31).

Could the discrepancy referred to above be accounted for if there were actually two lines of saucers built by Schriever and Habermohl? In other words, could the Schriever-Habermohl project have actually been a Schriever project and a Habermohl project, two separate designs within the team? Georg Klein seems to answer this question, stating that "three constructions" which were finished at Prag by the end of 1944. One of these, he says, was a design by Dr. Miethe (32). The best interpretation of the words of both Epp and Klein would indicate that both Schriever and Habermohl each produced their own design. Schriever made no claim that his design flew. Epp claims the Habermohl design did fly in August, 1944 and again in February 14, 1945. This was the saucer witnessed by both Klein and Epp in flight.

Therefore, the history of the Schriever-Habermohl project in Prag can be summarized in a nutshell as follows: Epp's statement is that it was his design and model which formed the basis for this project. This model was given to General Erst Udet which was then forwarded to Dr. Walter Dornberger at Peenemuende. Dr. Dornberger tested and recommended the design (33) which was confirmed by Dornberger to Epp after the war (34). A facility was set up in Prag for further development and the Schriever-Habermohl team was assigned to work on it there. At first this project was under the auspices of Hermann Goering and the Luftwaffe (35). Sometime later the Speer Ministry took over the running of this project with chief engineer Georg Klein in charge (36). Finally, the project was usurped by the SS in 1944, along with other saucer projects, and fell under the purview of Dr. Hans Kammler (37). Schriever altered the length of the wing-vanes from their original design. This alteration caused the instability. Schriever was still trying to work out this problem in his version of the saucer as the Russians overran Prag. Haberrmohl, according to Epp, went back to his original specifications, with two or three successful flights for his version.

A Comparison of the Schriever and Habermohl Designs



On the left is the Schriever design while on the right is the Habermohl design. Please note the differing dimensions of the vane blades. This difference caused instability in the Schriever design. Drawings adapted from the work of Klaus-Peter Rothkugel.

While speaking of flight success, two more pieces of important evidence exists which were supplied by Andreas Epp. One comes in the form of a statement by a German test pilot, Otto Lange, given years after the war to Andreas Epp. In that statement, signed by Lange, Epp is credited with the idea behind the invention of the flying saucer and states that none other than Dr. Walter Dornberger had a hand in its development. He also makes the astonishing claim that he, personally, test flew this flying saucer for 500 kilometers in the course of testing (38) (39).

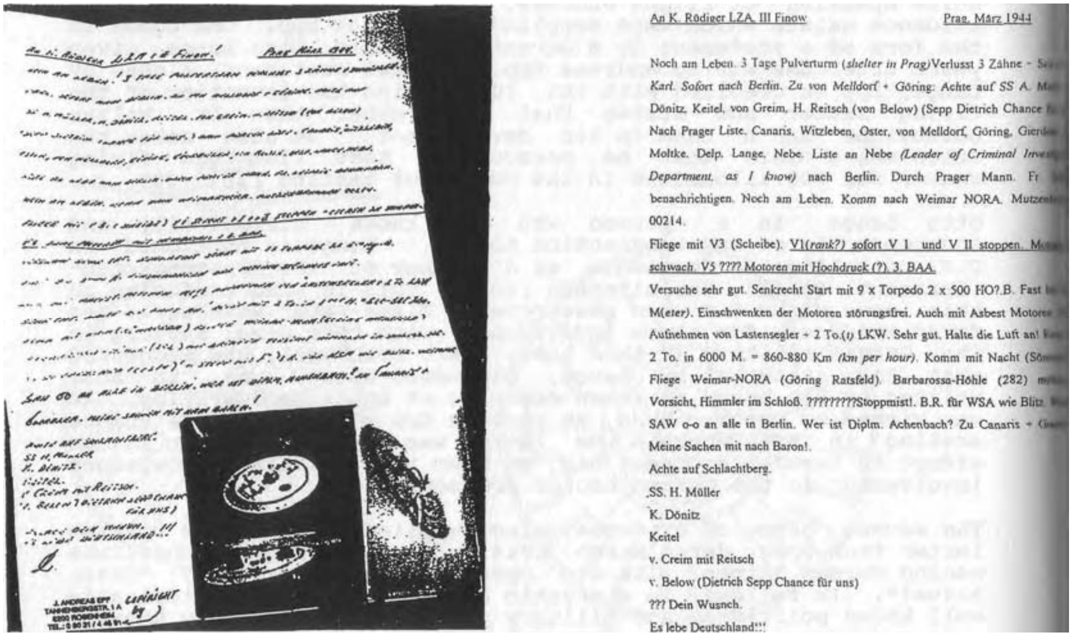
otto Lange is a person who is known historically and independently of any connection to Epp. Lange is mentioned in U.S. intelligence documents as a member of the "Rustungsstab" (Armament Staff), for aircraft (40). This is some confusion on this issue since a German researcher, Klaus-Peter Rothkugel, has found evidence for three individuals with this name serving in the German military at this time. Mr. Rothkugel, has suggested that the statement by Lange, discussed above, was, in fact, written by Epp based on known examples of Epp's hand writing. It was signed by another hand, so perhaps Epp and Lange had a chance meeting in 1965 wherein the letter was drafted by Epp in an effort to further document his, at that time, little-acknowledged involvement in the German saucer projects.

The second piece of evidence, also supplied by Epp, is a wartime Letter from Prag, dated March, 1944. It speaks to the conditions behind German lines with its opening greeting, simply "Still Alive!". It follows in a cryptic style describing historically well known political and military people who apparently knew or had something to do with the saucer project at Prag. The letter also describes some early prototype saucer models and their shortcomings. Interestingly enough figures on thrust are given (40) (41).

Three pictures appear at the bottom of the letter. One definitely shows a saucer in flight. There is no mention of these pictures in the text of the letter. Because they are not referenced and from their placement on the face of the letter it is possible that these pictures may have been a later addition to that letter. There are some other reasons why these pictures may not have been connected to the Schriever-Habermohl project or the Miethe-Belluzzo project. We shall return to these pictures at a later time.

An interesting fact elucidated by Epp is that the senior experts

Cryptic And Enigmatic Letter Describes Flying Disc Development



An K. Rüdiger LZA. III Finow Prag, März 1944

Noch am Leben. 3 Tage Pulverturm (*shelter in Prag)*Verlusst 3 Zähne - Karl. Sofort nach Berlin. Zu von Melldorf + Göring: Achte auf SS A.
Dönitz, Keitel, von Greim, H. Reitsch (von Below) (Sepp Dietrich Chance
Nach Prager Liste. Canaris, Witzleben, Oster, von Melldorf, Göring, Moltke. Delp. Lange. Nebe. Liste an Nebe (Leader of Criminal Department, as I know) nach Berlin. Durch Prager Mann. Fr benachrichtigen. Noch am Leben. Komm nach Weimar NORA.
00214.
Fliege mit V3 (Scheibe). V1(rank?) sofort V 1 und V II stoppen.
schwach. V5 ???? Motoren mit Hochdruck (?). 3. BAA.
Versuche sehr gut. Senkrecht Start mit 9 x Torpedo 2 x 500 HO?.B. Fast
M(eter). Einschwenken der Motoren störungsfrei. Auch mit Asbest Aufnehmen von Lastensegler + 2 To.(t) LKW. Sehr gut. Halte die Luft an!
2 To. in 6000 M. = 860-880 Km (km per hour). Komm mit Nacht
Fliege Weimar-NORA (Göring Ratsfeld). Barbarossa-Höhle (282)
Vorsicht, Himmler im Schloß. ?????????Stoppmist!. B.R. für WSA wie SAW o-o an alle in Berlin. Wer ist Diplm. Achenbach? Zu Canaris +
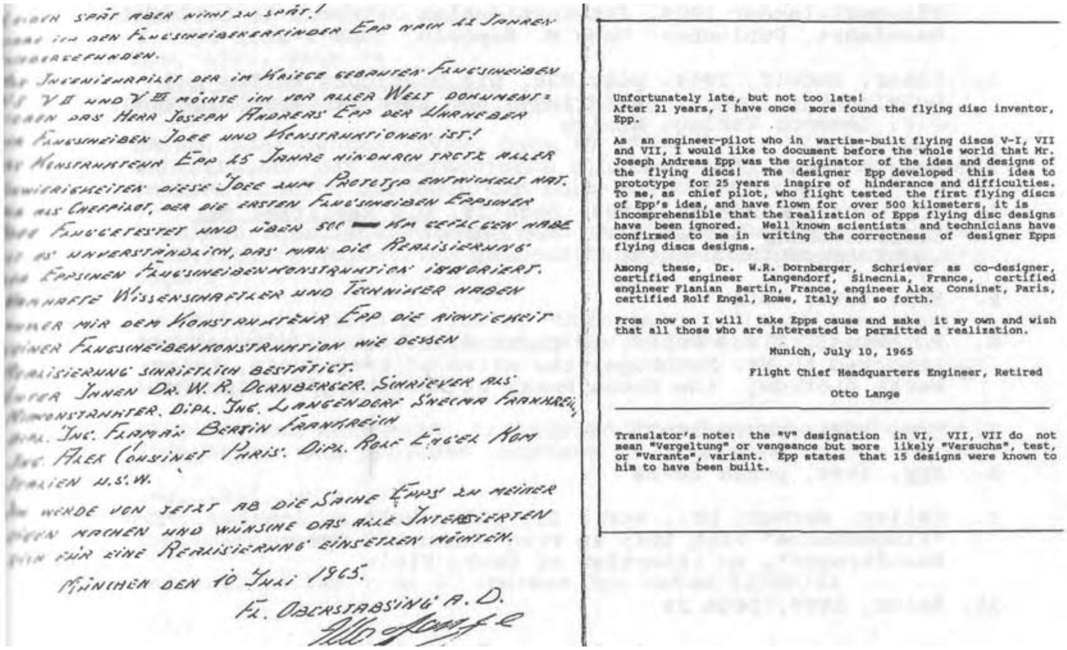
Meine Sachen mit nach Baron!.
Achte auf Schlachtberg.
SS. H. Müller
K. Dönitz
Keitel
v. Creim mit Reitsch
v. Below (Dietrich Sepp Chance für uns)
??? Dein Wusnch.
Es lebe Deutschland!!!

On the left is the original letter sent to the author by Andreas Epp. On the right is a typed version done by Kadmon. Notes in English are directed to the author. The letter starts without any formal or Informal greeting, stating only "Still alive". Flying disc research "sehr gut" with vertical take-off at speeds of 860-880 per hour (525-550 milesper hour).



LEIDER SPÄT ABER NICHT ZU SPÄT!
HABE ICH DEN FLUGSCHEIBENERFINDER EPP NACH 21 JAHREN
WIEDERGEFUNDEN.
ALS INGENIEURPILOT DER IM KRIEGE GEBAUTEN FLUGSCHEIBEN
V I V II UND V III MÖCHTE ICH VOR ALLER WELT DOKUMENT-
IEREN DAS HERR JOSEPH ANDREAS EPP DER URHEBER
DER FLUGSCHEIBEN IDEE UND KONSTRUKTIONEN IST!
DER KONSTRUKTEUR EPP 25 JAHRE HINDURCH TROTZ ALLER
SCHWIERIGKEITEN DIESE IDEE ZUM PROTOTYP ENTWICKELT HAT.
MIR ALS CHEFPILOT, DER DIE ERSTEN FLUGSCHEIBEN EPPSCHER
IDEE FLUGGETESTET UND ÜBER 500 [redacted] KM GEFLOGEN HABE
IST ES UNVERSTÄNDLICH, DAS MAN DIE REALISIERUNG
DER EPPSCHEN FLUGSCHEIBENKONSTRUKTION IGNORIERT.
NAMHAFTE WISSENSCHAFTLER UND TECHNIKER HABEN
IMMER MIR DEM KONSTRUKTEUR EPP DIE RICHTIGKEIT
SEINER FLUGSCHEIBENKONSTRUKTION WIE DESSEN
REALISIERUNG SCHRIFTLICH BESTÄTIGT.
UNTER IHNEN DR. W. R. DORNBERGER. SCHRIEVER ALS
MITKONSTRUKTEUR. DIPL. ING. LANGENDORF SNECMA FRANKREICH, DIPL. ING. FLAMAN BERTIN FRANKREICH
ING. ALEX CONSINET PARIS. DIPL. ROLF ENGEL ROM
ITALIEN U.S.W.

ICH WERDE VON JETZT AB DIE SACHE EPPS ZU MEINER
EIGEN MACHEN UND WÜNSCHE DAS ALLE INTERESSIERTEN
SICH FÜR EINE REALISIERUNG EINSETZEN MÖCHTEN.

MÜNCHEN DEN 10 JULI 1965.

FL. OBERSTABSING. A. D.

Unfortunately late, but not too late!
After 21 years, I have once more found the flying disc inventor, Epp.

As an engineer-pilot who in wartime-built flying discs V-I, VII and VII, I would like to document before the whole world that Mr. Joseph Andreas Epp was the originator of the idea and designs of the flying discs! The designer Epp developed this idea to prototype for 25 years inspire of hinderance and difficulties. To me, as chief pilot, who flight tested the first flying discs of Epp's idea, and have flown for over 500 kilometers, it is incomprehensible that the realization of Epps flying disc designs have been ignored. Well known scientists and technicians have confirmed to me in writing the correctness of designer Epps flying discs designs.

Among these, Dr. W.R. Dornberger, Schriever as co-designer, certified engineer Langendorf, Sinecnia, France, certified engineer Flanian Bertin, France, engineer Alex Consinet, Paris, certified Rolf Engel, Rome, Italy and so forth.

From now on I will take Epps cause and make it my own and wish that all those who are interested be permitted a realization.

Munich, July 10, 1965

Flight Chief Headquarters Engineer, Retired

Otto Lange

Translator's note: the "V" designation in VI, VII, VII do not mean "Vergeltung" or vengeance but more likely "Versuchs", test, or "Varante", variant. Epp states that 15 designs were known to him to have been built.

Original and author's translation of letter signed by Lange acknowledging Epp's role in flying disc history and advisors for both the Schriever-Habermohl project and the next project to be discussed, the Miethe-Belluzzo project, were exactly the same individuals (43).

The Schriever-Habermohl Project(s)

Sources and References

1. Meier, Hans Justus, 1999, page 24, "Zum Thema "Fliegende Untertassen" Der Habermohlsche Flugkreisel", reprinted in Fliegerkalender 1999, Internationales Jahrbuch de Luft-und Raumfahrt, Publisher: Hans M. Namislo, ISBN 3-8132-0553-3
2. Lusar, Rudolf, 1964, page 220, Die Deutschen Waffen und Geheimwaffen des 2. Weltkrieges und ihre Weiterentwicklung, J.F. Lemanns Verlag, Munich
3. Lusar, 1964, ibid
4. Epp, Joseph Andreas, 1994, page 28, Die Realitaet der Flugscheiben, Efodon e.V., c/o Gernot L. Geise, Zoepfstrasse 8, D-82495
5. Epp, 1994, ibid
6. Rothkugel, Klaus-Peter, in personal letters a witness has reported to Mr. Rothkugel the sites of Prag-Rusin, Letov-Werke (Lettow), the Skoda Works at Pressburg/Trentschin
7. Epp, 1994, pages 30-31
8. Epp, 1994, pages 28-33
9. Keller, Werner, Dr., April 25, 1953, Welt am Sonntag, "Erste "Flugscheibe" flog 1945 in Prag enthuellt Speers Beauftrager", an interview of Georg Klein
10. Meier, 1999, page 23
11. Personal letter from J. Andreas Epp dated 12/30/91
12. Epp, 1994, page 27, 30
13. Lusar, 1964, 220
14. Holberg, Jan, 8/20/54, page 4, "UFOs gibt es nicht! Wohl aber: Flugscheiben am laufenden Band!" Das Neue Zeitalter
15. Epp, 1994, page 31
16. Barton, Michael X., 1968, page 38, The German Saucer Story, Futura Press, Los Angeles (based upon Hermann Klaas)
17. Zwicky, Viktor, September 19, 1954, page 4, Tages-Anzeiger

fuer Stadt und Kanton Zuerich, "Das Raetsel der Fliegenden Teller Ein Interview mit Oberingenieur Georg Klein, der unseren Lesern Ursprung und Konstruktion dieser Flugkoerper erklaert"

18. Klein, Georg, October 16, 1954, page 5, "Die Fliegenden Teller", Tages-Anzeiger fuer Stadt und Kanton Zuerich

19. Epp, 1994, page 31

20. ibid

21. Epp, 1994, page 34

22. Lusar, 1964, page 220

23. Meier, Hans Justus, 1999, page 10, "Zum Thema "Fleigende Untertassen" Der Habermohlsche Flugkreisel", Fllegerkalender Internationales Jahrbuch der Luft-und Raumfahrt

24. Combined Intelligence Committee Evaluation Reports, Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee, Evaluation Report 149, page 8

25. Der Spiegel, March 30, 1959, "Untertassen Sie fliegen aber doch" Article about and interview of Rudolf Schriever

26. Zunneck, 1998, page 119

27. This written statement, translated from Bavarian dialect to High German was provided courtesy of publisher Thomas Mehner

28. Epp, 1994, page 30

29. Epp, 1994, page 31

30. Personal letter from J. Andreas Epp dated 12/30/91

31. ibid

32. Klein, Georg, October 16, 1954, page 5, "Die "Fliegenden Teller", Tages-Anzeiger fuer Stadt und Kanton Zuerich

33. Epp, 1994, page 26

34. ibid

35. Epp, 1994, page 27

36. Epp, 1994, page 33

17. ibid

38. Kadmon, 2000, Ahnstern IX, "Andreas Epp", Aorta c/o Petak,

Postfach 778, A-1011, Wien, Austria

39. Personal letter from Andreas Epp, dated 12/30/91

40. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Evaluation Report, Report Number 40 "Sonderausschuss"

41. Kadmon, 2000, Ahnstern IX, "Andreas Epp"

42. Personal letter from Andreas Epp, dated 12/30/91

43. Epp, 1994, page 31

The Miethe-Belluzzo Project

This saucer project may have been an outgrowth of flying wing research. It was begun in 1942, and was under the on-site nuthority of Dr. Richard Miethe, sometimes called Dr. Heinrich Richard Miethe. Not much is known about Dr. Miethe before the war. After the war Dr. Miethe is rumored to have worked on the Anglo-American saucer project at the firm of Avro Aircraft Limited of Canada. Such is stated Klein (1)/ Epp (2), Barton (3), Lusar (4), as well as a myriad of other sources. We will return to the Avro projects later.

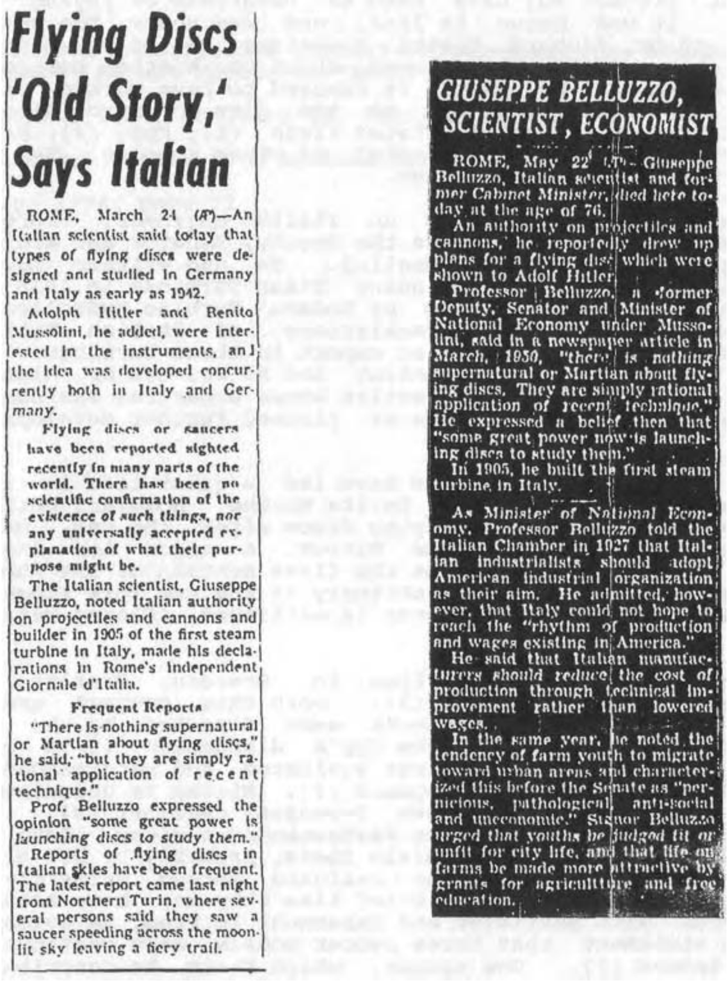
Working with Dr. Miethe was an Italian engineer, Professor Guiseppe Belluzzo. Belluzzo was the Deputy, Senator and Minister of National Economy under Mussolini. He had written several books on technical matters including Steam Turbines in 1926 and calculations and Installations of Modern Turbine Hydrolics in 1922 (names are English translations of Italian titles). Belluzzo was considered to be an expert in steam turbines. Dr. Belluzzo was not a junior scientist and he was not Dr. Miethe's assistant. He was a senior scientist whose expertise was somehow invaluable on the saucer devices or planned further developments of them.

After the war Belluzzo seems to have led a quiet life in Italy until his death on 5/22/52. Unlike Miethe, however, Belluzzo went on record about German flying discs after the war. He is quoted on the subject in The Mirror, a major Los Angeles newspaper in 1950. This may be the first mention of the subject in the American press. In his obituary in the New York Times his work on the German saucer program is mentioned. (Please refer to copies of these articles).

This team worked in facilities in, Dresden, Breslau and Letow/Prag according to Epp (5). Both this project and the Schriever and Habermohl projects were directed by the same experts and advisors (6). From Epp's discussion, it is clear that Dr. Walter Dornberger first evaluated and recommended his saucer model for further development (7). Miethe is described by Epp in translation as a "known V-weapons designer"(8). The association of both projects to Peenemuende is clear. Both were sanctioned and set up by officials there, probably by Dr. Walter Dornberger himself. Miethe and Belluzzo worked primarily in Dresden and Breslau but for a brief time they may have actually joined forces with Schriever and Habermohl in Prag, as evidenced by Klein's statement that three saucer models were destroyed on the Prag tarmac (9). One saucer, which Klein he describes as Miethe's was among these. Klein acknowledges that Peenemuende, and its nearby test facility at Stettin, retained and developed the Miethe design as an unmanned vehicle (10)(11).

Epp tells us that the Miethe-Belluzzo project was organized under exactly the same authority as the Schriever-Habermohl project and

Giuseppe Belluzzo



Flying Discs 'Old Story,' Says Italian

ROME, March 24 (AP)—An Italian scientist said today that types of flying discs were designed and studied in Germany and Italy as early as 1942.

Adolph Hitler and Benito Mussolini, he added, were interested in the instruments, and the idea was developed concurrently both in Italy and Germany.

Flying discs or saucers have been reported sighted recently in many parts of the world. There has been no scientific confirmation of the existence of such things, nor any universally accepted explanation of what their purpose might be.

The Italian scientist, Giuseppe Belluzzo, noted Italian authority on projectiles and cannons and builder in 1905 of the first steam turbine in Italy, made his declarations in Rome's independent Giornale d'Italia.

Frequent Reports

"There is nothing supernatural or Martian about flying discs," he said; "but they are simply rational application of recent technique."

Prof. Belluzzo expressed the opinion "some great power is launching discs to study them."

Reports of flying discs in Italian skies have been frequent. The latest report came last night from Northern Turin, where several persons said they saw a saucer speeding across the moonlit sky leaving a fiery trail.

GIUSEPPE BELLUZZO, SCIENTIST, ECONOMIST

ROME, May 22 (AP)—Giuseppe Belluzzo, Italian scientist and former Cabinet Minister, died here today at the age of 76.

An authority on projectiles and cannons, he reportedly drew up plans for a flying disc which were shown to Adolf Hitler.

Professor Belluzzo, a former Deputy, Senator and Minister of National Economy under Mussolini, said in a newspaper article in March, 1950, "there is nothing supernatural or Martian about flying discs. They are simply rational application of recent technique." He expressed a belief then that "some great power now is launching discs to study them."

In 1905, he built the first steam turbine in Italy.

As Minister of National Economy, Professor Belluzzo told the Italian Chamber in 1927 that Italian industrialists should adopt American industrial organization as their aim. He admitted, however, that Italy could not hope to reach the "rhythm of production and wages existing in America."

He said that Italian manufacturers should reduce the cost of production through technical improvement rather than lowered wages.

In the same year, he noted the tendency of farm youth to migrate toward urban areas and characterized this before the Senate as "pernicious, pathological, anti-social and uneconomic." Signor Belluzzo urged that youths be judged fit or unfit for city life, and that life on farms be made more attractive by grants for agriculture and free education.

On the left, a column from The Mirror, dated March 24, 1950. This is one of the earliest English references to German flying discs. On the right is Dr. Belluzzo's obituary, dated May 22, 1952 from the New York Times which again mentions German flying discs.

he further identifies the very same industrial firms which supported Schriever-Habermohl as supporting this project (12). In reality, both should be viewed as one project with different aspects.

The designs envisioned by Dr. Miethe and Professor Belluzzo were quite different from those of Schriever and Habermohl. Designs of this project consisted of a discus-shaped craft whose outer periphery did not rotate. Two designs have positively been attributed to Miethe and Belluzzo although three designs exist as part of their legacy.

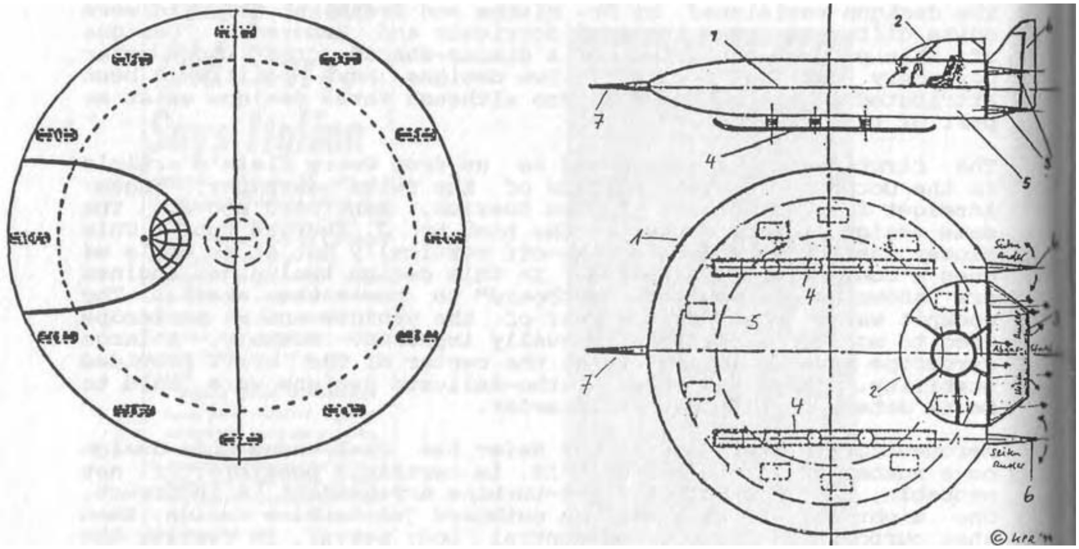
The first design is made known to us from Georg Klein's article in the October 16, 1954 edition of the Swiss newspaper, Tages-Anzeiger fuer Stadt und Kanton Zuerich, mentioned above. The same design is reproduced in the book by J. Andreas Epp. This saucer was not intended to take-off vertically but at an angle as does a conventional airplane. In this design twelve jet engines are shown to be mounted "outboard" to power the craft. The cockpit was mounted at the rear of the vehicle and a periscope used to monitor directions visually impaired. Notably, a large gyroscope mounted internally at the center of the craft provided stability. This and other Miethe-Belluzzo designs were said to be 42 meters or 138 feet in diameter.

Aeronautical writer Hans Justus Meier has challenged this design on a number of grounds (13). It is certainly possible, if not probable, that the outboard jet-turbine arrangement is incorrect, one might ask, if this was an outboard jet-turbine design, then what purpose did the bloated central body serve? In reality the twelve jets may simply have been jet nozzles of one engine. Certainly the large central body had a function, it must have housed the engine.

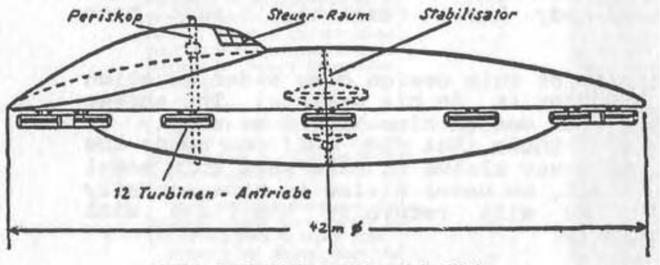
But how could the authenticity of this design come under question when Georg Klein is vouching for it in his article? The answer may be that Klein never saw this design himself and he simply is relying on the descriptions of those that did. If one reads the works of Klein carefully, he never claims to have seen this model in flight. As a matter of fact, he never claims to have actually seen this design at all. We will return to the flaws with Klein's description momentarily.

The second Miethe design seems to have originated with a 1975 German magazine article (14). This version shows a cockpit above and below the center of the craft. Four jet engines lying behind the cockpits are shown as the powerplants. No real detail is supplied in this article. This design is not ever discussed in the text which deals primarily with the Schriever-Habermohl Project. Some writers have speculated on this particular design, supplying detail (15). For now, however, no named source seems to be able to link this design with the Miethe-Belluzzo Project. Therefore, at least for the time being, we must put this design in suspense and focus on the first and next design in discussing

The Miethe-Belluzzo Disc--Design One



1
2
3
4
5
6
7
Steiu Ruder
© KPR '99



Periskop
Steuer-Raum
Stabilisator
12 Turbinen - Antriebe
42 m ø

Bild 2: Vertikalschnitt durch Flugscheibe Miethe die schematische Zeichnung ist wesentlich überhöht

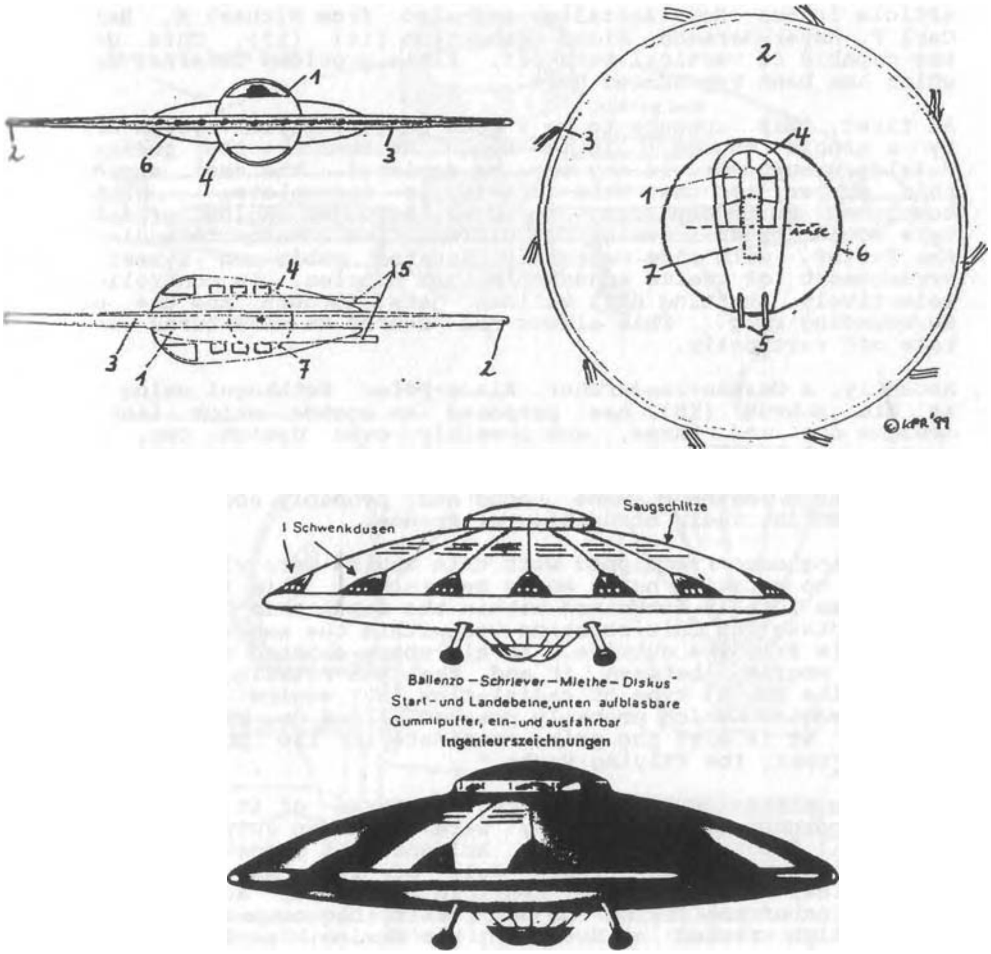
On the left is a reconstruction by Georg Klein, 10/16/54, from the Swiss newswaper Tages-Anzeiger. Note the small "Stabisator" and the outboard jet engines. On the right is Klaus-Peter Rothkugel's more probable reconstruction incorporating fins, skids, and the inner-lying Rene Leduc engine.

The Miethe-Belluzzo Disc—Designs Two And Three



1
2
3
4
5
6
7
15
Achse
©KPR'99
Saugschlitze
I Schwenkdusen
Ballenzo – Schriever – Miethe – Diskus
Start- und Landebeine, unten aufblasbare
Gummipuffer, ein- und ausfahrbar
Ingenieurszeichnungen

On the top is Miethe-Belluzzo design two. Note rotating disc (2) and stabilizing wheel (7) acting as a gyroscope. (Courtesy of Klaus-Peter Rothkugel) It is the author's opinion that this design was never built. On the bottom is Miethe-Belluzzo design three, capable of vertical take-off.

the aforementioned saucer project.

The third design attributed to the Miethe-Belluzzo Project comes to us from and article by Jan Holberg in an August 20, 1966 article in Das Neue Zeitalter and also from Michael X. Barton-Carl F. Mayer-Hermann Klaas connection (16) (17). This design was capable of vertical take-off. Klaas provides internal detail which has been reproduced here.

At first, this appears to be a push-pull propeller system driven by a single engine. It is not. Neither are the twelve jet nozzles unsupported in any way as depicted. The real answer to this mystery is that this drawing is incomplete. With the completed parts depicted, a radial turbojet engine of special type would appear. Design one differs from design three in that the latter, with its centrally located cabin and symmetrical arrangement of twelve adjustable jet nozzles, is controlled by selectively shutting off various jets through the use of a surrounding ring. This allows the saucer to make turns and to take off vertically.

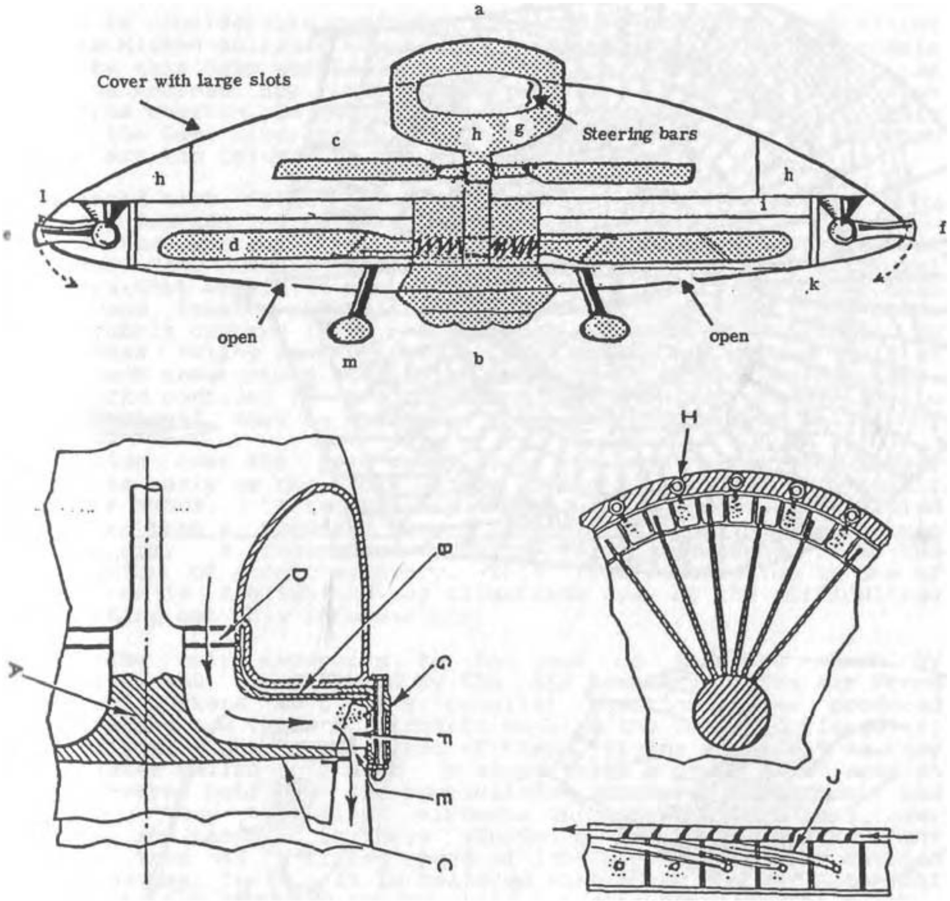
Recently, a German researcher, Klaus-Peter Kothkugel using Vesco as his source (18), has proposed an engine which links the designs one and three, and possibly even design two, while supplying the missing pieces needed to make the engine depicted air-worthy and resolves other problems. This engine was invented by a French engineer, Rene Leduc and probably acquired by the Germans during their occupation of France.

If a flying saucer equipped with this engine were viewed from the outside, no rotating parts would be visible. This is because the engine was totally contained within the metal skin of the saucer. It did rotate but this rotation was within the saucer itself and not viable from the outside. An air space existed all around the spinning engine, between it and the non-rotating outer skin. This engine was a type of radial-flow jet engine. It was this type of engine which probably powered all of Dr. Miethe's saucer designs. It is also the prime candidate for the post-war design of John Frost, the "Flying Manta."

The Flying Manta actually did fly. Pictures of it during a test flight are unmistakable. They were taken on July 7, 1947 by William A. Rhodes over Phoenix, Arizona. It almost goes without saying that the time frame, July of 1947, as well as the geographical location, the American Southwest, as well as the description of the flying object itself, beg comparisons to the saucer which crashed at Rosewell, New Mexico, earlier that same month.

If one looks at what is known of Dr. Miethe's saucer design, the Leduc engine, and the Frost Manta, it must be acknowledged that a connection between these three not only explains apparent inconsistencies in the existing Miethe designs but also links them to the post-war American Southwest, the precise spot where

The Rene Leduc Engine



a
Cover with large slots
Steering bars
h g
c h h l i d e f k open open m
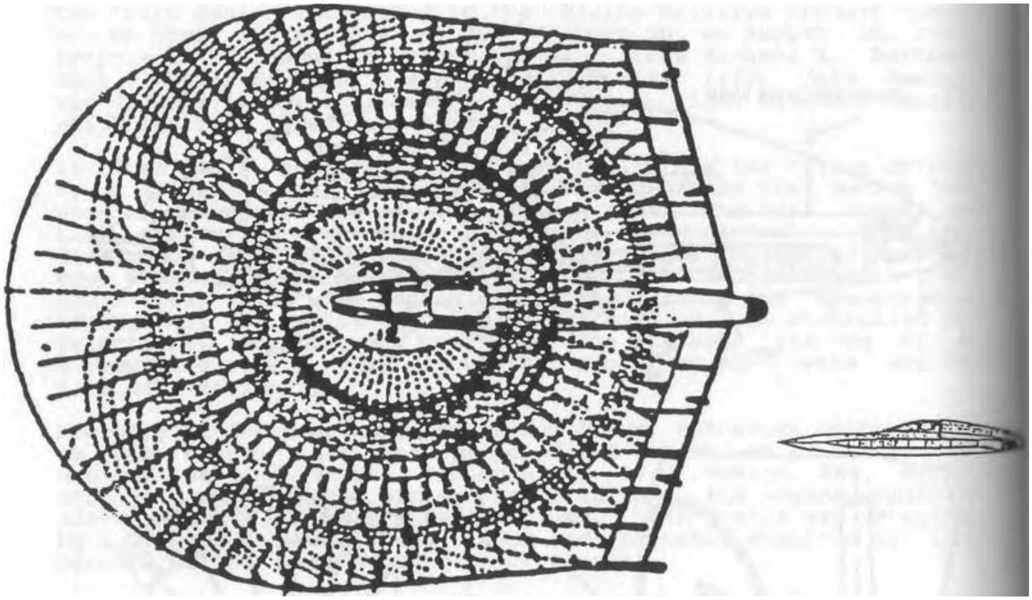
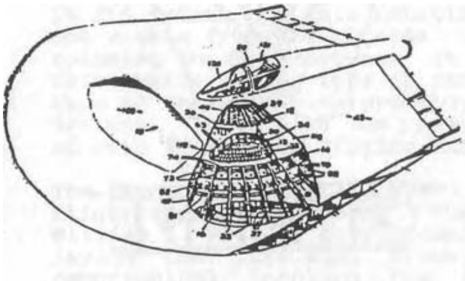
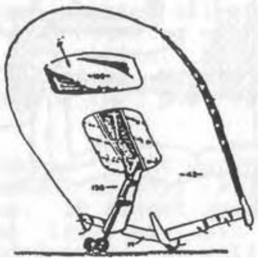
b
H
D
B
A
G
F
m
C
J

Top: Hermann Klaas' diagram of the workings of the Miethe-Belluzzo Disc. Note: intake screw (c) Carrying wing blade (d)affixed to a piston engine, jets nozzles (e) with no apparent engines. Close but not exactly right. Bottom: Leduc design. A-Rotor B-Front Bulk-head C-Rear Bulk-head D-Intake Vane E-Compressor Vane F-Combustion Chamber G-Bulk-head H-Fuel Injection Jets J-Fixed Flame Ring From I Velivoli Del Mistero I seareti technici dei dischi volanti by Renato Vesco







This is the mounting of the Leduc engine as illustrated by the later Avro diagram (Canada-USA). The outer hull is fixed. The inner rotating engine draws in the air from between it and the hull and exhausts through rear or sides as needed for steering. Compare this design to Miethe-Belluzzo designs, especially to the first design.

captured German World War Two technology was being tested and evaluated.

There is considerable confusion as to where the first test flight of the Miethe-Belluzzo saucer occurred. Epp tells us that models made by this team were flight tested since 1943. Georg Klein, as well as Andreas Epp, state that a test model of this craft took off from Stettin, in northern Germany, near Peenemuende, roughly where the Oder River meets the Baltic, and crashed in Spitsbergen which are the islands to the north of Norway.

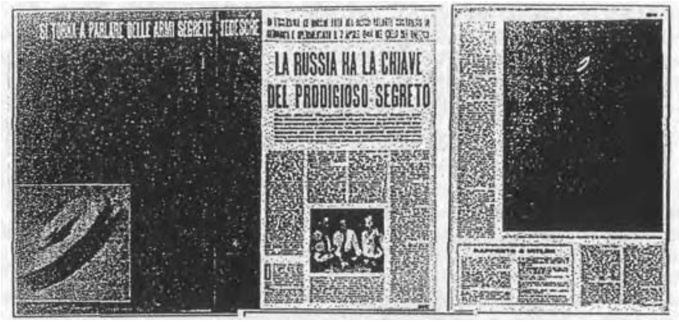
A manned test flight in December, 1944 has been mentioned by Norbert Juergen-Ratthofer and Ralf Ettl in one of the films on which they worked. The pilot named was Joachim Roehlicke or perhaps Hans-Joachim Roehlicke (19). Klaus-Peter Rothkugel reports that Roehlicke was under the direction of none other than Dr. Hans Kammler himself and was stationed at the Gotha Wagonfabrik company (20). The Gotha Wagonfabrik company is in the Jonas Valley in Thuringia. This valley was packed full of high-tech underground facilities which included nuclear research. Roehlicke confided to his daughter after the war, according to Mr. Rothkugel, that he "had seen the earth from above" (21).

Confusion over the test details of the Miethe-Belluzzo saucer start as early as the whole German flying disc controversy itself in the 1950s. In the English translation of his book, titled Brighter than a Thousand Suns A Personal History Of The Atomic Scientists. a footnote appeared which deviated from the discussion of atomic weaponry. This 1958 description is one of the first in English and may illustrate some of the difficulties in sorting out this information:

" *The only exception to the lack of interest shown by authority was constituted by the Air Ministry. The Air Force research workers were in a peculiar position. The produced interesting new types of aircraft such as the Delta (triangular) and "flying discs." The first of these "flying saucers," as they were later called—circular in shape, with a diameter of some 45 yards—were built by the specialists Schriever, Habermohl and Miethe. They were first airborne on February 14, 1945, over Prague and reached in three minutes a height of nearly eight miles. They had a flying speed of 1250 m.p.h. which was doubled in subsequent tests. It is believed that after the war Habermohl fell into the hands of the Russians. Miethe developed at a later date similar "flying saucers" at A. V. Roe and Company for the United States." (22).

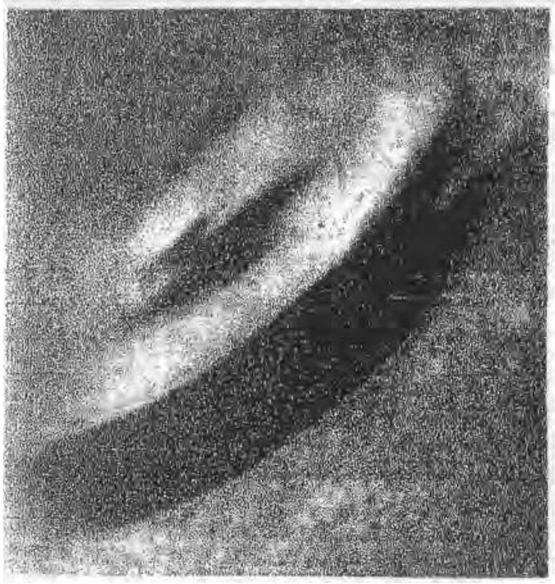
One big difference between the Miethe-Belluzzo design and the Schriever-Habermohl designs is that the former craft was alleged to have, or be designed to have, a longer flight range. This point is reinforced by the Spitzbergen flight mentioned above. Klein states that the Germans considered long range, remote controlled attack from Germany to New York using this craft.

Miethe-Belluzzo Saucer In Flight



SI TORNA A PARLARE DELLE ARMI SEGRETE TEDESCHE

LA RUSSIA HA LA CHIAVE DEL PRODIGIOSO SEGRETO



Top picture is of a September 6, 1952 article in the Italian newspaper "Tempo". This article deals with the work of Dr. Miethe and features a photograph of his saucer allegedly dated April 17, 1944, taken over the Baltic. Bottom is an enlargement of the photograph. It seems to be a Miethe-Belluzzo type 1 but could also be a type 3. Courtesy of Klaus-Peter Rothkugel.

As stated earlier, both projects were under the same authority. Experts and advisors included, according to Epp, among others, head-designer Kalkert of the Gotha Waggonfabrik, head-designer Guenther of Heinkel, engineer Wulf of Arado, engineer Otto Lange of the RLM, and engineer Alexander Lippish of Messerschmitt. Pilots were Holm, Irmler, Kaiser and Lange. The test pilot was Rudolf Schriever.

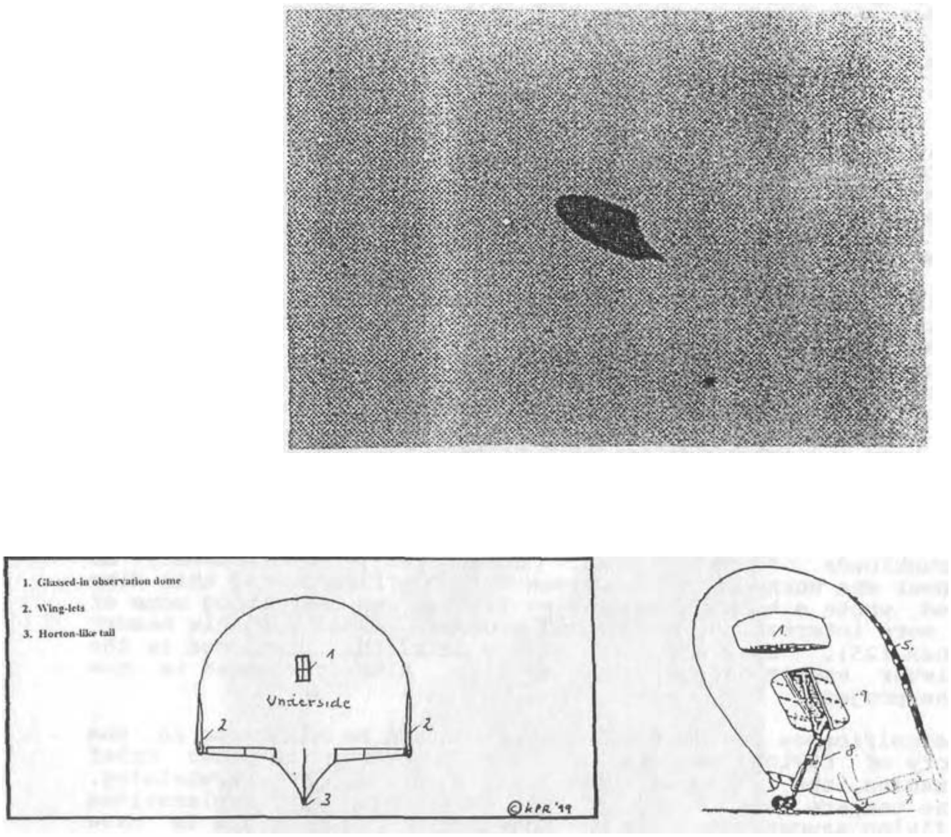
There does exist two alleged still pictures of the Miethe craft in flight. One is reproduced here. It may be the first design. A picture claiming to be of what is called here the third design can be found in W. Mattern's book, UFO's Unbekanntes Flugobiekt? Letzte Geheimwaffe Des Dritten Reiches? (23). Efforts have been made to acquire the picture for this book but the inquiry went unanswered by the book's publisher.

Politically, in 1944, Heinrich Himmler, head of the SS, replaced Albert Speer's appointee, Georg Klein, with Dr. Hans Kammler as overseer of this combined saucer project (24). This is a little confusing, however, since Kammler retained Klein as his employee, Perhaps a more practical way to look at this is that Kammler, Himmler's employee, replaced Speer while Klein did what he always did. The result was that the SS took direct and absolute control over these projects from this point until the end of the war.

Prior to this happening, news of these designs or application itself was made to the German Patent Office. All German wartime patents were carried off as booty by the Allies. This amounted to truckloads of information. Fortunately, Rudolf Lusar, an engineer who worked in the German Patent Office during this time period, wrote a book in the 1950s listing and describing some of the more interesting patents and processes based upon his memory of them (25). They are surprisingly detailed. Included is the Schriever saucer design with detail. Also discussed is the Miethe project.

The significance of these two teams can not be minimized in the history of flying saucers or UFOs. Already in this brief discussion, the evidence, taken as a whole, is overwhelming. Please compare this to any and all extraterrestrial explanations of flying saucers. Here we have Germans who claim to have invented the idea of the flying saucer. We have Germans who claim to have designed flying saucers. We have Germans who claim to have built flying saucers. We have Germans who claim to have flown flying saucers. We have Germans who claim to be witnesses to flying saucers known beforehand to be of German construction. We have German construction details. And finally, we have a man who took pictures of a known German flying saucer in flight. The facts speak for themselves. During the Second World War the Germans built devices we would all call today "flying saucers". No other UFO explanation can even approach this in terms of level of proof.

Miethe-Belluzzo Saucer In America?



1. Glassed-in observation dome
2. Wing-lets
3. Horton-like tail
1
Underside
2
2
3
©KPR '99
1.
5.
7.
8.

Top: a picture from the July 9, 1947 edition of the Arizona Republic taken by William A. Rhodes as it flew over his home in Phoenix. Lower Left: a drawing of the craft by Klaus-Peter Rothkugel. Lower Right: one view of the Avro Frost-Manta design, predating the Silver Bug Project. Was this a captured Miethe-Belluzzo-Leduc saucer?

Sources and References

1. Klein, Georg, 10/16/54, page 5, "Die "Fliegenden Teller"", Tages-Anzeiger fuer Stadt und Kanton Zuerich
2. Epp, J. Andreas, 1994, page 34
3. Barton, Michael X., 1968, page 58, The German Saucer Story- Futura Press, 5949 Gregory Avenue, Los Angeles, CA. 90038
4. Lusar, Rudolf, 1964, page 220, Die deutschen Waffen und Geheimwaffen des 2. Weltkrieges und ihre Weiterentwicklunq. J.F. Lehmanns Verlang, Munich
5. Epp, J. Andreas, 1994, pages 30-31
6. ibid
7. Epp, J. Andreas, 1994, pages 26-27
8. Epp, J. Andreas, 1994, page 30
9. Klein, Georg, 10/16/54, page 5
10. Zwicky, Viktor, 9/18/54, page 4, "Das Raetsel der Fliegenden Teller", Tages-Anzeiger fuer Stadt und Kanton Zuerich
11. Klein, Georg, 10/16/54, page 5
12. Epp, J. Andreas, 1994, pages 30 and 31
13. Meier, Hans Justus, 1995, "Die Miethe-Flugscheibe-eine reichlich nebuloese Erfindung", Flieger-Kalender 1995, E.S. Mettler & Sohn, text editing: Hans M. Namislo, Celsius-Str. 56, 53125 Bonn, Germany
14. Luftfahrt International, May-June, 1975, "Deutsche Flugkreisel Gab's die?"
15. J. Miranda and P. Mercado, 1998, Flugzeug Profile, page 25-27
16. Holberg, Jan, 8/20/54, "UFOs gibt es nichti Wohl aber: Flugscheiben am laufenden Band!", Das Neue Zeitalter
17. Barton, Michael X., 1968, pages 42, 63, 64
18. Vesco, Renato, 1974, from photos and diagrams begining on page 392, I Velivoli Del Mistero I segreti tecnici dei dischi volanti. U Mursia editore, Via Tadiuo 29, Milan, Italy
19. Video film, "UFOs Das Dritte Reich Schlaegt Zurueck?", 1988, Tempelhof Gesellschaft, Wien, Available through Dr. Michael Damboeck Verlag, Markt 86, A-3321, Ardaggr, Austria

20. Rothkugel, Klaus-Peter, 2000, page 4, "Baute Peenemuende ueberschallschnelle Flugscheiben?", four page information sheet concerning supersonic and high altitude saucer construction at Peenemuende, Bad Nauheim, Germany

21. ibid

22. Jungk, Robert, 1958, page 87, Brighter than a Thousand Suns A Personal History Of The Atomic Scientists. Harcourt. Brace and Company, New York, translated by James Cleugh from Heller als tausend Sonnen. 1956, Alfred Scherz Verlag, Bern

23. Mattern, W., date unknown, page 34, UFO's Unbekanntes Fluaobiekt? Letzte Geheimwaffe Des Dritten Reiches?, Samisdat Publishers LTD, 206 Carlton Street, Toronto, Canada M5A 2LI

24. Epp, J. Andreas, 1997. page 33

25. Lusar, Rudolf, 1960, (English version) German Secret Weapons of the Second World War. Neville Spearman Limited, 112 Whitfield St., London W.I, England

"Foo fighter" is a name given to a small, round flying object which followed Allied bombers over Germany during the latter phases of the air war. There are also some reports of foo fighters in the Pacific theater of the war. Sometimes they would appear singularly but more often in groups, sometimes flying in formation. By day they appeared to be small metallic globes. By night they glowed with various colors. These object attempted to approach Allied bombers closely which scared the bomber crews who assumed they were hostile and might explode. Upon taking evasive maneuvers they found the foo fighters would keep pace with them in some instances. Besides the name foo fighter this device is sometimes called "Feuerball", its German name or its English translation, fireball. More about names later.

For those readers who have not been exposed to foo fighters before, following is an American flight account found in Intercept UFO by Renato Vesco:

"At 0600 (on December 22) near Hagenau, at 10,000 feet altitude, two very bright lights climbed toward us from the ground. The leveled off and stayed on the tail of our plane. They were huge bright orange lights. They stayed there for two minutes. On my tail all the time. They were under perfect control (by operators of the ground). They turned away from us, and the fire seemed to go out".

Vesco goes on to say:

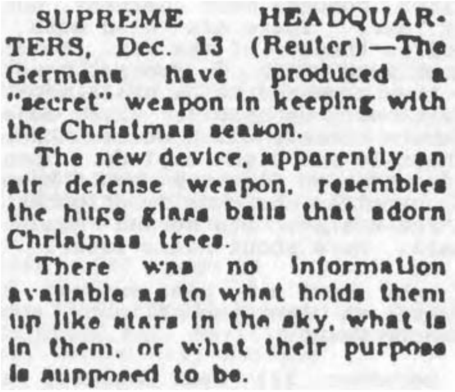
"The rest of the report was censored. Apparently it went on to mention the plan's radar and its sudden malfunctioning" (1).

Flying saucer books of the 1950s usually mentioned foo fighters and recounted the sightings of Allied servicemen. Later, due to the extraterrestrial hysteria, publications tended to omit descriptions of foo fighters, preferring to begin the tale of flying saucers with Kenneth Arnold in 1947.

In modern times, if they are mentioned at all by mainstream UFO magazines or books, an attempt is sometimes made to confuse the issue of the origin of foo fighters in one of three ways. First, they say or imply that both sides in World War Two thought foo fighters were a weapon belonging to the opposite side. They may cite as a source some German pilot obviously "out of the loop" who claims the Germans did not know their origin. Second, they attempt to advance the idea that foo fighters are still unknown and a mystery or possibly a naturally occurring phenomenon. Third, they advance an extraterrestrial origin.

It is difficult to imagine a vast bad faith plot, extending over years, which attempts to discredit or confuse the issue of foo fighters. Perhaps the authors of these UFO magazines and books

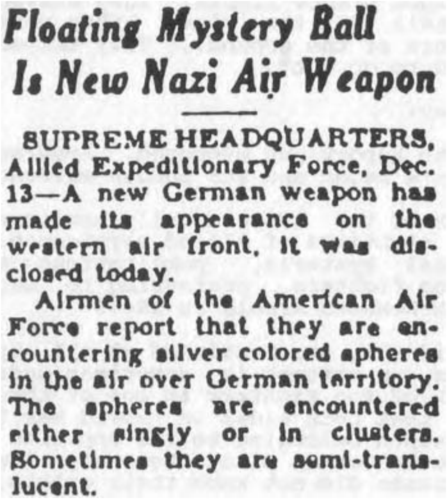
The First Reports Of German Foo Fighters



SUPREME HEADQUARTERS, Dec. 13 (Reuter)—The Germans have produced a "secret" weapon in keeping with the Christmas season.

The new device, apparently an air defense weapon, resembles the huge glass balls that adorn Christmas trees.

There was no information available as to what holds them up like stars in the sky, what is in them, or what their purpose is supposed to be.



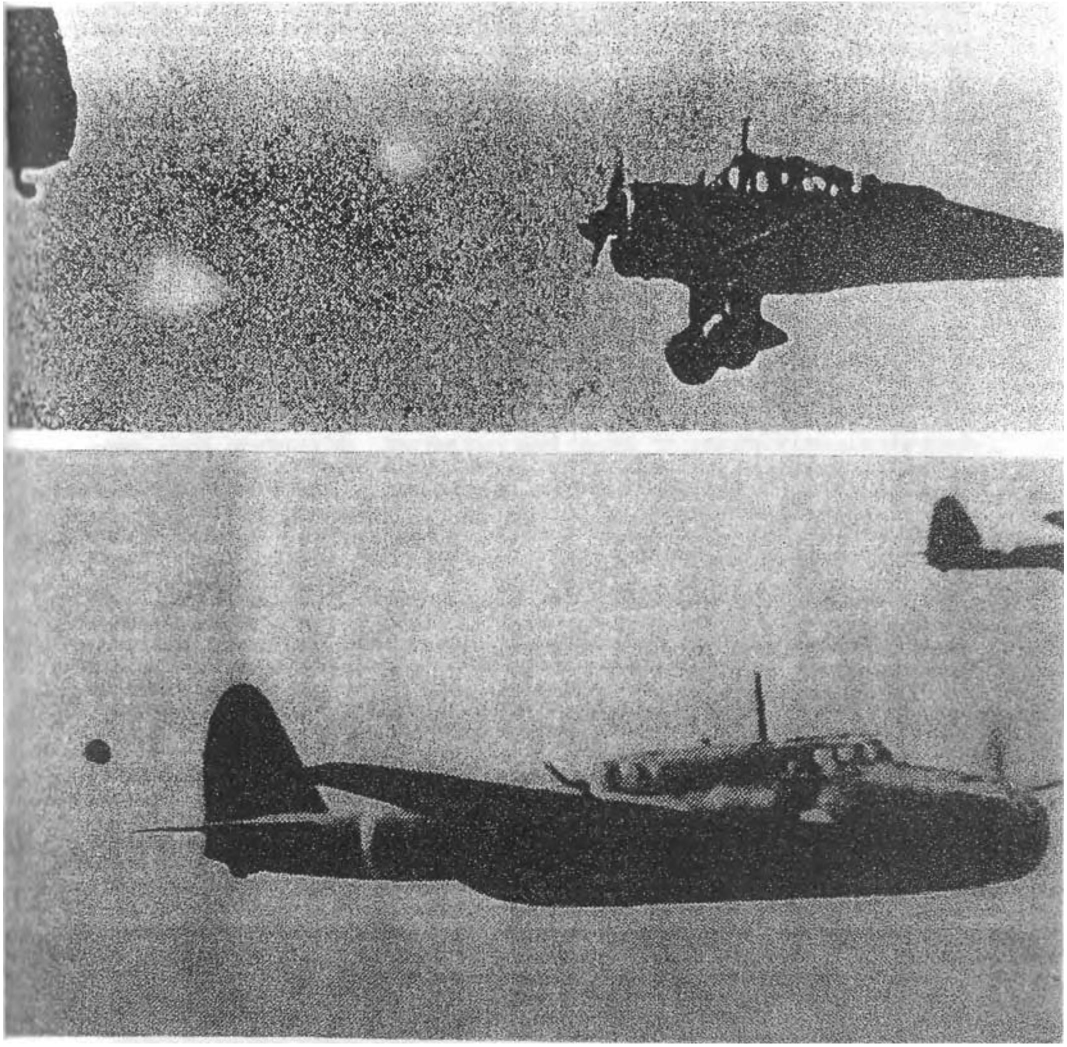
Floating Mystery Ball Is New Nazi Air Weapon

SUPREME HEADQUARTERS, Allied Expeditionary Force, Dec. 13—A new German weapon has made its appearance on the western air front, it was disclosed today.

Airmen of the American Air Force report that they are encountering silver colored spheres in the air over German territory. The spheres are encountered either singly or in clusters. Sometimes they are semi-translucent.

Top: A Reuters report from December 13, 1944
Bottom: The New York Times, December 14, 1944

Foo Fighters In Flight



Top: At night or in dim light foo fighters appeared luminescent. Bottom: In strong light foo fighters appeared as silvery balls. This picture was taken over the Pacific in 1943. There are many stories speaking of small, round flying balls sent to Japan by the Germans via submarine.

are truly without a clue and simply perpetuating old and bad information as a convenient explanation. In any event, it is now clear they utterly failed to do their homework on foo fighters before writing about them.

The U.S. military, too, has always denied knowledge of foo fighters. Numerous Freedom Of Information Act (FOIA) requests have been filed, for instance, by this writer as well as other researchers asking for information on foo fighters. A "no record" response always followed. All U.S. governmental agencies queried claimed that they had never heard of foo fighters. This happened in spite of the fact that all known alternate names for foo fighters were submitted as well as a detailed description of the device itself. This was the situation until the late 1990s.

Vesco is by far the best source concerning the foo fighter which he calls "Feuerball". He describes it as a radio controlled missile, built at an aeronautical establishment at Wiener Neustadt (Austria) with assistance of the Flugfunk Forschungsanstalt (Radio-Flight Research Installation) of Oberpfaffenhoffen. The project was under the control of an SS technical division. It was armored, circular in shape, resembling the shell of a tortoise. The device was powered by special flat, circular a turbojet engine. After being guided to the proximity of the target from the ground, an automatic infra-red tracking device took over control. The circular spinning turbojet exhaust created a visual effect of a bright, fiery ball in the nighttime sky. Within the craft itself a klystron tube pulsated at the frequency of Allied radar making it almost invisible to those remote eyes. A thin sheet of aluminum encircled the device immediately under the layer of protective armor but was electrically insulated from the armor. Once a bullet pierced the armor and the thin aluminum sheet, a circuit was formed which had the effect of triggering the Feuerball to climb out of danger at full speed (2).

Once within range, special chemical additives were added to the fuel mixture which caused the air in the vicinity of the device to become ionized. This meant that electricity could be conducted directly through the air itself (3). Any ignition-based engine coming into range of the ionized region would become useless, misfiring, stalling and eventually crashing.

Vesco goes on to say that with the advance of the Soviets into Austria the production facilities for the Feuerball were moved to a number of underground plants in the Black Forest run by the Zeppelin Works (4).

Recently an Austrian researcher, Kadmon, who specializes in uncovering the esoteric, sent to me a copy of a letter describing details of the foo fighter from the German perspective. This letter is reproduced here for those who read German language. It is a letter from physicist Friedrich Lachner to Professor, Dr. Alois Fritsch. The letter tells Dr. Fritsch that in an aircraft plant which was a branch of Messerschmitt at Weiner-Neustadt, Austria, a test model of a flying craft was built with a diameter of five meters which presumably made a test flight to Vienna. "His Martha", his wife, saw the outline of an exactly elliptical flying object in the twilight which appeared to her to be operating by some other means of flight that was normally the case because of its sudden directional changes. Her reaction was that it was an enemy flying object and it scared her. After the bomber attack on the plant, a doctor, "Oskar L." saw a model of this frightful thing in the plant also and had no idea of what it was. The astronomer Waehnl was, during the war, employed calculating construction costs at this aircraft facility where she had earlier in life learned something of aircraft technology from her father. She confirmed it also. Lachner briefly spoke with an engineer named Kuehnelt who worked as in flight technology for the German Army. He explained to Lachner that he saw such a device with a diameter of fifteen meters. Lachner says that he had known for some years about a machine with a thirty meter diameter. He also says that he had gotten to know a flight engineer named Klein when he was active near the flight testing of the supreme chief General Udet. Lachner claims that "Klein had something to do with these things". One or more unmanned and remote controlled of this sort of spinning-top-like flying objects are mentioned by Lachner in connection with the massive Allied bomber raids on the ball-bearing plant at Wuerzburg. Finally, Lachner goes on to say that a Professor Richter built these devices for Peron in Argentina. A long distance test-flight was actually flown to the United States. There the device was intercepted and an American pilot was shot down. The remainder of the letter concerns nuclear developments in Austria and the USA before and after the Second World War and misunderstandings by Lusar in his book.

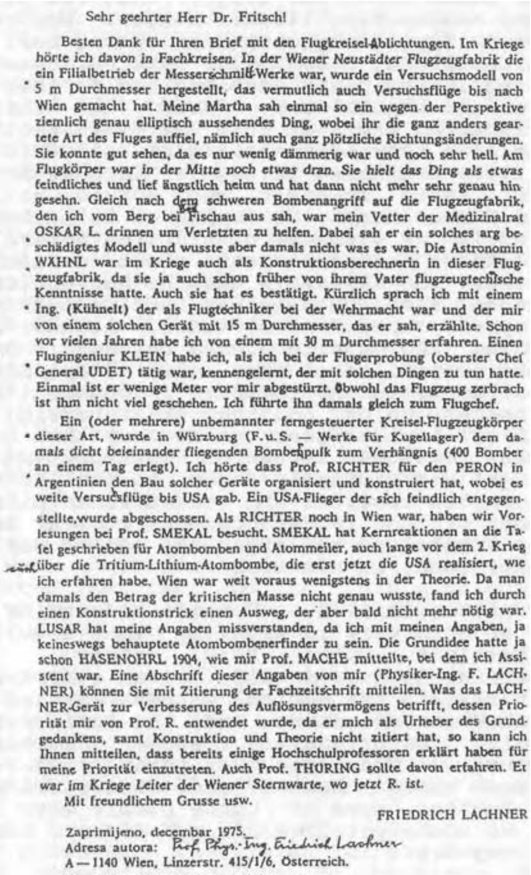
This letter was written in 1975. Details concerning Klein and the larger flying objects were in print by that time. There are important confirmations within this letter. These are revelations concerning Lachner's wife as an eyewitness to the object in twilight flight, the medical witness who saw the object within the plant at Wiener-Neustadt, and the confirmation of the astronomer, Waehnl. Unfortunately, Kadmon advises that Dr. Waehnl is now deceased. The important point is that these are real people with real names. Most of whom were alive at the time of this letter. Further, some of these people were scientists with a reputation at stake yet they did not disavow the substance of this letter in any way.

In the closing months of the last millennium witnessed a breakthrough regarding foo fighters. The break came by accident and from the government of the United States. Remember, Freedom Of Information Act requests regarding foo fighters had been filed with many branches of the U.S. military and intelligence services as well as with their repository, the National Archives. Even though all known alternative names were included, as well as a detailed description of the device in question was provided, a

Austrian Atomic Scientist Professor Friedrich Lachner's Letter



Sehr geehrter Herr Dr. Fritsch!

Besten Dank für Ihren Brief mit den Flugkreisel-Ablichtungen. Im Kriege hörte ich davon in Fachkreisen. In der Wiener Neustädter Flugzeugfabrik die ein Filialbetrieb der Messerschmitt-Werke war, wurde ein Versuchsmodell von 5 m Durchmesser hergestellt, das vermutlich auch Versuchsflüge bis nach Wien gemacht hat. Meine Martha sah einmal so ein wegen der Perspektive ziemlich genau elliptisch aussehendes Ding, wobei ihr die ganz anders geartete Art des Fluges auffiel, nämlich auch ganz plötzliche Richtungsänderungen. Sie konnte gut sehen, da es nur wenig dämmerig war und noch sehr hell. Am Flugkörper war in der Mitte noch etwas dran. Sie hielt das Ding als etwas feindliches und lief ängstlich heim und hat dann nicht mehr sehr genau hingesehn. Gleich nach dem schweren Bombenangriff auf die Flugzeugfabrik, den ich vom Berg bei Fischau aus sah, war mein Vetter der Medizinalrat OSKAR L. drinnen um Verletzten zu helfen. Dabei sah er ein solches arg beschädigtes Modell und wusste aber damals nicht was es war. Die Astronomin WAHNL war im Kriege auch als Konstruktionsberechnerin in dieser Flugzeugfabrik, da sie ja auch schon früher von ihrem Vater flugzeugtechnische Kenntnisse hatte. Auch sie hat es bestätigt. Kürzlich sprach ich mit einem Ing. (Kühnelt) der als Flugtechniker bei der Wehrmacht war und der mir von einem solchen Gerät mit 15 m Durchmesser, das er sah, erzählte. Schon vor vielen Jahren habe ich von einem mit 30 m Durchmesser erfahren. Einen Flugingeniur KLEIN habe ich, als ich bei der Flugerprobung (oberster Chef General UDET) tätig war, kennengelernt, der mit solchen Dingen zu tun hatte. Einmal ist er wenige Meter vor mir abgestürzt. Obwohl das Flugzeug zerbrach ist ihm nicht viel geschehen. Ich führte ihn damals gleich zum Flugchef.

Ein (oder mehrere) unbemannter ferngesteuerter Kreisel-Flugzeugkörper dieser Art, wurde in Würzburg (F. u. S. — Werke für Kugellager) dem damals dicht beieinander fliegenden Bomberpulk zum Verhängnis (400 Bomber an einem Tag erlegt). Ich hörte dass Prof. RICHTER für den PERON in Argentinien den Bau solcher Geräte organisiert und konstruiert hat, wobei es weite Versuchsflüge bis USA gab. Ein USA-Flieger der sich feindlich entgegenstellte, wurde abgeschossen. Als RICHTER noch in Wien war, haben wir Vorlesungen bei Prof. SMEKAL besucht. SMEKAL hat Kernreaktionen an die Tafel geschrieben für Atombomben und Atommeiler, auch lange vor dem 2. Krieg über die Tritium-Lithium-Atombombe, die erst jetzt die USA realisiert, wie ich erfahren habe. Wien war weit voraus wenigstens in der Theorie. Da man damals den Betrag der kritischen Masse nicht genau wusste, fand ich durch einen Konstruktionstrick einen Ausweg, der aber bald nicht mehr nötig war. LUSAR hat meine Angaben missverstanden, da ich mit meinen Angaben, ja keineswegs behauptete Atombombenerfinder zu sein. Die Grundidee hatte ja schon HASENOHRL 1904, wie mir Prof. MACHE mitteilte, bei dem ich Assistent war. Eine Abschrift dieser Angaben von mir (Physiker-Ing. F. LACHNER) können Sie mit Zitierung der Fachzeitschrift mitteilen. Was das LACHNER-Gerät zur Verbesserung des Auflösungsvermögens betrifft, dessen Priorität mir von Prof. R. entwendet wurde, da er mich als Urheber des Grundgedankens, samt Konstruktion und Theorie nicht zitiert hat, so kann ich Ihnen mitteilen, dass bereits einige Hochschulprofessoren erklärt haben für meine Priorität einzutreten. Auch Prof. THURING sollte davon erfahren. Er war im Kriege Leiter der Wiener Sternwarte, wo jetzt R. ist.

Mit freundlichem Grusse usw.

FRIEDRICH LACHNER

Zaprimijeno, decembar 1975.
Adresa autora: Prof. Phys.-Ing. Friedrich Lachner
A — 1140 Wien, Linzerstr. 415/1/6, Österreich.

Professor Lachner describes a sighting of a foo fighter by none other than his wife, Martha. Lachner mentions that he heard that Professor Richter built these devices for Juan Peron in Argentina. This, incidently, is the same Professor Richter involved in an ill-fated attempt to produce fusion generators for Peron.

"no record" response was uniformly generated by all facets of government.

A German researcher, Friedrich Georg, recognized a valuable entry in a microfilm roll, titled a 1944 U.S. Strategic Air Forces In Europe summary titled An Evaluation Of German Capabilities In 1945, which, somehow, had eluded the censors (5). In that summary report German devices called by American Intelligence "Phoo Bombs" are discussed. Sources for this summary were reports of pilots and testimony of prisoners of war. Phoo bombs were described as "radio-controlled, jet-propelled, still-nosed, short-range, high performance ramming weapons for use against bombing formations". Speed was estimated at 525 miles per hour.

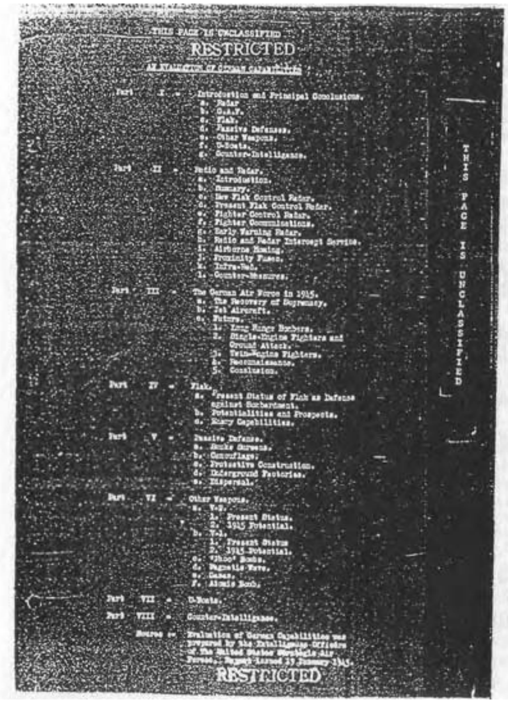
Further demands were made using FOIA as to the raw data used to compile the summary evaluation. Of course, denials followed, but finally, after an Appeal, the government indicated that more information did exist concerning Phoo Bombs. Most of this was a repeat or re-statement of the summary document. One document was hand-written and may have served as the basic text of the report.

It seems the U.S. Air Force was never aware of a threat to aircraft engines coming from over ionization of the air around these devices. Likewise, the claim by Vesco that they possessed klyston tubes which pulsed at the same freguency of Allied radar and so jammed radar on board was not recognized. Vesco cites the aircraft radio research institute at Oberpfaffenhofen (F.F.O.) as having invented such devices (6).

The Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report on this facility. Report 156, states that work there involved several types of klystron tubes and that one of this facilities principal functions was inventing technology to jam Allied radar, unfortunately all the secret material held at this facility was burned in the face of the advancing Allies. Individual scientists later produces some copies of documents which represent what the Allied intelligence strike teams took away. Exactly how complete this sample was we will never know (7).

Other very exotic research did go on at the F.F.O. installation which might be mentioned. They not only did work on klystron tubes but on magnetrons also. They did work on generation of millimeter range radio wave through the use of crystal vibrations. They also experimented with silicon and germanium "crystals" (8). These two substances figure prominently in the making of what we call today semiconductors which form the basis of the transistor. Invention of the transistor is credited to William Shockley, for which he won the Nobel Prize, about two years after the Second World War.

This bit of research explodes an argument made by the late Col. Philip j. Corso in his book The Day After Roswell that transistors were, at least in part, based upon alien technology (9). The only guestions which remain are: exactly how far the



THIS PAGE IS UNCLASSIFIED

RESTRICTED

AN EVALUATION OF GERMAN CAPABILITIES

Part I - Introduction and Principal Conclusions.
  a. Radar
  b. G.A.F.
  c. Flak.
  d. Passive Defenses.
  e. Other Weapons.
  f. U-Boats.
  g. Counter-Intelligence.

Part II - Radio and Radar.
  a. Introduction.
  b. Summary.
  c. New Flak Control Radar.
  d. Present Flak Control Radar.
  e. Fighter Control Radar.
  f. Fighter Communications.
  g. Early Warning Radar.
  h. Radio and Radar Intercept Service.
  i. Airborne Homing.
  j. Proximity Fuses.
  k. Infra-Red.
  l. Counter-Measures.

Part III - The German Air Force in 1945.
  a. The Recovery of Supremacy.
  b. Jet Aircraft.
  c. Future.
    1. Long Range Bombers.
    2. Single-Engine Fighters and Ground Attack.
    3. Twin-Engine Fighters.
    4. Reconnaissance.
    5. Conclusion.

Part IV - Flak.
  a. Present Status of Flak as Defense against Bombardment.
  b. Potentialities and Prospects.
  c. Heavy Capabilities.

Part V - Passive Defense.
  a. Smoke Screens.
  b. Camouflage.
  c. Protective Construction.
  d. Underground Factories.
  e. Dispersal.

Part VI - Other Weapons.
  a. V-2.
    1. Present Status.
    2. 1945 Potential.
  b. V-1.
    1. Present Status
    2. 1945 Potential.
  c. "Phoo" Bombs.
  d. Magnetic Wave.
  e. Gases.
  f. Atomic Bomb.

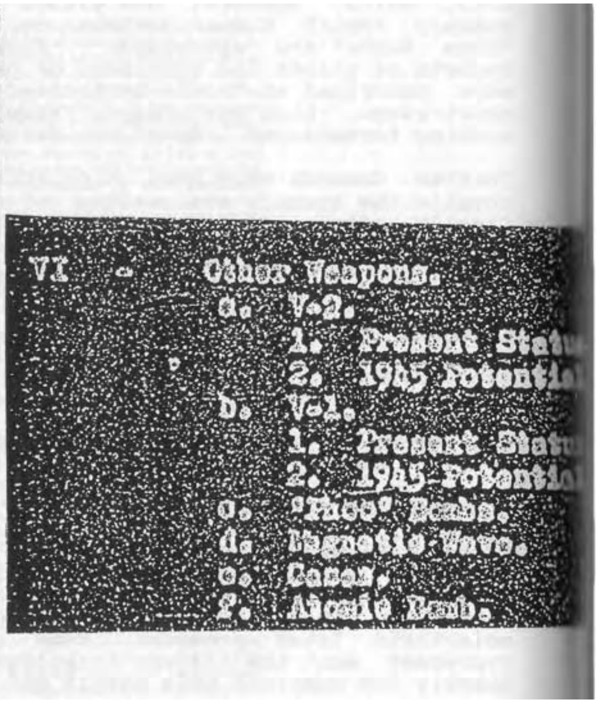
Part VII - U-Boats.

Part VIII - Counter-Intelligence.

Source -- Evaluation of German Capabilities was prepared by the Intelligence Officers of the United States Strategic Air Forces. Report issued 13 January 1945.

RESTRICTED

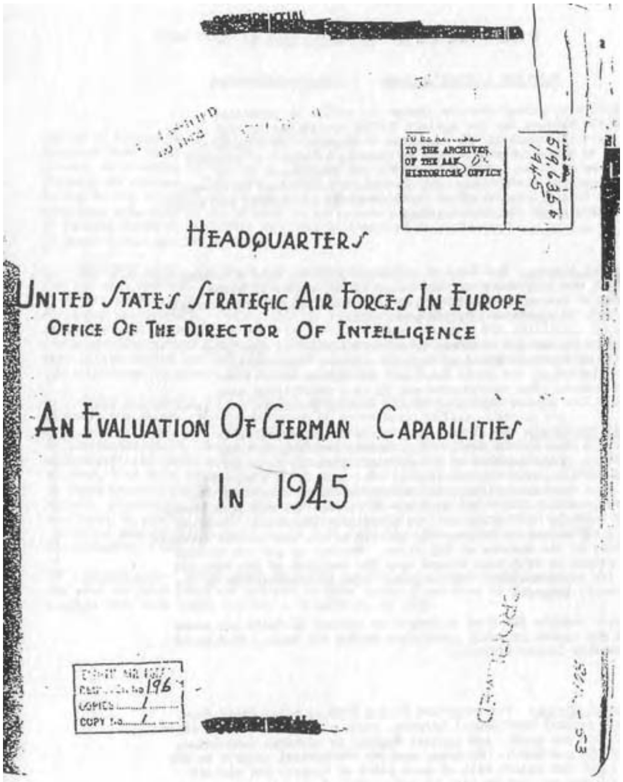
THIS PAGE IS UNCLASSIFIED



VI - Other Weapons.
  a. V-2.
    1. Present Sta
    2. 1945 Potenti
  b. V-1.
    1. Present Statu
    2. 1945 Potenti
  c. "Phoo" Bombs.
  d. Magnetic Wave.
  e. Gases.
  f. Atomic Bomb.

U.S. government's own documents prove they knew of the German origin of foo fighters. This table of contents of a "Intelligence Digest" document, with a February, 1945 date, addresses German military capacities. It lists "Phoo Bombs" as a weapon in the German arsenal (see VI- Other Weapons) Taken from microfilm negative image.

A UFO Rosetta Stone



~~CONFIDENTIAL~~

TO BE RETURNED
TO THE ARCHIVES
OF THE AAF
HISTORICAL OFFICE

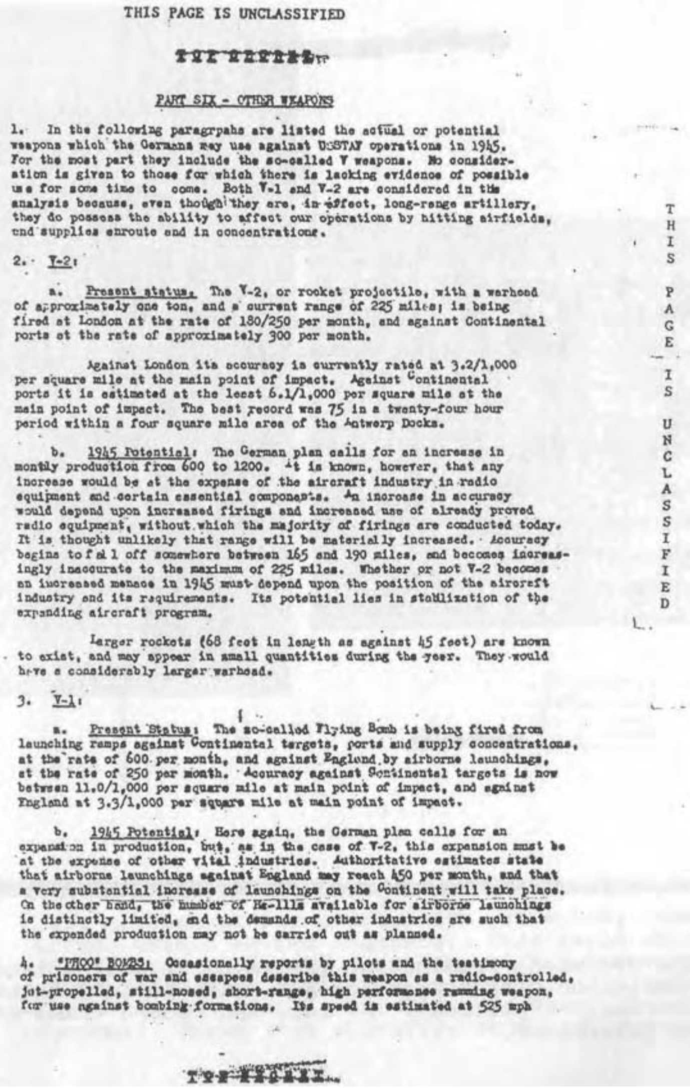
519.635
1945

HEADQUARTERS
UNITED STATES STRATEGIC AIR FORCES IN EUROPE
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF INTELLIGENCE

AN EVALUATION OF GERMAN CAPABILITIES
IN 1945

[illegible] AIR FORCE
[illegible] No. 196
COPIES 1
COPY No. 1

This document, fascinating in its own right, serves as a translation. "Foo fighters are "Phoo Bombs" in the government's parlance. No more "no record" name-games from the government.



THIS PAGE IS UNCLASSIFIED

~~TOP SECRET~~

PART SIX - OTHER WEAPONS

1. In the following paragrpahs are listed the actual or potential weapons which the Germans may use against USSTAF operations in 1945. For the most part they include the so-called V weapons. No consideration is given to those for which there is lacking evidence of possible use for some time to come. Both V-1 and V-2 are considered in this analysis because, even though they are, in effect, long-range artillery, they do possess the ability to affect our operations by hitting airfields, and supplies enroute and in concentrations.

2. V-2:

a. Present status. The V-2, or rocket projectile, with a warhead of approximately one ton, and a current range of 225 miles; is being fired at London at the rate of 180/250 per month, and against Continental ports at the rate of approximately 300 per month.

Against London its accuracy is currently rated at 3.2/1,000 per square mile at the main point of impact. Against Continental ports it is estimated at the least 6.1/1,000 per square mile at the main point of impact. The best record was 75 in a twenty-four hour period within a four square mile area of the Antwerp Docks.

b. 1945 Potential: The German plan calls for an increase in montly production from 600 to 1200. It is known, however, that any increase would be at the expense of the aircraft industry in radio equipment and certain essential components. An increase in accuracy would depend upon increased firings and increased use of already proved radio equipment, without which the majority of firings are conducted today. It is thought unlikely that range will be materially increased. Accuracy begins to fall off somewhere between 165 and 190 miles, and becomes increasingly inaccurate to the maximum of 225 miles. Whether or not V-2 becomes an increased menace in 1945 must depend upon the position of the aircraft industry and its requirements. Its potential lies in stabilization of the expanding aircraft program.

Larger rockets (68 feet in length as against 45 feet) are known to exist, and may appear in small quantities during the year. They would have a considerably larger warhead.

3. V-1:

a. Present Status: The so-called Flying Bomb is being fired from launching ramps against Continental targets, ports and supply concentrations, at the rate of 600 per month, and against England by airborne launchings, at the rate of 250 per month. Accuracy against Continental targets is now between 11.0/1,000 per square mile at main point of impact, and against England at 3.3/1,000 per square mile at main point of impact.

b. 1945 Potential: Here again, the German plan calls for an expansion in production, but, as in the case of V-2, this expansion must be at the expense of other vital industries. Authoritative estimates state that airborne launchings against England may reach 450 per month, and that a very substantial increase of launchings on the Continent will take place. On the other hand, the number of He-111s available for airborne launchings is distinctly limited, and the demands of other industries are such that the expended production may not be carried out as planned.

4. "FOO" BOMBS: Occasionally reports by pilots and the testimony of prisoners of war and escapees describe this weapon as a radio-controlled, jet-propelled, still-nosed, short-range, high performance ramming weapon, for use against bombing formations. Its speed is estimated at 525 mph

~~TOP SECRET~~

T
H
I
S

P
A
G
E

I
S

U N
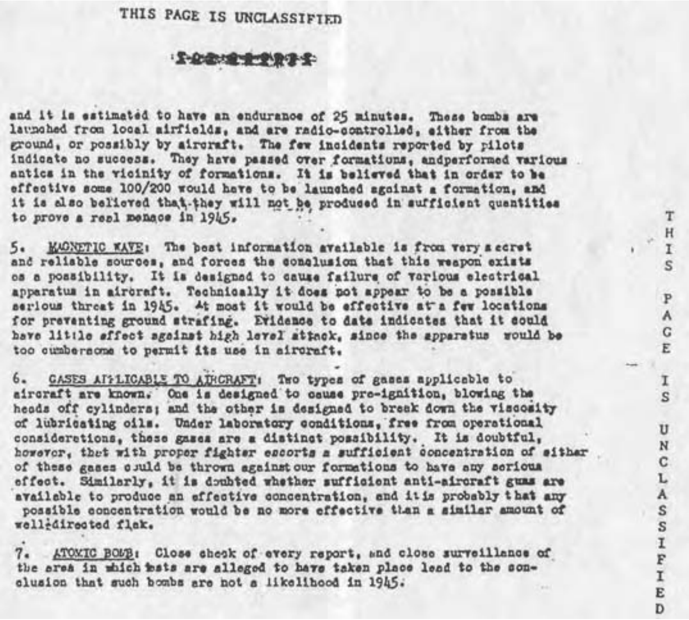
C
L
A
S
S
I
F
I
E
D



THIS PAGE IS UNCLASSIFIED

~~[illegible]~~

and it is estimated to have an endurance of 25 minutes. These bombs are launched from local airfields, and are radio-controlled, either from the ground, or possibly by aircraft. The few incidents reported by pilots indicate no success. They have passed over formations, andperformed various antics in the vicinity of formations. It is believed that in order to be effective some 100/200 would have to be launched against a formation, and it is also believed that they will not be produced in sufficient quantities to prove a real menace in 1945.

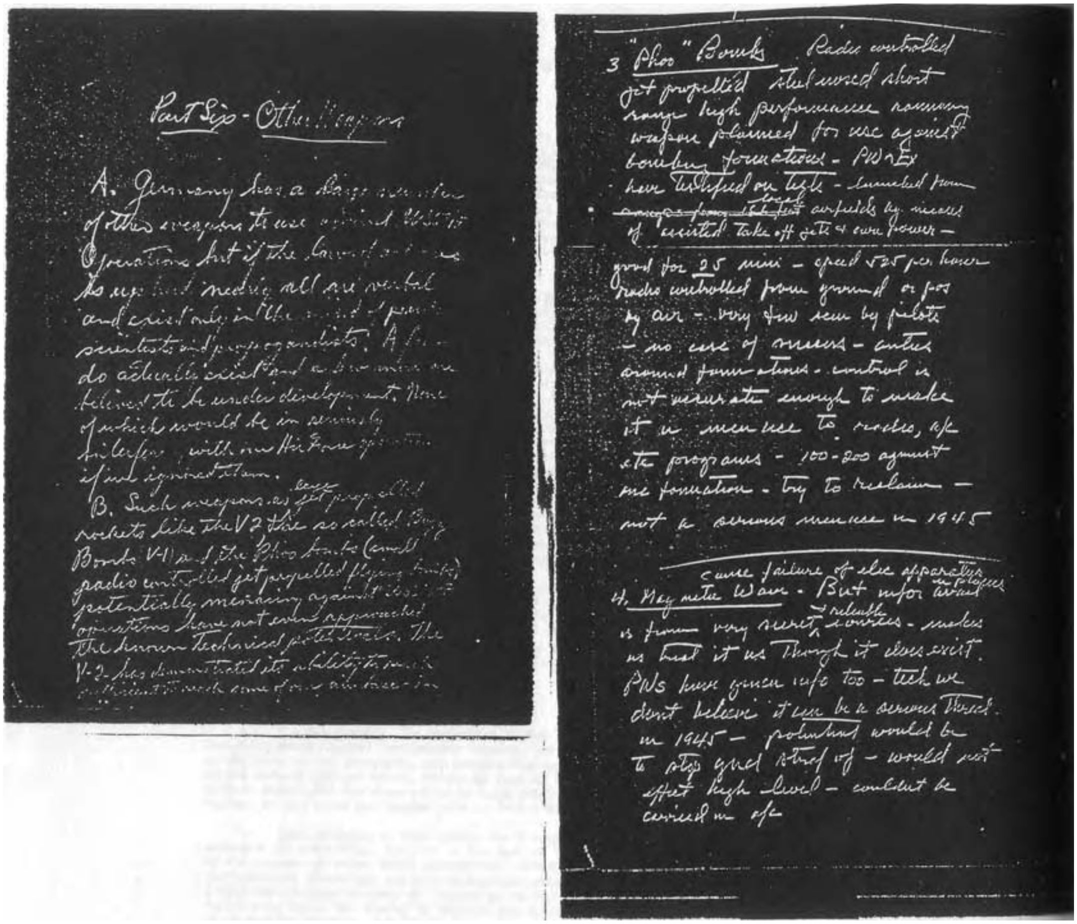
5. MAGNETIC WAVE: The best information available is from very secret and reliable sources, and forces the conclusion that this weapon exists as a possibility. It is designed to cause failure of various electrical apparatus in aircraft. Technically it does not appear to be a possible serious threat in 1945. At most it would be effective at a few locations for preventing ground strafing. Evidence to date indicates that it could have little effect against high level attack, since the apparatus would be too cumbersome to permit its use in aircraft.

6. GASES APPLICABLE TO AIRCRAFT: Two types of gases applicable to aircraft are known. One is designed to cause pre-ignition, blowing the heads off cylinders; and the other is designed to break down the viscosity of lubricating oils. Under laboratory conditions, free from operational considerations, these gases are a distinct possibility. It is doubtful, however, that with proper fighter escorts a sufficient concentration of either of these gases could be thrown against our formations to have any serious effect. Similarly, it is doubted whether sufficient anti-aircraft guns are available to produce an effective concentration, and it is probably that any possible concentration would be no more effective than a similar amount of well-directed flak.

7. ATOMIC BOMB: Close check of every report, and close surveillance of the area in which tests are alleged to have taken place lead to the conclusion that such bombs are not a likelihood in 1945.

THIS PAGE IS UNCLASSIFIED

Phoo Bombs—An Intelligence Officer's Hand Written Notes



Part Six - Other Weapons

A. Germany has a large number of other weapons to use against USSTAF Operations but if the [illegible] to up [illegible] nearly all are verbal and exist only in the minds of [illegible] scientists and propagandists. A few do actually exist and a few more are believed to be under development. None of which would be in seriously interfere with our Air Force operations if we ignored them.

B. Such weapons as large jet propelled rockets like the V2 the so called Buzz Bombs V-1 and the Phoo bombs (small radio controlled jet propelled flying bombs) potentially menacing against USSTAF operations have not even approached the known technical potentials. The V-2 has demonstrated its ability to reach [illegible] some of our air bases in

3 "Phoo" Bombs Radio controlled jet propelled steel armored short range high performance ramming weapon planned for use against bombing formations - PW + Ex have testified on tests - launched from ~~[illegible]~~ local airfields by means of 'assisted' take off jets & own power - good for 25 min - speed 525 per hour - radio controlled from ground or pos by air - very few seen by pilots - no case of rammers - circles around formations - control is not accurate enough to make it a menace to radio, a/c etc programs - 100-200 against one formation - try to reclaim - not a serious menace in 1945

4. Magnetic Wave - cause failure of elec apparatus in planes - But info avail is from very secret & reliable sources - makes us treat it as though it does exist. PWs have given info too - tech we dont believe it can be a serious threat in 1945 - potential would be to stop good strafing - would not effect high level - couldnt be carried in a/c

Obtained in a freedom Of Information Act asking for more information after learning the government's code word for foo fighters ("Phoo Bombs").

Germans progressed in their work on semiconductors and should the scientists at the F.F.O. have been given credit for this discovery, the transistor, instead of Shockley? This example also illustrates exactly how far the military will go, or at least individuals in the military, to perpetuate the notion of high-technology derived from aliens. It also illustrates the willingness of large establishment publishing firms to assist in the propagation of these ideas.

Returning to the subject of foo fighters and the governments suppression of this information, it seems the government feels it has the right to deny FOIA reguests, no matter how detailed the description may be, unless the requestor uses exactly the same name as the government uses. Was the name "foo fighters" as opposed to "Phoo Bombs" just not close enough to trigger a response under the law or was this just another example of the government's bad faith regarding FOIA? Probably it was the latter. Friedrich Georg's research work which produced the first document naming Phoo Bombs acted like a Rosetta Stone in that it was a translation of their terms into ours. This applied not only for foo fighters but for the other topics mentioned below which the government had previously denied.

With these documents as proof of American knowledge of foo fighters, the understanding with regard to foo fighters is quite different than the confusion generated heretofore. The fact is that Vesco has been vindicated. The fact is that foo fighters were German-built flying weapons of war. The fact is that they were the very first modern UFOs. And finally, the fact is the government of the United States has known this all along and kept these facts from us for almost sixty years.

It should be noted that the documents which are in my possession are all documents written during the Second World War. No mention is made of Phoo Bombs in any post-war documents I have seen. Examples or at least plans of these flying devices must have been recovered. It seems there are still secrets hidden away in government files. To keep these secrets the government is willing to violate its own Freedom Of Information Act laws.

It should be noted that the document uncovered by Mr. Georg describes several weapons systems previously not disclosed by the U.S. government. This includes German rockets larger than the V-2. The government document states:

> "68 feet in length as against 45 feet"

The forty-five foot figure signifies the V-2, while the sixty-eight foot rocket is completely unknown.

In this same document is a description of a gas-weapon first described by Vesco and designed to down enemy aircraft (10). Actually, there are two such gas weapons. The first gas is designed to cause engine destruction through pre-ignition as described by Vesco. The second gas is designed to cause engine seizure through the breakdown of the viscosity of the engine's lubricating oil. This is another vindication of Vesco. Therefore, when Vesco states that this very weapon was successfully used against Allied aircraft in a second-generation saucer, the Kugelblitz, perhaps he should be taken seriously (11).

Finally, this document describes something the Americans call the "Magnetic Wave" but which the Germans always described as "Motorstoppmittel", meaning literally, "means to stop motors". Motorstoppmittel and other German death rays were also the subject of repeated FOIA requests which were all denied. It was only with the code-word "Magnetic Wave" that the dam of information was finally broken concerning this device and other German ray-weapons. Not only did the Germans use ionization of the atmosphere to halt ignition based engines but they also experimented with x-ray weapons and an even more exotic method, possibly involving use of the laser (12).

Vesco places construction of the foo fighter at the Austrian site of Wiener-Neustadt (13). Indeed, the testimony supplied by Kadmon does indicate an Austrian home for the foo fighter. The most likely site for foo fighter development was the Rax Works. The Rax Works were an outgrowth of the combinations and growth of several firms, the Wiener-Neustaedter Flugzeugwerke GmbH, the Flugzeugbau der Hitenberger Patronenfabrik, the Flughafenbetriebsgesellschaft Wiener-Neustadt and the Wiener Neustaedter Lokomotiv-Fabrik which was acquired by Henschel after the unification of Austria and Germany (14).

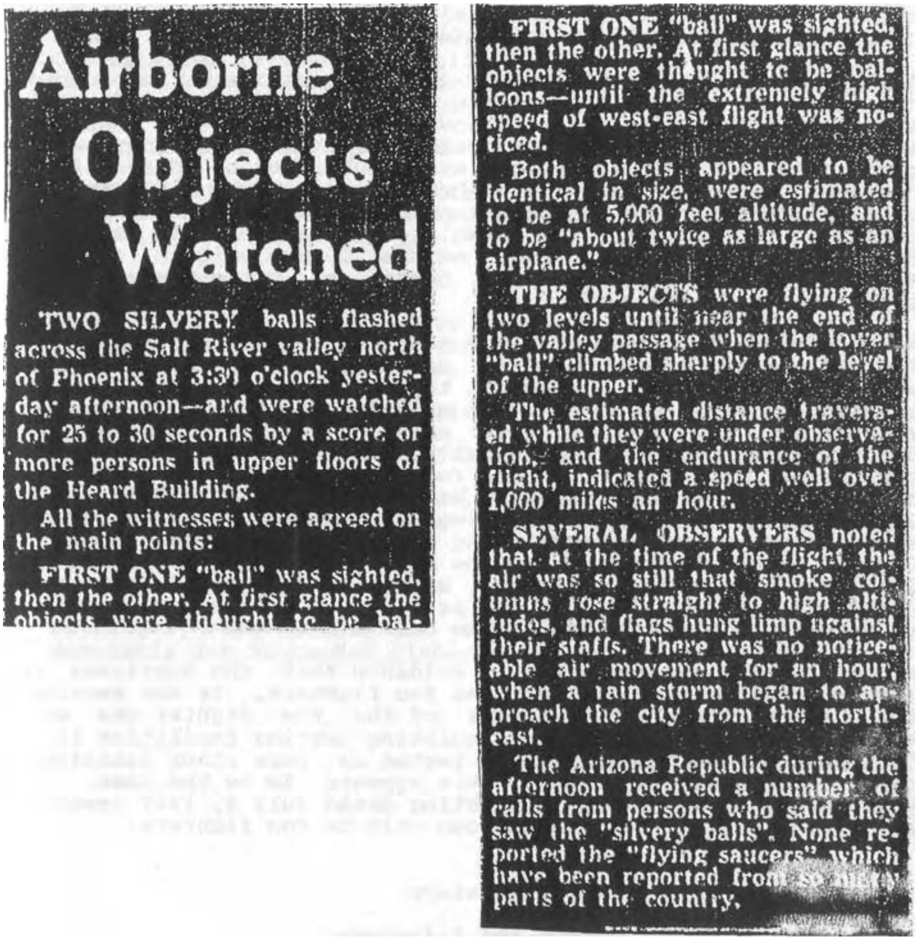
All the sources cited place foo fighter production in Austria. It is often repeated that this was a purely SS project, built at Wiener-Neustadt, with the help of the F.F.O. It is possible that these craft had an independent origin, outside the scope and sphere of Peenemuende. At about this same time, early 1943, Professor Alexander Lippisch broke away from Messerschmitt to head the Vienna based Luftfahrtforschungsanstalt-Wien (LFW). This was a first-class facility and Professor Lippisch is a figure central to the understanding of German flying discs. Vesco links the foo fighter, his "Feuerball" with a further-developed manned saucer, the "Kugelblitz". It is possible that both these craft had an independent origin, that is outside the purview of officials at Peenemuende under the direction of Dr. Lippisch at the LFW. In this case their link to Peenemuende would have become stronger as the war progressed and on a higher order, that of the SS through Dr. Hans Kammler and the Kammler Group based near Prag. It is also possible that the research and controlling authority of the German disc program moved from Peenemuende to Wiener-Neustadt as researcher Klaus-Peter Rothkugel suggests.

Questions arise with the acknowledgement of "Phoo Bombs" by the government. The first is what is the agenda of those seeking to



Airborne Objects Watched

TWO SILVERY balls flashed across the Salt River valley north of Phoenix at 3:30 o'clock yesterday afternoon—and were watched for 25 to 30 seconds by a score or more persons in upper floors of the Heard Building.

All the witnesses were agreed on the main points:

FIRST ONE "ball" was sighted, then the other. At first glance the objects were thought to be bal-

FIRST ONE "ball" was sighted, then the other. At first glance the objects were thought to be balloons—until the extremely high speed of west-east flight was noticed.

Both objects appeared to be identical in size, were estimated to be at 5,000 feet altitude, and to be "about twice as large as an airplane."

THE OBJECTS were flying on two levels until near the end of the valley passage when the lower "ball" climbed sharply to the level of the upper.

The estimated distance traversed while they were under observation, and the endurance of the flight, indicated a speed well over 1,000 miles an hour.

SEVERAL OBSERVERS noted that at the time of the flight the air was so still that smoke columns rose straight to high altitudes, and flags hung limp against their staffs. There was no noticeable air movement for an hour, when a rain storm began to approach the city from the northeast.

The Arizona Republic during the afternoon received a number of calls from persons who said they saw the "silvery balls". None reported the "flying saucers" which have been reported from so many parts of the country.

From "The Arizona Republic", July 8, 1947 deny this fact both in and out of government? Are these just extraterrestrial "true believers" gone amuck? There is no doubt that the government has known the truth about foo fighters and German saucers in general for almost sixty years, yet they have never been willing to publicly acknowledge these facts. Why is this? What issues of national security could possibly be compromised with such a disclosure over a half-century later?

Is this denial of foo fighters just of government inspiration? The sad truth is that the private "information" or disinformation sector is also guilty in of a cover-up. Why do they contribute to the denial of the German origin of this technology? What major New York publisher has ever published on German flying discs as opposed to the libraries of books pushing the extraterrestrial UFO hypothesis—a hypothesis totally lacking in proof? Let me pose the specific question: would Simon and Schuster ever publish a book on the German origins of flying saucers as they did for Col. Corso and his extraterrestrial hypothesis? If not why?

Another question arises from the confirmation of foo fighters by the government. This question concerns the veracity of Renato Vesco who originally placed the topic before us in his Italian edition as early as 1968. The question is this: If Vesco is right about foo fighters, what about the other claims he made about German saucers? Specifically, these are claims made about the further development of the foo fighter technology resulting in a manned saucer project he called "Kugelblitz" (ball-lightning). As well as claiming the Kugelblitz actually flew, Vesco gave us some tantalizing details of the development of German saucer technology by the Anglo-Americans after the war. In view of Vesco's track record, we can not simply dismiss these claims as has been done in the past. Vesco's assertions should be borne in mind as further facts become evident.

Finally, there is some small evidence that the Americans did acquire working examples of these foo fighters. If the Americans had captured complete examples of the foo fighter one would expect they would be taken to existing testing facilities in the Southwestern United States and tested as were other examples of captured German technology. This appears to be the case. The Arizona Republic reports a sighting dated July 8, 1947 involving two flying silvery balls which can only be foo fighters.

Foo Fighters

Sources and References

1. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 82, Intercept UFO. Pinnacle Books, Inc., 275 Madison Ave, New York, NY. 10016, recently reissued as Man-Made UFOs 1944-1994 by Adventures Unlimited Press

Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 85-86

3. ibid

4. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 87

5. United States Air Force, 1944, "An Evaluation Of German Capabilities In 1945", Maxwell Air Force Base, Alabama, USA, this and other information related to Phoo Bombs can be found on microfilm rolls A-1007-1652, A-5729-2040

6. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 85-87

7. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Report Number 156, "Report On Flugfunk Forschungsinstitut Oberpfaffenhofen F.F.O. Establishments"

8. ibid

9. Corso, Phillip J., Col., 1997, page 161, The Day After Roswell. Pocket Books, a division of Simon & Schuster Inc., 1230 Avenue of the Americans, New York, NY. 10020

10. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 136-138

11. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 145 and 156

12. German Research Project, 1999, "German Death Rays Part Two: The German And American Governmental Evidence", P.O. Box 7, Gorman, CA. 93243-0007 USA

13. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 86

14. Rothkugel, Klaus-Peter, not yet published, page 31, Das Geheimnis der deutschen Flugscheiben

A report comes to us from Russian immigrant Paul Stonehill concerning the experience of a Russian POW in Northern Germany. The report was first published some time ago in UFO Magazine, volume 10, number 2 in 1995, but this witness describes a story so different from other German saucer reports that it is worth emphasis at this point. The witness is unnamed but the source of the original report is known to Paul Stonehill and he vouches for its authenticity. The unnamed witness is called mister "X".

Mister X was taken prisoner by the Germans in the Ukraine in 1941, early in the German offensive. From there he was housed in a concentration camp where he contracted typhus. X improved and even managed to escape but was re-captured and taken to Auschwitz concentration camp. There, he worked as a medical orderly before a typhus relapse made this work impossible. X was scheduled for a one-way trip to the crematorium but was saved from this fate by a woman German medical doctor who cured him of the typhus. Not only did she do this but, for some reason not made clear in the article, she supplied him with false identity papers stating that X was a mechanical engineer.

In August of 1943 X was moved to KZ (concentration camp) A4 at Trassenhedel in the vicinity of Peenemuende to work on project Hochdruckpumpe's removal from that area. Hochdruckpumpe, or high pressure pump in English, was a long distance cannon with fired in sequential states as the projectile moved by each charge and along an very long barrel. From here X was reassigned to work at Peenemuende itself.

In September of 1943, X and some other prisoners were engaged in demolition of a reinforced cement wall. At lunch time the other prisoners were driven away from this site but for some reason, possibly a dislocated foot, X was left behind.

After the others had gone, four workers appeared from a hangar and rolled out a strange looking craft onto the concrete landing strip nearby. It was round, had a teardrop-shaped cockpit in the center and was rolled out on small inflatable wheels, like an "upside down wash basin". After a signal was given, this silvery metal craft began making a hissing sound and took off, hovering at an altitude of about five meters directly over the landing strip. As it hovered, the device rocked back and forth. Then the edges began to blur. Suddenly the flying craft's edges seem to blur as it jumped up sharply and gained altitude in a snakelike trajectory. X concludes that because rocking was still exhibited, the craft was advancing erratically.

A gust of wind blew in from the Baltic. The flying craft was turned upside down and began to loose altitude. Mr. X was enveloped by hot air and the smell of ethyl alcohol as he heard the craft grinding into the earth. Without thinking, X ran for the craft in an effort to assist the downed pilot. The pilot's body was hanging out of the broken cockpit and the craft was engulfed in blue flames of fire. X glimpsed the still hissing jet engine before everything was swallowed in flames.

What can be gleaned from this account? Mr. X certainly saw a German flying disc. But the "smell of ethyl alcohol" and the "blue fames of fire" set this engine apart from any so far described. German jet engines ran on jet fuel, a light oil something similar to kerosene. The Walter rocket engines ran of very exotic hypergolic fuels which burst into flames automatically once they made contact with each other. Ethyl alcohol is the alcohol of fermentation as, for instance, potatoes are fermented and distilled into vodka. Ethyl alcohol is not the best substance for aircraft fuel since it is low calories by weight and volume in comparison with the other fuels mentioned. The advantage of alcohol for the shortage plagued Germans was that it was available. Ethyl alcohol and liquid oxygen were exactly the fuels which powered the V-2 rocket developed at nearby Peenemuende.

Given this report, we have a reason to consider Peenemuende as a German site which produced flying discs. But before proceeding with our inquiry as before we must take a step back from our strictly detailed survey of German flying saucers in order to get better perspective of this overall body of information.

To this point any reader somewhat familiar with German flying discs might find the level of detail and proof enlightening but might feel that the basic story is known and has already been told. These readers will be pleasantly surprised by this chapter of our story. Not only is new evidence presented here but a new interpretation of existing evidence sheds a whole new light upon the study of German flying discs.

This new evidence and this new way of looking at things are primarily the result of the input of German aeronautical investigator Klaus-Peter Rothkugel. Within the last year or so he has proposed to me and to another investigator, Heiner Gehring, ideas which were previously overlooked. Mr. Rothkugel has investigated and documented his ideas to both of us and has convinced us of their merit. In turn, both Mr. Gehring and myself have spent some time and effort in advancing this research ourselves and sharing the results. These researchers have published their findings in Germany and have allowed me to make use of these ideas here.

The careful reader will note that mention has already been made of Mr. Rothkugel and his contributions. In this section some of the ideas which he first put forth will be examined as will hie emphasis on the overall organization and understanding of the material.

It was Vesco who first gave us an explanation of foo fighters.

Vesco relied upon his own understanding of the subject which was gained during the war and documented them with facts gleaned from his research into British intelligence files. His explanation has been largely vindicated both by reports of sightings within Austria and through United States military documents obtained independently through the Freedom Of Information Act. Why then should not the other explanations given us by Vesco be worthy of further inquiry? While discussing German saucer development, Vesco described German research designed to overcome the drag limitations imposed upon aircraft by boundary layer effects.

Boundary layer effects refer to the flow of air across the wing of an aircraft in flight. The air forms sheets of air moving across the wing, the slowest moving sheet being closest to the wing. At high speeds these slower moving layers collide with oncoming air molecules of the atmosphere causing areas of turbulence with translate into atmospheric drag as a practical matter. Elimination of the boundary layer would mean that the aircraft could fly faster or expend less energy to fly at any given speed (1)(2).

Swept wings, a German innovation, represent an aircraft designer's response toward lessening the effects of drag on high speed aircraft wings. It was found that air passing over the wings at an angle retarded boundary layer formation. Therefore, turbulence was less apt to form. The swept back-wings of the Me-163 rocket interceptor may have been the result of this research. An advanced model of the Me-262 jet fighter was to incorporate fully swept-back wings. But German aircraft designers of those times wanted to go further. They wanted to eliminate the boundary layer completely.

They proposed to do this with suction wings (3). The literature on German efforts toward elimination of the boundary layer using suction wings is voluminous, as Vesco has pointed out. Beginning in the early 1940s German designers cut slots into experimental aircraft and auxiliary engines were employed to suck in the boundary layer through the wing itself and redirect this air into the fuselage and out the rear of the aircraft.(4). This proved to be more complicated than first anticipated. It was found that the area of turbulence, eddy currents caused by the boundary layer, moved across the wing from front to back as air speed increased. A slot at one position on the wing might work at one speed but not another. This meant that many, many slots covering the expanse of the wing would be needed to totally defeat this boundary layer problem. This proved impractical for a number of reasons.

One reason this was so was that multiple engines had to be used. The first engine had to provide power for flight as in any airplane. The second engine, mounted in the fuselage, was necessary to draw in air through the slotted wings and exhaust it towards the rear. Interestingly enough, it was found that the boundary layer could be eliminated by "sucking it in" or by "blowing it off" using a strong flow of air to disrupt it (5).

Full scale suction wing aircraft were built for purposes of testing this concept. These were the Junkers "Absaugeflugzeug" (suction aircraft) AF-l and the Fieseler "Absaugestorch" (suction-stork) AF-2.

Concurrent with these experiments, work was being done into the feasibility of circular wings. This work also began in the 1930s with the basic ideas being credited to Professor Ludwig Prandtl. Early scientific papers on circular winged aircraft were written beginning in 1936 by Wilhelm Kinner (6) and in 1938 by M. Hansen (7). Both of these scientists worked at the Aerodynamic Research Facility at Goettingen. By 1941 Dr. Alexander Lippisch was also engaged in experimentation on circular wings at the Messerschmitt firm. His design, designated J1253, was tested at the wind-tunnel at Goettingen (8). Dr. Lippisch was visited by Dr Giuseppe Belluzzo while at Messerschmitt in Augsburg and Lippisch worked together with Dr. F. Ringlib on a "Drehfluegel" or "rotating wing" which was tested at Peenemuende (9). As with suction wings, a body of scientific literature from those times documents this early circular-wing experimentation.

The genius of the German designers was to combine the ideas of suction and circular wings into a single aircraft. Housing complete aircraft within its wing would eliminate the fuselage and so eliminate an unnecessary, drag-causing structure.

Prandtl and Lippisch were not comparably to Schiever and Habermohl. Prandtl and Lippisch are not even comparable to Dr. Richard Miethe. Pradtl and Lippisch were senior scientists who were well established in their worlds, either of whom would have been capable of heading a major project. In fact they did. In fact neither the Schriever-Habermohl or what we have called the Miethe-Bellonzo projects were major projects. This is another significance of what is being discussed here because what is being discussed here is a completely different organization and understanding of German flying discs than has been presented heretofore.

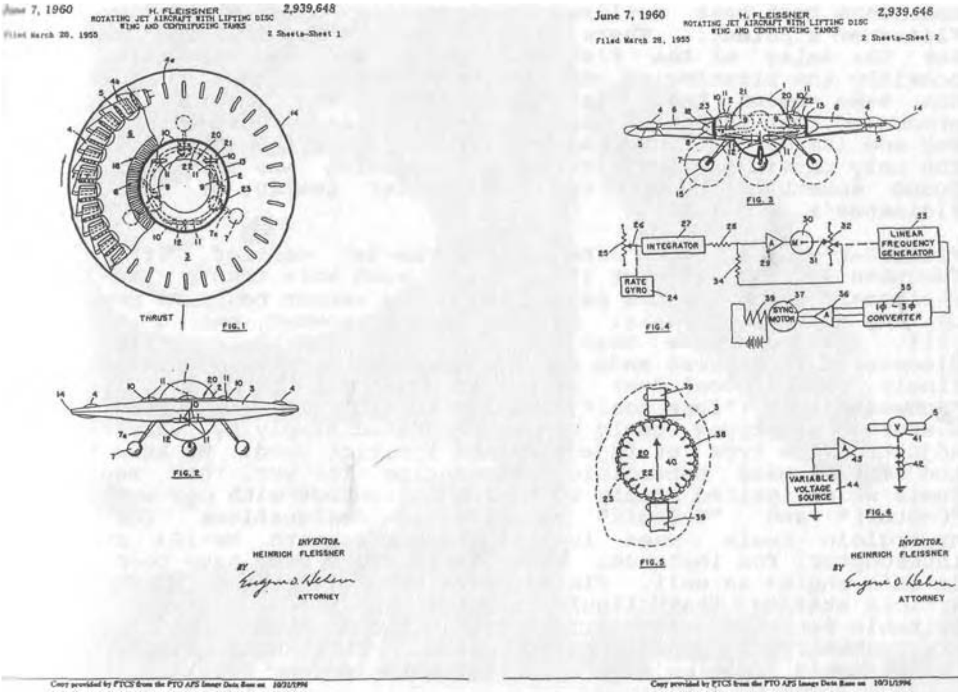
Remember that controlling authority for both the Schriever-Habermohl and the Miethe-Bellonzo projects came from officials in Peenemuende? J. Andreas Epp makes the point in his book that he originated the idea of the Schriever-Habermohl-type of flying disc and actually made a model of this flying craft. Setting aside for the moment the subject or originality, Epp sent his model to General Ernst Udet of the Luftwaffe whom he had met as a child. General Udet must have been impressed with this idea because he sent the plans and model to Peenemuende for evaluation. Peenemuende authorized the Schriever-Habermohl team to further develop the idea and as you might recall, Epp chided Schriever for straying from his original blade dimensions while crediting Habermohl for keeping them. The point is that Peenemuende set up Schriever and Habermohl to construct and further develop this design as they set up Dr. Miethe to set up further develop the Leduc engine based design. The Germans even refer to the Schriever-Habermohl design as a "Flugkreisel" or flying top in English and the Miethe design as a "Flugdiskus". Our vernacular, "flying saucer" originally corresponded to the German folk-word "Flugschiebe" or flying disc. If the Flugkreisel, Flugdiscus and Flugschiebe are all different machines and we know who built the first two then who built the third, the Flugscheibe? The answer is that Peenemuende built the Flugscheibe. Officials at Peenemuende saved the best for themselves while controlling the other two.

Let's look at some evidence. The May, 1980 issue of Neue Presse featured an article about the German fluidics engineer Heinrich Fleissner (10). Fleissner was an engineer, designer and advisor to what he calls a "Flugscheibe" project based at Peenemuende during the war. It is interesting to note that Fliessner's area of expertise, fluidics, is exactly the specialty involved in investigating problems with boundary layer flow. Fleissner reports that the saucer with which he was involved would have been capable of speeds up to 3,000 kilometers per hour within the earth's atmosphere and up to 10,000 kilometers outside the earth's atmosphere. He states that the brains of the developmental people were found in Peenemuende under the tightest of secrecy (11). We will return to this article again, at a later point, but what is of most interest to us here are three facts. First, that Fleissner worked at Peenemuende on a flying saucer project. Second, that a hint of this design has survived to this day. Third, the surviving design can be linked to photographic evidence of a German saucer, circa World War Two.

Almost ten years after the war, on March 28, 1955, Heinrich Fleissner filed a patent application with the United States Patent Office for a flying saucer (Patent Number 2,939,648). Fleissner's saucer was unlike Schriever's, Habermohl's, or Miethe's. The engine employed by Fleissner rotated around the cabin on the outside of the saucer disc itself. It was set in motion by starter rockets as with Schriever and Habermohl. The difference is that this engine was really a form of ram-jet engine. It featured slots running around the periphery of the saucer into which air was scooped. The slots continued obliquely right through the saucer disc so that jet thrust was aimed slightly downward and backward from the direction of rotation. Within the slots, fuel injectors and a timed ignition insured a proper power curve which was in accordance with the speed and direction of the saucer much like an automobile's fuel injection is timed to match the firing of the spark plugs. Steering was accomplished by directing the airflow using internal channels containing a rudder and flaps which ran alongside of the central cabin. The cabin itself was held stationary or turned in the desired direction of flight using a system of electromagnets and servo-motors coupled with a gyroscope (12).

It is interesting to note that while the patent was filed on

The Post-War Saucer Patent Of Heinrich Fleissner



June 7, 1960
H. FLEISSNER
2,939,648
ROTATING JET AIRCRAFT WITH LIFTING DISC WING AND CENTRIFUGING TANKS
Filed March 28, 1955
2 Sheets-Sheet 1
THRUST
FIG. 1
FIG. 2
INVENTOR.
HEINRICH FLEISSNER
BY ATTORNEY
June 7, 1960
H. FLEISSNER
2,939,648
ROTATING JET AIRCRAFT WITH LIFTING DISC WING AND CENTRIFUGING TANKS
Filed March 28, 1955
2 Sheets-Sheet 2
FIG. 3
INTEGRATOR
LINEAR FREQUENCY GENERATOR
RATE GYRO
SYNC MOTOR
1φ - 3φ CONVERTER
FIG. 4
FIG. 5
VARIABLE VOLTAGE SOURCE
FIG. 6
INVENTOR.
HEINRICH FLEISSNER
BY
ATTORNEY
Copy provided by PTCS from the PTO APS Image Data Base on 10/21/1996
Copy provided by PTCS from the PTO APS Image Data Base on 10/21/1996

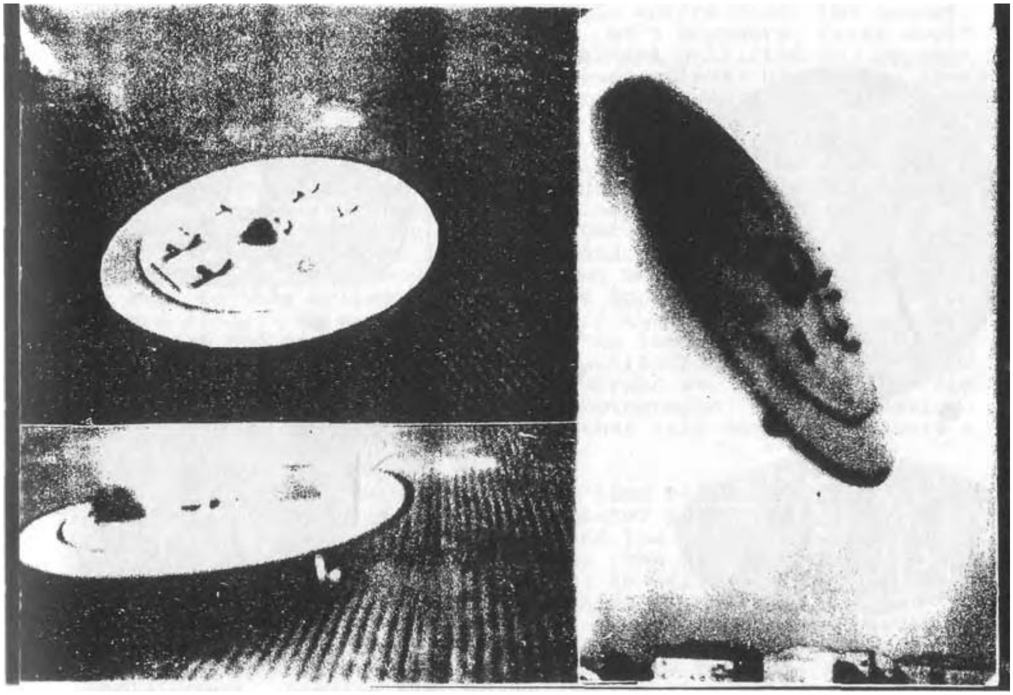
Fleissner was a technical advisor on the Peenemuende saucer project. An eye witness, known by Fleissner, told him this: "Shortly before the Capitulation, on April 24, 1945, a squadron of four flying discs took off-manned with two pilots whose names are unknown-under heavy artillery barrage from the German and Russian sides from the Berlin-Lichterfelde Airport to a still-today unknown destination." (Neue Press, 5/2/80, page 3)

March 28, 1955, it was not granted until June 7, 1960, over five years later! What could possibly have been the reason for the delay? The only possible reason concerns the American Silver Bug Project which was being developed at the same time. This was a project which was tasked with further development of the Miethe design or an outgrowth of it and simply referred to as a "radial jet engine". But we now know this Miethe project was not the equal of the Peenemuende project in terms of speed. The Americans must have realized this sometime after the filing of Fliessner's patent. There can be little doubt that the reason for the delay of the Fleissner patent was the evaluation and possibly the pirating of his design by the Americans. At about the same moment that Fieissner's patent was granted, it was announced that the joint Canadian-American saucer project, Silver Bug and its derivatives, had been abandoned by those governments. The only possible reason for this abandoning was that they had found something better and the better design, by far, was Fieissner's.

Fieissner's design was likened to a ram-jet earlier. It could function in this way but it was also much more than a ram-jet. Fleissner states in his patent that the saucer could be powered by any number of fuels: "liquid, dust, powder, gas or solid" (11). It could have used, for example, used the recently rediscovered fuel first made by Dr. Mario Zippermayr consisting of finely powered coal dust in a suspension of liquid air (13) or "Schwaramkohle" ("foam coal") and liquid air (14). Different fuel mixtures and types could be accommodated simply by varying or adjusting the type of injectors and ignition used. We know that the Germans used hypergloic fuels during the war, that meaning fuels which ignited simply by coming in contact with one another. "C-Stoff" and "T-Stoff" were German designations for the hypergloic fuels used in the Messerschmitt Me-163 rocket interceptor, for instance. These fuels could also have been used in this engine as well. Fleissner further elaborated in his 1980 article stating that liquid hydrogen and liquid oxygen were suitable for this design (11). Liquid hydrogen and liquid oxygen are rocket fuels of the highest order. This means Fieissner's saucer could function as a rocket with the proper fuel.

Shall we assess the implications? In its simplest form, Fieissner's saucer could have operated as a ram-jet on jet fuel. At its highest level, Fieissner's saucer could have operated outside the atmosphere on liquid hydrogen and oxygen. Or it could have done both. Fieissner's saucer could have taken off as a ram-jet, gained speed and aititude but at some point, reached a limit of diminishing returns. At this point, the saucer would have been able to slowly bleed liquid oxygen into the ram-jets for further performance enhancement. Further, it could slowly have replaced jet fuel with liquid hydrogen. This would be accompanied by a closing of the air intake apparatus. At this point there is no reason this saucer can not become a space ship, that is, able to operate beyond the fringes of the earth's atmosphere. Is this performance enough to impress the U.S. Air

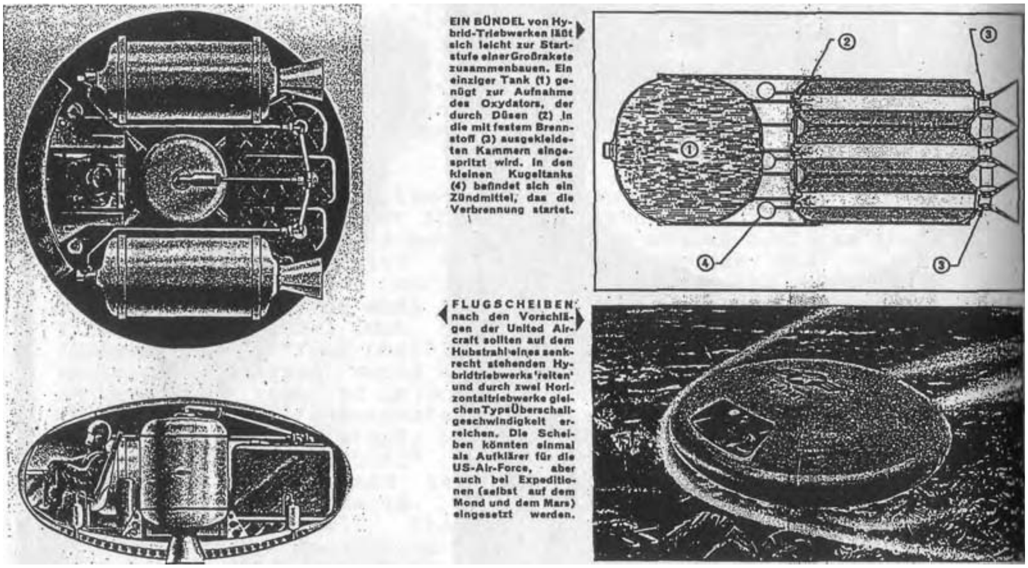
Detailed Picture Of A German Saucer



This is a blow-up of the picture attached to J. Andreas Epp's "Still Alive" letter from Prag, March, 1944. Note air intake ring and crest for steering on the roof of the cabin. Diameter is about six meters. Is this the saucer described in the Aftonbladet article? Possible location is Stettin near Peenemuende.

Thinking Outside The Box

Hybrid Liquid-Solid Propellant Rocket



EIN BÜNDEL von Hybrid-Triebwerken läßt sich leicht zur Startstufe einer Großrakete zusammenbauen. Ein einziger Tank (1) genügt zur Aufnahme des Oxydators, der durch Düsen (2) in die mit festem Brennstoff (3) ausgekleideten Kammern eingespritzt wird. In den kleinen Kugeltanks (4) befindet sich ein Zündmittel, das die Verbrennung startet.

FLUGSCHEIBEN nach den Vorschlägen der United Aircraft sollten auf dem Hubstrahl eines senkrecht stehenden Hybridtriebwerks 'reiten' und durch zwei Horizontaltriebwerke gleichen Typs Überschallgeschwindigkeit erreichen. Die Scheiben könnten einmal als Aufklärer für die US-Air-Force, aber auch bei Expeditionen (selbst auf dem Mond und dem Mars) eingesetzt werden.

Top Right: 1. Liquid Oxidizer 2. Injection Jets for Oxidizer 3. Combustion Chamber Constrictions 4. Ignition Mechanism Solid fuel shown running along sides of combustion chamber (dark color). "Schaumkohle" (porous compressed coal) are suitable as fuel as would a mixture of Aluminum power and polyurethan combined with liquid nitrogen tetroxide. Thrust controlled by amount of oxidizer injected. Hypergolic mixtures would require no ignition system. Alternately, oxydizers could be solid and fuel liquid. "Nichts ist unmoeglich" Nothing is impossible Force and the civilian population of the late 1940s and early 1950's? The answer is certainly in the affirmative.

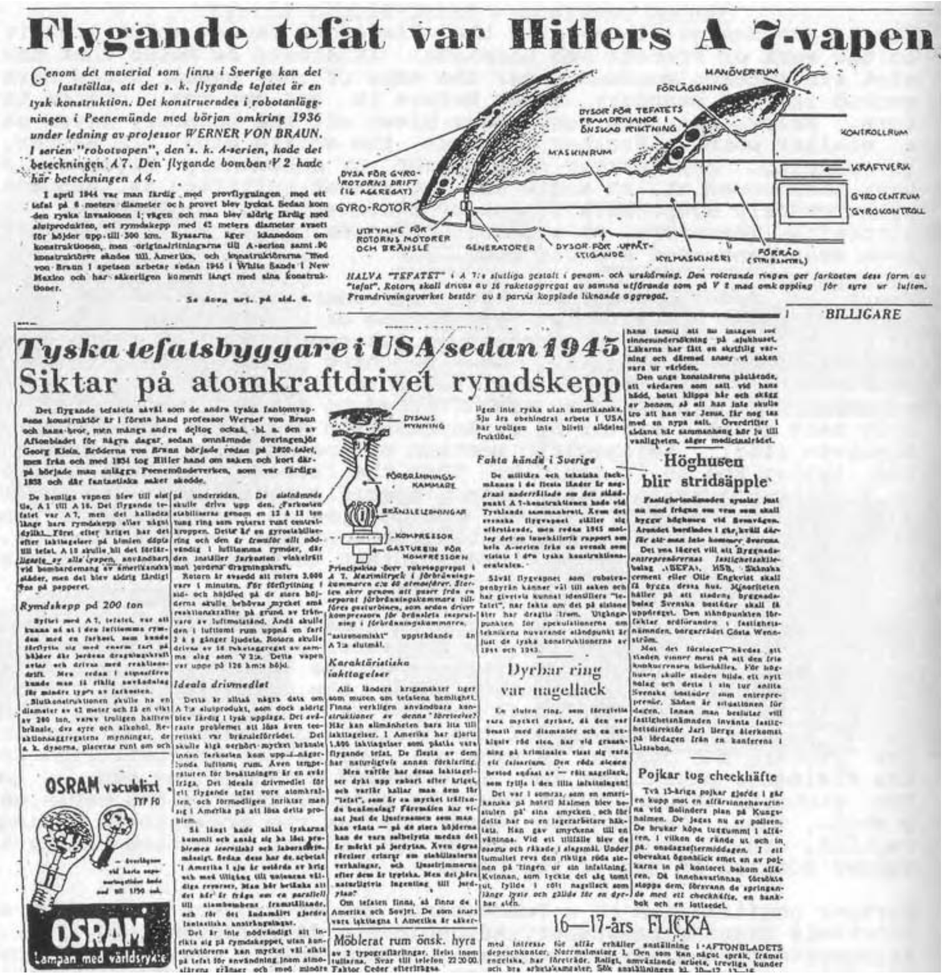
There are design elements in the Fleissner saucer which link it to the work of Prandtl and Lippisch. It should be noted that the slot air intakes mounted near the edge of the saucer would have sucked in the boundary layer before it got any real chance to form. Below, the jets would have blown off the boundary layer at a similar point. Further, because the entire wing, the saucer, is spinning, any further development of a boundary layer would have been moved at an angle and so almost nullified as happens with severely swept-back wings of a conventional high-speed jet aircraft. Therefore, at supersonic speeds, this saucer might not have even generated a sonic boom.

There is some proof that the Fleissner-type of saucer was actually built and flown at Peenemuende or a nearby test facility at Stettin. Fleissner's patent is likened to wartime reality by a photograph. Actually, it is three photographs. These photographs have appeared in a fragmentary, vintage Dutch article on German saucers and they are attached to a wartime letter from Prag sent to this writer by J. Andreas Epp and later published in Ahnstern (15). No specific mention of the photograph is made in the letter and so it could be that the late Mr. Epp included it as a general example rather than a specific reference. Epp never claimed the saucers in these photographs as his design. Epp himself claimed to have the only photographs of that device. There is reason to suspect, however, that this design does bare a relationship to the Fleissner design.

The pictures show a small saucer with some telling features. One point of correspondence with the Fleissner patent is that the air intake is located near the periphery of the saucer wing. This is seen as seen in the ring just inside the saucer's edge. The other is that the directional control is clearly viable in the rudder mounted on the top of the cockpit or central cabin. In the picture the control is external and not as sophisticated as the Fleissner patent but the idea behind both are the same. In the pictured saucer, turns would be made by turning the cabin as a whole, thus, turning the rudder just as the prehistoric flying reptile, the Pterodactyl, turned its flight direction using a rudder located on top of its head.

Further confirmation of a Peenemuende saucer project comes from a Stockholm evening newspaper, Aftonbladet, dated October 10, 1952. It reports that a flying saucer, a "space ship", was developed by the Germans during World War Two at Peenemuende by Dr. Wernher von Braun and his rocket team. A test-model of this craft lifted off in April of 1944. It was six meters in diameter. The ultimate craft to be built, was a space ship of 42 meters in diameter, capable of flying an astonishing three hundred kilometers in altitude! Not stated in the article but interesting to note is that this 300 kilometers represents a higher altitude than the first American earth orbiting satellite.



Flygande tefat var Hitlers A 7-vapen

Genom det material som finns i Sverige kan det fastställas, att det s. k. flygande tefatet är en tysk konstruktion. Det konstruerades i robotanläggningen i Peenemünde med början omkring 1936 under ledning av professor WERNER VON BRAUN. I serien "robotvapen", den s. k. A-serien, hade det beteckningen A 7. Den flygande bomben V 2 hade här beteckningen A 4.

I april 1944 var man färdig med provflygningen med ett tefat på 6 meters diameter och provet blev lyckat. Sedan kom den ryska invasionen i vägen och man blev aldrig färdig med slutprodukten, ett rymdskepp med 42 meters diameter avsett för höjder upp till 300 km. Ryssarna äger kännedom om konstruktionen, men originalritningarna till A-serien samt 90 konstruktörer sändes till Amerika, och konstruktörerna med von Braun i spetsen arbetar sedan 1945 i White Sands i New Mexico och har säkerligen kommit långt med sina konstruktioner.

Se även art. på sid. 6.

MANÖVERRUM
FÖRLÄGGNING
DYSOR FÖR TEFATETS FRAMDRIVANDE I ÖNSKAD RIKTNING KONTROLLRUM
MASKINRUM
KRAFTVERK
DYSA FÖR GYRO-ROTORNS DRIFT (16 AGGREGAT)
GYRO-ROTOR
GYRO CENTRUM
GYRO KONTROLL
UTRYMME FÖR ROTORNS MOTORER OCH BRÄNSLE
GENERATORER
DYSOR FÖR UPPÅT-STIGANDE
KYLMASKINERI
FÖRRÅD

HALVA "TEFATET" i A 7:s slutliga gestalt i genom- och urskärning. Den roterande ringen ger farkosten dess form av "tefat". Rotorn skall drivas av 16 raketaggregat av samma utförande som på V 2 med omkoppling för syre ur luften. Framdrivningsverket består av 8 parvis kopplade liknande aggregat.

BILLIGARE

Tyska tefatsbyggare i USA sedan 1945
Siktar på atomkraftdrivet rymdskepp

Det flygande tefatets såväl som de andra tyska fantomvapnens konstruktör är i första hand professor Werner von Braun och hans bror, men många andra deltog också, bl. a. den av Aftonbladet för några dagar sedan omnämnde överingenjör Georg Klein. Bröderna von Braun började redan på 1920-talet, men från och med 1934 tog Hitler hand om saken och kort därpå började man anlägga Peenemündeverken, som var färdiga 1938 och där fantastiska saker skedde.

Rymdskepp på 200 ton

Ideala drivmedlet

DYSANS MYNNING
FÖRBRÄNNINGS-KAMMARE
BRÄNSLELEDNINGAR
KOMPRESSOR
GASTURBIN FÖR KOMPRESSORN

Principskiss över raketaggregat i A 7. Maximitryck i förbränningskammaren c:a 60 atmosfärer.

Karaktäristiska iakttagelser

Fakta kända i Sverige

Dyrbar ring var nagellack

Höghusen blir stridsäpple

Pojkar tog checkhäfte

OSRAM vacublixt TYP FO

OSRAM Lampan med världsrykte

Möblerat rum önsk. hyra

16—17-års FLICKA

Swedish newspaper "Aftonbladet", dated 10/10/52, describes a German saucer built by Wernher von Braun at Peenemuende, six meters in diameter, which lifted off in April, 1944. The article states that high fuel consumption was the major problem, a problem which would be solved utilizing atomic power.

The construction drawings for this device are in the USA, according to the article, and the drawings are also known to the Russians. The chief difficulty with the saucer, according to the report, is the tremendous fuel requirements during its assent. This problem, it goes on to say, could be solved through the utilization of atomic energy.

Let us look at the picture of the three saucers again. In the lower left picture two dark objects can be seen resting on its top. Mr. Rothkugel suggests these may be bombs or fuel. Let us assume the latter, that they are fuel drums for refueling the saucer. In the USA metal drums of this type commonly contain petroleum products. They measure about three feet in height. Two are shown but six lengths could be stretched across this saucer with perhaps inches to spare. A meter is slightly over a yard. This saucer roughly corresponds in size to the description given in the Aftonbladet article. The picture on the right, minus the fuel drums and poised above some buildings, clearly shows that this saucer actually flew.

A whole technical history and organizational hierarchy can be pieced together from this picture, the Fliessner patent, and the Aftonbladet article. The Fleissner design minimizes the effects of boundary layer resistance reflecting the outcome of work starting with Ludwig Prandtl. It is a circular aircraft and a linear descendant of the circular aircraft designed by Dr. Prandtl and Dr. Alexander Lippisch. Fleissner states that he worked at Peenemuende. Peenemuende functioned as the head of all German saucer research. A fact of life at Peenemuende was that all German scientists deferred to Dr. Wernher von Braun who was an expert, the only expert, at everything. Dr. von Braun did have an organizational supervisor, Dr. Walter Dornberger, later to work for Bell Aircraft in the USA. Above Dr. Dornberger was Dr. Hans Kammler, the SS chief of all jet aircraft and vengeance weaponry. All these named men and organizations were part of the German saucer program, their public denials not withstanding.

One more loose end is tied up relating to the Fleissner design. This is the relationship of Dr. Giuseppe Belluzzo to the German saucer projects as a whole. Remember, Dr. Belluzzo was a senior scientist and engineer who specialized in materials and steam turbines. The Fleissner saucer design is normally thought of as a sort of ram-jet. But this ram-jet spun due to thrust imparted to it by its exhaust. This exhaust-supplied motion scooped in and compressed the incoming air before ignition. Low speed flight would have been impossible without this feature just as it is with any ram-jet. So another way to look at this engine is that it was a turbine-ram-jet no matter how incongruous this may sound at first. It should also be noted that in the rocket mode, when the saucer is burning only liquid oxygen and liquid hydrogen, the products of this combustion are only heat and water. Another way to say heat and water is steam. To repeat, Dr. Giuseppe Belluzzo was a steam-turbine expert. As mentioned earlier, Mr. Rothkugel reports that Dr. Belluzzo visited and, presumably consulted with. Dr. Alexander Lippisch at Augsberg. Dr. Belluzzo's involvement with the German saucer projects should not be assumed to be confined to the Miethe project.

Let's review the Peenemuende Project to this point. It is a wide ranging project with at least two spin-offs, the Schriever-Habermohl project and the Miethe project. The Schriever-Habermohl project(s) employ a whirling set of vane-blades and one or more rocket or jet engines in a kind of "spinning top" manner. It may have been capable of supersonic flight. The Miethe project differs in that it employs an internal spinning turbo-jet first invented by Rene Leduc. Depending of the saucer configuration, its thrust can be vented in any direction for steering purposes. It also may have been capable of supersonic flight.

This design was given further study and was probably developed after the war in the form of the John Frost "Manta". A design such as this may have been responsible for the sightings by Kenneth Arnold near Mt. Rainier in the State of Washington in June of 1947. It was probably responsible for the pictures taken by William Rhodes as seen and described in the July 9, 1947 edition of the newspaper, The Arizona Republic. This same design, described as a "Flying Shoe" may have figured in the Roswell crash. Ideas from this design may have been further developed by A.V. Roe, Limited company in Canada.

Besides retaining overall control of these two saucer projects, the officials at Peenemuende retained and developed their own saucer project. Using similarities between surviving pictures from the time and the patent filed by a former member of that project, Heinrich Fleissner, we can piece together something of its design. Its identifying characteristic is its engine which has been described earlier as a turbine-ram-jet. It could operate using a variety of fuels. It could function as a jet engine within the atmosphere or covert to a rocket engine using liquid oxygen and liquid hydrogen. Its speed and altitude limits would have been much greater than either the Schriever-Habermohl or the Miethe saucers, yet its construction would have been less complex than the advanced designs of the radial-jet engines being developed in the Canada as part of the Silver Bug Program. Recognition of these facts, especially after the 1955 patent application by Fleissner, probably lead to the abandonment of the A.V. Roe, Limited project(s). A cover project, the "Avrocar" was released to the public, discredited by its own designers, and put away to be forgotten.

In discussing the Aftonbladet article we have jumped ahead of our story slightly in order to connect the three saucers pictures with the Fleissner saucer patent in a proper context. The Aftonbladet article has other implication which will be discussed. Now, however, we must once again return to basics in order to illustrate the next stage of saucer development envisioned by the German scientists.

Vesco makes mention of liquified air or liquid propellants or explosives numerous times in discussing flying saucers (16)(17)(18)(19)(20). Vesco refers to saucers powered using "liquid air". On page 135-136 of Intercept UFO he says:

"After the German surrender in May 1945, when the British examined the secret papers of the technical departments of certain factories hidden in the forested area of the Schwarzwald-another region earmarked as an "island" for a last-ditch stand-they discovered that some of the documents miraculously spared from the retreating S.S. units' destruction of papers concerned "the important experiments conducted with liquid air as a power supply for certain new types of turbine engines capable of producing tremendous power outputs. At first the discovery led them to believe that a new system for powering submarines was under study, but ancillary information about the construction of powerful apparatuses working on principle of electromagnetic waves that would make it possible to exercise radio control at great distances, as well as photographs showing some parts of the new turbine, caused them to change their minds. Thus they got on the track of a preliminary preparatory stage for a new and very powerful type of armored, radio-controlled aircraft".

Mr. Rothkugel points out that the logical projection of Vesco's statements on liquid air would involve a saucer in with air would be drawn in through the skin or through slots in the upper wing (saucer), then rapidly cooled by special equipment into liquid air. The liquid air would be burnt in a combustion chamber and the hot air and steam would be exited through a turbine used to produce the electricity which this process would require.

The saucer would be drawn along through the atmosphere by the low pressure area to its front and top as well as by aerodynamic forces caused by its wing at low speed. With the addition of more liquid air into the combustion chamber, the expansive forces involving the conversion of a liquid to a gas would provide additional performance enhancement. This amazing and little-know method was invented and patented by the Austrian Karl Nowak in 1943 (21) and will work even with inert gasses. Of course, even nitrogen, sometimes considered an inert gas and which constitutes the major component of our atmosphere, can be burnt with sufficing electrical ignition as is witnessed in lightning. The cooling needed to liquify the air would be generated using a cryostat, probably liquid helium. Liquid helium is the coldest of gasses, minus 452 degrees F, just above absolute zero. In addition to the cryostat, magnetic cooling machinery, such as is employed to produce liquid nitrogen would be employed (22). From the cooling power of liquid helium and evaporative techniques, liquid nitrogen and liquid oxygen can be made which are the major constituents of our atmosphere.

A saucer which could gather its fuel along the way has one obvious advantage. It could stay aloft for days if not weeks. More conventional chemical power could be employed for take-offs and landings and for bursts of speed necessary for military applications. In fact, there is no reason that the propulsion systems of the Fleissner saucer and the liquid air saucer envisioned by Vesco could not be combined into one aircraft.

It is unknown at this time if actual steps were taken to realize a liquid air powered flying saucer by the Germans. Whether it was undertaken or not it certainly did lead thinking on to the next step in this process and for this step there is more than a little evidence. This step was mentioned in the Aftonbladet article. It involves atomic power. Yes, the Germans intended to build a nuclear powered flying saucer (23).

These are the conclusions first reached by Dr. Milos Jesensky and engineer Robert Lesniakiewicz in 1998. The former author is a Czech and the latter author is a Pole. Both belong to a large UFO organization which functions in both countries. After the Soviet pullout there were no restrictions on excavation of unused military sites belonging to the Germans during the Second World War. This organization got busy interviewing witnesses who had connections to those times as well as identifying German underground facilities. They opened up as many of these as they could find, and they were numerous. Most of the Polish sites were within the borders of Germany at that time since the borders, before and during the Second World War, extended into about 20% of Western Poland. Other sites were in the heavily German dominated areas of Moravia and Bohemia, now the Czech Republic.

Of course, the Germans had taken out what they wanted before retreating and then sealed up the entrances with explosives. As an example of how far this research group was willing to go, they not only opened up and explored the upper levels of Der Riese, mentioned earlier, but also explored the flooded lower levels, in the cold, silent darkness using scuba gear. Besides Der Riese, other very large sites were discovered and explored including "Robert 1", "Robert 11", and "Robert 111".

They found that the larger sites were really composed of a complex of sites. For instance, at Der Riese some of these sites within the larger facility were involved in mining uranium ore. Some were involved in refining the ore. Some other sites were involved in nuclear research (24).

Wartime German work in nuclear research was not confined to bomb building, as it was in the USA. The Germans were also interested in harnessing the atom as an energy source. Remember, Germany was dependent upon foreign sources of oil for energy. German planners long realized this was a weakness and had been trying to correct the problem since the early 1930s. Great plans were in the works, if not actually built, for atomic reactors used to generate electricity. These were sometimes called "uranium machines" by the Germans. Not only were these uranium machines to be used to generate electricity but they were also destined to power submarines and aircraft.

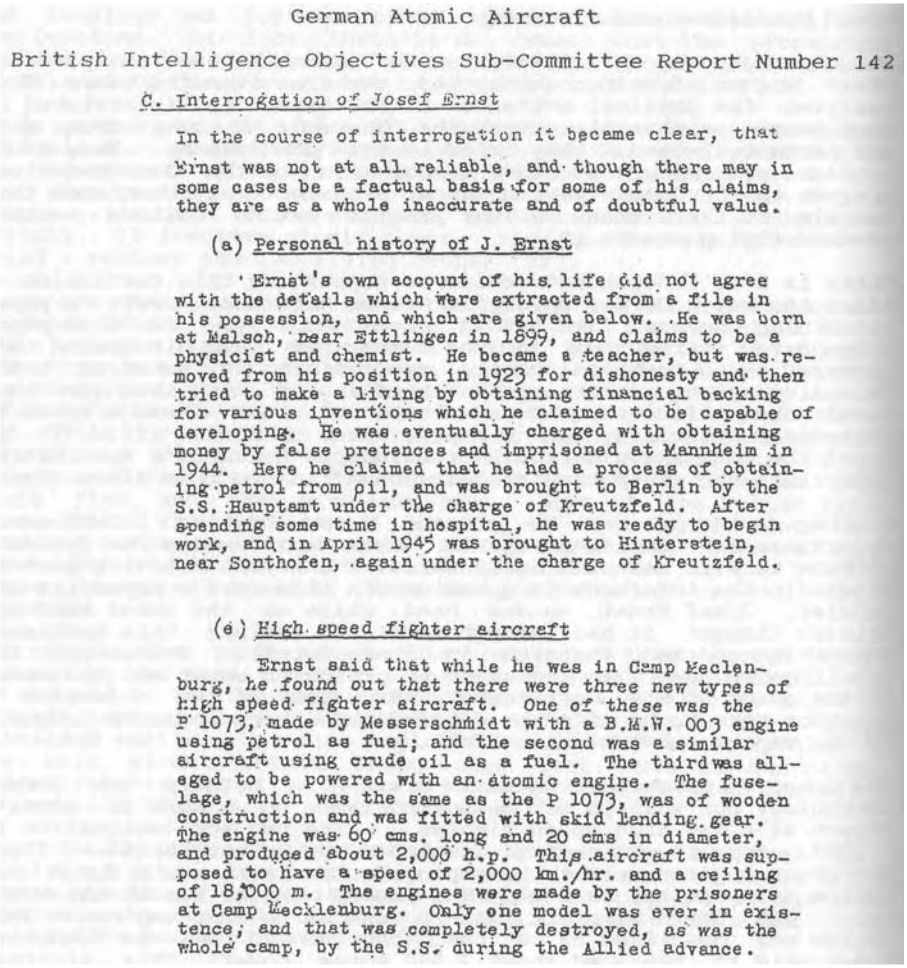
Dr. Jesensky and Mr. Lesniakiewicz assembled and analyzed the great volume of evidence they had gathered over the years. They analyzed the physical evidence of the sites and interviewed as many people as possible. From the thousands of observations made and facts collected, they tried to draw conclusions. They found a close proximity and close association of the German nuclear program to the German flying saucer program. They concluded that one aim of the German nuclear program was to build a nuclear powered flying saucer (23).

There is some independent evidence supporting this conclusion. After the war, German physicist Werner Heisenberg wrote a paper concerning German interest in atomic energy. In that paper Heisenberg stated that in the summer of 1942 discussion had occurred among technical people specializing in issues of heat. This discussion concerning the handling of technical questions about the efficiency of conversion of heat from uranium to determined materials, for example, water or steam (25). It is hoped the reader would recall Dr. Giuseppe Belluzzo's specialties (materials and steam turbines) in connection to this discussion.

Further evidence can be gleaned from British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Report. This report seems to follow a pattern we will see used again twice. The report does its best to discredit the informant in question, in this case a physicist and chemist, Josef Ernst, on one hand, while on the other hand the British thought it had enough merit to include this testimony concerning German research in some detail. Evidently, the intelligence agency in question is trying to cover all the bases in the event of any contingency. No matter if the scientist in question were to be cited or discredited, there would be language in the report substantiating both.

The report describes several areas of totally new German technology but what is of most importance to us here is Ernst's report of a new high speed fighter. The project designation is P-1073, and it was being developed by Messerschmitt. Three different engines were to be employed. The first was a B.M.W. 003 engine using petrol as fuel. The second engine was to use crude oil. The third aircraft was to use an atomic engine. This engine was described as 60 cms. long and 20 cms. in diameter. Ernst said it produced about 2,000 horse power! This aircraft was supposed to have a speed of 2,000 kilometers per hour (about 1250 m.p.h.) and a ceiling of 18,000 meters (over 54,000 feet). It was made at a Camp Mecklenburg. Only one model was ever made and it was destroyed, as was Camp Mecklenburg, by the SS before being taken by the Allies (26).

Establishment historians have all told us that the German atomic program was inept and disorganized. There may be some evidence for the charge that they did not share information between themselves due to strong rivalry (27) but the real facts are



German Atomic Aircraft

British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Report Number 142

C. Interrogation of Josef Ernst

In the course of interrogation it became clear, that Ernst was not at all reliable, and though there may in some cases be a factual basis for some of his claims, they are as a whole inaccurate and of doubtful value.

(a) Personal history of J. Ernst

Ernst's own account of his life did not agree with the details which were extracted from a file in his possession, and which are given below. He was born at Malsch, near Ettlingen in 1899, and claims to be a physicist and chemist. He became a teacher, but was removed from his position in 1923 for dishonesty and then tried to make a living by obtaining financial backing for various inventions which he claimed to be capable of developing. He was eventually charged with obtaining money by false pretences and imprisoned at Mannheim in 1944. Here he claimed that he had a process of obtaining petrol from oil, and was brought to Berlin by the S.S. Hauptamt under the charge of Kreutzfeld. After spending some time in hospital, he was ready to begin work, and in April 1945 was brought to Hinterstein, near Sonthofen, again under the charge of Kreutzfeld.

(e) High speed fighter aircraft

Ernst said that while he was in Camp Meclenburg, he found out that there were three new types of high speed fighter aircraft. One of these was the P 1073, made by Messerschmidt with a B.M.W. 003 engine using petrol as fuel; and the second was a similar aircraft using crude oil as a fuel. The third was alleged to be powered with an atomic engine. The fuselage, which was the same as the P 1073, was of wooden construction and was fitted with skid landing gear. The engine was 60 cms. long and 20 cms in diameter, and produced about 2,000 h.p. This aircraft was supposed to have a speed of 2,000 km./hr. and a ceiling of 18,000 m. The engines were made by the prisoners at Camp Mecklenburg. Only one model was ever in existence; and that was completely destroyed, as was the whole camp, by the S.S. during the Allied advance.

Top: British efforts to accredit and discredit their informant, Josef Ernst. This theme appears repeatedly in Allied documents in association with German informants. The intelligence people were merely covering themselves for all eventualities. Bottom: A German atomic airplane built at Mecklenburg. The Mecklenburg facility utilized some personnel which were considered to be a security risk.

quite different than heretofore publicly disclosed (28). The overwhelming fact is that until now establishment historians have not had enough information to reach final conclusions about the German atomic program. Many facts have been concealed and these facts are only now being brought into the open. One fact is that there were even more German atomic programs than previously known, and the fact is that one of these programs was run by the SS (28).

One establishment historian, Thomas Powers (29), perhaps unwittingly gives us some insight into the discussion at hand, Powers concentrates on the historical sequence of the German atomic program and with the people involved and their relationships with one another. He also follows the progress of the many organizations researching atomic physics for the purposes of energy production and bomb making. Powers documents six such groups.

One group concerns this discussion. It was run by the Heereswaffenamt or Army Weapons Department. Its Director of Research was Dr. Erich Schumann who was also the scientific advisor to Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel. Schumann was a professor of military physics at the University of Berlin. He also held a commission in the army so with these credentials he was able to move comfortably in both academic and military circles. Schumann should be thought of as an administrator rather than a research scientist (30).

The field of research was left to Dr. Kurt Diebner (31). Diebner was a physicist for the Heereswaffenamt since 1934 and headed his own atomic research project. German physics during the war years was geared towards practical results. During the early phases of the war it was thought that nuclear weapons were unnecessary. The thinking at the time was that the war could be won without an atomic bomb using conventional weaponry. Therefore, work on atomic weapons was de-emphasized in the early years of the war. Work on atomic means of energy production was always a high priority, a priority which only got higher as the war drug to a conclusion.

Germany always felt more threatened by dependence upon foreign sources for energy. Therefore, harnessing the energy potential of the atom for an ongoing source of energy was always a concern for German atomic scientists, much more so than for the Americans. This aim is clearly mentioned in discussion among the scientists involved in the work.

In early 1942 the success of Diebner's reactor experiments lead him to propose a full-scale effort to develop both power-producing machines and atomic bombs. He continued to pressure Schumann who was more pessimistic about the possibilities of bringing this research to a practical result. Schumann finally became convinced and agreed to give a presentation to top Nazi officials of their findings. The text of Schumann's speech was to stress the more conservative energy production aspect of atomic research rather than the building of a bomb. This was considered more feasible and so gives us an insight into the German atomic program and its thinking (32).

One example of their optimism was the participation of Diebner in plans for building an atomic power plant for Germany's submarine fleet. The year 1945 was mentioned as a target date for this to happen (33)(34).

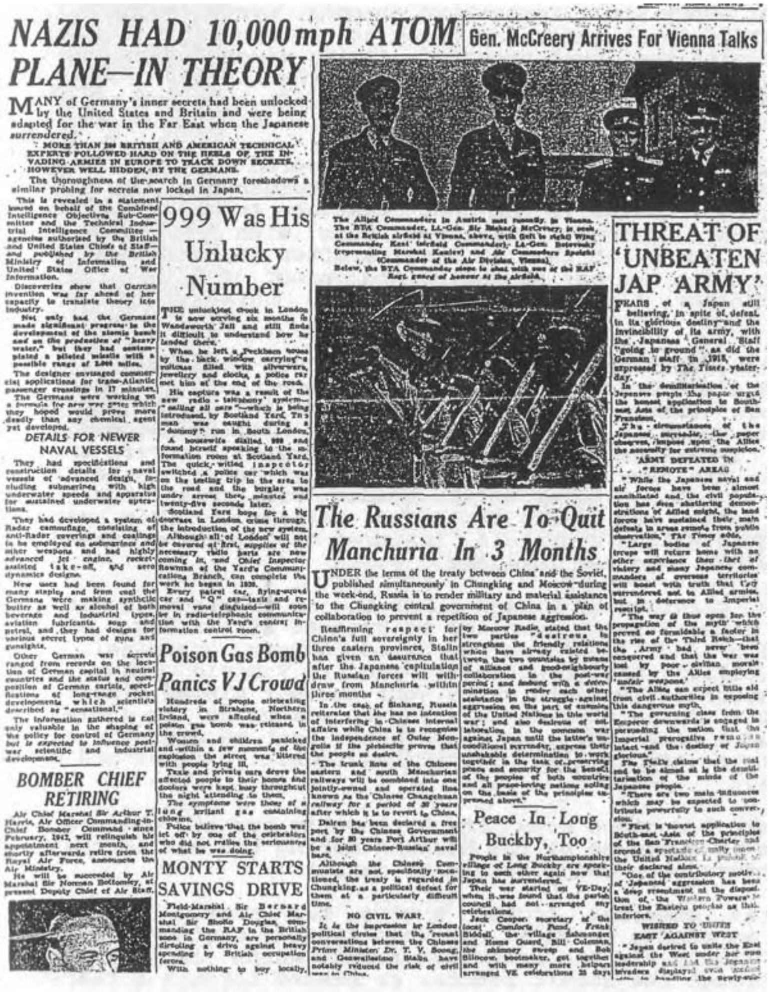
Diebner's relationship to Schumann is made clear by Powers. Powers also introduces us to two additional players who were not officially involved with this project but who somehow interject themselves into things making their view heard.

The first is industrial physicist, Carl Ramsauer. Ramsauer was the head of the German Physical Society and a leading researcher for the electrical firm Allgemeine Elektrizitaetsgesellschaft. Ramsauer urged the German research establishment to rid itself of ethnic physics and get down to the business of using science to win a war (35).

A second scientist interjected himself into the fray in support of Ramsauer. This was none other than Ludwig Prandtl whom we have met earlier (36). Prandtl was familiar with the potential of fission's use in the war effort and insisted that the Nazis let scientists do science without reference to ethnic background or politics. Why was German atomic research so important to an a scientist involved in aeronautics? What aims did Prandtl have in common with these other individuals which linked them together? What was the urgency that compelled Ramsauer and Prandtl to intervene in a matter outside their areas of expertise and in opposition to the will of Nazi officials?

To answer those questions, let us look at each individual involved and his major area of interest. Professor Erich Schumann's interest was the military application of atomic energy. Dr. Kurt Diebner's interest was the development of atomic energy for nuclear weaponry as well as for a variety of other applications. As an industrialist, Karl Ramsauer's expertise was putting technology into large-scale, practical, production. In this time and place that meant military production. We already know that Professor Ludwig Prandl's interests were round-wing, suction aircraft. The interests of these four could only coincide if we were discussing tha military-industrial production of a nuclear powered, round-wing, suction aircraft.

In addition, it is now known that Dr. Diebner, more than any other well known German scientist, was at the heart of the German atomic bomb development. It was Dr. Diebner who participated in the development of a German uranium bomb which was being prepared in one of the underground facilities at Jonastal, specifically at a facility "Burg". Not only did Dr. Diebner do this but he did



NAZIS HAD 10,000 mph ATOM PLANE—IN THEORY

MANY of Germany's inner secrets had been unlocked by the United States and Britain and were being adapted for the war in the Far East when the Japanese surrendered.

MORE THAN 200 BRITISH AND AMERICAN TECHNICAL EXPERTS FOLLOWED HARD ON THE HEELS OF THE INVADING ARMIES IN EUROPE TO TRACK DOWN SECRETS, HOWEVER WELL HIDDEN, BY THE GERMANS.

The thoroughness of the search in Germany foreshadows a similar probing for secrets now locked in Japan.

This is revealed in a statement issued on behalf of the Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee and the Technical Industrial Intelligence Committee — agencies authorised by the British and United States Chiefs of Staff — and published by the British Ministry of Information and United States Office of War Information.

Discoveries show that German invention was far ahead of her capacity to translate theory into industry.

Not only had the Germans made significant progress in the development of the atomic bomb and on the production of "heavy water," but they had contemplated a piloted missile with a possible range of 2,000 miles.

The designer envisaged commercial applications for trans-Atlantic passenger crossings in 17 minutes.

DETAILS FOR NEWER NAVAL VESSELS

BOMBER CHIEF RETIRING

Air Chief Marshal Sir Arthur T. Harris, Air Officer Commanding-in-Chief Bomber Command since February, 1942, will relinquish his appointment next month, and shortly afterwards retire from the Royal Air Force, announces the Air Ministry.

He will be succeeded by Air Marshal Sir Norman Bottomley, at present Deputy Chief of Air Staff.

999 Was His Unlucky Number

THE unluckiest crook in London is now serving six months in Wandsworth Jail and still finds it difficult to understand how he landed there.

Poison Gas Bomb Panics VJ Crowd

Hundreds of people celebrating victory in Strabane, Northern Ireland, were affected when a poison gas bomb was released in the crowd.

MONTY STARTS SAVINGS DRIVE

Field-Marshal Sir Bernard Montgomery and Air Chief Marshal Sir Sholto Douglas, commanding the RAF in the British zone in Germany, are personally directing a drive against heavy spending by British occupation forces.

Gen. McCreery Arrives For Vienna Talks

The Russians Are To Quit Manchuria In 3 Months

UNDER the terms of the treaty between China and the Soviet, published simultaneously in Chungking and Moscow during the week-end, Russia is to render military and material assistance to the Chungking central government of China in a plan of collaboration to prevent a repetition of Japanese aggression.

Reaffirming respect for China's full sovereignty in her three eastern provinces, Stalin has given an assurance that after the Japanese capitulation the Russian forces will withdraw from Manchuria within three months.

NO CIVIL WAR?

Peace In Long Buckby, Too

People in the Northamptonshire village of Long Buckby are speaking to each other again now that Japan has surrendered.

THREAT OF 'UNBEATEN JAP ARMY'

FEARS of a Japan still believing, in spite of defeat, in its glorious destiny and the invincibility of its army, with the Japanese General Staff "going to ground" as did the German staff in 1918, were expressed by The Times yesterday.

ARMY DEFEATED IN "REMOTE" AREAS

WISHED TO UNITE EAST AGAINST WEST

The 8th Army News, Triest, August 28, 1945, page three. For a short period of time, before the Cold War started heating up, censorship, both military and civilian was lax. It is from this time period from which we get much valuable information this within a working association with the SS atomic research team mentioned above (37). This SS connection runs back to Prag, the Skoda Works and the Kammler Group who held knowledge and control of every truly innovative weapons system being developed by the Third Reich including those at Peenemuende. As we know, this included the development of flying discs. The association of the facilities in and around Prag, the Kammler Group, atomic energy and German flying discs has been made by other researchers using other evidence (38). This connection seems very strong.

The Germans were planning an nuclear powered flying saucer just as they were planning a nuclear powered submarine. The proof for both of these claims is the fact that the Americans discovered such plans, further developed them with captured German scientists, and built them in America after the war. We already know about the nuclear submarine and proof of American plans to build a nuclear flying saucer based upon German ideas has just been reveled.

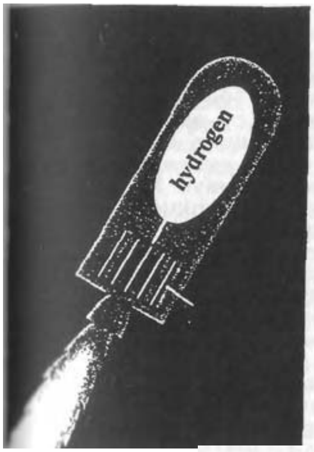
Jim Wilson, writing in the November, 2000 edition of Popular Mechanics discloses something of major importance. Wilson tells of the days following the collapse of the 3rd Reich and a rumor which had begun circulating in Allied military intelligence circles. Interrogations of captured German aircraft engineers pointed to the development of a super-fast German rocket fighter at a secret base in Bavaria (the reader will recall the research aircraft 8-346 and P-073 mentioned earlier). This aircraft, according to Wilson's article, featured odd looking curved wings which blended into the fuselage.

Documents obtained by Wilson point to an American secret saucer project, separate and parallel to Project Silver Bug, of German inspiration and involving captured German personnel. This project, called the Lenticular Reentry Vehicle (LRV), was a flying saucer designed to carry four nuclear tipped missiles into earth orbit for a mission duration of six weeks at a time. The saucer had a four man crew, was forty feet in diameter and was powered by a combination of chemical rocket engines and nuclear power (39).

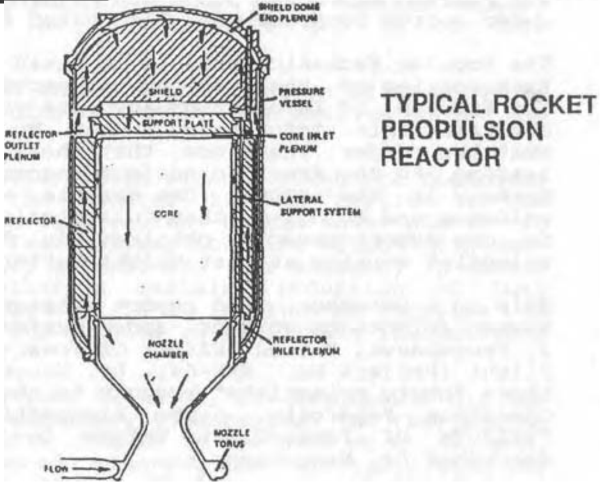
The chemical engines were the hypergolic rocket engines of the same type as employed by the Germans during the war in the Me-162 rocket interceptor and referred to earlier.

Besides the chemical rocket engine, two atomic engines were employed as atomic rockets. In this type of engine a liquid gas (perhaps liquid air as described above) which is very cold, is passed through the atomic reactor or passed through a radiator of molten metal heated by the reactor. The liquid gas turns to vapor instantly and is accelerated out the rear of the rocket at a greater velocity than can be obtained by burning two liquid gases, for instance, hydrogen and oxygen. Although a shielded nuclear reactor is certainly heavier than an air-cooled aero-engine, there might an overall weight savings as compared to a

How An Atomic Rocket Works



Nuclear Gas Core Reactor



TYPICAL ROCKET PROPULSION REACTOR
SHIELD DOME END PLENUM SHIELD
PRESSURE VESSEL
SUPPORT PLATE
REFLECTOR OUTLET PLENUM
CORE INLET PLENUM
REFLECTOR
CORE LATERAL SUPPORT SYSTEM
NOZZLE CHAMBER
REFLECTOR INLET PLENUM
NOZZLE TORUS
FLOW

Top: The simple story is that hydrogen is passed through or by an atomic reactor. The very cold liquid hydrogen in instantly heated and greatly expands, providing thrust for the rocket. No actual combustion occurs and no oxidizer is needed. Bottom: A detailed look at the reactor itself.

conventional liquid rocket system since a liquid oxidizer, such as liquid oxygen, need not be carried on the vehicle. The atomic engine would also produce electricity for the saucer using this expansive output coupled to a turbine generator.

Wilson cites some evidence that this saucer was built and actually flew (40). Orbiting at an altitude of 300 miles and with a six week mission, this saucer was in reality an orbiting space station capable of raining destruction down upon any country or countries deemed an enemy. One can extrapolate a rotation system by which such a dreadnought was always kept on station for such a contingency. Klaus-Peter Rothkugel has suggested that an orbiting doomsday space station such as this was to be called the "Gatland Space Station" and that it was part of a strategic military joint-effort between the United States, Britain, Canada and perhaps Australia. Before the Popular Mechanics revelation, this assertion might have been dismissed as lacking in proof but now this idea must be given a hearing.

Wilson states that project's general contractor was North American Aviation in California but the project was managed out of Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in Ohio where German engineers who worked on rocket plane and flying disc projects were housed under secret contract with the United States government (41).

The Popular Mechanics article is based upon information obtained from working on the American perspective and going back in time. The Freedom Of Information Act was very skillfully employed in obtaining this information. What Mr. Wilson did not know was what the reader knows now, that there is a trail of information leading to the American nuclear saucer project which started in Germany in the 1930s. One example which links both lines of evidence and bringing them full-circle back to the German origin is one report recently obtained via FOIA on a particular German scientist working at that Wright-Patterson facility.

This is a December, 1946 report written by one of those captured German scientists working under contract for the USA, Dr. Franz J. Neugebauer, titled "Effect Of Power-Plant Weight On Economy Of Flight (Project No. NFE-64). Dr. Neugebauer was, in fact, one of those "booty scientists" brought to the USA under the auspices of Operation Paperclip. The Biographical Note in the report, "Effects Of Power-Plant Weight On the Economy Of Flight", describes Dr. Neugebauer as:

"Dr. Franz J. Neugebauer is the foremost German authority on this subject. An Expert on internal-combustion engines and a specialist for Diesel compound aircraft engines, he held leading positions at Junkers in Dessau and Munich from 1924 to 1943, and was director of the engineering department of the Institute for Aeronautical Research at Munich from 1943 to 1945.

Dr. Neugebauer is employed at present in the Propulsion Section, Analysis Division, Intelligence (T-2), AMC, Wright field, Dayton, Ohio" (42).

Two comments are in order. The first is that Junkers-Dessau is associated with a possible German saucer project designated "Schildkroete" which will be discussed later. The second comment is that Dr. Neugebauer was not brought to the USA to build diesel-powered aircraft. Diesel engines are much heavier than piston type aero-engines of those times. Dr. Neugebauer's relevant expertise is, in reality, his knowledge of the effects of heavy engines on aircraft performance and economy.

Nowhere in this report are the words "atomic rocket" mentioned but the implications are clear. As touched upon above, an atomic rocket's weight distribution would be somewhat different from that of a conventional rocket or aircraft. The nuclear reactor would be weighty but the fuel load would be lighter because no oxidizer, such as liquid oxygen, would be necessary. Also, the power output would be somewhat greater than an ordinary liquid fuel chemical rocket. The three variables as opposed to the already known figures for piston, jet or chemical rocket engines are greater engine weight, lesser fuel weight, and greater power output. A new equation was necessary if atomic rockets were to be fitted into an aircraft design calling for a certain speed, payload or range. It was Dr. Neugebauer's job to do this computation.

The following is a paragraph from the introduction of this report (43). It seems to say nothing but state the obvious until one thinks "atomic engine":

"Power-plant weight is a factor which affects flight performance; the greater the weight, the greater is that portion of the airplane and the drag which is affected by the power plant. In contrast to the effect of fuel consumption, the effect of power-plant weight cannot be easily determined. For example, it cannot be easily determined whether a certain reduction of fuel consumption is still advantageous if it involves an increase in power plant weight. This report aims to facilitate insight into these and similar questions."

Without ever mentioning the word "atomic", Dr. Neugebauer did the mathematical computations necessary to establish the feasibility of an atomic powered aircraft. Thanks to the work of Mr. Wilson, we know that at least advanced planning was undertaken with the goal of building an atomic powered flying saucer. There is no doubt that the Americans would not have involved captured German scientists in this project unless it was absolutely necessary to do so. The reason it was necessary was the same reason which other German scientists were employed in America's ballistic missile program. It was because both groups of German scientists has previous experience. Both groups worked on very similar projects in Germany during the war. These scientists and their projects were far ahead of the Americans in both these areas. The input of these scientists was absolutely essential if these projects were to succeed in a timely matter, meaning, ahead of the Soviets.

Two final points or comments should be added to this discussion. First, while the Peenemuende saucer project was run in and around Peenemuende, research and component work were probably also done in other facilities elsewhere within the Greater Reich. References to saucer research at some of these other sites by this or other writers may be, in fact, part of the overall Peenemuende project.

Second, historically speaking, the German atomic projects have always been minimized to say the least. For whatever reason, there seems to have been a concerted effort to deny German expertise in the field of atomic energy. Originally, this may have been government inspired. Now, however, it seems to be a mantra taken up as part of some agenda whose specifics remain clouded. "Nay-saying" regarding German atomic projects has become sheik and those who expound it imply knowledge and sophistication in their opinions. Anyone doubting the high degree of understanding possessed within the Third Reich concerning matters "atomic" should take a look at the evidence being put forth by on-site investigators and German language researchers which have arisen since the fall of the Berlin Wall. Much of this information is in book form available from Anum Verlag. Anyone with the interest and ability to read German language is urged to contact this publisher for a list of publications. After reviewing the evidence, German wartime expertise in atomic research sounds much less far-fetched than the nay-sayers would have you believe.

The Peenemuende Project

Sources and References

1. Goldstein, Sydney, 1948, pages 189 and 190, "Low-Drag and Suction Airfoils", Journal Of The Aeronautical Sciences, Volume 15, Number 4, University of Manchester, England

2. Pretsch, J., date unknown, "Umschlagbeginn und Absaugung Ein Breitrag zur Grenzschichttheorie", Report of the Aerodynamic Research Facility at Goettingen

3. Betz, A., 1961, page 1, in Boundary Layer And Flow Control edited by G.V. Lachmann, Pergamon Press, Oxford

4. Betz, A., 1961, page 6

5. Schlichting, H., 1942, "Die Grenzschicht and der ebenen Platte mit Absaugung and Ausblasen", Luftfahrt-Forschung

6. Kinner, Wilhelm, 1936, "Ueber Tragfluegel mit Kreisfoermigen

Grundriss", Vortraege der Hauptversammlung in Dresden, Band 16, Heft 6,

7. Hansen, M., 1938, "Messungen and Kreistragflaechen und Vergliech mit der Theorie der tragenden Flaeche", Vortraege der Hauptversammlung in Goettingen

8. Miranda, J. and P. Mercado, 1998, page 4, "Deutsche Kreisfluegelflugzeuge", Flugzug Profile

9. Rothkugel, Klaus-Peter, 2000, pages 1 and 2, "Dr. Alexander Lippisch der "Vater" der "fliegenden Untertassen", privately published information sheet

10. Sandner, Reinhardt, 1980, page 3, "Der Vater der fliegenden Untertasse 1st ein alter Ausburger", Neu Presse, number 19/17

11. ibid

12. U.S. Patent, Number 2,939,648, Granted June 7, 1960 filed March 28,1955, United States of America granted to H. Fleissner,"Rotating Jet Aircraft With Lifting Disc Wing And Centrifuging Tanks"

13. British Objectives Sub-Committee Report Number 143, "Information Obtained From Targets Of Opportunity In The Sonthosen Area, pages 4 and 5, 32 Bryanston Square, London

14. Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Evaluation Report Number 289, 1945, Interrogation of Drs. Julius Schmitt, Ludwig Schmitt, and Heinrich Schmitt, of Dr. Heinrich Schmitt-Werke, K.G. Berchtesgarden

15. Kadmon, 2000, Ahnstern IX "Andreas Epp", Aorta c/o Petak, Postfach 778, A-1011, Wien, Austria

16. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 93, Intercept UFO, Pinnacle Books, New York

17. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 135-136

18. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 164

19. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 168

20. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 163

21. German Patent, 1943, Karl Nowak, German Patent Number 905847, Class 12g, Group 101, Subsequently issued by the German Federal Republic on March 8, 1954. "Verfahren und Einrichtung zur Aenderung von Stoffeigenschaften Oder Herstellung von stark expansionsfaehingen Stoffen" (English translation: Method and Arrangement to the change from material properties or production of strong expansive capable matter)

22. Van Norstrand's Scientific Encyclopedia, 1954, pages 453-454 and 978-979.

23. Jesensky, Milos PhD. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, pages 51, 146, 151, "Wunderland" Mimozemske Technologie Treti Rise. Aos Publishing

24. Jesensky, Milos PhD. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, pages 41-43.

25. Heisenberg, Werner PhD., 1946, page 327, "Ueber die Arbeiten zur technichen Ausnutzung der Atomkernenergie in Deutschland" (In English: Concerning the Work Toward the Technical Exploitation of Nuclear Energy in Germany) courtesy of Mr. Klaus-Peter Rothkugel

26. British Intelligence Objectivers Sub-Committee Report Number 142, 1946, page 8, "Information Obtained From Targets Of Opportunity In The Sonthofen Area", London, courtesy of Friedrich Georg

27. Georg, Friedrich, 2000, page 222, Hitlers Siegeswaffen Band 1: Luftwaffe und Marine Geheim Nuklearwaffen des Dritten Reiches und ihre Traegersysteme, Anum Verlag, Schleusingen and Heinrich-Jung-Verlagsgesellschaft, mbH, Zella-Mehlis

28. Georg, Friedrich, 2000, pages 125, 154.

29. Powers, Thomas, 1993, Heisenberg's War The Secret History Of The German Bomb, Alfred A. Knopf, New York

30. Powers, Thomas, 1993, pages 130, 131, 132, 136, 137

31. Powers, Thomas, 1993, pages 131, 132, 135, 325

32. Powers, Thomas, 1993, pages 136, 138

33. Powers, Thomas, 1993, page 325

34. Georg, Friedrich, 2000, pages 188-190

35. Powers, Thomas, 1993, pages 131, 137, 143, 317

36. Powers, Thomas, 1993, pages 131, 137, 317, 416

37. Georg, Friedrich, 2000, page 125

38. Jesensky, Milos PhD., and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, pages 146, 151,

39. Wilson, Jim, 2000, Popular Mechanics, "America's Nuclear Flying Saucer"

40. Wilson, Jim, 2000, page 71

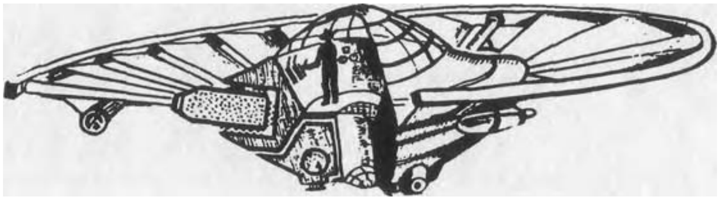
41. Wilson, Jim, 2000, page 68

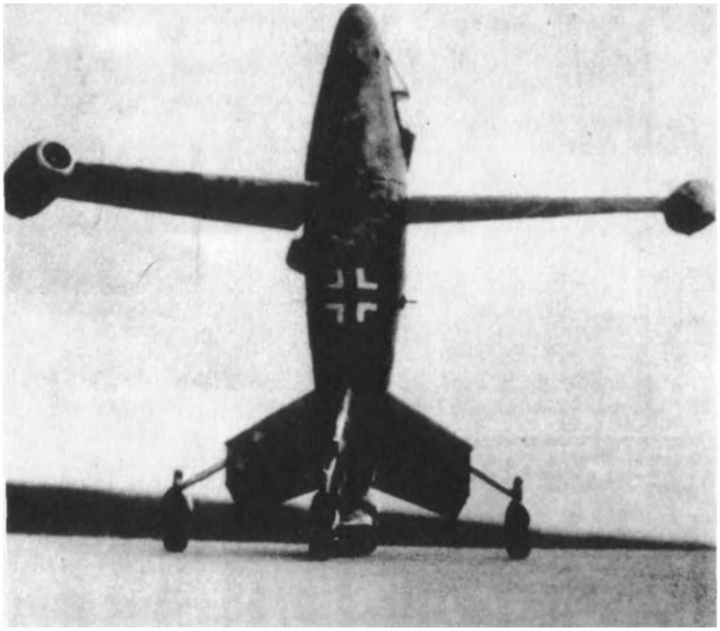
42. Neugebauer, Franz J. PhD., 1946, Technical Report: "Effect Of Power-Plant Weight On Economy Of Flight (Project No. NFE-64), Headquarters Air Material Command Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio

43. Neugebauer, Franz J. PhD., 1946, page 1

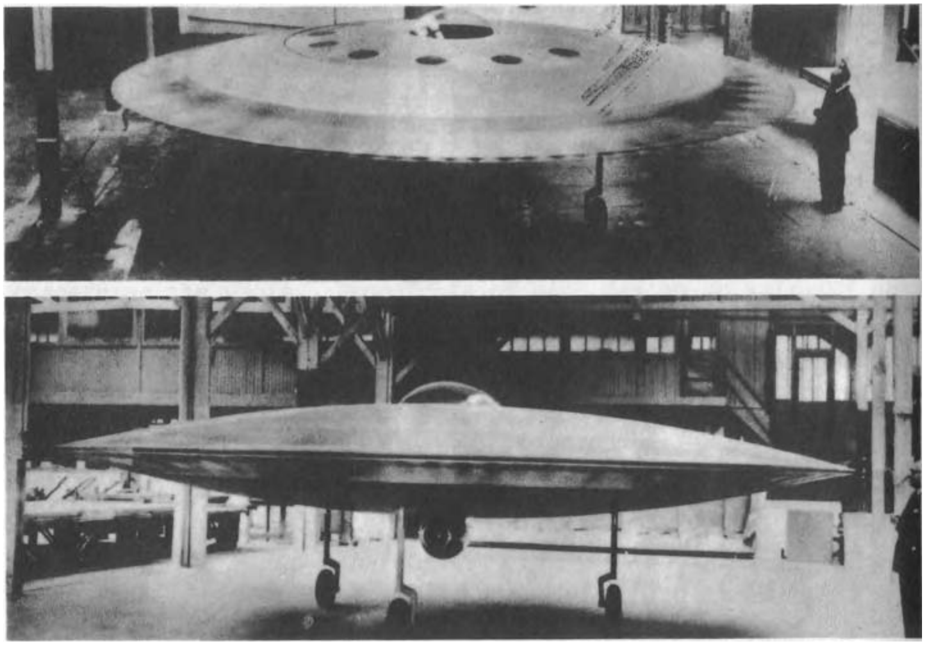
Section Summary

It can be said that the German flying disc program built upon itself, each innovation retaining something from a previous design yet incorporating a new innovation. This progressed through several steps until the original had seemingly nothing in common with final design. At each step a saucer project or at least a saucer design, seems to have been spun off. Each of these spin-offs was not an independent, stand-alone project but remained under the guidance and direction of an overall controlling authority. If viewed out-of-context, the multiplicity of designs and spin-offs have led to confusion concerning the whole. Proponents of each design or spin-off have championed the project with which they were familiar as "the" German saucer project. Let us try to keep idea in mind when discussing the next group of saucers which may or may not have had a relationship to those already discussed.

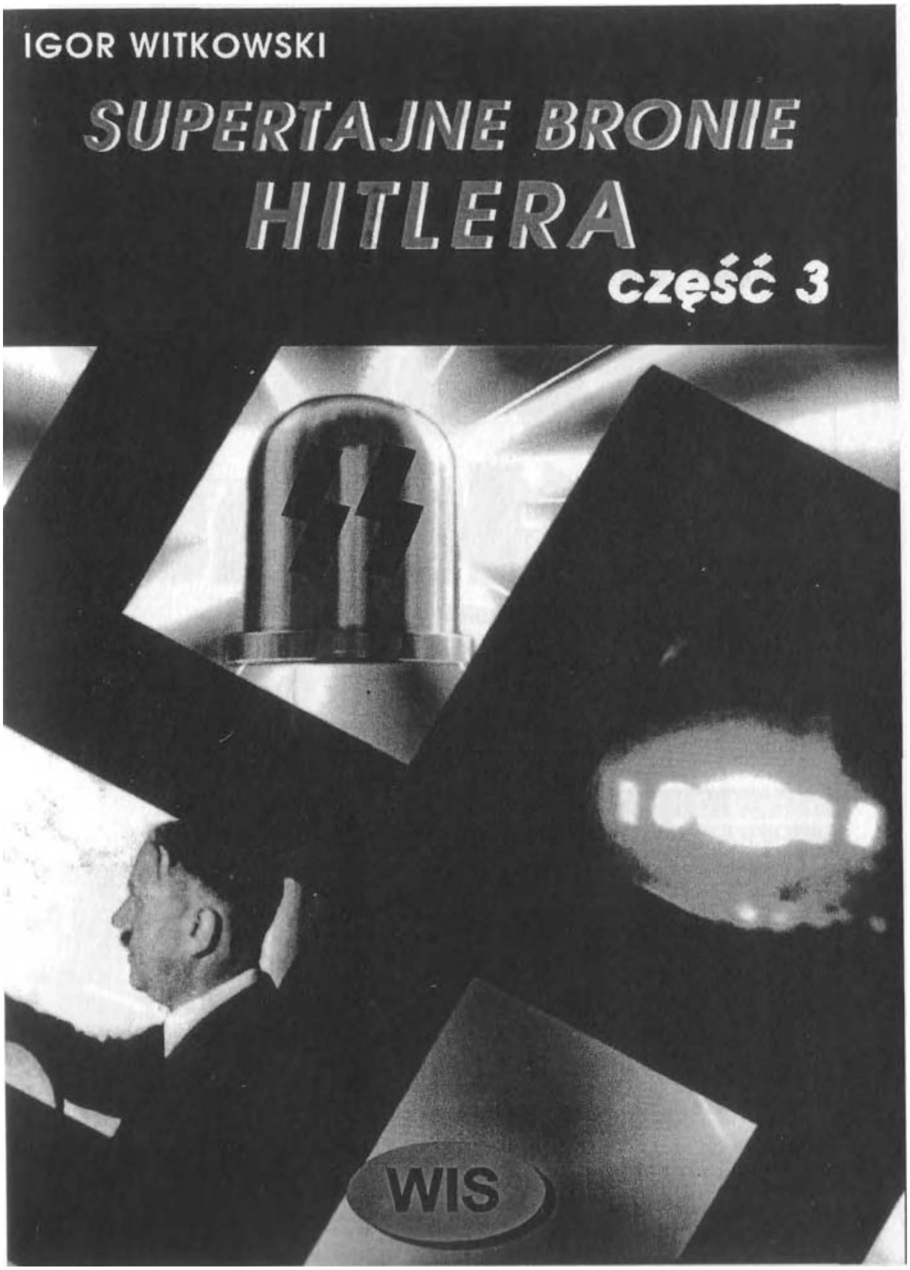




Top: Diagram of the Scriever-Habermohl flying disk. Bottom: The Focke-Wulf powered wing design with three Lorin ramjet engines. The required initial velocity was to be provided by rockets mounted in the engines.



Top: These photos of French aerospace designer Rene Couzinet's flying saucer with a diameter of 27 feet appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer on July 5, 1955. He died in a sudden auto accident shortly afterward. Left: The famous Darmstadt Saucer, a photo taken in August 1953 near the German city of Darmstadt.



IGOR WITKOWSKI
SUPERTAJNE BRONIE
HITLERA
część 3
WIS

A Polish language book on Hitler's secret weapons, including saucer and cylindrical aircraft.

Pekka Lahtinen
Ufojen arvoitus ratkeaa
Tulevatko ne tosiaan ulkoavaruudesta vai voiko kyseessä olla ihmisen oma keksintö? Entä pienet vihreät miehet?
158-2-11

A Finnish language book on Hitler's secret weapons, including saucer and cylindrical aircraft

CHAPTER FOUR:

THE GERMAN FIELD PROPULSION PROJECTS

THE VICTOR SCHAUBERGER MODELS

THE KM-2 ROCKET

FIELD PROPULSION SAUCERS
A German Eye Witness
A Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Report
The Smoking Gun: An F.B.I. Report
Discussion of German Field Propulsion Saucer
Atomic Saucers Again
The Karl Schappeller Device

CHAPTER FOUR

German Field Propulsion Projects

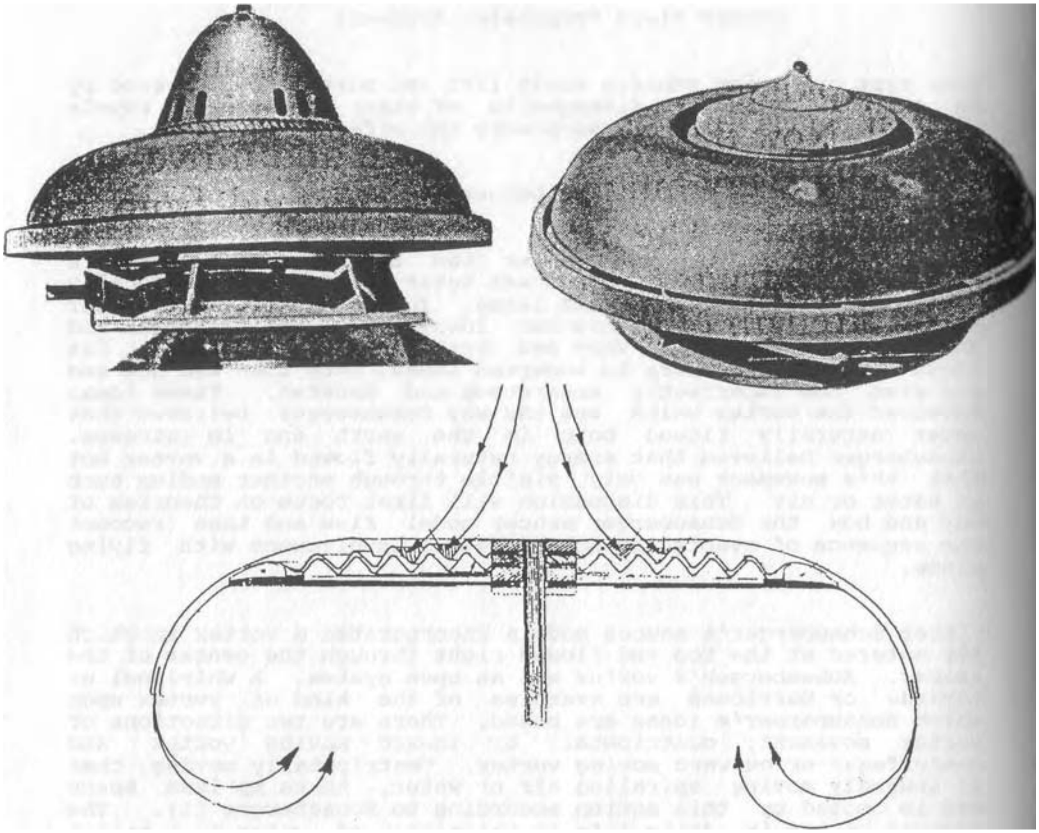
This type of flying vehicle would lift and move itself powered by an electric, magnetic, diamagnetic or ether field which repels earth's magnetic field or overpowers the effects of gravity.

The Viktor Schauberger Models

An Austrian, Viktor Schauberger was first and foremost a naturalist. His primary focus was water as found in naturally occurring streams, rivers and lakes. In observing the movement of water he formulated his own ideas about its movement and energetic properties. They are applicable in air also. His ideas are guite contrary to accepted ideas, both then and now and are even now imperfectly understood and debated. These ideas involved the vortex which was the way Schauberger believed that water naturally flowed both in the earth and in streams. Schauberger believed that energy naturally flowed in a vortex but that this movement was only visible through another medium such as water or air. This discussion will first focus on theories of why and how the Schauberger saucer model flew and then recount the sequence of events in Schauberger's involvement with flying discs.

Viktor Schauberger's saucer models incorporated a vortex in which air entered at the top and flowed right through the center of the saucer. Schauberger's vortex was an open system. A whirlpool or tornado or hurricane are examples of the kind of vortex upon which Schauberger's ideas are based. There are two directions of vortex movement, centripetal or inward moving vortex and centrifugal or outward moving vortex. Centripetally moving, that is inwardly moving spiraling air or water, takes up less space and is cooled by this motion according to Schauberger (1). The example we see in daily life is the motion of water in a toilet after flushing. He called this centripetal movement "implosion". Implosion was always accompanied by explosion as the fluid expanded again in an outward, centrifugal spiral. The process is first centripetal then centrifugal. The form this vortex took is really dictated by function according to Schauberger. The "function" is the energy flow. The spiral vortex is the shape the energy flow takes in its movement (2). Energy flows in at the top of the vortex in the characteristic double-spiral manner. These air molecules are imploded, that is, they are made more dense and they yield heat as they progress (3). Air molecules are squeezed tighter and tighter together as they move down the vortex until the sub-atomic particles themselves become unglued transforming into new and unrecognized forms of energy (4). As the vortex itself decreases in diameter implosion and speed are

Viktor Schauberger's Saucer Models



Top: Schauberger models. Bottom: Sectional diagram. The zig-zag is the air passage. The passage is a hollow space between two plates. As the saucer spins on its axis, the air enters and moves away from the center toward the rim following the up and down flow of the zig-zag. The spin causes individual tornado-like vortices to form as the spin causes the air flow to fold over on itself as it moves outward. Vortices become smaller in diameter and more "densified" until they reach the rim where they are released into the atmosphere, rapidly expand, and yield energy. Model is multi-section, copper. Courtesy Klaus-Peter Rothkugel increased until they reach the point within the vortex where centripetal forces stop and centrifugal forces take over.

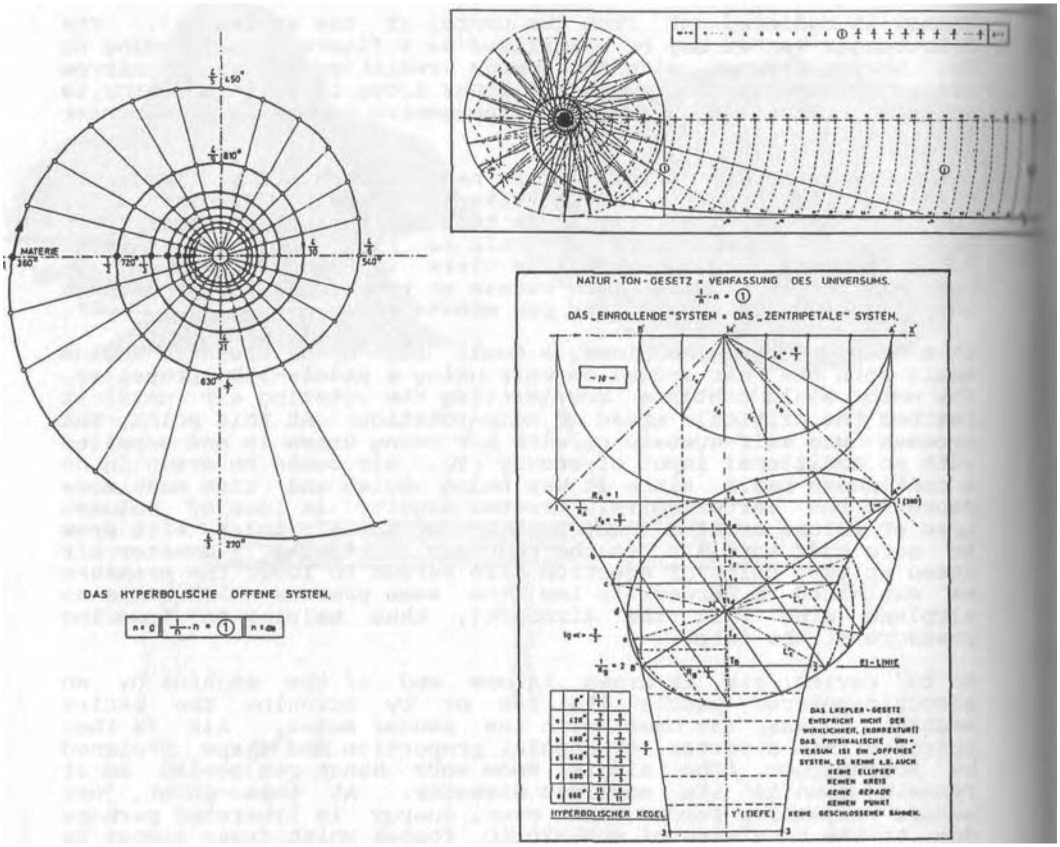
Energy is radiated out from the center of the vortex (5). The Schauberger vortex may be visualized as a figure "8" according to Dr. Gordon Freeman, with the energy radiating out at the narrow mid-point between the upper and lower loops (6). This energy is produces levitation. It may be diamagnetic energy as Schauberger believed (7).

Viktor Schauberger first built new designs for flumes to transport logs. He then built water purification machines using the principle of the vortex. He then built electric generators, heaters and coolers using only air as fuel. The breakthrough using machines was Schauberger's claim to have found a way to make his vortex machines auto-rotate at rotational speeds between 10,000 and 20,000 revolutions per minute (8).

In some Schauberger machines, a small high-speed electric engine would spin the air around an axis using a paddle-like propeller. The motor would continue accelerating the rotating air until it reached the critical speed of auto-rotation. At this point, the process was self-sustaining with air being drawn in and expelled with no additional input of energy (9). Air could be drawn in on a continuous basis since it was being cooled and thus made more dense in the vortex spiral. Greater density is loss of volume. Loss of volume created lower pressure at the air inlet with drew in more and more air as the reaction continued. Greater air speed at the point of ejection also served to lower the pressure as explained in Bernouli's Law (the same process which makes an airplane wing lift the aircraft), thus helping to lowering pressure at the inlet.

So to review: air is drawn in one end of the machine by an electric-powered, paddle-like fan or by spinning the entire machine as was the case with the saucer model. Air is then spiraled into a vortex of special proportion and shape designed by Schauberger. The air is made more dense yet cooled as it funnels down to its smallest diameter. At this point, just before expansive forces take over, energy is liberated perhaps due to the un-gluing of sub-atomic forces which frees energy in some manner currently imperfectly understood. The air begins to expand in a centrifugal motion as it warms. It is at this midway point that the air exits the saucer model at its periphery or lip of the saucer to expand centrifugally in the open atmosphere. Once a speed of 10,000 to 20,000 revolutions per minute is attained, the machine auto-rotates without need of the small electric-powered starter motor.

The exact proportions for the Schauberger pipes are designed geometrically. This geometry is of a rather esoteric nature. For instance, the bend of the spiral pipe is calculated using the Golden Section. For some time a true engineering genius, Dr. Gordon Freeman, has been writing to some interested parties and



MATERIE
360°
450°
810°
720°
540°
630°
270°
DAS HYPERBOLISCHE OFFENE SYSTEM. n = 0
n = ∞
NATUR-TON-GESETZ = VERFASSUNG DES UNIVERSUMS.
DAS „EINROLLENDE" SYSTEM = DAS „ZENTRIPETALE" SYSTEM.
PI-LINIE
DAS KEPLER-GESETZ ENTSPRICHT NICHT DER WIRKLICHKEIT. (KORREKTUR!)
DAS PHYSIKALISCHE UNIVERSUM IST EIN „OFFENES" SYSTEM, ES KENNT z.B. AUCH KEINE ELLIPSEN
KEINEN KREIS
KEINE GERADE
KEINEN PUNKT
KEINE GESCHLOSSENEN BAHNEN.
HYPERBOLISCHER KEGEL
Y'(TIEFE)

Top Left : The Hyperbolic Open System. The movement could be centripetal or centrifugal. Top Right: Law of Natural Tones resulting from the hyperbolic spiral. Bottom: The egg-shape, built according to the non-Euclidian Law of Natural Tones, correct some of the planetary motion laws of Kepler according to Schauberger.

explaining how certain shapes or wave patterns can impact conventional physics. He believes one needs to understand known science as well as a more esoteric doctrine in order to appreciate the nature of free-energy and some types of field propulsion UFO craft. The work of Viktor Schauberger is an example of this. In this work there remains a world of knowledge imperfectly understood by most of us.

Returning to the mechanism by which these models flew, Schauberger himself always made the point of the fact that his saucer models were constructed of diamagnetic materials. Diamagnetic materials are those which are repel a magnetic field. Schauberger considered copper diamagnetic (10) and the surfaces of the saucer models coming in contact with air were made of copper.

As mentioned above, the very atomic structure of these atoms may have altered by this process. Coats tells us that electrons, protons and neutron may have been separated from one another (11). It has been suggested that the electrons and protons of these atoms were stripped from their nuclei. Their opposing charges were free and attracted one another resulting in their mutual annihilation of one another yielding a release of energy (12). This would occur exactly at the point where centripetal forces ceased and centrifugal forces began, these air particles reversed their spin and altered their rotation.

Further, Coats explains that the neutrons, which were left over in the process described above, and contrary to accepted views, are themselves magnetic (13). These neutrons were expelled from the saucer centrifugally along with water, water vapor and air which had not reacted as stated above. These "magnetic" neutrons, on the outside of the saucer body may serve to increase the diamagnetic reaction of the copper saucer which would be both pushing away from the earth and the cloud of surrounding "magnetically charged" neutrons. In other words, the Schauberger disc may have been repelling away from the magnetically charged atmosphere which it itself had just created.

Dr. Richard LeFors Clark proposes a more detailed description of similar ideas involving the mechanism of the Bloch Wall (14). This will be discussed in the section involving Karl Schappeller but it should be kept in mind while reading these ideas that Dr. Clark had Schauberger in mind. These ideas and others pertaining to both Schauberger and Karl Schappeller will be presented in the Schappeller section to follow.

The history of the Schauberger flying disc models is as follows. According to Alexandersson, Aloys Kokaly, a German, began work for Viktor Schauberger in the early days of the Second World War producing certain parts for a "flying object" which were hard to obtain in Austria. The parts were to be delivered to the Kertl Works in Vienna which was the site of this work at the time. The Kertl Works were operating "on higher authority" in association with Schauberger. Kokaly was received at Kertl by its chief and told by this individual, somewhat bitterly, that one of these strange contraptions had already flown. As a matter of fact it had gone right through the roof of the Kertl plant (15). The year was 1940.

Coats tells us that the purpose of this device was twofold. First, it was to investigate free energy production. This could be done by running a shaft to the rapidly rotating wheel-like component which was auto-rotating at between 10,000 and 20,000 rpm. Using reduction gearing, some of that energy could be mechanically coupled to an electric generator producing electricity at no cost. The second purpose of these experiments was to test Schauberger's theories on levitation and flight (16).

Two prototypes were said to have been built at Kertl. The test flight was done without Schauberger's presence or even his permission to do the test. The model flew as described above but it did considerable destruction to the Kertl Works so there were mixed feels concerning the success of this flight. The force of levitation was so strong that it sheared six 1/4 inch diameter high-tensile steel anchor bolts on its way to the roof. Coats reports that according to Schauberger's calculations based upon previous tests, a 20 centimeter diameter device of this sort, with a rotational velocity of 20,000 rpm, would have lifted a weight of 228 tons (17).

A few years earlier in 1934 Schauberger had met with Hitler to discuss alternative energy ideas (18). Nothing come of this meeting immediately but after Germany annexed Austria in 1938, Schauberger became involved in research at Professor Kotschau's laboratory in Nuremberg. Assisted by his son, Walter, who had just completed engineering studies at a technical college in Dresden, Viktor Schauberger went to work with a Dr. Winter on a plan to extract electrical energy directly form a water flow. Some success was achieved. Alexandersson reports that a potential of 50,000 volts was achieved but that no practical results came from this at that time (19).

Probably based upon the fact that Viktor Schauberger was a veteran of the Great War, he was inducted into the Waffen-SS in 1943. This put him under the direct control of SS chief Heinrich Himmler. Schauberger was ordered to castle Schoenbrunn near the Mauthausen concentration camp in Austria. There he was to select qualified prisoners, twenty to thirty craftsmen, technicians and engineers, and begin work on a new, secret weapon. Schauberger arranged improved conditions for his team and produced another flying saucer model (20).

In May, 1945, because of the deteriorating circumstances of the war, Schauberger was re-located to Leonstein in Upper Austria by the SS. There, just after a successful test flight of his latest device, it was seized by an American intelligence unit which appeared to be well informed about it. Schauberger was debriefed by American intelligence, according to Coats, detained, and told not to participate in further research (21).

Coats was actually able to locate a surviving example of a Schauberger saucer model. Excellent photographs of this device are to be found in his book, Living Energies, as well as a dissection of it into its various components. It is unclear if this device was one of the earlier (1940) or later (1945) projects.

After the war, Schauberger worked on agricultural projects in Austria until one day in the late 1957 when he was contacted by two Americans. They promised Viktor almost unlimited resources if he and his son Walter would work for them in the United States (22). Discussion concerning the exact source and motives for this offer are beyond the scope of this discussion but suffice it to say that they were powerful interests. The Schaubergers were sent to Texas, near the Red River, where Viktor was asked to disclose everything he knew and Walter was asked to set Viktor's terminology into the standard language of physics and engineering. This whole episode proved extremely unsatisfactory for both Schaubergers and they returned to Austria after about three months. As a condition for their return, Viktor was asked to sign away his knowledge to this powerful concern. Viktor was given a contract in English, which he did not read. Nevertheless, the deal was done and the Schaubergers returned to Austria (23). Viktor, already in poor health, died five days later on September 25, 1958. Walter continued advancing his father's research in Austria until his death in 1997.

Coats provides us with pictures of one of the Schauberger saucers in question and an explanation of its workings (24). This saucer was composed of a number of copper plates bolted together. Air was drawn in at the to and into the rapidly spinning saucer which was set into motion by an electric motor. In this machine no paddles pushed upon the air to start it. Instead, a motor was used to spin the whole saucer model to the desired number of revolutions per minute. The air was thus spun rapid over channels formed by the upper and lower surfaces of two copper plates. On these plates alternate ridges and depressions on both plates kept the air moving in snake-like wave forms and it moved toward the periphery of the saucer. Because the saucer was rapidly spinning, the air was folded over upon itself as it moved laterally into many individual vortices. The air was rotating in these vortices and moving up and down between the ridged plates. It was also moving around as the saucer spun on its axis. This is a double-spiral motion which additionally duplicates the undulating motion seen on the Schauberger log flumes. The air was cooled and made more dense as it progressed towards the periphery. At and around the saucer the periphery, it was ejected into the atmosphere at great speed.

In this machine, centripetal air flow changes to centrifugal air flow at this periphery. The air, once outside the saucer, spirals away in a centrifugal motion. It is at this periphery, at the midline of the saucer, where the change of motion takes place. It is here that energy is liberated. It is this energy which gives the saucer its quality of levitation.

Sometimes the Coanda Effect is cited as a reason this saucer flew (25). Coanda effects, if present at all, are only a secondary force if Viktor Schauberger's calculations are correct. Coanda effects alone could never be powerful enough to generate the lifting force equal to 228 tons which Schauberger estimated his small model produced.

The important factual points to keep in mind are these: First, this saucer-model, probably in more than one version, actually flew. Second, one model still exists today. Therefore this "flying saucer" is a physical reality which can be photographed, touched and studied. Third, explanations of the mysterious energetic forces causing lift in this device should not be forgotten. The German scientific leadership was interested in implosion and in what Schauberger had to teach them but they did not necessarily want to be limited by the use of air to achieve these results. Instead, they may have wanted to use Schauberger ideas but actuating these principles with electronic components. We will see some ideas relating to Schauberger in a future example.

The Viktor Schauberger Models

Sources and References

1. Coats, Callum, 1996, page 276, Living Energies, Gateway Books, Bath, U.K.
2. Coats, Callum, 1996, page 46
3. Coats, Callum, 1996, page 276
4. Coats, Callum, 1996, page 290
5. Freeman, Gordon PhD., 1999, personal correspondence
6. ibid
7. Coats, Callum, 1996, 290
8. Coats, Callum, 1996, 287
9. ibid
10. Coats, Callum, 1996, page 292
11. Coats, Callum, 1996, pages 290-292

12. Coats, Callum, 1996, page 292

13. ibid

14. Clark, Richard LeFors PhD., 1987, "The Earth Grid, Human Levitation And Gravity Anomalies" in Anti-Gravity And The World Grid, edited by David Hatcher Childress, Adventures Unlimited Press, Stelle, Illinois

15. Alexandersson, Olaf, 1990, page 87, Living Water. Gateway Books, The Hollies, Wellow Bath, U.K.

16. Coats, Callum, 1996, page 287

17. ibid

18. Kadmon, date unknown, pages 10, 23, Ahnstern 1, "Viktor Schauberger", Aorta c/o Petak, Postfach 788, A-1011, Wien, Austria

19. Alexandersson, Olaf, 1990, pages 89-91

20. Coats, Callum, 1996, page 11

21. ibid

22. Coats, Callum, 1996, page 15

23. Coats, Callum, 1996, page 27

24. Coats, Callum, 1996, pages 287-293

25. Reba, Imants, 1966, page 86, "Applications Of The Coanda Effect", Scientific American

The KM-2 Rocket

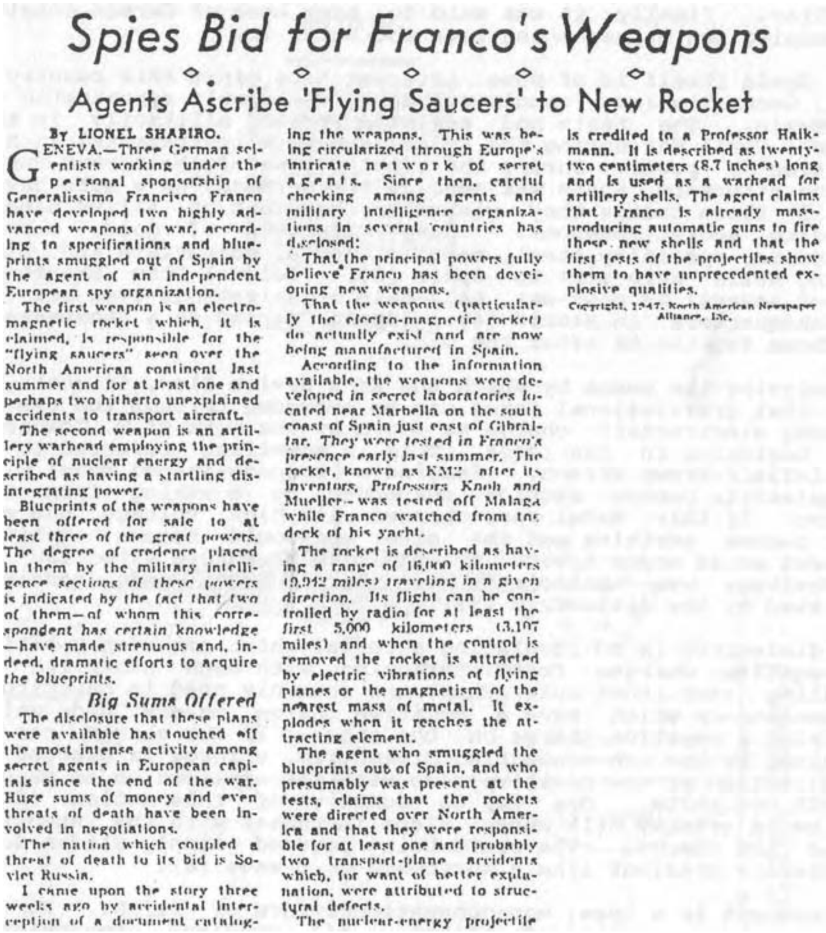
A shred of evidence comes down to us though the years in the form of a newspaper article by Lionel Shapiro in the Denver Post, dated November 9, 1947, and titled "Spies Bid for Franco's Weapons". (Please refer to a copy of that article). It should be noted that this was a few months after the summer of 1947, the first and largest UFO flap in history, which included the Kenneth Arnold sighting and the flying saucer activity of Roswell. It should also be noted that the Denver Post was nor is not a tabloid publication.

In doing research, this newspaper was contacted in an attempt to learn the whereabouts of the author, Lionel Shapiro. Unlike so many newspapers in the United States which have been purchased and merged by conglomerates, this newspaper is still intact and in existence. Unfortunately, no record could be found of Mr. Shapiro in their personnel files although they did maintain files going back that far. Also, no record could be found in their sister publication, The Rocky Mountain News. It was suggested that Mr. Shapiro was "a stringer", that is, a writer who did not work directly for the newspaper and whose work was purchased on a piece by piece basis. His work seems to have been channeled through the North American Newspaper Alliance. More of Mr. Shapiro's history and connections will unfold as the tale progresses.

This article describes two devices. The first is an "electromagnetic rocket", sometimes referred to later as the "KM-2 rocket" in other literature. The second is a nuclear warhead small enough to be fired by an artillery piece. The nuclear, warhead which is affixed to a cannon projectile, is novel at this time and is interesting since such devices were built and fired shortly thereafter by the United States military. The article's description of the nuclear cannon is correct. This was a German invention and was under development in Germany during the latter stages of the war. A prototype was even built and it carried the German designation of DKM 44 (1). This very cannon was copied by the Americans and became the T-131 which fired a nuclear warhead (2).

The discussion of the nuclear cannon is really beyond the scope of this book but what is important to bear in mind concerning this discussion is that if fifty percent of this article has proven to be accurate. The nuclear cannon was built and it stemmed from a German prototype. Does this not at least raise the possibility that the other fifty percent is accurate also?

Returning to the electromagnetic rocket itself, this device is right on point for the discussion of field propulsion. Some points are ascertained in reading this article. Its description as a "rocket" would lead one to believe it was cylindrical in shape rather than saucer-shaped. It is suggested that this



Spies Bid for Franco's Weapons

◆

Agents Ascribe 'Flying Saucers' to New Rocket

By LIONEL SHAPIRO.

GENEVA.—Three German scientists working under the personal sponsorship of Generalissimo Francisco Franco have developed two highly advanced weapons of war, according to specifications and blueprints smuggled out of Spain by the agent of an independent European spy organization.

The first weapon is an electromagnetic rocket which, it is claimed, is responsible for the "flying saucers" seen over the North American continent last summer and for at least one and perhaps two hitherto unexplained accidents to transport aircraft.

The second weapon is an artillery warhead employing the principle of nuclear energy and described as having a startling disintegrating power.

Blueprints of the weapons have been offered for sale to at least three of the great powers. The degree of credence placed in them by the military intelligence sections of these powers is indicated by the fact that two of them—of whom this correspondent has certain knowledge—have made strenuous and, indeed, dramatic efforts to acquire the blueprints.

Big Sums Offered

The disclosure that these plans were available has touched off the most intense activity among secret agents in European capitals since the end of the war. Huge sums of money and even threats of death have been involved in negotiations.

The nation which coupled a threat of death to its bid is Soviet Russia.

I came upon the story three weeks ago by accidental interception of a document cataloging the weapons. This was being circularized through Europe's intricate network of secret agents. Since then, careful checking among agents and military intelligence organizations in several countries has disclosed:

That the principal powers fully believe Franco has been developing new weapons.

That the weapons (particularly the electro-magnetic rocket) do actually exist and are now being manufactured in Spain.

According to the information available, the weapons were developed in secret laboratories located near Marbella on the south coast of Spain just east of Gibraltar. They were tested in Franco's presence early last summer. The rocket, known as KM2 after its inventors, Professors Knoh and Mueller—was tested off Malaga while Franco watched from the deck of his yacht.

The rocket is described as having a range of 16,000 kilometers (9,942 miles) traveling in a given direction. Its flight can be controlled by radio for at least the first 5,000 kilometers (3,107 miles) and when the control is removed the rocket is attracted by electric vibrations of flying planes or the magnetism of the nearest mass of metal. It explodes when it reaches the attracting element.

The agent who smuggled the blueprints out of Spain, and who presumably was present at the tests, claims that the rockets were directed over North America and that they were responsible for at least one and probably two transport-plane accidents which, for want of better explanation, were attributed to structural defects.

The nuclear-energy projectile is credited to a Professor Halkmann. It is described as twenty-two centimeters (8.7 inches) long and is used as a warhead for artillery shells. The agent claims that Franco is already mass-producing automatic guns to fire these new shells and that the first tests of the projectiles show them to have unprecedented explosive qualities.

Copyright, 1947, North American Newspaper Alliance, Inc.

Post-War German science for Generalissimo Francisco Franco. This is from the Denver Post, November 9, 1947, four months after flying saucers were seen all over the USA.

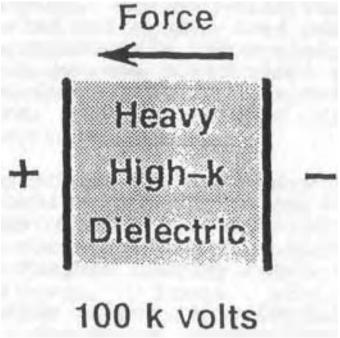
device was responsible for the flying saucer sightings over the USA that previous summer. This speaks for its operational range. It was said to have been tested off Malaga while Franco watched. The device was constructed in the town of Marbella, east of Gibraltar. Finally, it was said to have been of German origin, even naming the German scientists who built it.

Even Spain itself is of some interest here since this country's ruler, Generalissimo Francisco Franco, was openly sympathetic to the Nazis. The Nazis had assisted Franco militarily in the Spanish Civil War during the 1930s and were instrumental in his retention of power. During the final stages of the Second World War and afterward Spain was seen, by the Germans as a safe haven for all those things they wished to keep out of Allied hands, including secret weapons. Many shipments of gold, secret blueprints, specialty steel, machine tools, scientists and high ranking Nazis were sent to Spain (3). Colonel Otto Skorzeny, head of several SS post-war, self-help organizations even set up his headquarters in Madrid (4). Spain served as a home-away-from-home for the SS after the war.

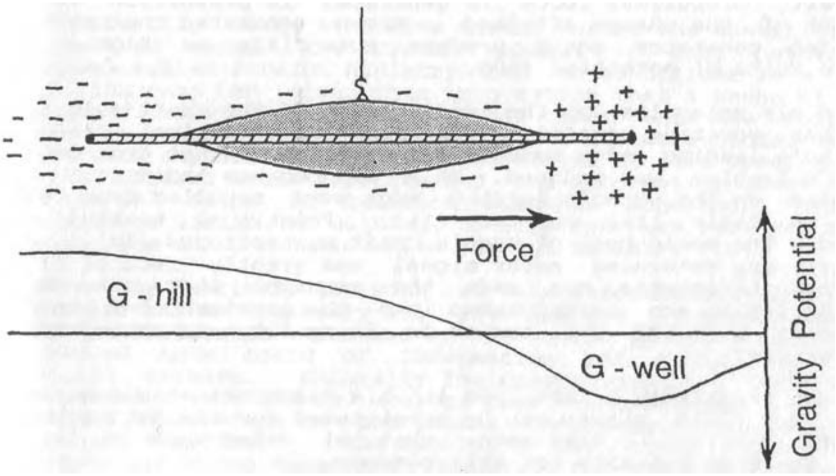
In analyzing the means by which the KM-2 device flew, it must be noted that gravitational force can be overcome through the use of a strong electrostatic charge as shown by the work of T. Townsend Brown beginning in the 1920s. This is sometimes referred to as the Biefield-Brown Effect. Imagine a torpedo-shaped model with a dielectric center section suspended by a string from the ceiling. If this model were charged with high voltage, one end would become positive and the other end would become negative. Movement would occur toward the positively charged direction if the voltage was sufficient and the charged ends remained separated by the dielectric (5).

This dielectric is an insulating material which can keep positive and negative charges from interacting with each other and so canceling each other out. They are commonly used in capacitors or condensers which have a positive charge on one side while retaining a negative charge on the other. If the charge can be contained by the non-conducting dielectric, a force is exerted in the direction of the positive side with the application of 75,000 to 300,000 volts. One way to conceive of this action is to imagine a gravity hill whose slope increases with the intensity of the ion charge. The craft being powered simply slides down the gravity gradient like a surfboard on a wave (6).

This concept is a new, non-conventional form of flight. It is non-aerodynamic method of flight. All previous conventional flight had either been through the use of lighter than air balloons, winged craft powered by propellers, jets or rockets or the brute force of rockets themselves. Using this method, Brown advocated defeating gravity by generating another form of energy over which gravity could be surfed. It is a form of field propulsion.



Force
Heavy
High–k
Dielectric
+
–
100 k volts



Force
G - hill
G - well
Gravity Potential

T.T. Brown found that when strong electric charges are separated by a dielectric, movement occurs towards the positive charge as if gravity were reduced on the positive side or as if the charged object were sliding down a hill.

T. Townsend Brown demonstrated this means of propulsion to the American military during the 1950s. He used a saucer-shaped model tethered only by a high voltage line supplying the charge to the model (7). During that decade Brown built increasingly larger, faster models using this method. Brown found that a saucer or a triangle was the best shape for this type of flying craft. A secret proposal, code-named Winterhaven, was to develop a Mach 3 antigravity saucer interceptor was put forth to the U.S. Air Force (8). This project was further developed through the 1960s but after this all traces of this concept seem to disappear.

But where Brown is overlooked is not only did he have a method of electrostatic propulsion but he also had a self-contained method to impart this charge to a flying craft. He invented a flame-jet generator or electrokenetic generator which supplied the necessary high voltage in a light weight, compact manner (9).

The flame-jet generator utilized a jet engine with an electrified needle mounted in the exhaust nozzle to inject negative ions in the jet's exhaust stream. A corresponding but positive charge is automatically built up upon the leading front edge of the craft. As long as there is no leakage through the dielectric or insulating material, in this case through the wings and body of the craft, propulsive force is generated in proportion to the strength of the charge attained. Brown estimated that such a flame-jet generator could produce potentials as high as 15 million volts of potential (10).

Ionized air molecules on the leading edge of the craft's surface had other positive benefits. The positive electrical field on the wing's leading edge reduced air friction so that drag caused by air molecules was reduced. This was because individual air molecules on the wing's leading edge were repelled from each other by their like charges (11). Frictional heating was reduced. The sonic boom of such a craft was softened (12). And finally, any returning radar signal was greatly reduced (13). Dr. Paul LaViolette has made the argument that all these characteristics are incorporated into the American B-2 bomber, concluding that the B-2 bomber is in reality an anti-gravity aircraft (14).

As Brown repeatedly points out in his Electrokinetic Generator patent, any fluid stream can be substituted for the jet engine's fuel and air (15). This means that hot water vapor or steam itself would be suitable for this purpose.

If T. Townsend Brown had been working on this form of flight since the 1920s, is it not conceivable that others were also? Remember that the KM-2 device is described as an "electromagnetic rocket". If a combination design is considered, one which combines the electrokinetic apparatus with the electrokinetic generator, a picture emerges which would seem to fulfill the description given to the KM-2 "electromagnetic rocket".

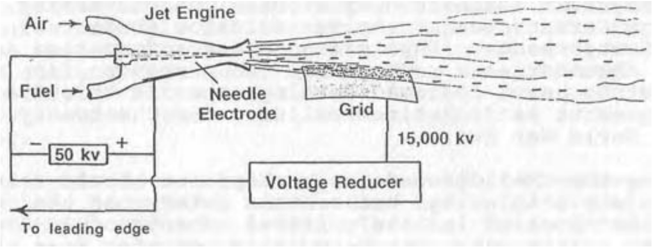
The real question may be if the flow of this knowledge went from Brown to the Germans or from the Germans to Brown as was the case with so much high technology in the post-war years. T. T. Brown's early collaborator and mentor was a Dr. Paul Biefield a Professor of Physics and Astronomy at Dennison University. Dr. Biefield was a German speaker who was a fellow student of Albert Einstein in Switzerland. Physicists share information across international boundaries. There is no reason for German scientists not to have followed developments in this Biefield-Brown Effect, as it is sometimes called, for the twenty years leading up to World War Two.

Before leaving the KM-2 discussion, perhaps we should return to the reporter who originally broke this story of the German "Electromagnetic Rocket" in 1947, Lionel Shapiro for a closer look at who he really was. It seems this reporter does have a history of breaking or leaking stories through the North American Newspaper Alliance. These stories which, prior to his involvement, could only be classified as "secret". The point in question is a 1946 report, brought to our attention though the extensive research of Dr. Milos Jesensky and Mr. Robert Lesniakiewicz and translated into English for me by Milos Vnenk. This account is of post-wartime intrigue can only be outlined here.

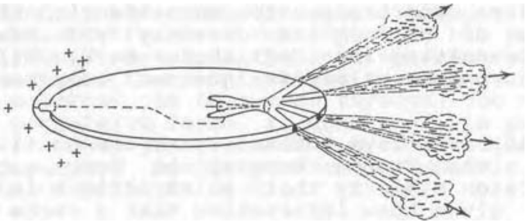
On October 13, 1945, over five months after the hostilities in Europe had ended, the French embassy in Prag notified the Czechoslovakian Foreign Ministry that an SS officer in a French detention camp had given them information that a cache of secret documents existed near Prag. This cache took the form of a tunnel in which 32 boxes of secret documents were hidden and were wired with explosives before being sealed at its opening. The French offered their services and the information given to them by the SS officer in question, Guenther Achenbach. But even after three months of waiting, no response was received by the French from the Czechoslovakian Foreign Ministry (16).

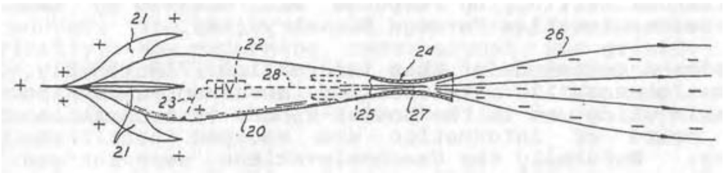
Somehow the Americans got wind of this information. Incredibly, the Americans on February 13, 1946 mounted an armed incursion into Czechoslovakia which was in the Soviet sphere of occupation, retrieved this hoard of information and escaped back into occupied Germany. Naturally the Czechoslovakians were furious and demanded and got an apology from the Americans. They also demanded the return of the German documents stolen from their sovereign territory. The Americans did return documents but probably not those sensitive documents for which the expedition was mounted (17).

Dr. Jesensky and Mr. Lesniakiewicz have made an extensive study of the German technical facilities surrounding Prag and the purposes for these facilities. It is their conclusion that the sensitive technical information recovered and which prompted this dangerous action was nothing other than plans of the German disc airplane, the "V-7" (18).



Air
Jet Engine
Fuel
Needle Electrode
Grid
15,000 kv
−
50 kv
+
Voltage Reducer
To leading edge





21
22
24
26
28
HV
23 20
25
27
21

Top: T.T. Brown's flame-jet generator, capable of supplying millions of volts. Middle: Brown's saucer design which is definitely food for thought. Bottom: Brown's electric rocket incorporating flame-jet generator. The KM-2 rocket must have been a very similar device.

It was Lionel Shapiro, writing under the name Lionel S. B. Shapiro who broke this story for the North American Newspaper Alliance (19). As confirmation, it can be added that the story was also covered by Ms. Lux Taub in the Swedish publication "Expressen" with stories on 2/19/46, 2/22/46 and 2/24/46 (20).

In the immediate post-war world there seems to have been a relaxation on the release German technical information. Not the detailed analytic work done by the various Allied intelligence teams combing the carcass of the dead Reich, but the popular reporting by Shapiro and others who received the "o.k." to publish brief stories recounting Nazi technology which would be squelched later as the cold war got underway.

But even given this relaxation, what are the chances of one reporter stumbling upon both the stories of the electromagnetic rocket and the U.S. incursion into Czechoslovakia, first, and on his own? It is also noteworthy that both of these stories dealt with the topic of this book, or at least one which is related to that theme. Mr. Shapiro must have been a very well connected reporter indeed! He is also an excellent source of information.

A point of speculation should be made concerning the KM-2 device. As stated above, T. T. Brown believed that water vapor or steam was a suitable medium for his electrokenetic generator. Water vapor is present in the atmosphere, as we all know. A small atomic engine, such as was mentioned earlier in connection with the Messerschmitt P-1073, burning and being cooled by atmospheric gasses, might provide enough water vapor to enable the electrokenetic generator to produce the high voltage required. This would be an atomic powered field propulsion device. Further, Friedrich Georg gives us details on an atomic steam engine with the Germans were designing to power a propeller driven aircraft (21). An easy substitution of a device similar to the Brown electrokenetic generator for the propellers could have been made enabling a device with all the characteristics given for the KM-2 electromagnetic rocket to have been born. And of course Dr. Giuseppe Belluzzo would have been waiting and willing to do the plumbing.

The KM-2 Rocket

Sources and References

1. Georg, Friedrich, 2000, pages 171-173

2. ibid
3. Infield, Glenn B., 1981, pages 179, 192, Skorzeny Hitler's Commando, St. Martin's Press, New York

4. Infield, Glenn B., 1981, pages 173, 183

5. LaViolette, Paul A. Ph.D., 1993, pages 84-85, "The U.S. Antigravity Squadron" in Electrogravitics Systems Reports On A New Propulsion Methodology edited by Thomas Valone, M.A., P.E., 1994, Integrity Research Institute, Washington D.C.

6. ibid

7. ibid

8. LaViolette, Paul A. Ph.D., 1993, page 87

9. U.S. Patent Number 3,022,430, Granted: 2/20/62 to T.T. Brown, titled "Electrokinetic Generator"

10. ibid

11. LaViolette, Paul A. Ph.D., 1993, page 93

12. LaViolette, Paul A. Ph.D., 1993, page 87

13. LaViolette, Paul A. Ph.D., 1993, page 88

14. LaViolette, Paul A. Ph.D., 1993

15. U.S. Patent Number 3,022,430, Granted: 2/20/62 to T.T. Brown, titled "Electrokinetic Generator"

16. Jesensky, Milos Ph.D., and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, pages 98-102, "Wunderland" Memozemske Technologie Treiti Rise. Aos Publishing

17. Jesensky, Milos Ph.D. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, page 100

18. Jesensky, Milos Ph.D. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, page 102

19. Jesensky, Milos Ph.D. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, page 100

20. Jesensky, Milos Ph.D. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, page 101

21. Georg, Friedrich, 2000, pages 87-89, Hitlers Sieqeswaffen Band 1: Luftwaffe Und Marine Geheime Nuklearwaffen des Dritten Reiches und ihre Traeaersysteme. Amun Verlag, Heinrich-Jung Verlagsgesellschaft mbH.

Field Propulsion Saucers

The existence of World War Two German field propulsion flying saucers is a topic which is denied by virtually every reputable authority in aviation history. It is also denied by many researchers studying German saucers. The problem is that in the years immediately following the Second World War the earth's skies suddenly began to be populated by flying craft which did some remarkable things. They flew at unheard of speeds. They made very sharp turns, seemingly non-aerodynamic turns, even at this extreme speed. They lacked the glowing tail of jets or rockets but they glowed or gave off light at night from their periphery or from the whole craft. They were silent or almost silent. Sometimes they gave off sounds that an electric generator or motor might make. Sometimes vehicles with electrically based ignition systems ceased to operate in the presence of these saucers. No government claimed these flying craft, yet they were seen all over the world.

The press and popular culture attributed these unusual craft to an extraterrestrial source. Yet, after over fifty years, no real proof for this assertion has ever come forth. Let's come back down to earth. By all accounts these saucer were solid and material in nature. Perhaps it is time to attribute their origin to a solid, material source.

It seems only proper to begin searching for an explanation for field propulsion saucers with the very sources which we now know built conventional flying saucers, the Germans of the Third Reich. The earliest reference to a field propulsion saucer being a German invention is from a 1960 book by Michael X in which it is described as a "flying egg" (1). Michael X., under the name Michael X. Barton, is also the author who, in 1968, wrote The German Saucer Story. In the second book returns to the theme again (2). This time he cites a source. His primary informant, Hermann Klaas, describes twelve secret weapons to Barton. They are:

1. The flying disc
2. A tank made entirely of one piece of metal
3. The sound wave weapon
4. A laser beam weapon
5. A flaming artificial cloud
6. A robot bomb
7. A charged cloud weapon
8. An armor piercing projectile
9. The electromagnetic KM-2 rocket
10. A paralyzing ray
11. Electronic ball lighting
12. The flying bottle, tube, sphere, etc.

Thirty-two years later we certainly know that some of these weapons did exist. It has been confirmed that the Germans were working on weapons numbered 1, 2, 3, 6, and 8 for instance. It has been confirmed that the Germans were working on x-ray or gamma ray weapons as well as another type, possible laser weapons. It has been confirmed that the Germans were working on a gaseous cloud as a means of combating enemy bombers. So in view of this track record, his claim of research on a "flying bottle" should be given serious consideration.

But what is the specific evidence which would cause us to believe that the Germans were working on a field propulsion saucer? As one paws through the literature on German saucers, some evidence is encountered which could indicate field propulsion vehicles. There are the still pictures which will be discussed later on. Here, we will focus on just three pieces of evidence, that of an eyewitness, a German pilot, who saw such things on the ground, a Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee report and an F.B.I. report. The F.B.I. report was taken years after the war but for reasons which will be discussed, there is reason to conclude this report has merit.

German Eye Witnesses

The first report comes to us courtesy of researcher Horst Schuppmann. A friend of Mr. Schuppmann's interviewed an eyewitness to German saucers during the Second World War. This report first appeared in the 1998 Geheimtechnologien. Wunderwaffen Und Irdischen Facetten Des UFO-Phaenomens by Karl-Heinz Zunneck (3).

The subject of this interview was a German pilot who flew many missions in a JU-52, taking off and touching down in rough, presumably outlying airfields. The Junkers JU-52 was an aircraft used by the Luftwaffe for many roles and could be described as a mainstay or a workhorse. It was a transport airplane, a troop carrier and even had been used as a bomber. It resembled and was used in a similar way to the American Douglas Dakota or DC-3. The main difference between the two aircraft was that the JU-52 had three engines as opposed to the Dakota's two and the JU-52 lacked a traditional airframe, instead deriving structural strength from a unique corrugated metal shell, which also made the appearance of the JU-52 distinctive.

The sighting in question was reported to the author, Mr. Zunneck, by Horst Schuppmann whose friend knew the pilot of the JU-52 in question. The date was July, 1944. Accompanying the pilot on this three and one-half hour flight was a co-pilot, a mechanic, and the radio man. The airplane took off from Brest-Deblin and flew on a westerly course to Lublin. The flight was unfolding smoothly which was somewhat abnormal for the particular time and stage of the war. Over Stettin Lagoon preparations were made to land. A large white cross was sighted which was the marker for their goal, a meadow landing strip. The aircraft descended, landed normally and rolled toward a group of bushes which would hide the aircraft from view.

Then things took a decided turn to the abnormal. Harsh orders were received that the pilot, co-pilot and mechanic were not to exit the airplane. Suddenly, the radio man had vanished. The others waited an hour in vain for his return. Finally, the pilot decided to get out of the airplane and find his missing crewman, without orders, and on his own.

On the airfield itself nobody was to be seen. There was only one building visible which was a lonely hanger. The pilot, ever concerned with maintaining cover, headed straight for this hanger. Upon arrival he opened an narrow, high sliding door and entered, hoping to receive some information. No person was to be seen but what the pilot did see bewildered him so that the image was deeply ingrained in his mind.

There in the hanger stood three or four very large, round, dark dish shaped metal constructions on telescope-like leg stands. The objects were about 6 meters off the ground and the objects themselves were 12 to 15 meters in diameter. The pilot compared the shape of the objects to a giant soup dish or soup plate.

Suddenly, out of the half darkness a military guard emerged. The guard let the pilot know that he was in an area which was strictly off limits. In fact, the pilot was told, on no uncertain terms, to disappear immediately or this would be his last day on earth.

This day had started as a routine flight connecting two outlying airfields. This pilot had no expectations of seeing something so unusual that he barley had context in which to place it. Further, even as his mind was transfixed and in a process of trying to give understanding to what he was seeing, he was suddenly. jolted out of this tableau by a guard threatening his very life and ordering him to leave.

Of course the question of what those objects in the hanger really were comes back to this pilot even after almost 55 years. The pilot personally attributes it to the so called "Magnetscheibe", literally, "magnet-disk". According to the pilot rumors of these objects circulated in pilot circles since the summer of 1944 (4).

Two things can definitely be said of this sighting. First, it can be said is that this sighting seems to be of the smaller type of German field propulsion saucer as opposed to a larger version. Second, these saucers can definitely be ascribed to belonging to and in the possession of German military forces during the Second World War. At no time in this report has the word "alien" or "extraterrestrial" ever been mentioned or even considered.

Beyond that it can be said that the pilot personally believed these to be of the "Magnetscheibe" type, that is to say not powered by chemical combustion. There reasons to believe this is correct. These saucers were found on a remote and rather primitive airfield. They were in the only building present. This means that they did not need an extensive support system.

The chemically powered jet or rocket engines needed an extensive field support structure. They needed to be refueled after every flight. The two liquid fuels used by the Me-163 rocket-fighter, for instance, ignited immediately when they came into contact with each other with explosive intensity. The fuel tanks had to be washed out after each flight and separate ground crews were responsible for each type of liquid fuel. It is noteworthy that no such support ground support structure or personnel was in evidence on this occasion. All that was observed was a large structure filled with saucers and a guard. The ground support necessary for launch of these craft must have been minimal and argues for the field propulsion hypothesis.

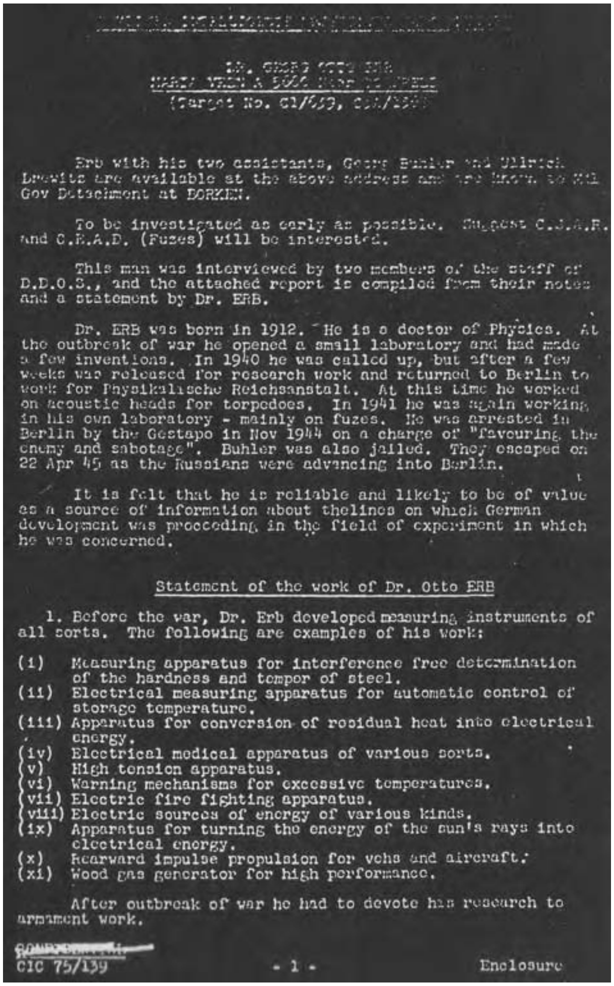
Of course the weakness in this report is the lack of the name of the pilot. Even if this report is taken at a minimal level of credulity, it constitutes a rumor of German involvement with field propulsion vehicles.

The reader will recall that the research paradigm being followed is that once mention was made by a German source of a particular thing, then (and only then) corroborating information should be sought from U.S. governmental agencies using FOIA.

A Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Report

Since we have a German claiming field propulsion saucers we can now follow our research paradigm and search governmental records for corroboration. The Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee reports are a series of reports compiled by agents of the United States and Great Britain. Most were written immediately after the field work was done. The agents targeted specific things such as sites, people, specific technology or other aspects of specific interest. The agents then wrote a summary report which is what is entered into the record.

As with almost all summary reports at this level, the implications of what is being described are lacking. These reports do not set the particular technology into any context. That is, these reports doe not say how a specific technology under study was to be applied in the future in some, if not most, cases. Behind these reports must be a body of information and at least a few individuals intimately familiar with the technology in question. They were familiar with the technology and the context to which it was useful. If another government operative was interested in that topic or its implications, and if his security clearance sufficed, he would be shown the underlying material and presumably be directed to the particular individual



[illegible]

DR. GEORG OTTO ERB
[illegible]
(Target No. C1/659, [illegible])

Erb with his two assistants, Georg Buhler and Ulrich Drewitz are available at the above address and are known to Mil Gov Detachment at DORKEN.

To be investigated as early as possible. Suggest C.S.A.R. and C.E.A.D. (Fuzes) will be interested.

This man was interviewed by two members of the staff of D.D.O.S., and the attached report is compiled from their notes and a statement by Dr. ERB.

Dr. ERB was born in 1912. He is a doctor of Physics. At the outbreak of war he opened a small laboratory and had made a few inventions. In 1940 he was called up, but after a few weeks was released for research work and returned to Berlin to work for Physikalische Reichsanstalt. At this time he worked on acoustic heads for torpedoes. In 1941 he was again working in his own laboratory - mainly on fuzes. He was arrested in Berlin by the Gestapo in Nov 1944 on a charge of "favouring the enemy and sabotage". Buhler was also jailed. They escaped on 22 Apr 45 as the Russians were advancing into Berlin.

It is felt that he is reliable and likely to be of value as a source of information about thelines on which German development was proceeding in the field of experiment in which he was concerned.

Statement of the work of Dr. Otto ERB

1. Before the war, Dr. Erb developed measuring instruments of all sorts. The following are examples of his work:

(i) Measuring apparatus for interference free determination of the hardness and temper of steel.
(ii) Electrical measuring apparatus for automatic control of storage temperature.
(iii) Apparatus for conversion of residual heat into electrical energy.
(iv) Electrical medical apparatus of various sorts.
(v) High tension apparatus.
(vi) Warning mechanisms for excessive temperatures.
(vii) Electric fire fighting apparatus.
(viii) Electric sources of energy of various kinds.
(ix) Apparatus for turning the energy of the sun's rays into electrical energy.
(x) Rearward impulse propulsion for vehs and aircraft.
(xi) Wood gas generator for high performance.

After outbreak of war he had to devote his research to armament work.

~~[illegible]~~
CIC 75/139 - 1 - Enclosure

who was its residing expert. Only slowly, if at all, was this secret science leaked or given to American industry and then only with an appropriate cover-story, one which may even supply a pseudo-inventor of that technology. This is conspiracy at its finest. This deception is beyond the scope of this book but what is important for us now is that sometimes a mistake or slip-up was made in writing or censoring these reports and hints of things of stupendous technological worth actually surfaces. Such is the case with Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Report number 146 regarding Dr. Georg Otto Erb and his work which is reproduced here.

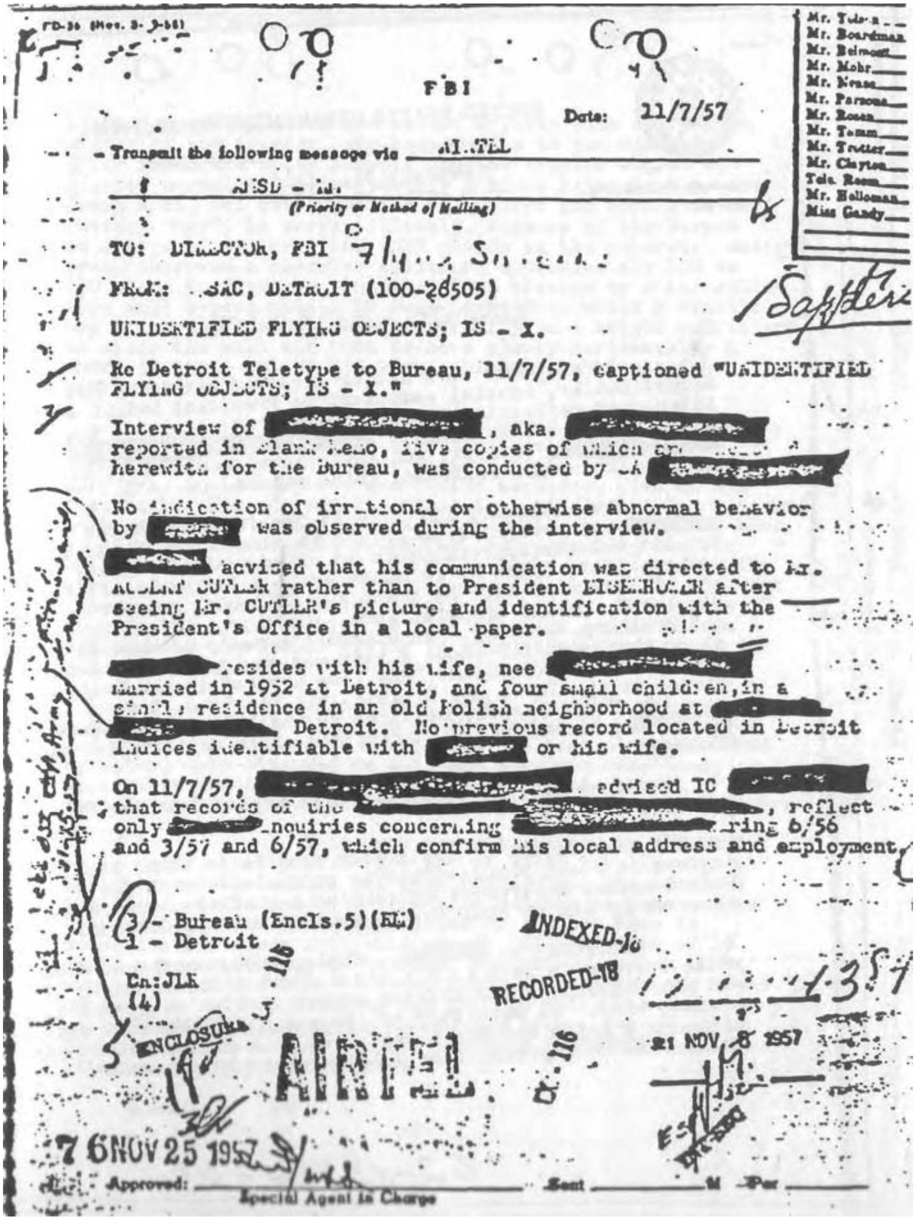
Dr. Erb was on the cutting edge of several technologies according to this report. None of these technologies was especially exciting in 1946, however. Jets, rockets and atomic energy where the hot-ticket items of the time. Nobody cared about new sources of electrical energy. The USA had plenty of electricity and plenty of oil to generate more. It was also known by then that atomic power could be applied to generate even more electricity. Nobody cared about Dr. Erb's experiments listed under item (iii) "Apparatus for conversion of residual heat into electrical energy" or item (viii) "Electrical sources of energy of various kinds" or even item (ix) "Apparatus for turning the energy of the sun's rays into electrical energy". Since nobody cared about these things, there was really no reason not to list them in the summary report. Their significance would only be realized a generation later during the "energy crisis" of the mid-1970s and by then it was too late to censor the report. One can only wonder where this research would have led if it funding had continued over the next thirty years. Or did it continue in secret?

Of course by now many readers will have already read number and grasped the significance of number (x) "Rearward impulse propulsion for vehs and aircraft". Given the nature of Dr. Erb's other work, it is a safe bet that this "impulse propulsion" was not of the jet or rocket nature. In fact there remains little doubt that this propulsion was, in fact, field propulsion. Dr. Erb was experimenting on means to apply forward motion using rearward impulse propulsion to aircraft and "vehs" (vehicles). If this is not the smoking gun for German experiments in field propulsion saucers, it is at least a hint that there is a gun.

The Smoking Gun: An F.B.I. Report

That is right, Fox Mulder was not the first F.B.I. agent to believe in UFOs. The files in question are F.B.I. file numbers 62-83894-383, 62-838994-384 and 62-83894-385. Their date is 11/7/57 to 11/8/57. They deal with a Polish immigrant, then living in the United States, who reported his wartime experience to the Bureau hoping it might throw some light on UFO sightings seen in Texas at about this time.

F.B.I. Reports On A German Field Propulsion Saucer



FD-36 (Rev. [illegible])

Mr. Tolson
Mr. Boardman
Mr. Belmont
Mr. Mohr
Mr. Nease
Mr. Parsons
Mr. Rosen
Mr. Tamm
Mr. Trotter
Mr. Clayton
Tele. Room
Mr. Holloman
Miss Gandy

FBI

Date: 11/7/57

Transmit the following message via AIRTEL

[illegible]
(Priority or Method of Mailing)

TO: DIRECTOR, FBI Flying Saucers

FROM: SAC, DETROIT (100-26505)

UNIDENTIFIED FLYING OBJECTS; IS - X.

Re Detroit Teletype to Bureau, 11/7/57, captioned "UNIDENTIFIED FLYING OBJECTS; IS - X."

Interview of [redacted], aka. [redacted] reported in blank memo, five copies of which are [illegible] herewith for the Bureau, was conducted by SA [redacted]

No indication of irrational or otherwise abnormal behavior by [redacted] was observed during the interview.

[redacted] advised that his communication was directed to Mr. ROBERT CUTLER rather than to President EISENHOWER after seeing Mr. CUTLER's picture and identification with the President's Office in a local paper.

[redacted] resides with his wife, nee [redacted] married in 1952 at Detroit, and four small children, in a single residence in an old Polish neighborhood at [redacted] Detroit. No previous record located in Detroit indices identifiable with [redacted] or his wife.

On 11/7/57, [redacted] advised IC [redacted] that records of the [redacted], reflect only [redacted]nquiries concerning [redacted]ring 6/56 and 3/57 and 6/57, which confirm his local address and employment.

3 - Bureau (Encls.5)(RM)
1 - Detroit

CN:JLK
(4)

INDEXED-18

RECORDED-18

21 NOV 8 1957

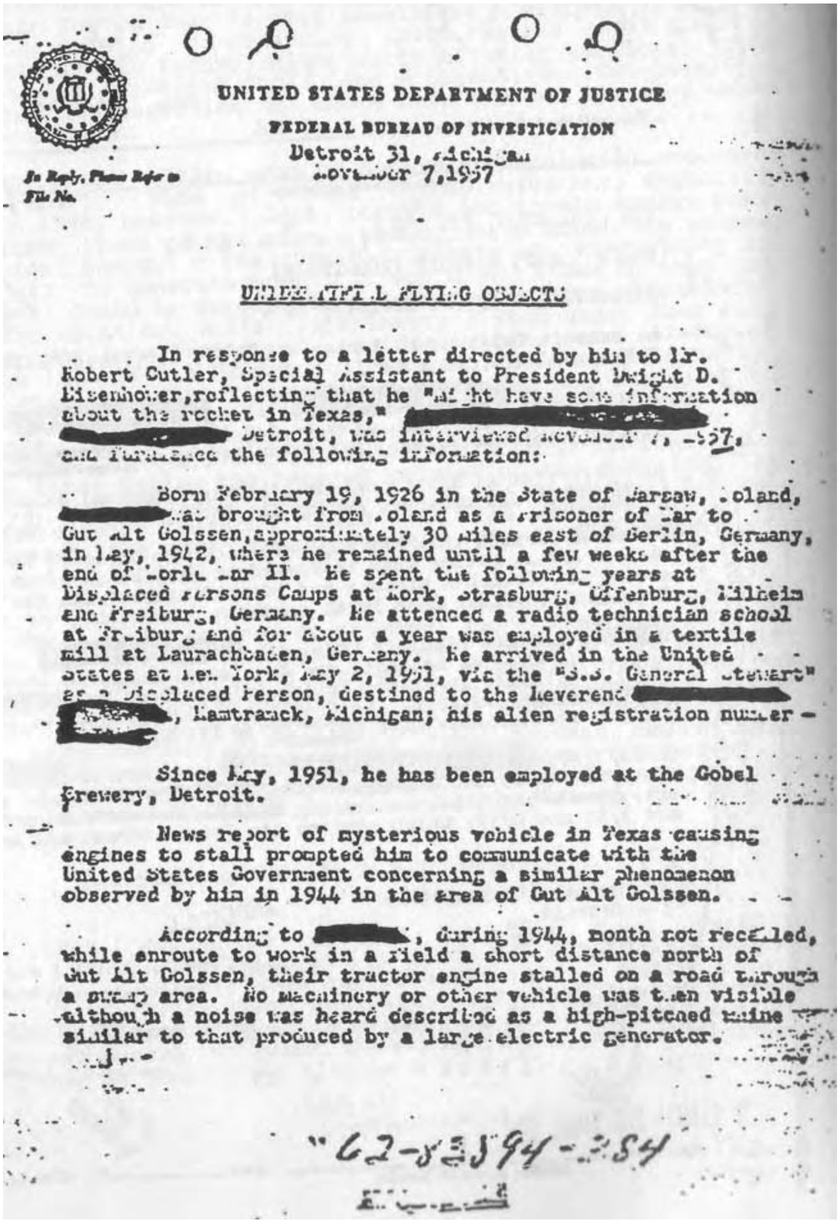
ENCLOSURE

AIRTEL

76 NOV 25 1957

Approved: ______ Special Agent in Charge Sent ______ M Per ______

F.B.I. Reports On A German Field Propulsion Saucer



UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION
Detroit 31, Michigan
November 7, 1957

In Reply, Please Refer to File No.

UNIDENTIFIED FLYING OBJECTS

In response to a letter directed by him to Mr. Robert Cutler, Special Assistant to President Dwight D. Eisenhower, reflecting that he "might have some information about the rocket in Texas," [redacted] Detroit, was interviewed November 7, 1957, and furnished the following information:

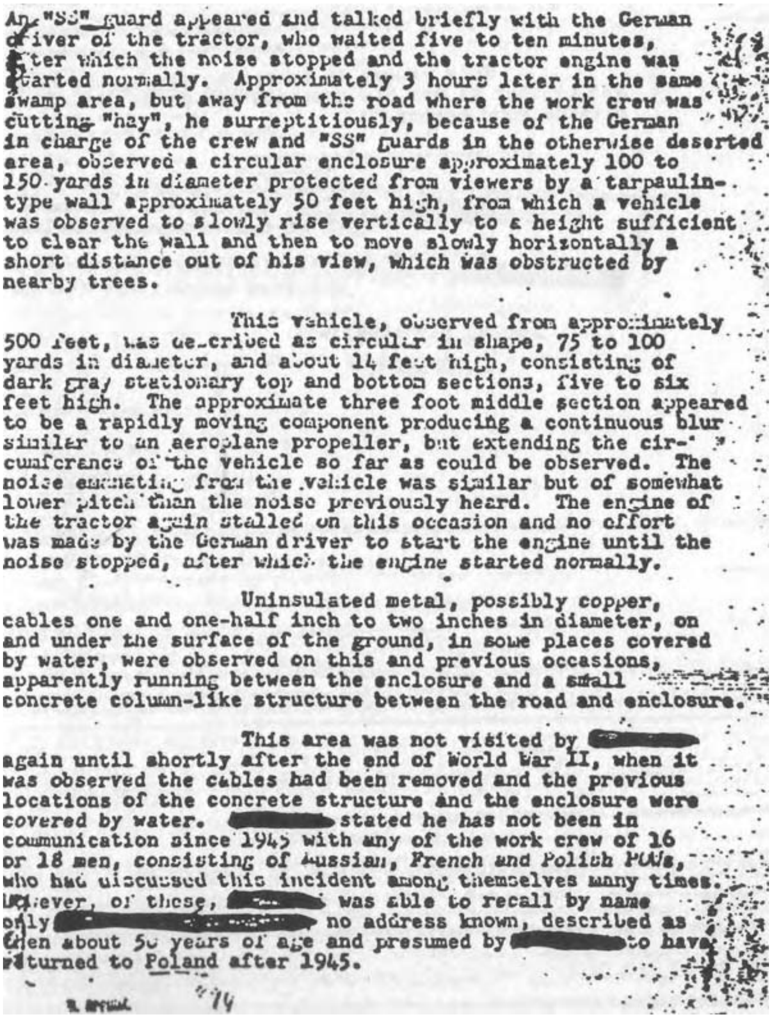
Born February 19, 1926 in the State of Warsaw, Poland, [redacted] was brought from Poland as a Prisoner of War to Gut Alt Golssen, approximately 30 miles east of Berlin, Germany, in May, 1942, where he remained until a few weeks after the end of World War II. He spent the following years at Displaced Persons Camps at Kork, Strasburg, Offenburg, Milheim and Freiburg, Germany. He attended a radio technician school at Freiburg and for about a year was employed in a textile mill at Laurachbaden, Germany. He arrived in the United States at New York, May 2, 1951, via the "S.S. General Stewart" as a Displaced Person, destined to the Reverend [redacted], Hamtramck, Michigan; his alien registration number – [redacted]

Since May, 1951, he has been employed at the Gobel Brewery, Detroit.

News report of mysterious vehicle in Texas causing engines to stall prompted him to communicate with the United States Government concerning a similar phenomenon observed by him in 1944 in the area of Gut Alt Golssen.

According to [redacted], during 1944, month not recalled, while enroute to work in a field a short distance north of Gut Alt Golssen, their tractor engine stalled on a road through a swamp area. No machinery or other vehicle was then visible although a noise was heard described as a high-pitched whine similar to that produced by a large electric generator.

62-83894-284



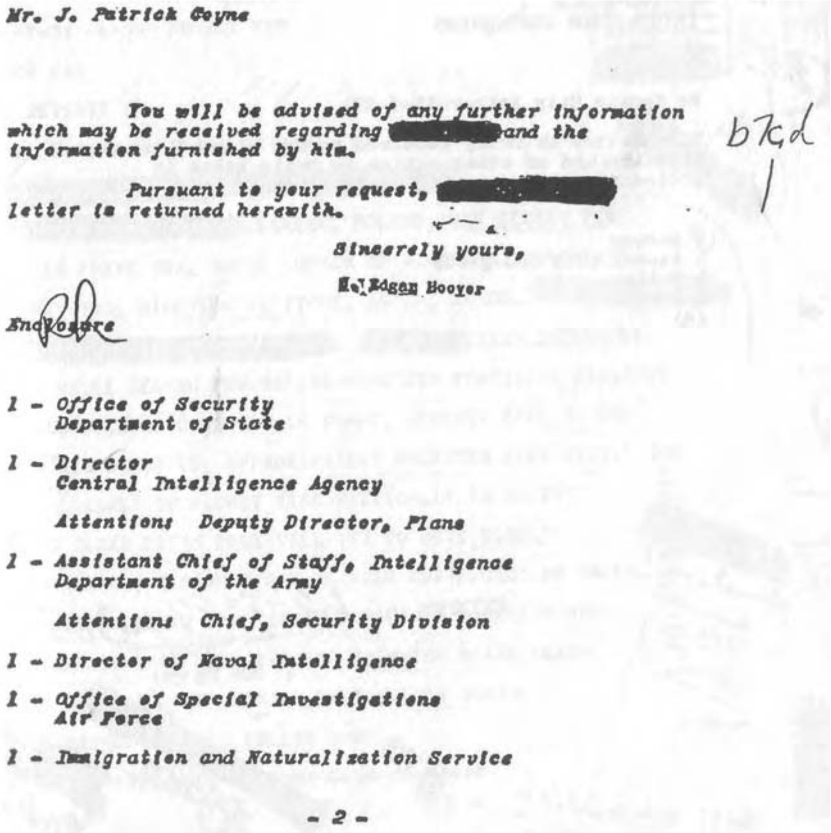
An "SS" guard appeared and talked briefly with the German driver of the tractor, who waited five to ten minutes, after which the noise stopped and the tractor engine was started normally. Approximately 3 hours later in the same swamp area, but away from the road where the work crew was cutting "hay", he surreptitiously, because of the German in charge of the crew and "SS" guards in the otherwise deserted area, observed a circular enclosure approximately 100 to 150 yards in diameter protected from viewers by a tarpaulin-type wall approximately 50 feet high, from which a vehicle was observed to slowly rise vertically to a height sufficient to clear the wall and then to move slowly horizontally a short distance out of his view, which was obstructed by nearby trees.

This vehicle, observed from approximately 500 feet, was described as circular in shape, 75 to 100 yards in diameter, and about 14 feet high, consisting of dark gray stationary top and bottom sections, five to six feet high. The approximate three foot middle section appeared to be a rapidly moving component producing a continuous blur similar to an aeroplane propeller, but extending the circumference of the vehicle so far as could be observed. The noise emanating from the vehicle was similar but of somewhat lower pitch than the noise previously heard. The engine of the tractor again stalled on this occasion and no effort was made by the German driver to start the engine until the noise stopped, after which the engine started normally.

Uninsulated metal, possibly copper, cables one and one-half inch to two inches in diameter, on and under the surface of the ground, in some places covered by water, were observed on this and previous occasions, apparently running between the enclosure and a small concrete column-like structure between the road and enclosure.

This area was not visited by [redacted] again until shortly after the end of World War II, when it was observed the cables had been removed and the previous locations of the concrete structure and the enclosure were covered by water. [redacted] stated he has not been in communication since 1945 with any of the work crew of 16 or 18 men, consisting of Russian, French and Polish POWs, who had discussed this incident among themselves many times. However, of these, [redacted] was able to recall by name only [redacted] no address known, described as then about 50 years of age and presumed by [redacted] to have returned to Poland after 1945.

74



Mr. J. Patrick Coyne

You will be advised of any further information which may be received regarding [redacted] and the information furnished by him.

Pursuant to your request, [redacted] letter is returned herewith.

b7c,d

Sincerely yours,

J. Edgar Hoover

Enclosure

1 - Office of Security
Department of State

1 - Director
Central Intelligence Agency

Attention: Deputy Director, Plans

1 - Assistant Chief of Staff, Intelligence
Department of the Army

Attention: Chief, Security Division

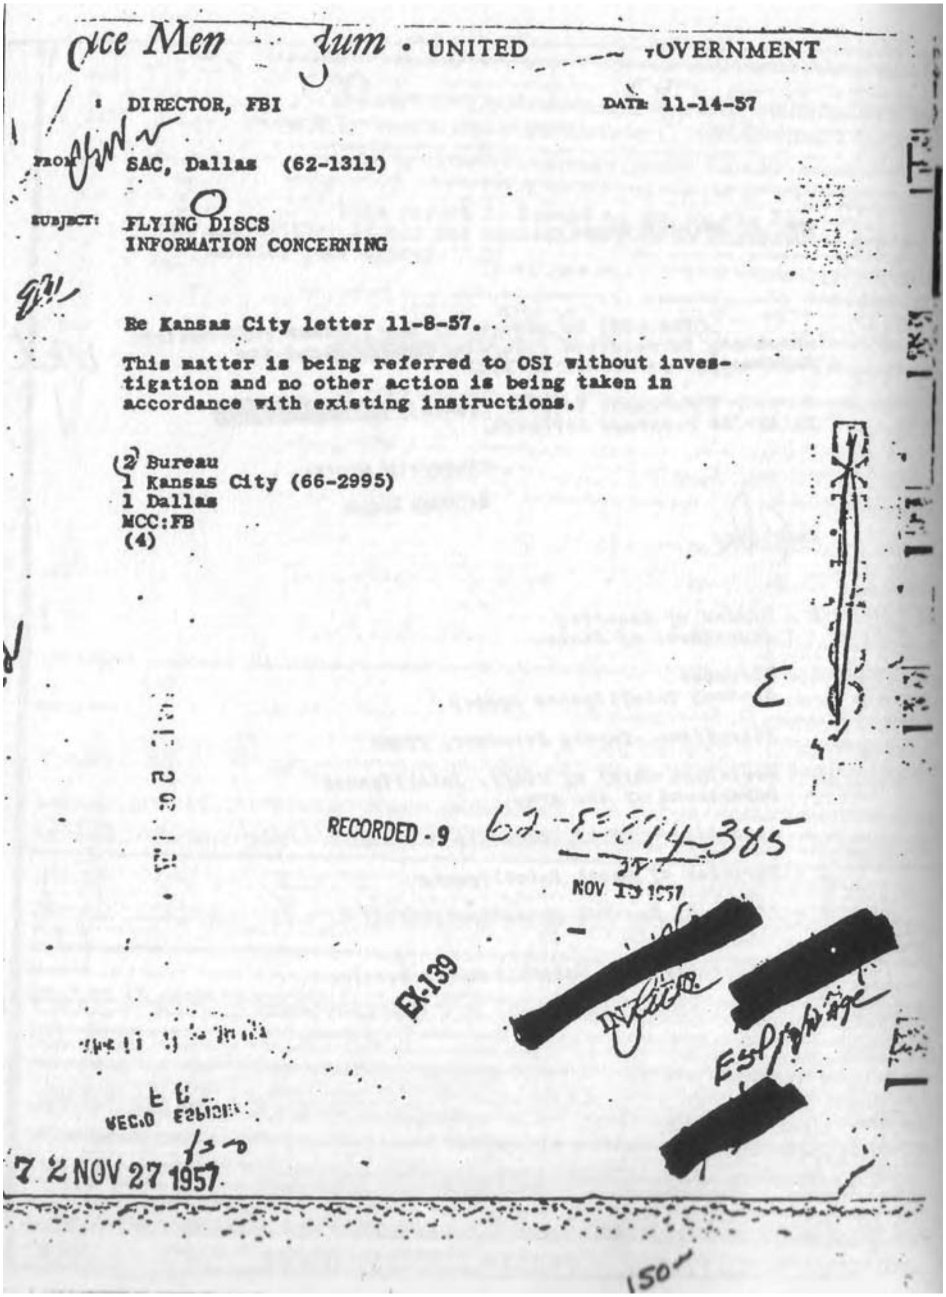
1 - Director of Naval Intelligence

1 - Office of Special Investigations
Air Force

1 - Immigration and Naturalization Service

- 2 -

F.B.I. Reports On A German Field Propulsion Saucer



ice Men dum • UNITED OVERNMENT

TO : DIRECTOR, FBI DATE: 11-14-57

FROM : SAC, Dallas (62-1311)

SUBJECT: FLYING DISCS
INFORMATION CONCERNING

Re Kansas City letter 11-8-57.

This matter is being referred to OSI without investigation and no other action is being taken in accordance with existing instructions.

2 Bureau
1 Kansas City (66-2995)
1 Dallas
MCC:FB
(4)

E

RECORDED - 9 62-83894-385

NOV 19 1957

EX-139

[redacted]

[redacted]

[redacted]

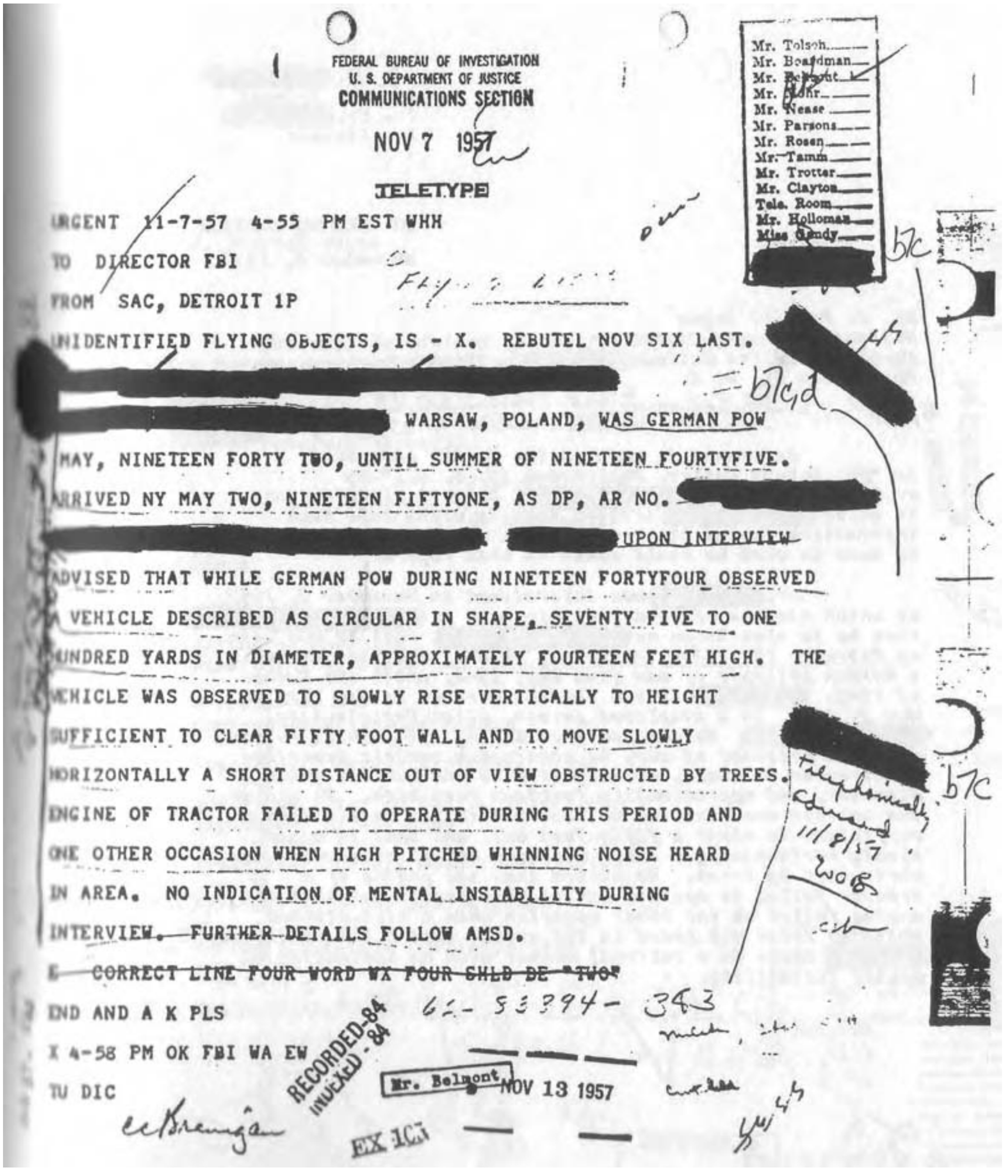
INFO

Espionage

72 NOV 27 1957

150

F.B.I. Reports On A German Field Propulsion Saucer



FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION
U. S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
COMMUNICATIONS SECTION

NOV 7 1957

TELETYPE

Mr. Tolson
Mr. Boardman
Mr. Belmont
Mr. Mohr
Mr. Nease
Mr. Parsons
Mr. Rosen
Mr. Tamm
Mr. Trotter
Mr. Clayton
Tele. Room
Mr. Holloman
Miss Gandy
[redacted]

b7c

URGENT 11-7-57 4-55 PM EST WHH

TO DIRECTOR FBI

FROM SAC, DETROIT 1P

UNIDENTIFIED FLYING OBJECTS, IS - X. REBUTEL NOV SIX LAST.

[redacted] WARSAW, POLAND, WAS GERMAN POW

MAY, NINETEEN FORTY TWO, UNTIL SUMMER OF NINETEEN FOURTYFIVE.

ARRIVED NY MAY TWO, NINETEEN FIFTYONE, AS DP, AR NO. [redacted]

[redacted] [redacted] UPON INTERVIEW

ADVISED THAT WHILE GERMAN POW DURING NINETEEN FORTYFOUR OBSERVED

A VEHICLE DESCRIBED AS CIRCULAR IN SHAPE, SEVENTY FIVE TO ONE HUNDRED YARDS IN DIAMETER, APPROXIMATELY FOURTEEN FEET HIGH. THE

VEHICLE WAS OBSERVED TO SLOWLY RISE VERTICALLY TO HEIGHT

SUFFICIENT TO CLEAR FIFTY FOOT WALL AND TO MOVE SLOWLY

HORIZONTALLY A SHORT DISTANCE OUT OF VIEW OBSTRUCTED BY TREES.

ENGINE OF TRACTOR FAILED TO OPERATE DURING THIS PERIOD AND

ONE OTHER OCCASION WHEN HIGH PITCHED WHINNING NOISE HEARD

IN AREA. NO INDICATION OF MENTAL INSTABILITY DURING INTERVIEW. ~~FURTHER DETAILS~~ FOLLOW AMSD.

~~E CORRECT LINE FOUR WORD WX FOUR SHLD BE "TWO"~~

END AND A K PLS

X 4-58 PM OK FBI WA EW

TU DIC

[redacted]

b7c,d

[redacted]

b7c

telephonically advised 11/8/57
WOB
cb

62-53394-343

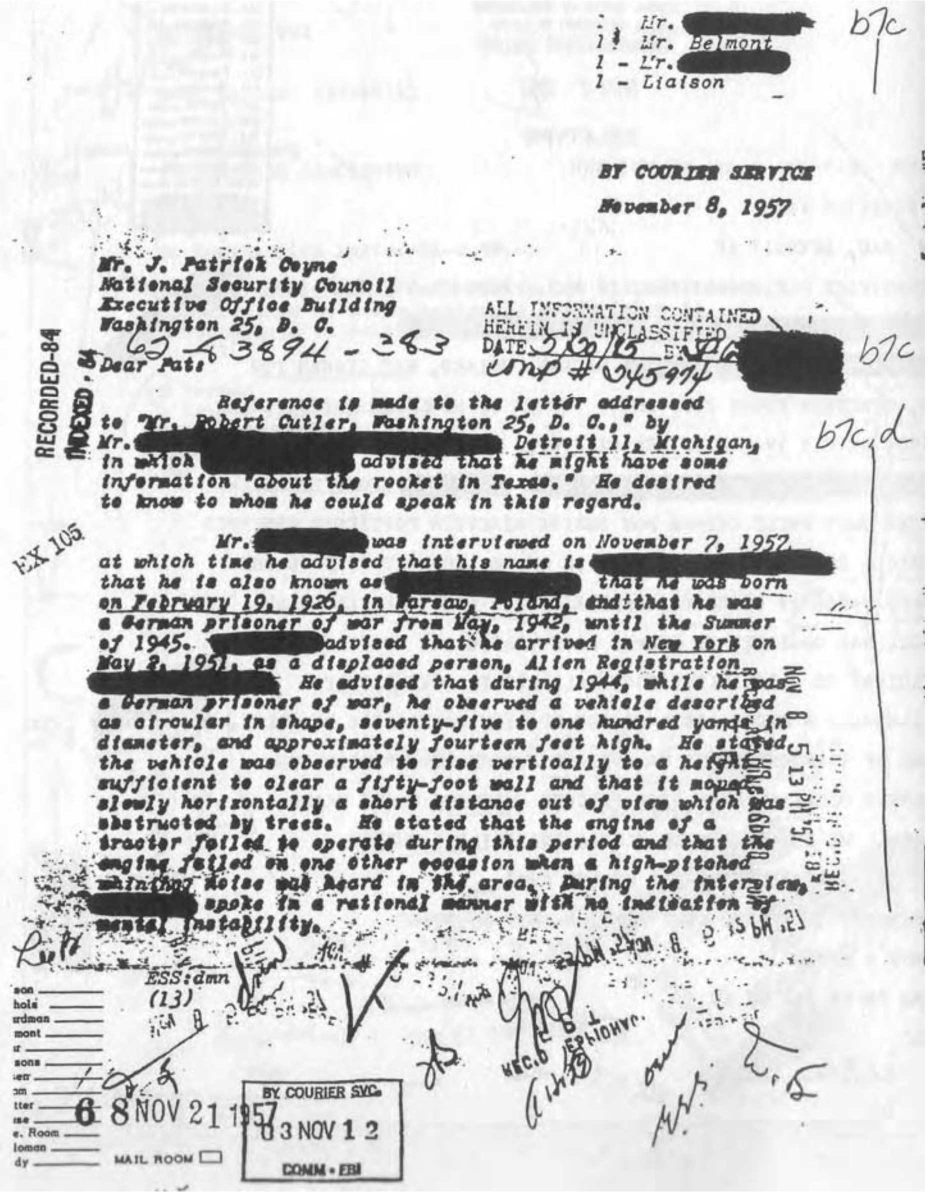
RECORDED-84
INDEXED-84

Mr. Belmont

NOV 13 1957

EX-103

F.B.I. Reports On A German Field Propulsion Saucer



1 - Mr. [redacted]
1 - Mr. Belmont
1 - Mr. [redacted]
1 - Liaison

b7c

BY COURIER SERVICE

November 8, 1957

Mr. J. Patrick Coyne
National Security Council
Executive Office Building
Washington 25, D. C.

62-63894-283

ALL INFORMATION CONTAINED
HEREIN IS UNCLASSIFIED
DATE 2/20/85 BY [redacted] emp # 045974

b7c

RECORDED-84

INDEXED - 84

Dear Pat:

Reference is made to the letter addressed to "Mr. Robert Cutler, Washington 25, D. C.," by Mr. [redacted] Detroit 11, Michigan, in which [redacted] advised that he might have some information "about the rocket in Texas." He desired to know to whom he could speak in this regard.

b7c, d

EX 105

Mr. [redacted] was interviewed on November 7, 1957, at which time he advised that his name is [redacted] that he is also known as [redacted] that he was born on February 19, 1926, in Warsaw, Poland, and that he was a German prisoner of war from May, 1942, until the Summer of 1945. [redacted] advised that he arrived in New York on May 2, 1951, as a displaced person, Alien Registration [redacted] He advised that during 1944, while he was a German prisoner of war, he observed a vehicle described as circular in shape, seventy-five to one hundred yards in diameter, and approximately fourteen feet high. He stated the vehicle was observed to rise vertically to a height sufficient to clear a fifty-foot wall and that it moved slowly horizontally a short distance out of view which was obstructed by trees. He stated that the engine of a tractor failed to operate during this period and that the engine failed on one other occasion when a high-pitched whining noise was heard in the area. During the interview, [redacted] spoke in a rational manner with no indication of mental instability.

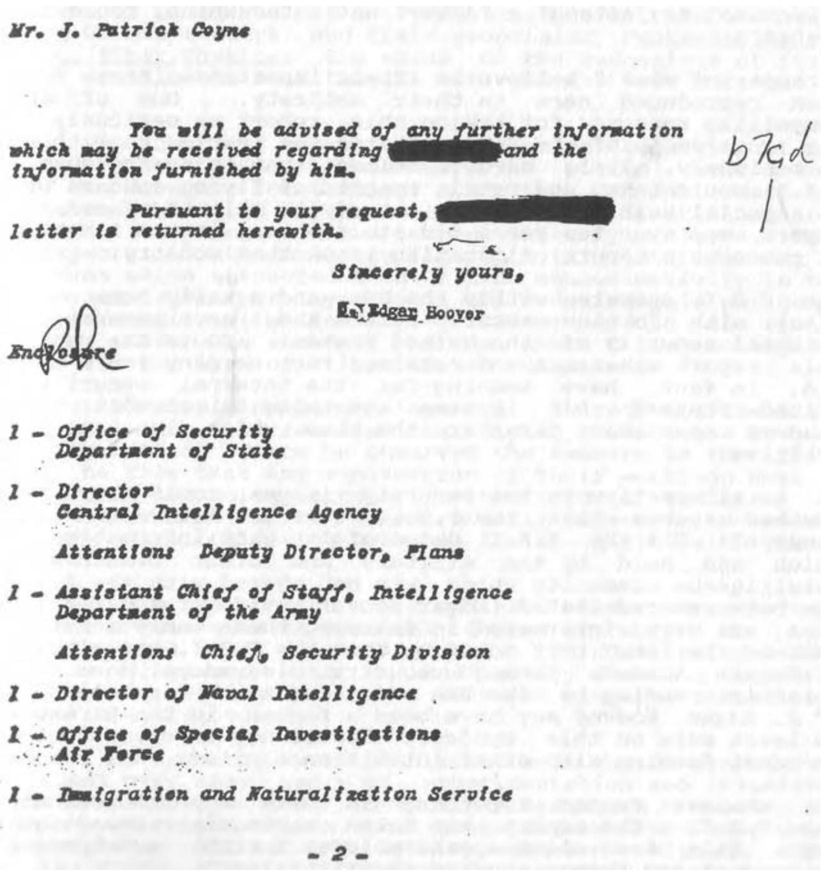
NOV 8 5 13 PM '57

ESS:dmn
(13)

68 NOV 21 1957

BY COURIER SVC.
3 NOV 12
COMM - FBI

MAIL ROOM ☐



Mr. J. Patrick Coyne

You will be advised of any further information which may be received regarding [redacted] and the information furnished by him.

b7c,d

Pursuant to your request, [redacted] letter is returned herewith.

Sincerely yours,

J. Edgar Hoover

Enclosure

1 - Office of Security
Department of State

1 - Director
Central Intelligence Agency

Attention: Deputy Director, Plans

1 - Assistant Chief of Staff, Intelligence
Department of the Army

Attention: Chief, Security Division

1 - Director of Naval Intelligence

1 - Office of Special Investigations
Air Force

1 - Immigration and Naturalization Service

- 2 -

The time of the sighting was in 1944, the place was Gut Alt Golssen, approximately 30 miles east of Berlin. The informant, whose name has been deleted, states that while he was a prisoner of war working for the Germans, a flying object arose nearby from behind an enclosure hidden from view by a 50 foot high tarpaulin-type wall. It rose about 500 feet then moved away horizontally. The only noise the object made was a high-pitched whine. The object was described as being 75 to 100 feet in diameter and 14 feet high. It was composed of a dark grey stationary top and bottom sections five to six feet high with a rapidly moving center section producing only a blur and extending the circumference of the vehicle. Notably, the engine of their farm tractor stalled during this event and the SS guards told the driver not to attempt a restart until the whine could no longer be heard.

Because of what I believe is their importance, these files have been reproduced here in their entirety. One of the most compelling reasons for taking this report so seriously is that the government of the United States of America took this report so seriously. It is hard to believe that an agency such as the F.B.I. would take and retain reports of flying saucers which had no special meaning for them. Add to this the fact that this report was over ten years old at the time it was taken and that it concerns a report originating in another country.

The F.B.I. operates within the USA and usually does not concern itself with foreign matters unless they have meaning for the internal security of the United States. Could the reason that this report was taken and retained for so many years be that it did, in fact, have meaning for the internal security of the United States? Did it have something to do with the flying saucers seen over Texas at the time which also stopped motor vehicles?

As an alternative to the security issues, could there have been another reason that the F.B.I. was so interested in flying saucers? Did the F.B.I. desperately want information on UFOs which was held by the military and other branches of the intelligence community which was not shared with the F.B.I.? It has been rumored that J. Edgar Hoover, head of the F.B.I. at the time, was very interested in learning these secrets but was held "out of the loop". It could be that the F.B.I. was already aware of German saucers through security clearances done on German scientists coming to the USA under Operation Paperclip? The ego of J. Edgar Hoover may have been a factor in the Bureau's guest to learn more on this subject. Hoover may have wanted to be on an equal footing with other intelligence chiefs.

For whatever reason, something in these reports resonated with the F.B.I. The report was taken seriously, investigated and kept. This fact alone speaks volumes for the existence of UFOs in general and German saucers in particular.

Discussion of German Field Propulsion Saucers

Some explanation has been attempted regarding the Schauberger models and the KM-2 rocket. From this point on, the discussion of German field propulsion saucers will move away from the areas centering around observed evidence and into areas of interpretation. Some of the German flying craft described are flying saucers in the classic sense. The F.B.I. report describes something which moves by non-aerodynamic means and which remains the source of speculation.

At this point, mention should be made of the ideas of some prominent writers in this field. The first of these is Mr. William Lyne of Lamy, New Mexico. Mr. Lyne has written two books concerning German saucers and field propulsion, Pentagon Aliens and Occult Ether Physics. His ideas on the mechanisms of field propulsion remain the best thought out and the most detailed on the subject.

Mr. Lyne lives near the secret weapons testing facilities of Los Alamos and White Sands. These were the places where German weaponry was brought for testing after the war and where the United States tested its first atomic bomb. It is still an area Of secret military research and secret military projects. Then as now, aspects of atomic energy figure in this setting. It is also an area which attracted much flying saucer activity in the late 1940s and 1950s. Mr. Lyne was a child during this period of time and personally witnessed flying saucers as did his family and friends. Later, as an adult, he went about trying to explain mechanisms for the type of flight he had witnessed.

Lyne worked within certain parameters. He rejected the alien hypothesis outright. He realized that flying saucers had to have been made by humans. Since he observed the saucers in the 1940s and 1950s, he knew that any explanation of their workings must be limited to the technology present in the 1940s or earlier. He connected UFO technology to other recently imported technology from Germany while believing both had their origins with Nikola Tesla (5).

Further, there is no mention of intangibles by Mr. Lyne. There are no unknown energies or mystical forces at work. Mr. Lyne stands with both feet on the ground. Things are concrete. Machinery is diagramed. Matter and energy function as they always have. In reading Mr. Lyne's work one can almost smell the machine oil and the ozone.

Mr. Lyne builds upon the work of Nikola Tesla who developed his unique ideas over many years of experimentation and invention. This basis built upon real world experimentation, testing and application separates Tesla's ether theory ideas from those which will be explored later. Mr. Lyne presents us with an ether theory in which ether is super-fine matter which exists everywhere. It is so fine that it will go through the holes left in ordinary matter (6).

A few words about Mr. Lyne's ideas are necessary to set a context for this discussion. Just as an internal combustion engine can be described as a "heat pump" so can the flying saucer drive of Mr. Lyne be described as an "ether pump". Ether (very fine matter) is attracted to the saucer via an electric field, then pumped through the saucer and out again using the principle of magneto-hydro-dynamic pumping (7). This magneto-hydro-dynamic pumping is related to the Hall Effect. Edwin Hall placed a gold leaf strip in which an electric current was flowing into a gap in a magnetic field. An electromotive force was produced at right angles to the magnetic field and the electric current. This electromotive force was proportional to the product of the electric current and the magnetic field (8).

According to experimentation by Tesla, ether is made rigid with high voltage, high frequency electrical energy (9). The convex shape of the upper half of the saucer projects the electrical attractive force, generated by a specific electronic component, in an ever expanding arch over the saucer. Ether is made rigid and anchors the saucer. This is possible since the total mass of the ether caught in the electric field is far greater than the mass of the saucer. Near the surface of the saucer, the "rigified" ether is pulled into the saucer in what Mr. Lyne calls "tubes of force". These tubes of force would be pulled right through the opposite side of the saucer and out if it were not for the blocking force of a second apparatus which nullifies the tubes of force and prevents this from happening. This imbalance is the reason the saucer is able to move (10).

The electrical components necessary for this to take place are, according to Mr. Lyne, a Tesla turbine to supply electrical power and two types of Tesla pancake coils (11).

The Tesla turbine is a wheel-like device which is described in Mr. Lyne's book (12) and elsewhere (13). Mr. Lyne orients this turbine vertically in his drawings but oriented with its flat spinning surface horizontally, this might, perhaps, account for the spinning disc witnessed on some saucers.

The Tesla pancake coils are also described in both sources cited. Mr. Lyne goes further and gives instructions as to their manufacture. One type of pancake coil insures forth a negative discharge of DC energy, tuned to a one-fourth wave length, and is oriented in the desired direction of flight (14). The other type of pancake coil is mounted exactly opposite the first and emits a positive AC discharge which is used to dissolve the ether flow or tubes of force.

Dr. Gordon Freeman, a Fucannelli-like scientist who knows about such matters, has been curious about the abbreviated wave-cycle of the first pancake coil. His position is that one must not only understand conventional scientific theory in order to spiral secondary transmission line primary source

lamps and other loads
No. 593,138 (1897)
power by wire

Top Left: Pancake Tesla coil with the secondary coil inside the primary. Top Right: The smaller of the Hans Coler free-energy machines. Bottom: Cut away showing Vril power plant. Was this related to the Schappeller device?

understand the way a field propulsion saucer flies but one must also understand some concepts which are sometimes labeled "occult". Dr. Freeman has worked out a "common denominator" for some field propulsion vehicles the essence of which he has shared (15). Dr. Freeman's ability to analyze, explain and interrelate physics, engineering and "occult" geometry is only matched by his ability to explain it all on a level we can all understand.

Some individuals see hidden, esoteric or occult knowledge as the inspiration for the breakthroughs the Germans made in field propulsion flying vehicles. Usually coupled with an exotic-theory of UFO origin, it is an egually exotic local from which this exotic theory is said to have originated. We have been presented with this line of reasoning for years in the "UFOs are of extraterrestrial origin" theory. Indeed, some writers see an extraterrestrial origin for German UFOs also as we shall see. But just stating that UFOs are of occult or alien origin is not an explanation in itself. It still begs the question of how they operate. Their method of operation, their technology, must be explained regardless of where they came from in order for the explanation to be a satisfying one.

Returning to earth, another theory is that the German scientists were influenced by some ideas originating in Asia. Tibet and India are the suspects in question. UFOs have been reported over Mongolia, Tibet and India for centuries. The ancient Indians even claimed to have constructed aircraft which resemble flying saucers. These saucers are called Vimanas. Ancient Indian texts in Sanskrit speak of the flight and manufacture of these saucers. The German "Ahnenerbe", an organization whose purpose is associated with researching Germanic ancestry, sent out expeditions to the East with the express purpose of acquiring ancient, hidden knowledge. This is precisely what Heinrich Haarer was doing, whose book served as the basis for the film "Seven Years in Tibet". This link between flying saucers of the East and the West is suspected as an influence on German field propulsion vehicles (16). The exact connection, though, has never been demonstrated.

A connection which is more certain involves Viktor Schauberger's use of Pythagorean geometry. There is no doubt that Schauberger incorporated this mathematics into his work but what is intriguing is what is said about this body of mathematical knowledge. The story goes that it was the Knights Templar who stumbled upon this knowledge in the Holy Land during the Crusades and it was they who kept and incorporated this knowledge through the use of "sacred geometry".

Both the above mentioned schools of thought lead far beyond the parameters of this book but the reader should be aware of what is said about them and their relationship to German flying discs.

Whether it is called "occult technology" or "conventional technology", in the end, it is just simply technology. And in the end, as Dr. Freeman says, "all machines can be reduced to numbers". What is called by some "occult" might be better called "arcane". This is because this technology, which seems to be the basis of field propulsion, is taught only to certain individuals, technological initiates, who use and need this knowledge for their work on government sponsored black projects. These scientist utilize a technology and understanding which are reserved for their use alone. This knowledge is not taught and not made available to the rest of us. We, the great unwashed masses, are given Einstein and the Theory of Relativity and told that this is the pinnacle of learning. As with all secret information, this arcane knowledge is held on a "need to know" basis. Our government believes that we simply don't need to know. It takes a true genius like Dr. Freeman to recognize this knowledge and set it before us in language that we can understand. It is hoped that Dr. Freeman will publish a book sooner rather than later.

Mention of the "occult" brings us to another line of evidence concerning field propulsion, that put forth by Norbert Juergen-Ratthofer and Ralf Ettl. Mr. Ettl became involved while doing research for a film project on Dr. Wernher von Braun. A film company was paying for this research. A package or several packages of information were obtained by the production company which had more to do with UFOs than rocketry. This information was laid aside by Mr. Ettl but he returned to it after enlisting the help of Norbert Juergen-Ratthofer who had a special interest in that subject (17).

The packages contained breathtakingly clear photographs of German saucers in flight. Some of these pictures may be just models but some look authentic and are posed against a landscape. Nowadays, pictures can be generated via computer and these pictures surfaced within modern times. At least one negative from these pictures which was given to Mr. Vladimir Terziski by Mr. Juergen-Ratthofer and seen by this writer, so at least not all of these pictures were computer generated. The pictures have been seen in public and through video film presentation, for about ten years. To the best of my knowledge these pictures have never been debunked using modern technical photo-analysis. Therefore, they have never been shown to be anything less than legitimate. Until they are shown to be less than legitimate, we must accept them as they are represented to us.

Besides the pictures, these writers provide an entire historical and cultural context for these saucers within the Third Reich, This contest involves secret organizations within the SS. Further, the context provided by these writers involving the occult, channeling, and extraterrestrials. This is the weak point of their presentation since the case for these latter connections is really not strong enough to be "in evidence".

Besides the books of Mr. Ettl and Mr. Juergen-Ratthofer, several other German language writers contribute books on a similar or

Haunebu 2 Test Flight

Ghostly image of a saucer, said to be a Haunebu 2, on a test flight. Photograph originally from collection of Norbert-Juergen Ratthofer, courtesy of Vladimir Terziski related theme. The more notable are D.H. Haarmann (18) and 0. Bergmann (19). Mr. Ettl and Mr. Juergen-Ratthofer themselves have written several books which are all in German language and available through their publisher (20). Mr. Ettl and Mr. Juergen-Ratthofer have also done two video films, "UFOs Das Dritte Reich Schlaege Zurueck?" and a second film, whose English title is "UFO Secrets of the 3rd Reich". This second film is very well done and contains the pictures mentioned earlier. These films should be seen by anyone seriously interested in German field propulsion saucers (21) (22).

Mr. Juergen-Ratthofer, Mr. Ettl and allied writers offer two different systems for field propulsion. The smaller saucer-type, which they designate "Vril" was powered by three moving magnetic fields (23). The larger type, designated "Haunebu" was powered by a series of devices according to these writers. In this arrangement, the output of smaller of the Hans Coler "free energy" devices (24), the "Magnetapparat", was used to supply input for the larger Coler device, the "Stromerzeuger". The output of this second device was used to turn a Van de Graaf generator. This energy was directed into something called a Marconi ball dynamo with supplied lift to the saucer (25)(26).

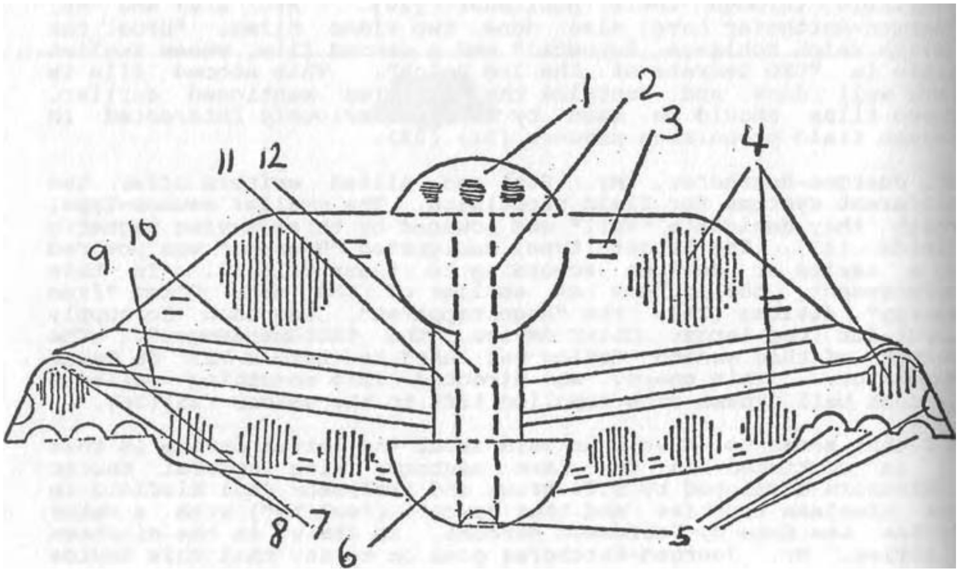
All that seems to have been said about the latter device is that it is mentioned in the same sentence with special saucer condensers developed by T.T. Brown and Professor Paul Biefield in the nineteen twenties and that "such" ("solche") with a rotor system was done by Professor Marconi, in Italy, in the nineteen thirties. Mr. Juergen-Ratthofer goes on to say that this device is to be considered, in principle, a forerunner to the Searl system (27).

The Haunebu pictures strongly resemble the Adamski saucer pictures of the early 1950s. These saucers were seen and pictures of them taken world-wide. There were many different sources for both sighting of Adamski saucers and pictures of them. There were so many in the early 1950s that it is hard to believe that all of them are fakes. Mr. Ettl and Mr. Juergen-Ratthofer maintain that these "Adamski saucers" are really the German-designed Haunebu type saucers (28). Since they were flown after the war, certain questions as to their origin arise. These questions will be treated in an upcoming section of this book.

Besides the Vril and Haunebu designs mention is made by Mr. Juergen-Ratthofer of another type of field propulsion vehicle. This saucer uses a chemical engine to drive a field propulsion generator (29). The type of chemical engine involved is similar to the famous Walter (Walther) engine, which were to be installed on some types of German submarines.

The Walter process involved a closed circuit system activated by the thermal energy produced by the decomposition of a high concentration of hydrogen peroxide. This reaction occurred in the presence of a catalyst, potassium permanganate, in a

Hybrid Saucer Design



Chemical/Field Propulsion Saucer (N. Juergen-Ratthofer). 1. Plexiglass pilot's cabin. 2. Crew rooms. 3. Intake air slots (hermetically sealed in space). 4. Vacuum ring retainers with high-performance vacuum pumps. 5. Lifting and steering jets connected to the Walter turbine system. 6. Walter turbines and electric generators with connected machine maintenance rooms. 7. Disc rotor wheel, rotating clockwise. 8. Electromagnet outer ring rotating counter-clockwise. 9. Disc wheel, inner part of the electromagnet outer ring. 10. Segmented disc-rotor and wing screw with adjustable flight blades. 11. Axis of saucer with (a) two electric motors to drive the counter rotating disc motors: electro-gravitation plant, (b) various electrical connections, (c) fuel and water tanks. 12. Connection shaft between pilot's cabin and machine room.

decomposition chamber. This resulted in a 600 to 700 degree gas composed of steam and oxygen, under natural pressure sufficient to drive a turbine. After the gas had done its work if was fed into a reclamation chamber which recycled at least part of the gas back into the engine. Additional fuel, Juergen-Ratthofer mentions methanol, could be fed into the system for more heat. The system without additional fuel is called the "cold" system while with added fuel it is called the "hot" system. In fact, the cold system was used on the V-2 rocket to drive the turbo-fuel pumps since known pumps could not handle the volume of liquid necessary to feed this new type of rocket.

In the hybrid saucer Mr. Juergen-Ratthofer describes, the cold system drives a rotor-stator arrangement which doubles as a blade lifting wing similar to that of a helicopter. The rotor-stator-blade is internally housed in the cowling of the saucer. The output of the rotor-stator is a strong magnetic field which presumably frees the saucer of the constraints of gravity as claimed for the other field propulsion saucers (30). In addition, spaces within the saucer have all air removed by special vacuum pumps with increase the buoyancy of the craft within the atmosphere. Further, some of the hot oxygen-steam mixture is jetted out at the periphery of the saucer while being mixed with methanal for additional heat and therefore thrust. Again, we are reminded of Dr. Belluzzo. We are also reminded of Vesco since he hints at a similar engine (31) which he even vaguely links with "electromagnetic waves" (32). Have we come full-circle?

In the same vane, would be negligent not to mention that an atomic engine might easily be substituted for the Walter engine. The atomic engine might be one of three types. It might be the type which burned the atmosphere itself. This burning would produce hot air and steam from the water contained in the atmosphere. It might be one which produced steam using water carried in tanks. It might be one which super-heats and ejects a gas such as hydrogen or helium. Any of these mediums could be ejected through the rotor blades yielding the desired result. A device of this type would tie together many of the German saucers-plans so far discussed.

Dr. Freeman points out that Marconi "stole" Tesla's inventions. Tesla also built a power-plant of spherical construction which contained vacuum tubes and so may have been superior to the device of Schappeller which we shall look at next. Surprisingly, some detail exists about this Tesla free energy device (33). Tesla used his engine to successfully power a Pierce Arrow automobile. This means that a spherical, working field propulsion device existed in the USA powering, not a flying saucer but an automobile. Dr. Freeman warns not to be confused by many spherical devices, all of which seem different. The fact is that they all work on the same principles (34).

German Field Propulsion Flying Saucers

Sources and References

1. X, Michael, 1960, pages 17, 33, We Want You Is Hitler Alive?, Futura Press, reprinted 1969 by Saucerian Books, Clarksburg, WV.
2. Barton, Michael X., 1968, pages 26-36, The German Saucer Story, Futura Press, Los Angeles
3. Zunneck, Karl-Heinz, 1998, pages 120-122, Geheimtechnologien. Wunderwaffen Und Irdischen Facetten Des UFO-Phaaenomens 50 Jahre Desinformaton und die Folaen. CTT-Verlag, Suhl
4. Zunneck, Karl-Heinz, 1998, page 122
5. Lyne, William R., 1999, page 48, Pentagon Aliens. Creatopia Productions, Lamy, New Mexico 87540
6. Lyne, William R., 1999, page 28
7. Lyne, Willaim R., 1999, page 38
8. Lyne, William R., 1999, page 21
9. Lyne, William R., 1999, pages 20, 41
10. Lyne, William R., 1999, page 42
11. Lyne, William R., 1999, pages 197-200
12. ibid
13. Trinkaus, George, 1988, pages 3-4, Tesla The Lost Inventions. High Voltage Press, Portland, OR.
14. Lyne, William R., 1999, page 215
15. Freeman, Gordon Dr., 3/18/01, personal letter to author
16. Stoll, Axel Ph.D., 2001, pages 15-20, Hochtechnologie im Dritten Reich Reichsdeutsche Entwicklunqen und die vermutlich wahre Herkunft der "UFOs". Amun-Verlag, Schleusesiedlung 2, D-98553 Schleusingen
17. Ettl, Ralf, 1999, page 11, "Notes To The Vril-Project" Ursprung und Quellen
18. Haarmann, D.H., 1983, Geheime Wunderwaffen, II Geheime Wunderwaffen. III Geheime Wunderwaffen, Hugin Gesellschaft Fuer Politisch-Philosophische Studien E.V., Postfach 23, D-48472, Hoerstel 3, Germany

19. Bergmann, O., 1988 and 1989, 1 Deutsche Flugscheiben und U-Boote Ueberwachen Die Weltmeere. 11 Deutsche Fluqscheiben und U-Boote Ueberwachen Die Weltmeere, Hugin Gesellschaft Fuer Politisch-Philosophische Studien E.V., Postfach 23, D-484772, Hoerstel 3, Germany

20. Dr. Michael Daemboeck Verlag, Markt 86, A-3321 Ardaggr, Austria

21. Video Film "UFOs Das Dritte Reich Schlaegt Zurueck?, available through Dr. Michael Daemboeck Verlag, see reference (18)

22. Video Film "UFO Secrets of the 3rd Reich" available through Total Solutions International, Las Vegas, NV.

23. van Helsing, Jan, 1993, page 129, Geheim Gesellschaften und ihre Macht im 20. Jahrhundert, Ewertverlag, Meppen, Germany

24. British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Final Report No. 1043 Item No. 31, "The Invention Of Hans Coler, Relating To An Alleged New Source Of Power"

25. Video Film "UFOs Das Dritte Reich Schlaegt Zurueck?, available through Dr. Michael Daemboeck Verlag, see reference (18)

26. Juergen-Ratthofer, Norbert and Ralf Ettl, 1992, page 51, Das Vril-Projekt. Dr. Michael Daemboeck Verlag, Ardaggr, Austria

27. Juergen-Ratthofer, Norbert, date unknown, page 16, "Geheime UFO, 1. Folge: Flugscheibenprojekte aus verschiedenen Staaten der Erde", this article was courtesy of Theo Paymans, Holland

28. Juergen-Ratthofer, Norbert, date unknown, pages 84,85, Fluqscheiben und andere deutsche und iapanische Geheim- und Wunderwaffen im Zweiten Weltkrieg, self-published, available through reference (18)

29. Juergen-Ratthofer, Norbert, date unknown, pages 1 and 16, "Geheime UFO, 2. Folge So baut man fliegende Untertassen—und so funktionieren sie", this article was courtesy of Theo Paymans, Holland

30. ibid

31. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 163 and 164, Intercept UFO. Pinnacle Books, New York

32. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 135-136

33. Nieper, Hans A., 1985, pages 188-189, Conversion of Gravity Field Energy Revolution in Technology, Medicine and Society, MIT Verlag, Oldenburg

34. Freeman, Gordon Dr., 3/18/01, personal letter

Atomic Saucers Again?

It is possible that all of the options for the field propulsion of German flying discs have not been presented or had a fair hearing. Two of these other possibilities are reviewed below. The first is the possibility that a world-shattering breakthrough in field propulsion occurred during the Third Reich involving atomic energy. This is plausible given the extensive and mostly still-secret atomic research done by the Germans coupled with the government's attempt to down play UFO sightings immediately following the war. The second possibility is that a field propulsion device was developed out of the early work of the Austrian inventor, Karl Schappeller. This possibility is strengthened by the fact that individuals and organizations involved in this research openly acknowledged that one of their aims was to build an "ether ship".

The German conventional saucer program culminating with atomic propulsion has been discussed. Evidence of German field propulsion saucers has been reviewed. We already know that each step in the conventional German saucer program was a logical development of the previous saucer design. The question is: did the power utilized in the German field propulsion saucers arise from nuclear power? Was there a breakthrough which has been kept secret for almost sixty years?

We have discussed the link between nuclear facilities and flying saucers. Is this evidence, in itself, that an association exists? The association could be for one of two reasons. First, these areas may simply have been the most secure facilities available. The two projects may not have been connected at all. For security reasons, both projects were simply run out of the same area.

The second possibility is that the two projects were run out of the same facility because they are connected somehow. If there is a connection between nuclear energy and field propulsion, what type of connection is this? The connection under discussion is a direct conversion from nuclear energy to field energy. This connection is on the order of the connection between electricity and magnetism or heat and electricity or nuclear energy and heat. Does such a connection exist?

The answer I got from everyone asked was a resounding "no". The consensus seemed to be that the closest we could come to this was to convert nuclear energy to heat energy and then to electrical energy though the medium of a steam turbine. This is how nuclear power plants and atomic submarines work. This method seemed to have nothing to do with flight since the hardware involved is much too bulky and heavy.

We have already reviewed some other options for nuclear powered saucers. Klaus-Peter Rothkugel suggests that the atmosphere itself could be burnt using liquid air as a fuel and a nuclear reactor as a heat source. Friedrich Georg has documented some aircraft engine designs, apparently left on the drawing board, involving a propeller engine driven by steam heated by nuclear power. We have seen the enigmatic Messerschmitt design involving a small nuclear engine on a high-speed aircraft. We have also discussed the atomic rocket approach which involves heating and ejecting of liquid hydrogen using a nuclear reactor in the Lenticular Reentry Vehicle.

While there is no known direct connection between nuclear energy and field propulsion, Dr. Gordon Freeman has made me aware of an alternate method of production of electrical energy through the use of nuclear decay. This is important because with enough electrical energy both electrostatic and electromagnetic field propulsion are possible. Let me relate to you what Dr. Freeman told me as to how this process works. It is amazingly simple.

The simplest method involves the use of two solar cells which are the same size. A piece of paper, the thickness of a business card is cut to the same size as the solar cells. Radium chloride is painted onto both sides of the paper. The paper is then fitted between the solar cells. The radium chloride emits alpha and beta particles which activate the solar cell. The reader might ask, if this method works, why has it not been patented? The answer is, that in a slightly more efficient configuration, it has been patented (1).

There are other forms of this simple example. Imagine a simple circuit used for purposes of generating electromagnetic waves. This circuit would consist of a wire connecting a capacitor and then to a coil. An electrical input is given to this circuit whereby the capacitor is sufficiently charged in order for it to discharge. The electrical energy is carried by the wire to the coil where it is charged. Electrical energy is then carried back from the coil to the capacitor by another wire completing the circuit. Alternately, the capacitor (electrical field) and the coil (magnetic field) are charged and discharged. The output of this circuit are electromagnetic waves, such as fill the electromagnetic spectrum. The system works until electrical resistance in the three components converts enough electrical energy into heat to sufficiently degrade its output.

What is done using the new atomic decay system is to paint the capacitors with radium chloride. This unstable compound emits alpha and beta particles when magnetically or electrostatically pulsed. These particles are absorbed by the capacitors (as well as the other components), the end result of which is an increase in electrical energy in the circuit. If enough capacitors can be wired into the circuit in series to produce enough energy to offset the ohmic degradation, then the output can be maintained for a long time. Radium chloride has a half-life of 800 years.

Of course, if an extra capacitor were wired in to the circuit, an excess of energy would result. Even if this excess energy is small, it can be very important. Devices using a similar method have also been patented (2) (3).

In the next step, the circuit described above is given an antenna and a tesla coil. The radium chloride doped capacitors are turned to one of the resonant frequencies for the tesla coil. An antenna is used which is suitable for receiving this same frequency output. A feed back loop is set up whereby energy is being pulsed into the system in these resonant frequencies. It is estimated that an output of three thousand watts can be obtained from this "lifetime battery" with an input of only fifty watts (4). A transformer and other devices can be used to tailor the electrical output produced by this device according to the need. Details for construction and tuning of this "battery" are available commercially (4).

This whole device can be held in one's hand. Imagine the power of one hundred or one thousand such units. Certainly a U-boat or a field propulsion saucer could be powered using this system.

Dr. Freeman believes this nuclear doping might be the missing link in several free energy devices. Dr. Freeman has evidence that both the Hubbard and Hendershot generators were doped with nuclear material. He has evidence that Hubbard actually worked for the Radium Company of America. Further, he has found evidence that it was radioactive material which was used to dope Moray's germanium valve (5).

Even further, he has suggested that the initial starting energy necessary for the operation of the Schappeller device, which will be discussed shortly, was supplied by a radioactively doped electret (5). Bolstering Dr. Freeman's claim is a U.S. patent using such a radioactive electret to maintain its charge (6). This is not the approach favored in this book, but the use of something like the "lifetime battery" to start the Schappeller device is not beyond the real of reason. In fact, there is some evidence that a very strange battery was being produced in wartime Germany.

During the war years, at least until 1943, none other than Professor. W. O. Schumann was engaged in building something called a "battery" at the Technical Institute at Munich. This battery was a project to itself and funded by the Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft, forerunner of the Reichsforschungrates, the Reich Research Council (7). The Reich Research Council coordinated high-priority war research between academic, industrial and military facilities.

This is the same Dr. Schumann who was brought to the United States after the war as part of Project Paperclip (8). This is also the same Dr. Schumann noted for the discovery of the Schumann Resonance. Dr. Schumann was no stranger to free energy devices since it was he who evaluated a working Hans Coler device in 1926 and could find no fault, hoax or bad faith, on the part of its inventor (9).

Rumor has it that Dr. Schumann's specialty was antennas and that he was responsible for building or improving American submarine communication after the war. It is said this was done by employing extra low frequency radio equipment and mile-long antennae which were towed behind the submarines themselves. The radio waves employed for this communication were said to go directly through the earth's center. Dr. Schumann also discovered something called the Schumann Resonance which deals with the resonant frequency of the planet earth itself.

Returning to wartime Munich, why would a full professor and world-class scientist be devoting years of research and government sponsorship to a battery while Germany was in the middle of a war? The answer is that this battery was something special. Was this similar to the "lifetime battery"? Could this type of energy production have been the promised means of freeing Germany from dependence of foreign oil? Was this battery an energy producing device, capable of powering or starting a field propulsion saucer?

The old problem arises. The question is not could this be the way it was done. The question is was this the way it was done, What proof is there that nuclear decay was used by the Germans to produce energy by any other means than is in practice today? Dr. Freeman provides one hint.

This scrap of evidence involves a religious sect. It is the Methernita Society of Switzerland. This is a self-contained, Christian brotherhood who own large areas of land in Switzerland. Among their accomplishments is a free energy device they call the Testatika. One desk top machine can yield an output of 3000 watts. This machine or machines have been in existence since the late 1970s and have been demonstrated for outsiders, including scientists and engineers. No fraud has ever been detected.

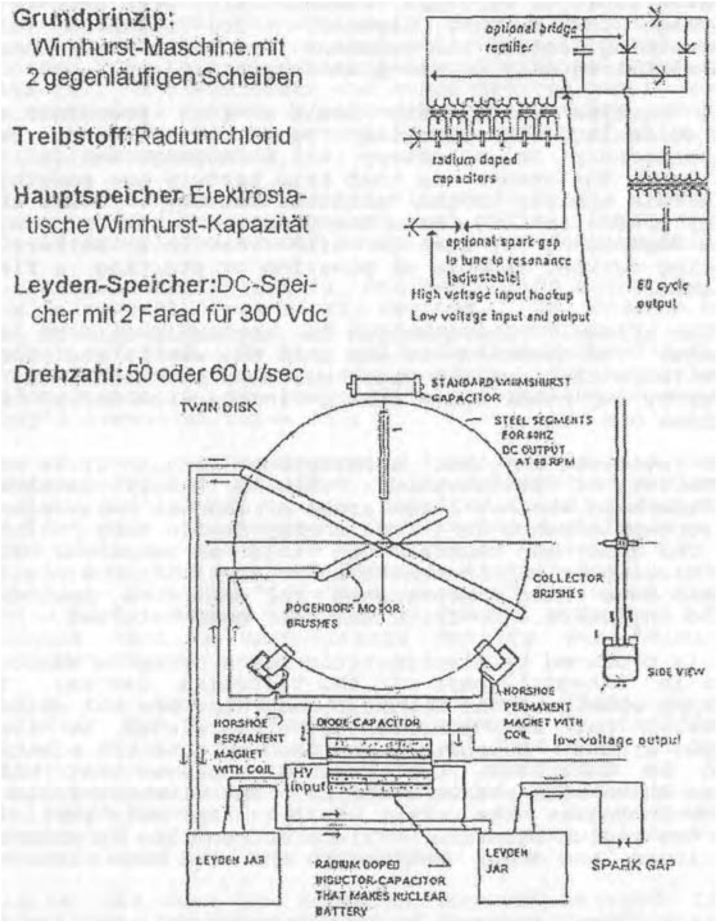
High voltage is produced by electrostatic means using a Wimhurst generator as in integral part of the Testatika device. The counter-rotating wheels of the Wimhurst generator are not allowed to spin freely, but are purposefully restricted to lower revolutions per minute. Capacitors are used to hold the electric charge which is generated. Dr. Freeman believes that these capacitors are doped with radium chloride. The electric field of the capacitors increases the output of alpha and beta particles derived from the radium chloride. This electron flow is absorbed by the capacitors and other components and fed back into the system.

The Methernita Society has never been forthcoming concerning the workings of this device. The machine itself seems to be the brainchild of one person, Paul Baumann, who is described as a

Methernita Testatika with Doped Capacitors

Der Testatika-Generator

Der erste wissenschaftliche Konverter zur Umwandiung elektrostatischer Energie in elektrodynamische Energie



Grundprinzip: Wimhurst-Maschine mit 2 gegenläufigen Scheiben

Treibstoff: Radiumchlorid

Hauptspeicher: Elektrostatische Wimhurst-Kapazität

Leyden-Speicher: DC-Speicher mit 2 Farad für 300 Vdc

Drehzahl: 50 oder 60 U/sec

optional bridge rectifier radium doped capacitors optional spark gap to tune to resonance [adjustable]
High voltage input hookup
Low voltage input and output
60 cycle output
STANDARD WIMSHURST CAPACITOR
TWIN DISK
STEEL SEGMENTS FOR 60HZ DC OUTPUT AT 60 RPM
COLLECTOR BRUSHES
POGENDORF MOTOR BRUSHES
SIDE VIEW
HORSHOE PERMANENT MAGNET WITH COIL
DIODE CAPACITOR
low voltage output
HORSHOE PERMANENT MAGNET WITH COIL
HV input
LEYDEN JAR
RADIUM DOPED INDUCTOR-CAPACITOR THAT MAKES NUCLEAR BATTERY
LEYDEN JAR
SPARK GAP

Dr. Freeman's drawing of the Testatika.

"technician". Even in the old films of the Testatika, Mr. Baumann does not look like a young man. Germany is Switzerland's neighbor and what better place to utilize secret wartime technology than in a closed religious order. Dr. Freeman informs me that one of the builder's assistants talks of radioactive and non-radioactive forces in conjunction with this machine. Dr. Freeman has put these scraps of evidence together and made a drawing which is reproduced here.

Let's try reversing an equation. What if the T. T. Brown relationship between a highly charged capacitor, gravity and movement were altered? What if the highly charged capacitor were fixed and unable to move in a gravitational field? Would not the energy evidenced in the movement of the capacitor in T.T. Brown's work be translated into electrical energy and contained in this fixed machine? Would this not be a generator?

Let's flip it around again. Could not a flying version of T. T. Brown's charged capacitor have gotten charged via decay of radioactive material with accompanying hardware similar to what has been described above?

One more point should be made concerning the possible relationship between atomic energy and field propulsion. We do know that electromagnetic radiation can be generated by atomic fission or fusion. This is done whenever nuclear weapons are detonated. It is called an electromagnetic pulse. This is a well-recognized phenomena and the military's communications and sensitive electronics have to be "hardened" against this electromagnetic pulse as a battlefield necessity. So the relationship between electromagnetic and atomic energy does exist. The question still remains as to a technological breakthrough in the application of this phenomena and to whether the Germans pioneered this effort involving flying craft.

Atomic/Field Propulsion Sources

1. United States Patent, Patent Number 5,443,857, August 22, 1995, granted to Howard C. Rivenburg, "Power Source Using A Photovoltaic Array And Self-Luminous Microspheres".

2. United States Patent, Patent Number 5,642,014, June 24, 1997, granted to Steven J. Hillinlus, assigned to Lucent Technologies, Inc., "Self-Powered Device".

3. United States Patent, Patent Number 4,835,433, May 30, 1989, granted to Paul M. Brown, assigned to Nucll, Inc., "Apparatus For Direct Conversion Of Radioactive Decay Energy To Electrical Energy".

4. Lifetime Batteries, 13A and 13B, contained in catalog of Energy Research Company, P.O. Box 1514, Jackson, CA. 95642

5. Freeman, Gordon Dr., personal letter to author dated 3/7/02

6. United States Patent, Patent Number 3,949,178, April 6, 1976, granted to Sten Hellstroem and Rolf Bertil Goeran Joenson, assigned to Telefonaktiebolaget L M Ericsson

7. Bundersarkiv, Postfach 450569, 12175 Berlin, file on Dr. W. 0. Schumann, courtesy of Mark D. Kneipp.

8. Foreign Scientists Case Files, 1945-58 "Winfreid Otto Schumann", Location Box 151,631/26/01/07, The National Archives, 8601 Adelphi Rd., College Park, Maryland 20740, Courtesy of Mark Kneipp

9. British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Final Report Number 1043, item number 31, "The Invention of Hans Coler, Relating To an Alleged New Source of Power", Bryanston Square, London

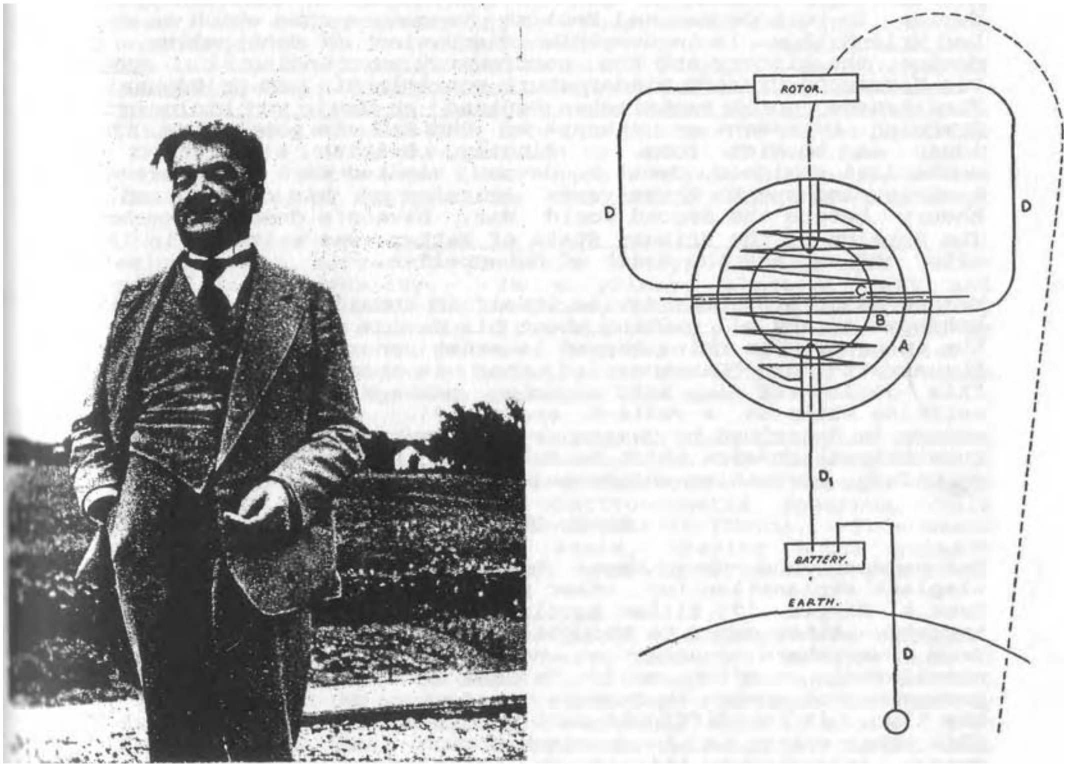
The Karl Schappeller Device

Was the Schappeller device an engine used in German field propulsion saucers? This is a possibility. Because so little has been reported about this device in the English language, the following is a report describing Karl Schappeller and his device in some detail.

Karl Schappeller (1875-1947) literally went from being born in poor house to owning a castle during his lifetime. His economic success was mirrored in his experiments in energy as a lay-scientist, culminating in the invention of a free-energy device which attracted considerable attention around 1930. Schappeller made no secret of his invention and actively sought private financing to manufacture and distribute the results of his research. He was in touch with financial concerns and even spoke with a representative of the British Admiralty concerning the utilization of his device to power the Royal Navy's ships (1).

At this time, 1930, the device was somehow appropriated and further worked upon by a governmental organization of the German Weimar Republic, the Reichsarbeitsgemeinschaft or Reich Works Association (RAG). At least one aim of the RAG was to make Germany self-sufficient in energy production. Specifically, they published their intentions to utilize many Schappeller devices in a system of broadcast energy distribution throughout Germany which would result in the entire elimination of the electrical grid (2). As we know, Adolf Hitler assumed power three years later and was also very interested in making Germany independent of foreign sources of energy for strategic reasons. It is known that political and scientific structure was set up to work on the energy problem as evidenced later by the synthesizing of gasoline and oil products from coal by the 3rd Reich. One of these

Schappeller



ROTOR.
D
D
C
B
A
D1
BATTERY.
EARTH.
D

Left: Inventor Karl Schappeller Right: Karl Schappeller's Device. A. Steel outer casing. B. Special ceramic lining in which tubes are embedded. C. Hollow center, filled by glowing magnetism when in operation. D. Tubes, circuit and earthling.

political and scientific structures was contained within the SS and it is known that Karl Schappeller actually met with SS Reichsfueher Heinrich Himmler in Vienna in 1933 (3).

Fortunately, there are good descriptions of the Schappeller device in both German and English languages upon which to draw. Per Vril-Mythos is a complete discussion of Schappeller, his device, the history and the controversy surrounding it. "Vril" Die Kosmische Urkraft Wiedergeburt von Atlantis and Weltdynamismus Streifzuege durch technisches Neuland an Hand von biologischen Symbolen represent an attempt by the RAG to popularize their ideas in booklet form. Finally, British electrical and mechanical engineer, Cyril W. Davson, visited Karl Schappeller in Austria and spent three years learning of his device and his theory before the Second World War. Davson's descriptive book, The Physics of the Primary State of Matter, was written in 1955, after the war and the death of Schappeller.

Before describing the device itself it should be understood that Schappeller and all writing about his device do so believing that the energy-source being tapped is ether energy, sometimes called "Raumkraft" or "Raumenergie", that is space energy (4)(5)(6). This device was also said capable, perhaps with some tuning, of emitting ether as a radiant energy (7). The physics of ether energy is described by Davson as a primary physics as opposed to conventional physics which he believed could only be considered a secondary, derivative understanding.

Ether Theory

For readers who have never heard of "ether", perhaps the simplest explanation for ether physics is that of the late Dr. Hans A. Nieper (7) titled Revolution in Technology, Medicine and Society. Ether could be thought of as an energy source emanating from everywhere equally at once. The universe could be considered, as often said, "a sea of energy". It forms a background of energy everywhere, and since it is everywhere all the time, it is difficult make independent measurement of it. This ether energy is in constant motion. All energy is radiant energy, according to this theory. This can easily be appreciated as to electromagnetic radiation but it is also true of that very elusive thing called gravity. Newton described the effects of gravity but he never told us exactly what it was. Dr. Nieper tells us that gravity is really a push, not a pull. Gravity is acceleration and is caused by the ether field. Again, all energy is radiant energy whose fundamental basis is ether radiation.

From the aforementioned book by Dr. Nieper:

"In addition, Nieper established the axiom that all natural accelerations can be attributed to a single unified basic principle, namely, the interception (or braking) of a field energy penetrating from the outside (gravity acceleration, magnetic, electromagnetic, electrostatic and radiesthesic acceleration). "

In trying to explain ether, it might be thought of as an all pervasive liquid occupying all of space. This liquid concept is useful because a liquid can not be compressed but can only transfer the energy attempting to compress it from one location to another. This is how an automobile's brakes work. The driver pushes in the break pedal when he wants to stop. The plunger of the break pedal attempts to compress fluid in the master cylinder. The master cylinder is connected by metal tubes full of fluid to each wheel. When force is put on the master cylinder by the driver it is transmitted to each of the four wheel cylinders full of the same fluid which transmit the force, moving the break shoes or stopping the disc which stops the wheels of the car.

Likewise, ether serves to transmit energy through this "non-compressibility" quality. In a primary electric coil and secondary electric coil, for instance, induction in the secondary does not take place directly from the primary as is new held by physics, but though and between the two via the ether field. This concept, that of the stimulation of the ether field as means of energy transport, is also expressed by Davson.

Using this perspective, that all energy is radiation, the braking of ether radiation, that is the slowing down or stopping of this radiation, can cause or generate other forms of energy. This word "energy" means the entire electromagnetic spectrum. This means electric, magnetic and electrostatic fields. This means heat. This also means gravity. Again, gravity is the primary radiation of the ether field. It radiates from every point in the universe equally.

This concept seems ridiculous until it is given some thought- One might ask: How can gravity be a push when we know better? After all, things fall to earth don't they? The answer is that the effects we feel and call gravity are due to gravity shielding. Ether radiation can be braked, that is slowed down and absorbed by mass. It is then re-radiated or turned into mass. It is re-emitted as slower ether radiation or even as heat. Some of it can is converted into mass inside a planet. If there is a loss of ether radiation, then there is shielding. Thus, a planet would shield from this radiation in one direction. That direction is always toward its center which is the direction of greatest mass and that is what we describe as "down". This is simply the area which contains the maximum amount of shielding. In all other directions the ether radiation continues to exert its push on us. The area of minimum shielding is directly opposite the area of maximum shielding, so things fall (or more correctly are accelerated or "pushed") to earth.

Think about this for a minute. Being in deep space is a little like being underwater. Underwater, all pressure from all points are so similar that we feel weightless. We are weightless in deep space because the ether field exerts a push on us from all directions equally. In space, the nearer one gets to a large body the stronger the push is from the opposite direction since the body shields or converts the ether radiation. The result of this thinking is a mechanism totally different from "gravity" as we know it but appearing as exactly the same observed phenomena.

The beauty of this ether theory of gravity is that gravity functions like every other form of radiation. Its underlying cause, ether radiation, can be converted to mass or, in certain circumstances, re-radiated or converted to other forms of energy. No Unified Field Theory is necessary. The ether field is the unified field. Further, there is no need to look for something separate called "anti-gravity". If gravity is a push then it is all anti-gravity. All we have to do to make a UFO is to find this particular gravity frequency and find out how to generate it.

Ether physics was a lost physics. Physics was hijacked early in the 20th Century by alleged results of the Michelson-Morley experiment. The Michelson-Morley experiment assumed "ether" was matter. There is some confusion here. We know now that particles moving near the speed of light are measured as waves, that is energy, rather than as matter. Nevertheless, ether theory has been discredited among physicists who, in turn, discredit others who raise the subject. It is only through the efforts of "free energy devices" and free energy researchers that this knowledge is being returned to us. Without this ether theory, the reason these devices work cannot be explained at all. Rejection of ether theory allows these devices to be dismissed as "theoretically impossible" and so fraudulent by simple deduction. They are marginalized and dismissed as "perpetual motion devices". According to established physics, perpetual motion devices violate physical laws of conservation of energy. Without an ether theory as an explanation, they do violate laws of conservation of energy and so their detractors are able to simply dismiss them out of hand. The simple fact that some of these free energy devices actually work does not seem to bother these scientists in the least. Rather than change the theory to accommodate the observed facts, the facts are ignored and substituted by dogma. Whether we like it or not, we are living in an energy Dark Age.

Instead of ether theory, we have all been led to focus upon Einstein and his Theories of Relativity. Two or three generations of scientists have wasted themselves on "trying to prove Einstein right". This misguided thinking has resulted in stagnation. One need go no further than the many "free energy" devices which have arisen to the level of notice in spite of accepted scientific theory to see that this statement is true.

Needless to say, German scientists of the Nazi period labored under no such illusions. They never abandoned ether physics. This was the fundamental reason why field propulsion UFOs were first developed in Germany. After the Second World War two different sciences developed called "Physics". One was the relativism taught in schools. The second more esoteric type was utilized only secretly, by the secret government, for deep black projects.

Structure of the Schappeller Device

According to Davson's description upon which we will rely, the Schappeller device is really composed of two separate units, the rotor and the stator. The stator is constructed as follows: Its surface is round or ball-shaped, being composed of two half-shells of steel. These half-shells contain the internal structure and are air tight. Attached at each "pole" of each half-shell is an iron bar magnet, most of whose structure is internal. This means that the bulk of the magnet is inside the steel ball, one opposite the other. There is a space between the two bar magnets at the very center of the sphere.

Insulation, a ceramic material, is placed on the inside of the steel ball leaving a hollow central area. Within this hollow area and around the space between the magnets are wound two internal coils. These originate at the bar magnet poles and each terminates at the center of the sphere with a connection leading out of the sphere to the rotor. These coils are composed of a hollow copper tube filled with a special and secret substance called the "electret". Upon leaving the sphere the electret filled copper tubes are replaced by conventional copper wire. An electrical connection is made from the outside surface of one pole to one pole of a special type of battery which is grounded at the other pole or, as an alternative, to a special device called an "Ur-machine" which will be discussed.

This electret is a permanent magnet within the sphere. This type of magnetism is not identical with ferro-magnetism or electromagnetism, it is much stronger (8). The actual composition of Schappeller's electret remains a secret but another electret has been made by Professor Mototaro Eguchi. It consists of carnauba wax and resin, perhaps also containing some beeswax. It was kept in a strong electric field while baking slowly until it solidified. For purposes of production of Schappeller spheres, a complete electret manufacturing plant would have to be set up which had no parallel in present science (9).

Before being set into operation, all the air is pumped from the hollow core of the sphere. This whole ball is mounted on a swivel mechanism so that the poles can be moved from the vertical to the horizontal. The stator is completely unattached from the rotor. The stator can function without the rotor and the stator is capable of producing electrical energy without the rotor. The rotor could also be used to generate additional electrical energy.

The rotor consists of: A steel wheel of special design fixed on the shaft to be driven and surrounded on its outer surface by magnets which are attracted and repelled by the force of the stator. The copper wire attached to the internal copper tubing filled with electret runs through this wheel and supplies electric power to the magnets. The magnets are hollow and filled with the same electret. There are always an odd number of magnets.

A variant of this rotor comes to us from Taeufer, who refers to this further development as the "Ur-Machine". This machine is composed of six sphere units as described above, five revolving around a sixth set above or below the plane of the other revolving spheres. A seventh unit would be employed to rotate the rotating five spheres and so would be offset, and not attached to the others. The five rotating spheres would charge the sixth stationary sphere. The sixth and seventh spheres would function as an anode and cathode and so ground the unit. The Ur-machine could be used to activate other spheres instead of a battery-earthing procedure (10).

As a prime mover, an engine, the rotor would be employed turning a driven shaft. The stator would be offset, that is, moved off center in relation to the rotor. Schappeller worked out various angles of efficiency (11). The driven shaft could be used to power any number of machine applications such as, for instance, the propellers of a ship.

Means of Operation

The device is started through totally unique battery and a connection to the earth (12). A specific excitation impulse must be given to the device (13). This electric impulse was conducted through the iron magnet and jumped the gap in the center of the sphere to the other iron magnet.

What occurred then sets this device apart from all others. In the vacuum of the sphere, in the center space between the two bar magnets a field of "glowing magnetism" was set up. This glowing magnetism was something entirely unique. It is recognized as a magnetic field but much more powerful and unlike any magnetic field of an iron bar or an electric coil. Once the initial input had been made to start the device, the battery and ground could be disconnected. The device would continue of operate on its own (14).

For an understanding of what is really happening here we have to consider the bar magnet. We think of a bar of iron with two poles, one positive and one negative or perhaps one north and one south pole. But there are really three components to the bar magnet. There are the two poles and the neutral zone between the poles If we cut the magnet in half we get two new poles. For the Schappeller this neutral area is very important. Imagine a bar magnet running through the vertical axis of the ball. Then imagine the center section cut out. We now have a north pole at the top of the ball, a south pole at the bottom of the ball just as we do with the planet Earth. In the center we have a missing section with a south pole, opposing the north pole at the top of the ball and, likewise, a north pole opposite the south pole at the bottom of the ball. We have now four poles and a split bar magnet with a gap in its center section.

It is this gap in the center where Schappeller's "glowing magnetism" is generated by grounding, that is, charging the device via a special battery and an earth connection. This glowing magnetism is the mystery. Davson cites Schappeller's calculations and gives this form of magnetism as being one thousand times more powerful than that produced by present magnetism (15). He also states that in this form of magnetism the electricity is stationary while the magnetism is radiated (16).

To repeat again, Davson contends throughout his book that this glowing magnetism is not found in secondary physics, that is, in modern physics, and that this glowing magnetism is a manifestation of primary physics. As a phenomenon of primary physics, it is responsible for and can generate heat, electricity and magnetism.

After initial stimulation and in a state of glowing magnetism, no further input of energy is needed from the battery. The device is able to draw in energy to it directly from the surrounding ether, bind this energy though its magnetic electret material, that is the filling in the hollow copper coils of the internal coil, and then re-radiate energy producing heat, electricity, magnetism or mechanical work depending upon the application.

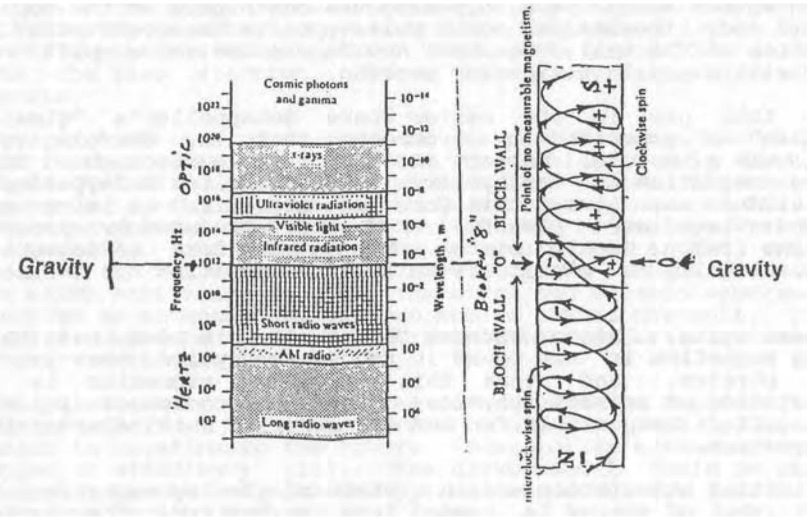
Stated another way, this is an implosion device and it is described as such (17) (18). Unlike the Schauberger device which is associated with the word implosion, the Schappeller device operates purely at the energetic level. Energy is drawn towards the center, through the magnets, into the field of glowing magnetism, and then radiated outward.

My first explanation for this output of radiant energy involves the concept of the Bloch Wall. A Bloch Wall is defined by Van Norstrand's Scientific Encyclopedia, 1958 edition, pages 201 and 202, as follows:

> "This is a transition layer between adjacent ferromagnetic domains magnetized in different directions. The wall has a finite thickness of a few hundred lattice constants, as it is energetically preferable for the spin directions to change slowly from one orientation to another, going through the wall rather than to have an abrupt discontinuity" (18).

In electromagnetics the Bloch Wall is external to the hardware itself. It is the point of division of the circling vortex, or spin, of the electronic magnetic energies of the north and south

Bloch Wall And Oscillating Circuit



Gravity
Frequency, Hz
OPTIC
HERTZ
10^{22}
10^{20}
10^{18}
10^{16}
10^{14}
10^{12}
10^{10}
10^{8}
10^{6}
10^{4}
10^{2}
Cosmic photons and gamma x-rays
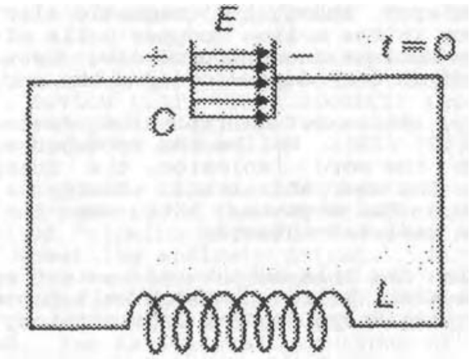
Ultraviolet radiation
Visible light
Infrared radiation
Short radio waves
AM radio
Long radio waves
10^{-14}
10^{-12}
10^{-10}
10^{-8}
10^{-6}
10^{-4}
10^{-2}
1
10^{2}
10^{4}
10^{6}
Wavelength, m
Broken "g"
BLOCH WALL
"O"
BLOCH WALL
Point of no measurable magnetism.
Clockwise spin
counterclockwise spin
S+
N−
Gravity



Top: Bloch Wall, a gravity wave source as a function of the electromagnetic spectrum? (Dr. Richard LeFors Clark) poles. The negative north pole magnetism spins to the left while the positive south pole spins to the right. Energy is being conducted into the Schappeller device through the un-insulated poles and being conducted and spun on its way to the center of the unit. The point of zero magnetism, no spin and magnetic reversal, where the two spin fields join, is the Bloch Wall (19).
Bottom: Oscillating circuit. Charged capacitor (electric field) discharges, current carried through insulated wire to charge coil (magnetic field) which discharges, charging capacitor. Oscillating electric and magnetic fields yield electromagnetic waves.

The Block Wall radiates energy. Remember, if energy is coming in then it must be going out. The Bloch Wall may generate radio, radar and other electromagnet frequencies but what is most interesting is that it is actually able to radiate gravity as according to Dr. Richard Lefores Clark. According to this interpretation, the conjunction of two dipolar generated force field vectors, a quadropole force field or gravity is generated according to Dr. Clark. Gravity being a quadropole source, radiates in a circular, 360 degree, pattern of two cycles. Dr. Clark has fixed the point of emission as below that of radar and above infrared at 10 to the twelfth power Hertz (20). Dr. Richard Lefors Clark believes gravity is a radiation (21) and so a "push".

Another Opinion

In late 2001, I wrote a magazine article on the Schappeller device (22) which contained most of the material described above. In that article a request for alternative explanations for the Schappeller device was made. I received a letter from Mr. Michael Watson, BSc, Charted Physicist and Member of the Institute of Physics in the United Kingdom. But there was something in Mr. Watson's background even more impressive than his professional credentials. Cyril W. Davson was a family friend whom Mr. Watson knew well in his youth and with whom he had discussed Schappeller and his ideas at length, many times. In Mr. Watson's letter was a brief summary of Schappeller's theory in which he cut through most of the confusing terminology.

This summary is important for a couple of reasons. Mr. Watson's summary of Schappeller's ether theory as described by Davson dovetails nicely into the ideas of Schauberger yet seems to allow for Tesla's experimental results on ether as explained by Bill Lyne. The following is what I learned from Mr. Watson's letter:

Most of us have heard of the two Thermodynamic Laws. These are laws of heat. The First Law of Thermodynamics states that energy is conserved, meaning that the total amount of energy in the universe always remains the same. This is no surprise for most of us and it is not the real concern here.

What is of concern is the Second Law of Thermodynamics which discusses heat and entropy. The word entropy might be thought of as a state of randomness or chaos. Negative entropy would then mean movement toward the less random or the more ordered in any particular thing. If we apply this to a system, then entropy tends to increase until the system breaks down in utter chaos

This will occur unless the system is re-charged with additional outside energy. A concrete example is less confusing.

Imagine a new automobile just coming off the assembly line. It has taken a great deal of energy to find, refine, forge, weld, and paint the metal parts of this car alone. This same concept also applies to all the other components of the car. This energy and organization constitute a highly organized state, or, said another way, a state of negative entropy.

What happens next illustrates entropy. The car is purchased. Whether it is driven hard or just sits in the garage does not matter in the long run because what happens to the car is that it starts to fall apart. This change may be small at first and may only occur at the molecular level, but it occurs nevertheless. The engine, transmission, paint, rubber, electronics, etc. all will fail with time. Even it the car just sits in the garage, in a thousand years the metal will eventually oxidize. Finally, the car rusts away forming a reddish brown heap. This is exactly the opposite of the organization and energy used to put the car together. This disorganization is entropy. The only thing which will reverse this, as we all know, are additional inputs of energy by the owner in the form of maintenance and repairs.

All things in a relative state of relative order move toward a state of disorder. In terms of heat, heat will always flow into a colder place from a warmer place. When something is heated there is a rise in its entropy. With increasing heat its molecules move faster and faster in random chaos as a bomb does when it explodes. Increasing heat means increasing randomness and chaos which is entropy. Cold, then, can be seen in terms of negative entropy. Any cold object is simply more organized and less random than the same object once it is heated.

Schappeller had something to say about the Second Law of Thermodynamics. He said there was another and unknown thermodynamic cycle which runs opposite the Second Law. To name this idea we will call it "Reverse Thermodynamics". It is the reverse of the Second Law of Thermodynamics in that it leads to an increase in entropy. Not only is there an increase in order but there is an increase in cold! Schappeller, according to Mr. Watson's letter, built his spherical device primarily to demonstrate the principles behind this Reverse Thermodynamics. It was not designed as a practical machine.

To demonstrate the difference between the Second Law of Thermodynamics and Reverse Thermodynamics two theoretical machines shall be examined. Actually, a machine running according to the Second Law of Thermodynamics is not theoretical at all. Combustion machines are of this type. For simplicity sake we will use a wood burning stove such as the type invented by Benjamin Franklin for the heating of a house.

Wood is put in a hollow iron vessel with an adjustable hole at one end. The adjustable hole admits atmospheric oxygen. An initial small input of heat is added to the wood and oxygen until burning occurs. A great deal of heat is produced once the wood begins to burn. We know heat expands. Carbon, carbon dioxide and water vapor are also produced as byproducts of the combustion. Entropy is increased. Since entropy is increased, so is pollution so perhaps we all can agree that this is a good example of the destructive technology so characteristic of the world in which we live.

In our example of a theoretical Reverse Thermodynamic machine the byproducts of the previous example can be used as fuel. But Schappeller's machine has the additional property of being creative, that is, negatively entropic. Schappeller believed this creative process to be individualistic, so we need a specific template to use as a pattern for this creation. Heat, water, and carbon dioxide are imputed into this machine. Quite amazingly, oxygen is yielded as a byproduct of this reaction! The heat is also absorbed in Schappeller's Reverse Thermodynamic machine! This absorption of heat is another way of saying that the machine is implosive in nature rather than expansive or explosive as was the heat producing machine. What is most amazing, however, is that entropy is actually reduced yielding, something which has been created - wood!

Actually, this machine is not theoretical either. It exists and works as we speak. These machines are all around us. We call these machine "life". In this case our machine is a tree. In the tree, energy, sunlight, is absorbed and combined in a cold process with water and carbon dioxide to form wood. The template used as a pattern for this seemingly intelligent, creative, process is simply a seed. In this type of reaction the "cold" force is something other than the absence of heat. This cold is an active cold. It is a "densifying", implosive cold. It is a life-giving cold. This is a cold, life giving force. To quote Watson:

"This process is life force and the reverse of the second law of thermodynamics; it is the vital force: Vril."

This is one huge difference between the physics of Schappeller and Schauberger and the physics of the Nineteenth Century. The physics of the Nineteenth Century explain everything in terms of the inanimate. Laws of physics are written using inanimate examples. Chemical reactions are described which stem from inanimate models. Animate models are simply made to conform with the inanimate assuming that life is just a special case which eventually will be shown to be nothing but chemistry and so subject to the same Second Thermodynamic Law as the inanimate. Schappeller and Schauberger both say in their own ways that this is not so. They say, each in their own ways, that a new and different law of thermodynamics applies to living forces. They say that this more akin to a life process than previous theories allow. They say this force is creative. Those that subscribed to these new ideas claim it was not only a new physical law but a new science and that Germany would lead the way to this new science. Let us take a closer look at what is claimed to be the physics behind this new science.

The first concept to be considered is cold. Cold in this sense does not mean the mere absence of heat. This is interstellar cold, the cold found in the vacuum of space. In this relative vacuum, matter is not found in sufficient quantity to use to measure this cold. Think about how we measure cold. We measure matter which is cold. We measure the heat in air or water for instance. In the absence of matter how would cold be measured? There is no doubt that if we could, for instance, place a thermometer in a glass of water in deep space, the temperature recorded would be at or very near absolute zero, 0 Kelvin or -273 degrees Centigrade or -460 degrees Fahrenheit.

The presence or absence of matter in deep space may be the subject of conjecture. The presence or absence of energy in deep space is something universally accepted. For instance, we all know that light passes through interstellar space. We see the proof when we look up at the stars, planets or the moon. Besides visible light, other electromagnetic radiations freely pass through space. These include x-ray, gamma and cosmic rays. Yet besides electromagnetic radiation many people now believe that in the depths of space there resides another form of energy with is found there as well as everywhere else all around us. This energy sometime goes by the name of "zero point energy" but for our purposes we can simply call it "ether energy". It is sometimes argued that this energy is really the result of ether rather than ether itself and that ether really is matter. For a moment, let us postpone this discussion and focus on the vast, stretches of interstellar space which are filled with ether energy, near or at absolute zero.

Mr. Watson points out Dawson's words on page 83 of The Physics Of The Primary State Of Matter where he says:

> "Cold is not therefore the absence of heat, primary heat and cold having nothing to do with molecular action (in the cosmos) there are no molecules available".

The reader may recall that something strange happens to electrical energy at absolute zero. For instance, if a disc of conducting material is held at absolute zero and the disc is given an electric charge, the electric current will circulate around and around the disc forever, never loosing its energy as it would if the disc were sitting on an office desk at room temperature. This property of cold is instrumental in the storage of at least one form of energy. The vast stretches of cold interstellar vacuum must be seen as a vast energy storage sea in a state of heightened negative entropy. Schappeller called this undirected matter-energy reserve potential "latent magnetism.

Out of this latent magnetism, both energy and matter could be produced with the corresponding stimulation. The non-excited electromagnetic field was viewed by Schappeller as simply latent magnetism. Matter is a condensation out of bipolar ether. Therefore, electromagnetism is a product of matter and is nothing more than bipolar ether in a different condition. Latent magnetism could be, then, excited into matter. Latent magnetism could be influenced by either of the thermodynamic principles discussed, the Second Law of Thermodynamics or by Reverse Thermodynamics. This vast ether field, whose most notable characteristic is the property of cold, latent and awaiting stimulus, is the progenitor of both energy, as we know it, and of matter.

Since primary cold, this vast reserve of negative entropy potential, is responsible for both matter and energy and since all energy eventually degenerates into heat, it follows that, as navson puts it, again on page 83:

> "Primary heat, as may now be understood, is composed of cold energy".

This is seems like a surprising play on words, especially from a man of science, but this statement follows perfectly from Schappeller's reasoning nevertheless.

We turn now to Schappeller's concept of "stress". Both heat stress and cold stress can be applied to an electromagnetic field. Heat stress is the usual type of stress applied to electromagnetic fields in secondary physics. Secondary physics is the physics of our everyday world according to Schappeller. Primary physics is the physics dealing with the cold force and ether yielding matter and energy, which constitute the secondary reactions and so Schappeller uses the term "secondary physics" to describe our world as we know it.

An example of heat stressing of the electromagnetic field is the condenser and the coil. A charged condenser results in an electric field and a charged coil results in a magnetic field. A charged condenser and coil, connected by a wire circuit alternately charge and discharge each other, producing electromagnetic radiation unit the heat caused by the resistance of the wire degrades the whole process into heat. Heat stress on the electromagnetism is +/-.

Cold stress on the electromagnetic field is something totally new to our science and technology. It is also seen in terms of +/- but the machines used to produce it are not known in our world. Mr. Watson did not say this but if we return to our examples of heat stressed machines, the condemnor and the coil, the corresponding cold stressed machines might be the Schappeller sphere and the Schappeller coil electret. The sphere collects the charge through the magnets, holds and condenses it in its glowing center corresponding to the electric field of the condenser. The internal coils filled with electret produce a magnetic field in the presence of the intense and pulsing electric field. According to my interpretation, the whole Schappeller sphere is a combined condenser/coil combined into one machine made possible through an initial input of cold stress.

As in our example of the condenser/coil interaction producing an electromagnetic wave, so an attraction exists between a machine obeying the Second Law of Thermodynamics and one obeying the law of Reverse Thermodynamics. This attraction can lead to interaction. For instance, an imploding or centripetal vortex can couple with an exploding or centrifugal vortex. The centripetal vortex is an example of a system following the law of Reverse Thermodynamics while the centrifugal vortex represents a system following the Second Law of Thermodynamics. We have all seen these two systems working together in everyday life. The common toilet is such a machine although the centrifugal side forms inside the drain pipe which is out of sight.

Perhaps there is another example which is more germane to our discussion. It is the diagram of the Vril power plant. (This engine diagram is used here as an example for discussion and is not a blind endorsement of the diagram's existence or accuracy.) In this interpretation of this diagram, we are really dealing with two separate devices. First, is the central spherical device which may be a refined version of the Schappeller sphere. An initial charge would be imputed into the sphere to start it after which the unit would continue to gather up the surrounding energy. This is a Reverse Thermodynamic machine. The sphere generates a magnetic field which could be offset by rotating as in the Schappeller device. The offset field would feed and so rotate the arms of the electric generator surrounding the sphere. The electric generator would gather electric energy, feeding the four large broadcasting fixtures on the walls of the saucer. These fixtures might be, for instance, Tesla pancake coils. The electric generator is an example of a machine complying with the Second Thermodynamic Law.

Both components of the power plant are bonded together in a single system since the output energy of the broadcasting fixtures on the walls of the saucer constitute additional input energy for the sphere. The two components attract one another and use and depend upon one another as they circulate and recirculate energy. As the energy level of one component increases so does the energy level of the other. Indeed, the biggest problem facing the use of such an engine may be employing a means to stop it.

The actual levitation might be the particular electromagnetic radiation coming out of the sphere. In this interpretation, the broadcast fixtures are used to steer the saucer. Davson gives output frequencies for the sphere as 10 to the sixth power (22).

Mr. Watson points out in his letter that one reason machines utilizing the Reverse Thermodynamic principle have not been recognized is that a cold stressed magnetic field is a cold machine. Even a centripetal vortex cools rather than heats. All our devices of measurement ultimately measure heat in some form. Measurement of cold is more difficult. The example already given, the problem of measuring temperature in interstellar space in the absence of matter is an example of this problem.

Finally, the reader will recall that Mr. Watson points out that electromagnetism manifests itself bipolarity, yielding four components in all. These are +/- hot electromagnetism and +/- cold electromagnetism. The reader will recall that two hot electromagnetic components can be joined (the condenser and the coil) and set into a cycle producing an electromagnetic wave. Is it possible that two complementary hot electromagnetic and cold electromagnetic machines could be set into cycle producing not a bi-polar but a quadropolar, 360 degree radiation, such as the one described by Dr. Richard Lefores Clark, to produce gravity?

Planned Uses For The Schappeller Device

If the above discussion has any meaning at all in the quest for an answer to the UFO question, one use for which the Schappeller device must have been destined was that of a power plant for a flying machine. Was this so? The Schappeller device had many planned uses. In 1930 this device was planned as a source of broadcast energy, reminiscent of Tesla, for both German homes and industry. The device could also be used as a generator, battery, transformer, or antenna (23). It is reported that toward the end of the war the SS researched the possibility of using this device in the form of a death ray (24). But additionally, and in answer to our question, the Schappeller device was envisioned as a levitation device for a flying machine. Here is some of that discussion from our sources:

"The new dynamic technology will, in the future, be able to drive electric locomotives and automobiles without the manufacture of costly armatures and everywhere through connection to the atmospheric voltage network. Hypothetically, is certainly the installation of a sufficient number of central amplification facilities which transports from the Ur-Machine the specific magnetic impulse from the dynamic spherical element. New types of aircraft with magneto-static power devices and steering, which are completely crash and collision proof, could be built for a fraction of the cost of today's aircraft—and without the lengthy training of everyone who will be servicing these aircraft".

From "Vril" Die Kosmische Urkraft Wiedergeburt von Atlantis by Johannes Taeufer, page 48.

"Our problem must be to drive toward the space ship problem to new understanding of a realization! Here a definite postulate can be established: "Spherical space ship with its own atmosphere—also technical creation of small planets with world-dynamic propulsion and buoyancy!".

Will this be possible? ---

Major powers in the world prepare themselves in any case presently, especially in Germany."

The above from Weltdynamismus Streifzuege durch technisches Neuland an Hand von biologischen Symbolen. pages 11 and 12. Please note the use of the words "spherical space ship" (Kugelraumschiff).

From Davson in The Physics Of The Primary State Of Matter, page 240:

"The Rotor is laminated to prevent eddying and the magnets do not project; the Rotor periphery is thus entirely equiradial. The Rotor is fixed to the shaft to be driven and the Stator is fixed about a metre above the earth's surface. The latter is, of course, flexible because the earth can include the sea or even the floor of an ether-ship."

From Davson, page 199:

"As has already been explained, the new Technique will not concern itself with the air as a supporting medium, but directly with the ether. Therefore, the body may be a vertical sealed cylinder with conic ends or any other suitable form. Such a body is obviously rigid and inelastic, and it must contain an ether stress of sufficient intensity to support its mass against the ether stress of the earth's stressfield, which means that the glowing magnetism core in the Stator, provided in the body to be lifted, must be able to vary its intensity according to the height at which the ether-ship is to be raised and supported whilst in transit, as the ether stress or field, itself, varies inversely as the square of the distance from the earth's surface. The actual design and solution of all the various problems in the production of such ships, the choice of methods of propulsion, whether independent or directional, belong to the new Technique, whereas here we are only interested in the principle as applied to the problem of Gravitation."

Finally, from Davson, page 177:

"Now the reason that an unsupported body falls to the ground is primarily because it has "no hold" on the medium. It was previously explained that any inert mass or body has only a latent stressfield which functions merely as the force of cohesion and has no mobility and thus only a latent internal stressfield and no external stressfield. This means that it has no "hold" on any elastic medium such as the ether or the air, therefore it must fall, and it falls towards the greater inductive energy.

If the inductive energy, through some exterior cause, could be made suddenly to increase enormously, there would come a point when the body would be supported, or rather suspended, before it reached the earth's surface.

The new Technique could accomplish this by placing a Schappeller Stator in the body in question, where the body is suitably constructed, thus setting up a glowing magnetic stressfield which would hold or keep the weight or mass of the unit body suspended, not in the air—the stressfield would have no reaction on the air—but only on the earth's magnetic stressfield.

This is the basis of the new principle for "ether ships""

Employing the Schappeller mechanism is only half the total explanation. In a field propulsion saucer there are possible two types of "drive" needed. The first is the "Auftrieb" or levitation. Employment of levitation makes the craft buoyant. It weighs nothing. If it weighs nothing it can be moved very easily. "Antrieb", impulse or motive power is the second drive involved. It moves the craft directionally. Levitation only would be supplied by the Schappeller system. Directional movement is so far best explained, in my mind, using the Tesla pancake coils as explained by Bill Lyne.

Concluding Thoughts on the Schappeller Device

In the end, what can be said of the Schappeller device? certainly, it did exist. It drew attention and funding from people within the German government of the time. It was studied by a qualified outsider, a British engineer, for a period of three years and was judged to be genuine.

There are some obvious problems, however. Exotic energies have been evoked which have not been explained satisfactorily. Therefore, the facts are not in evidence yet. Certainly more proof is required before the claims made for this device or the energies involved can be wholly accepted. For the time being we must put this discussion aside, awaiting further correlations.

There are some solutions connected with this device also. If we accept the idea that both the Schauberger and the Schappeller devices worked on the theory of implosion, then one explanation will serve to explain them both. It also allows for an ether-as-matter explanation. This may fit into the evidence gathered by Nikola Tesla. The commonality of these devices could then be sought and perhaps a more efficient device built as a result. We will pick up this theme again in the discussion section of this book.

It should be pointed out that the quest for this "new science" is not specific to Schappeller or Schauberger. Mr. Watson passed on these words from Ehrenfried Pfeiffer, a scientist who collaborated with Dr. Rudolf Steiner around 1920. Although he is not happy with the translation he sent it as he found it which is as it is presented here:

"...the method of science, in a materialistic sense, is based on analysis splitting apart, disintegration, separation, dissecting and all the procedures which have to destroy and take apart, to work on the corpse rather than to grow, to develop, to synthesize. That the human mind was captured by these methods of braking apart: in that I saw the source of our present situation. My question therefore was: (to Rudolf Steiner) is it possible to find another force or energy in nature, with does not have in itself the ductus of atomizing and analysis but builds up, synthesizes. Would we discover that constructive force, which makes things alive and grow, develop adequate building up of methods investigation, eventually use this force for another type of technic, applied to drive machines, than because of the inner nature of this force or energy we might be able to create another technology, social structure, constructive thinking of man rather than destructive thinking. This force must have the impulse of life, of organization within itself as the so-called physical energies have the splitting, separating trend within themselves.

My question to Rudolf Steiner October 1920 and spring 1921 therefore was: does such a force or source of energy exist? Can it be demonstrated? Could an altruistic technic be build upon it?".

My questions were answered as follows: "Yes, such a force exists, but is not yet discovered. It is what is generally known the aether (not the physical ether) but the force which makes things grow, lives for instance in the seed as Samenkraft. Before you can work with this force you must demonstrate its presence. As we have reagents in chemistry, so you must find a reagent for the aetheric force. It is also called formative aetheric force because it is the force which relates the form, shape, pattern of a living thing, growth. You might try crystallization processes to which organic substrata are added. It is possible then to develop machines, which react upon and are driven by this force. Rudolf Steiner than outlined the principles of the application of this force as source of a new energy..."

Since this quest for a new science with the accompanying new machines had a relatively long history in Germany, certainly pre-dating the 3rd Reich, it is almost certain that the Schappeller device or others built along a similar understanding were further developed during the Nazi period. What became of it after the war is unknown. It can be assumed that this device did not escape the scrutiny of the numerous Allied intelligence units tasked with combing Germany for examples of German science. Perhaps someday a government report will be de-classified explaining all this as it was in the case of another free-energy machine, that being the Hans Coler device, which was declassified by the British in 1978 (25) and which worked, according to Mr. Watson, using the same principles of cold magnetism. Until that final reckoning comes aspects of the Schappeller device will still remain a mystery. And until a more final reckoning comes, the question of if the Schappeller device was used as a source of field propulsion in German flying saucers must be deferred.

The Karl Schappeller Device

Sources and References

1. Bahn, Peter, Ph.D. and Heiner Gehring, 1997, pages 120-131, Per Vril-Mythos Eine geheimnisvolle Energieform in Esoterik, Technik und Therapie, Omega Verlag, Duesseldorf

2. Taeufer, Johannes, 1930, page 31."Vril" Die Kosmische Urkraft Wiedergeburt von Atlantis, commissioned and distributed by the Reichsarbeitsgemeinschaft "Das kommendende Deutschland", Astrologischer Verlag Wilhelm Becker, Berlin-steglitz

3. Bahn/Gehring, 1997, page 131

4. ibid, pages 120-124, 130

5. Weltdynamismus Streifzuege durch technisches Neuland an Hand von bioloaischen SYmbolen, 1930. pages 14-15, commissioned and distributed by the Reichsarbeitsgemeinschaft "Das kommendende Deutschland", Otto Wilhelm Barth Verlag, Berlin

6. Davson, Cyril W., 1955, pages 50-59, The Physics Of The Primary State Of Matter And Application Through the Primary Technique, Elverton Books, London

7. Nieper, Hans A., Ph.D., 1985, Conversion of Gravity Field Energy/Revolution in Technology. Medicine and Society. M.I.T. Management Interessengemeinschaft fuer Tachyonen-Geld-Energy GmbH, Friedrlch-Rueder-Strasse 1, 2900 Oldenbuurg, Germany (available in German and English language versions)

7. Davson, Cyril W., 1955, pages 212-213

8. ibid, page 231

9. ibid, pages 217, 223

10. Taeufer, 1930, pages 30-32

11. Davson, 1955, page 230

12. ibid, page 226

13. Taeufer, 130, page 30

14. ibid, page 32

15. Davson, 1955, page 231

16. ibid, page 231

17. ibid, page 57

18. Taeufer, 1930, pages 38-40

19. Clark, Richard LeFors, Ph.D., 1987, page 64, "The Earth Grid, Human Levitation And Gravity Anomalies", contained in Anti-Gravity And The World Grid edited by David Hatcher Childress, Adventures Unlimited Press, Stelle, Illinois

20. ibid

21. ibid

22. Stevens, Henry, 2001, "Infinite Energy", pages 9-13, Volume 7, Issue 40

23. Davson, 1955, page 244

24. Bahn/Gehring, 1997, page 115

25. British Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Final Report Number 1043, item number 31, "The Invention Of Hans Coler, Relating To An Alleged New Source Of Power, Bryanston Sguare, London

Chapter Summary

There is ample evidence that the Schauberger saucer model flew. The fact that the Schaubergers were brought to the United States to continue the work leads to the assessment that they worked on something of value to the government of the United States. The U.S. government was neither interested in his water research nor was it interested in his work on agriculture. We are left to conclude that it was his work on a new form of levitation, his saucer work, which brought Viktor Schauberger and his son Walter Schauberger to the United States. After learning all they could, the government of the United States dismissed the Schaubergers rather badly, foreshadowing the treatment of the German rocket scientists two decades later.

Lionel Shapiro was a credible and incredibly well connected reporter of the war and post-war years. The fact that he was able to break stories relating to secret weaponry in Czechoslovakia indicates that he had some connections within the U.S. military. With the war won, the years of 1946 and 1947 seen to have been a period when the guard of censorship was relaxed. This noose would be re-tightened as the cold war got underway. No fault can be found with Mr. Shapiro's article or its content. The article on the KM-2 electromagnetic rocket and Mr. Shapiro's other stories appeared in a respect newspapers, not a tabloids. His post-war report of the KM-2 electromagnetic rocket must be taken on face value as legitimate.

The German eyewitness account of "Magnetscheibe" prompted investigation into U.S. governmental sources for corroboration. The CIOS report and the F.B.I. report provided corroboration. In the CIOS report we find a U.S. governmental admission of experiments in field propulsion for aircraft undertaken in wartime Germany by Dr. Erb. The F.B.I. report on a field propulsion German saucer must be taken seriously because the F.B.I took it seriously. The F.B.I. carefully took the report and investigated the veracity of their subject. The F.B.I. then sent copies of this report to other intelligence agencies within the U.S. government which is indicated on the F.B.I. report itself. The Bureau saved the report all these years. The fact that this report deals with German technology but was taken by a domestic law enforcement agency, one whose "spy" activities are geographically restricted to within the USA, is noteworthy. It may indicate that the F.B.I.'s Director, J. Edgar Hoover, was kept "in the dark" about the real nature of flying saucers and may have wanted to show the other intelligence agencies that he was not so easily cut out of the information loop.

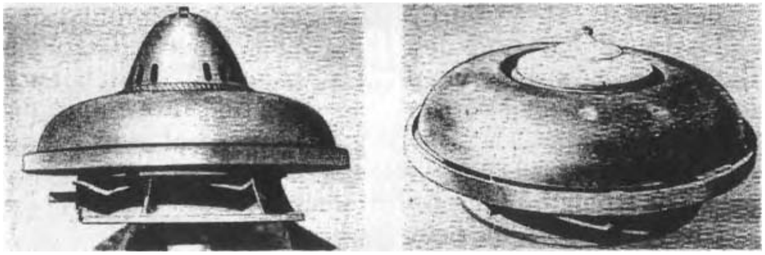
If you do not believe this F.B.I. report does not constitute something special, ask yourself, if you had walked into an F.B.I. office and described a UFO sighting you had made over ten years previously, what do you suppose the Bureau's reaction would be? Would you be taken seriously? Would your background be investigated and would your story be the subject of such extensive treatment? Would your report be kept for forty years? Or, on the other hand, would you be politely shown the door by a condescending uniformed security officer. Something in this report really struck a nerve at the F.B.I.

There is some suggestion that the Germans worked on a chemical engine which produced levitation. There is a possibility that electricity was produced by the Germans directly from atomic energy. There is some evidence, from both German and English language sources, that the Karl Schappeller device was being developed within Germany during the period of time in question. There is evidence that both the Schauberger and the Schappeller devices can be explained in terms of implosion and that implosion may have yielded the levitation force behind field propulsion vehicles. There is ample evidence that the Germans had access to the ideas of Nikola Tesla. The work of Tesla may be seen as an alternative method of propulsion or as a method of moving a field propulsion vehicle after it was made weightless by another method. There are wartime pictures along with many very similar post-war pictures which indicate that the development of field propulsion vehicles took place at this time.

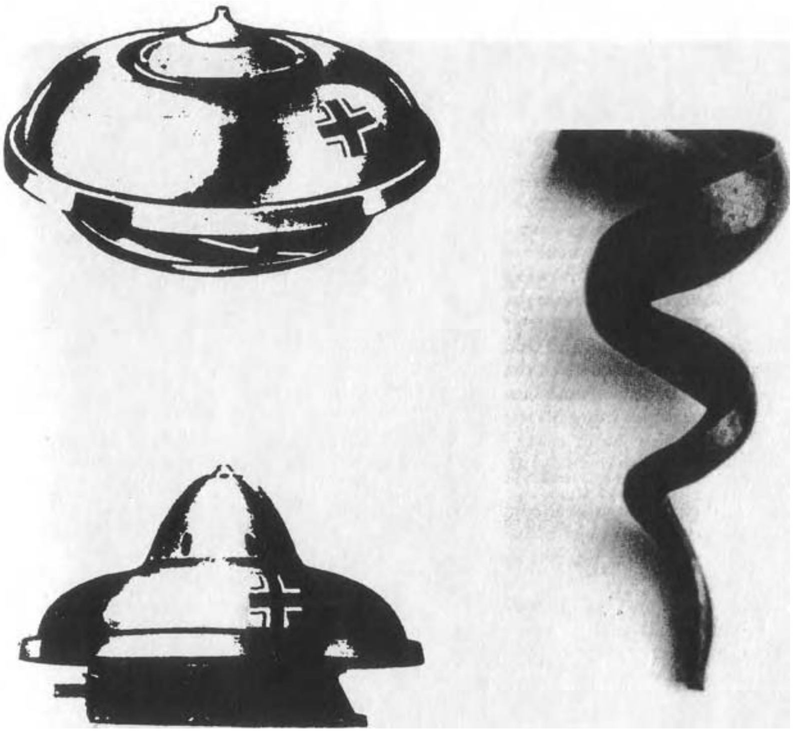
Concerning these pictures and related reports of flying saucers one is thrust up against the intelligence services of the government of the United States of America who see fit to involve themselves. As we will see, it is the latter's rather clumsy attempt to suppress and discredit the flying saucer phenomena which actually speaks volumes for its existence.

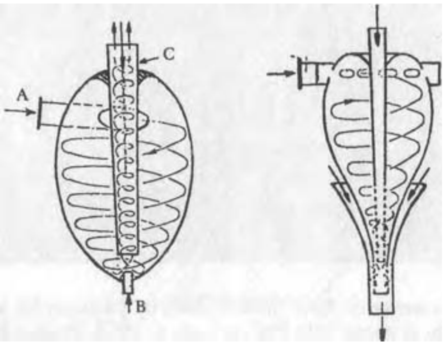
The exact methods pertaining to the propulsion of these saucers may be plausible but they can only be taken as provisional at this time. There may be hundreds of ways to power a field propulsion saucer. The question is not "how could it have been done" but "how was it done".

The brilliant Austrian scientist Victor Schauberger.

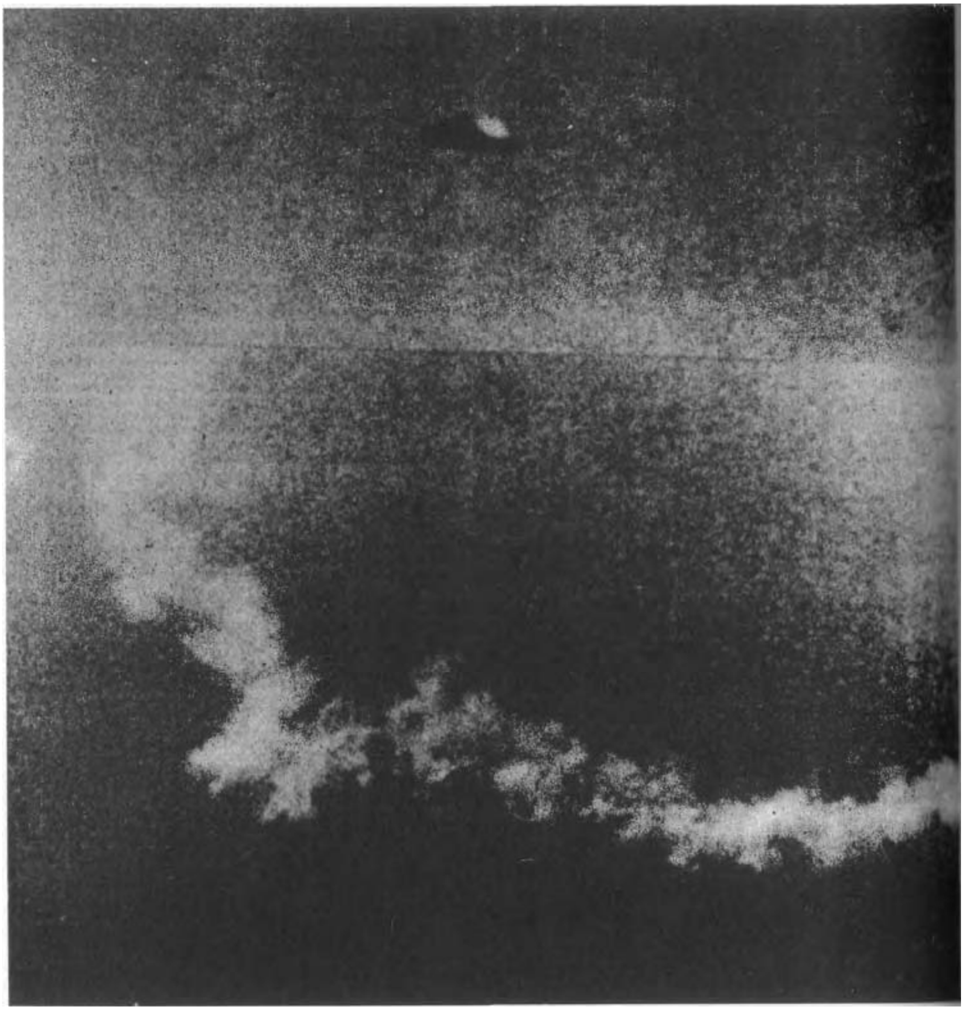


Victor Schauberger's vortex saucer models. Left: Victor Schauberger with a model of a home generator.



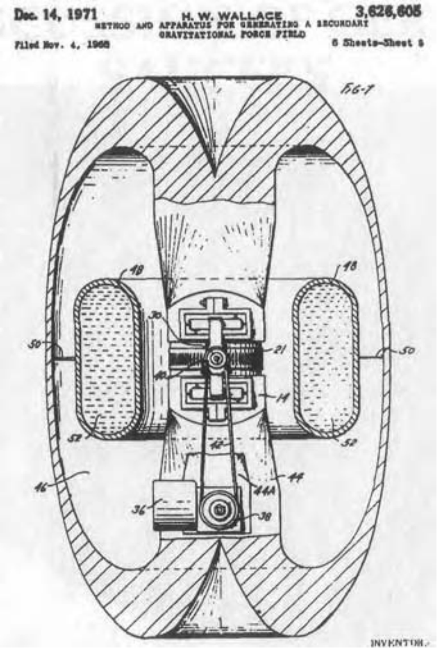


Above: Victor Schauberger's vortex saucer models, inspired by a kudu horn from Southern Africa. Below: Schauberger's two variations of an accelerator for nuclear fusion.



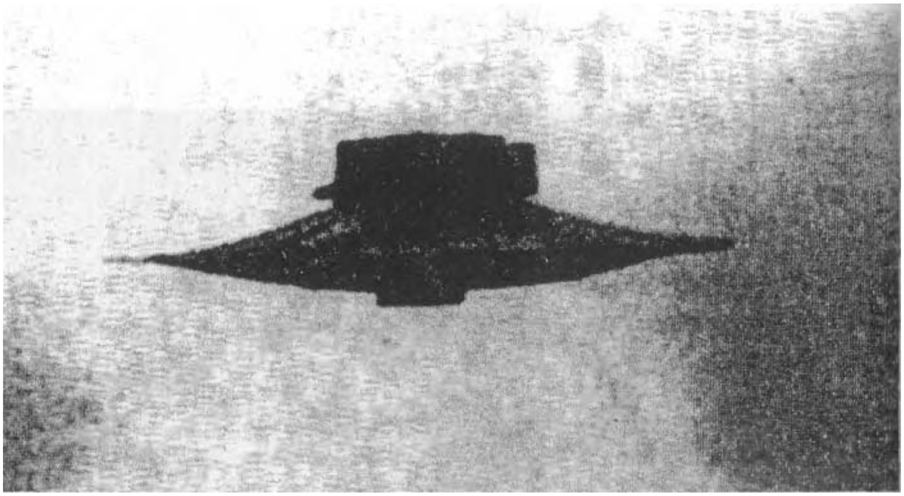
Above: One of a series of three photos taken by postman M. Muyldermans near Namur, Belgium, at about 7:30 PM on June 5, 1955. Project Blue Book showed little interest in these clear, daylight photos, despite the fame that they achieved.

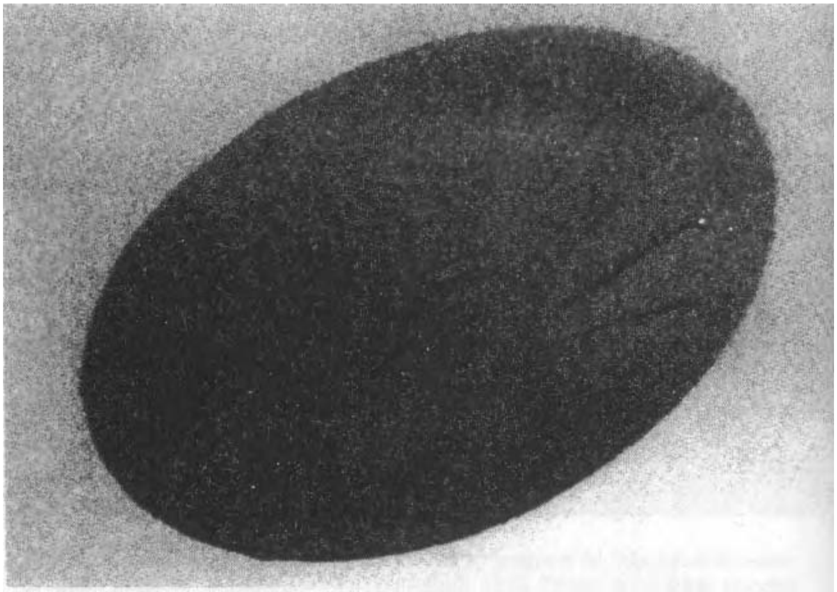
Above: A cylindrical-appearing UFO photographed over Torrance, California in 1967. Possibly part of the southern California testing of US military modifications of German designs?



Dec. 14, 1971
H. W. WALLACE
3,626,605
METHOD AND APPARATUS FOR GENERATING A SECONDARY GRAVITATIONAL FORCE FIELD
Filed Nov. 4, 1968
6 Sheets-Sheet 5
FIG-7
48
48
30
21
40
14
50
50
52
52
12
46
44
44A
36
38
INVENTOR

Above: A 1968 patent granted to H. W. Wallace for a "method and appartus for generating a secondary gravitational force field," exactly the kind of engine that the Germans were allegedly developing during WWII.





Above: Two photos of a "Vril-7" saucer in flight, according to Polish historian Igor Witkowski.

CHAPTER FIVE:

LORE AND LOOSE ENDS: A DISCUSSION OF GERMAN SAUCERS

CHAPTER FIVE

Lore And Loose Ends: A Discussion Of German Saucers

Some of the historical context for German flying discs has been discussed in the preliminary section of this presentation, "The Situation Within Nazi Germany". German saucers were not designed to generate the flying saucer mystery in the second half of the Twentieth Century. They were designed as a weapons system to do a specific job. The fast-moving wartime mind-set was a time when new aircraft designs and new propulsion technologies were coming on line with increasing frequency. The insertion of these saucer-craft into the wartime fabric did not seem as culture altering as the disclosure of these same craft might be to us today. But a simple recitation of the facts is not enough. Some things need to be said about the ideas on German saucers in order to put their study in a better context. Also, some strings have been left untied and some ideas need to be mentioned in order to round out the discussion on this topic.

No better place to start exists than with Renato Vesco. Vesco's insights for the reasons for German saucers were right on the money as were his descriptions of cultural conditions within wartime Germany with prompted this response. Vesco elucidated the foo fighter mystery as nobody else did. But he went on to describe another mystery craft which he called the "Kugleblitz" or "ball lightning" in English (1). This craft is not the same as the Schriever, Habermohl, Miethe or any other saucer design so far disclosed. Indeed, Vesco seems to know nothing of these other projects. His only descriptions were of the Feuerball (foo fighter) and the Kugelblitz.

Vesco described Kugelblitz as the big brother of the Feuerball, meaning that it was a further development of the Feuerball or foo fiqhter. A central cupola or cabin was surrounded by a free-spinning body or saucer which was turbine driven. Further stabilization was probably provided by a small but rapidly spinning centrally positioned flywheel, a gyroscope, set at ninety degrees from the axis of the saucer. The Kugelblitz was able to take-off vertically. Its method of destroying enemy aircraft was probably that described by Vesco (2) and confirmed in new U.S. government documents which included the description of the "Phoo Bomb" (3) under item six, "Gases Applicable To Aircraft". In this system the Kugelblitz approached an enemy bomber formation and ejected one of two types of gas ahead of that formation. The engines of the bombers inhaled the gas and were either destroy by pre-ignition or engine seizure caused by loss of motor oil viscosity. It is not know if one or both methods were used.

The Kugelblitz was guided to the bomber formation by a homing device whose name may have caused Vesco and later UFO researchers some confusion. This is because there existed a homing device whose name was "Kuglelblitz". This may have caused Vesco to assume the entire project bore its name. This device was manufactured by the Patent Verwertungs Gesellschaft of Salzburg and we know quite a bit about it through a Freedom Of Information Act response (4).

Curiously enough, and for a second time, the file comes to us from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, a domestic spy agency which theoretically had no business investigating foreign technology in foreign lands.

The Kugelblitz homing device was a proximity fuse which measured radio frequency waves bounced back from the target, reconciling the Doppler shift with measurement of standing waves to find the exact distance to the target. This homing device was the best of any produced by the Germans, according to the report, as was to be used on all varieties of flak rockets including the Schmettlerling and the Rheintochter. Examples were built at the Patent Verwertungs Gesellschaft plant but it never reached full assembly line production.

There are two interesting asides to this story. The first is that on May 1, 1945, one day after Hitler shot himself in the bunker and six days before Germany surrendered, two officers of the Reichsministerium fuer Rustungs und Kriegsproduktion (Albert Speer's ministry) arrived at the plant and took all existing examples of the Kugelbitz devices and the plans. Neither the two officers, the devices, nor the plans were ever seen again (5). Why was this done? Realistically, these officers must have had some post-war aspirations for this device. It must be added that at this point in the war, Speer's ministry, the Reichs Ministry for Armament and War Production referred to above was in fact being administered and run by the SS.

The second aside is another device in the conceptual stages at the Patent Verwertungs Gesellschaft called "Phantoscope". Phantoscope was to employ high frequency waves beamed to the ground then reflected and picked up on board a moving aircraft to image, in three dimensions, the contours of the earth's surface using a glass case filled with gas and tiny vertical wires. This could be done in any weather, day or night (6). One wonders if the German officers plucked this jewel also? If so, was this to be used on a manned saucer?

Vesco says the Kugelblitz saucer was flown once against enemy aircraft (7). It was destroyed by technical detachments of the SS after "a single lucky wartime mission" (8) in late March or April of 1945 (9) .

Another mystery is the post-war activities of Dr. Richard Miethe. Most all sources state that Dr. Miethe went to Canada after the war and worked on a joint Canadian-American saucer project at an aircraft facility near Toronto, Ontario. Unfortunately, all Freedom Of Information Act inquiries concerning Dr. Miethe run into the solid wall of "no record". Only one researcher ever claimed to have a document naming Dr. Miethe in association with this Avro Aircraft, Limited project, (also known as A.V. Roe, Limited), and that one researcher later admitted to being "a government asset" which throws a cloud of doubt on all his work (10).

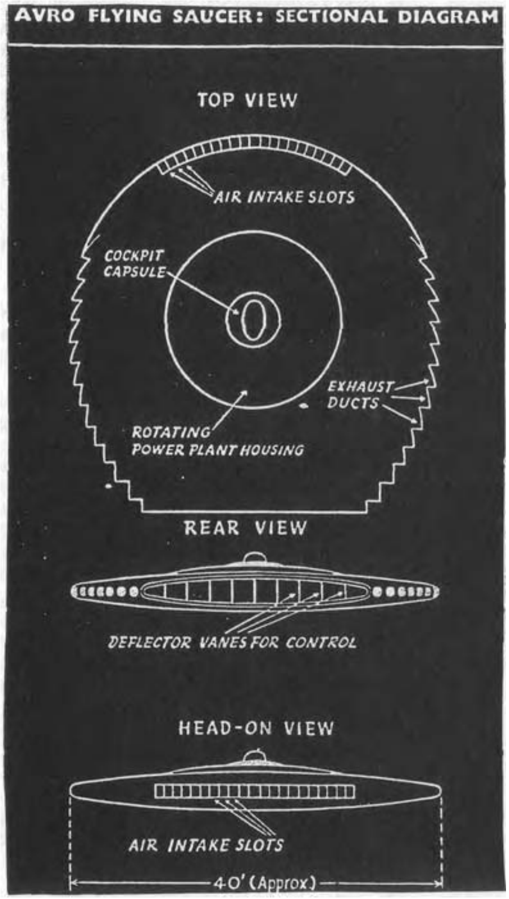
There is no doubt, however, that by early 1955, work was commenced by Avro to build a mach 3 flying saucer which is reminiscent of some of the designs attributed to Dr. Miethe. Two designs were proposed, the difference being the engine used to power the saucer. One proposal was to use several axial-flow jet engines. The second and preferred proposal was to use one large radial-flow jet engine. The axial type is the type most commonly used in jet aircraft today. The radial type was similar to the first jet engine flown by the Germans in 1937. In fact, the radial engine actually under study in Canada may have had some similarities with the Rene Leduc engine used by Dr. Miethe.

Work continued until the early 1960s under various names including Project Silver Bug and Project 1794. Finally, a small hover-craft was unveiled by Avro as the final outcome of their saucer experimentation. This "Avrocar" had nothing to do with either Dr. Miethe's work or a mach three interceptor. The Avrocar was probably a cover project for something else. This "something else" was more advanced.

The Avro Aircraft, Limited experimentation with saucer-craft was always an open secret which was at times exploited by the government. Information regarding this project has been obtained via Freedom Of Information Act using their American partner, the United States Air Force at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, by this researcher as well as other researchers.

There exists a sub-story to the Canadian involvement which should be mentioned. In an article in a British UFO magazine, writer Palmiro Campagna revealed a previously unknown connection between the Canadian government and the history of German saucers (11). It seems that an SS technical liaison officer, Count Rudolf von Meerscheidt-Huellessem, (erroneously spelled "Hullessem" in the article), contacted the Canadian government in March of 1952, offering technical information about a German saucer which could attain speeds "limited only by the strength of the metals used in the saucer's construction". According to the article, von

Avro Flying Saucer



AVRO FLYING SAUCER: SECTIONAL DIAGRAM
TOP VIEW
AIR INTAKE SLOTS
COCKPIT CAPSULE
EXHAUST DUCTS
ROTATING POWER PLANT HOUSING
REAR VIEW
DEFLECTOR VANES FOR CONTROL
HEAD-ON VIEW
AIR INTAKE SLOTS
40' (Approx)

This is a general diagram of the exterior of an Avro saucer. It is representative of how the Avro radial engine saucers worked. Within this outer hull an inner, flat radial-type engine of was situated. This is exactly the scheme designed by Dr. Richard Miethe it and has been copied from his designs. Dr. Frost and his engine designs were overblown, heavy, complicated frauds.

Meerscheidt-Huellessem wanted a large sum of money as down payment, a monthly salary and Canadian citizenship and police protection in exchange. Support for this claim comes in the form of copies of Canadian government documents describing this offer. Mr. Campagna states in the article that the Canadian government ultimately declined the offer but that the American government may have taken over negotiations and accepted.

Contact was made by this researcher with a daughter of Count Rudolf von Meerscheidt-Huellessem's who verified that her father was a technical liaison officer. She had little contact with her father since she was two years old since he had remarried and moved to Canada. She was able, however, to provide the address of another relative, Countess von Huellessem, who was Count Rudolf von Meerscheidt-Huellessem's widow.

Contact was made with Countess von Huellessem. Count von Meerscheidt-Huellessem died in 1988. But the Countess did know a little something about the story in question. Her late husband did discuss the flying saucer with her but only once. He told her that the "drawings" had been given to a representative of the Canadian government in 1952. After review of the drawings, the only comment from the representative was that they were "outdated". The drawings were never returned. The Canadians had succeeded in obtaining hard information concerning a real flying saucer and in paying for it with an insult. Count von Meerscheidt-Huellessem was somewhat despondent over the rejection. He never mentioned the subject to his wife again. At the time they were both making new lives for themselves in Canada and the subject never resurfaced.

In discussing these events with the Countess over the telephone, she told me that she herself had seen these drawings. She was asked if these were drawings or technical plans. She said they were technical drawings on rolls of paper. I said the word "blueprint" and she said "yes". She stated again that these drawings were given only to the Canadians and not to the Americans.

Countess von Huellessem was sent a copy of the aforementioned article. Her only comment was that her husband would not have asked for a large sum of money in exchange for this information. They already had means. He might have asked for a position, she said, since her husband would have enjoyed working on this project.

Returning to the Avro Aircraft, Limited - U. S. Air Force saucer project, we have to ask ourselves some questions. First, was this information, these plans, the real basis of the Avro saucer project? This would certainly explain the reason for the partnership between the two governments involved since the Americans would have needed the Canadians at that point and the Canadians would have insisted upon control of the project on their home soil. Second, did the technology brought to the Canadians by von Meerscheidt-Huellessen have anything to do with the jet technology obtained the under Freedom Of Information Act? It certainly had nothing to do with a hover-craft which was the outcome of this project according to the government. How could a floppy hover-craft barely capable of 300 miles per hour under the best of estimates have had anything to do with a saucer whose speed was "only limited by the strength of metals used in the saucer's construction"? Could Project Silver Bug, Project 1794, and some of the other patents of John Frost attributed to this collaboration all be nothing more than an elaborate cover story?

Another point is that until recently, the only connection linking the German saucer projects to the Avro Project and to the Americans was the involvement of Dr. Richard Miethe. With the new evidence of the Peenemuende Project's connection to the American saucer projects run out of Wright Field, Ohio and the Count von Meerscheidt-Huellessem connections to the Canadians, the weak linkage of Dr. Miethe to these projects is superfluous. There is now more than enough evidence to make these connections with or without Dr. Miethe. Further, considering the Count von Meerscheidt-Huellessem evidence, there is now a direct link between German saucer technology and the Canadian government's saucer project at A.V., Roe Limited. That link turns out to be the SS in the form of an SS technical liaison officer.

There are differing opinions as to how known saucer-types were actually powered. Every researcher seems to have his own ideas about this subject. Could the answer to this dilemma be that there are more types of German saucers than we know about? For instance a device is depicted in a 1975 issue of Luftfahrt International, a well respected German aeronautical magazine, which shows a drawing of a "Flakmine" (12). Depicted are several rotor blades, some powered by ram-jets, making it essentially a jet-powered helicopter. This device may have been derived from design work done in Italy in which the propellant and the explosive were the same substance. This device was called the "Turboproietto" meaning in English, "turbine projectile" (13). It would have been able to carry large quantities of explosive to the altitude of a bomber formation. The device would have rotored up, vertically, to the level of a formation of bombers and then detonated, using the remaining fuel as a bomb, presumably inflicting heavy losses. Klaus-Peter Rothkugel refers to this very device as a "Drehfluegel" and will detail its development in his upcoming book.

In another instance of a possible saucer type, saucers shown to Bill Lyne in a movie clip while he was in Air Force Intelligence were described by him as "flying turtles" (14). This film was taken by B-17 flight personnel during World War Two as the two German saucers attacked a squadron of bombers. other writers including Michael X. Barton and Norbert Juergen-Ratthofer used these same descriptive words. Vesco describes the "Feuerball", the foo fighter, as "circular and armored, more or less resembling the shell of a tortoise". This description also applies to his Kugelblitz (15). Turtle or tortoise is "Schildkroete" in German. Sometimes this device is referred to as a "flying turtle" in both languages. With so many writers using this term for flying craft which are apparently not all similar, there exists a certain amount of confusion about this name, "Schildkroete". Therefore, this saucer does not seem to fit neatly into any previously described saucer type. Perhaps this flying turtle is only another name for the Fireball or foo-fighter which seems to be the consensus among German writers, other writers seem to associate this word with a larger craft so perhaps this type of saucer is closer to what Vesco described as the Kugelblitz. "Schildkroete" seemed so nebulous that for many years this writer refused to accept the term at all.

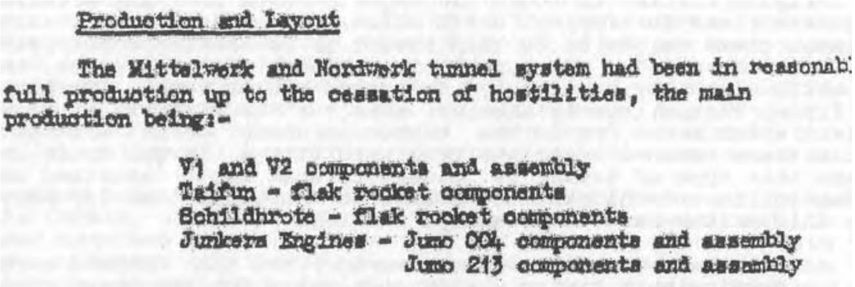
This all changed when it was uncovered that the Germans were actually developing a flying weapon code-named Schildkroete. This researcher as well as another researchers have found references to an offensive air weapon, called by the Germans, "Schildkroete", and known to American intelligence. The exact nature of this device is, however, still kept secret. The government is uncooperative, even when presented with their own words on the subject and copies of their own reports. For instance in a Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee interrogation of Albert Speer, Reichminister of Armaments And War Production, report 53(b), Speer is specifically asked about "Schildkroete". Only Speer's reply is retained in the record, not the actual question. Line number 20 of that interrogation quoted here as the document from microfilm is difficult to read:

> " 20. Schildkroete he was not sure about, but he thought is might, conceivably be a jet fighter. "

By the time Schildkroete had come about, Speer had lost much of his standing and duties to officials of the SS. In this same set of interrogations Speer deferred a question concerning V-weapons to Dr. Hans Kammler as the one the Allies should seek as the expert. Speer was the only one raising Kammler's name. There was no follow-up questioning by the Allied interrogators. It was almost as if Speer had uttered an obscenity, invoking the "K" word, which was a word simply too hot to be touched in that setting.

The next Allied reference to Schildkroete comes from the Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee, Evaluation Report 40, titled "Sonderausschus A-4". Sonderausschus was an organization whose job it was to prioritize resources toward projects most needed to defend the Reich. These high priority programs were the Vierjahresplan, Vulkanprogramm, Jaegerprogramm, Lokprogramm, and the Notprogramm. Each had projects within these headings. Even though under pressure of law in the form of a request under the auspices of the Freedom Of Information Act, the Federal Government of the United States of America has responded with a "No Record" when asked for their files on some of these programs. This is true even when confronted with their own documents naming

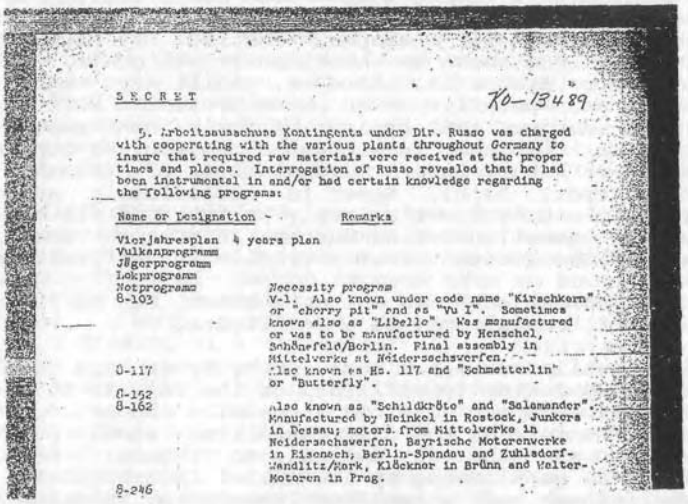
U.S. Government Documents Mentioning "Schildkroete"



Production and Layout

The Mittelwerk and Nordwerk tunnel system had been in reasonab full production up to the cessation of hostilities, the main production being:-

V1 and V2 components and assembly
Taifun - flak rocket components
Schildhrote - flak rocket components
Junkers Engines - Jumo 004 components and assembly
Jumo 213 components and assembly



SECRET

KO-13489

5. Arbeitsausschuss Kontingents under Dir. Russo was charged with cooperating with the various plants throughout Germany to insure that required raw materials were received at the proper times and places. Interrogation of Russo revealed that he had been instrumental in and/or had certain knowledge regarding the following programs:

Name or Designation -	Remarks
Vierjahresplan	4 years plan
Vulkanprogramm
Jägerprogramm
Lokprogramm
Notprogramm	Necessity program
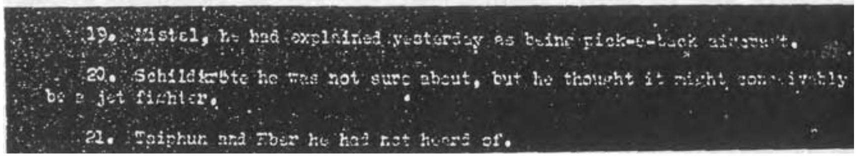
8-103	V-1. Also known under code name "Kirschkern" or "cherry pit" and as "Vu I". Sometimes known also as "Libelle". Was manufactured or was to be manufactured by Henschel, Schönefeld/Berlin. Final assembly in Mittelwerke at Neidersachswerfen.
8-117	Also known as Hs. 117 and "Schmetterlin" or "Butterfly".
8-152
8-162	Also known as "Schildkröte" and "Salamander". Manufactured by Heinkel in Rostock, Junkers in Dessau; motors from Mittelwerke in Neidersachswerfen, Bayrische Motorenwerke in Eisenach; Berlin-Spandau and Zuhlsdorf-Wandlitz/Mark, Klöckner in Brünn and Walter-Motoren in Prag.
8-246



19. Mistel, he had explained yesterday as being pick-a-back aircraft.

20. Schildkröte he was not sure about, but he thought it might conceivably be a jet fighter.

21. Taiphun and Eber he had not heard of.

Top: Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee (CIOS) Report items 21, 22, 31, File# XXX111-38 Underground Factories In Germany, page 19. Middle: CIOS Report 40, Sonderausschus A-4, page 5. Bottom: CIOS Report 59(b) Interrogation Of Albert Speer Reich Minister Of Armaments And War, Page 3 these programs. One project, project 8-162, clearly names Schildkroete as the code-name of this project. It is listed in association with a known project, the "Salamander" project, which resulted in the He 162A Salamander or Volksjaeger jet fighter.

The last reference to Schildkroete was found by Heiner Gehring in the Combined Intelligence Objectives Sub-Committee Party 536 report on Underground Factories in Germany. This was classified as "Secret" and was a G-2 Division, S.H.A.E.F. report! In describing the large underground facility at Nordhausen, where the bulk of the V-2 production took place, tunnel divisions Mittelwerk and Nordwerk were said in this secret report to be producing "Schildhroete - flak rocket components". Although spelled incorrectly in the report, the intended word is very apparent.

Clearly something is going on under the heading Schildkroete. A possibly is the connection of Schildkroete to the Italian "Turboproietti" mentioned by Vesco. In an information sheet, Klaus-Peter Rothkugel depicts a diagram for the Turboproietti. This design is remarkably similar that found in Swiss newspaper from the mid-1950s (16). This article credits the successful German saucer program and Georg Klein and goes on to describe another related design which is reproduced here. One can immediately see the relationship with the Turboproietti design. In this design the center of gravity is below the saucer surface adding stability. The pilot's cabin is also below the wing surface. This is curiously similar to a turtle's bony structure in which the head and neck emerge from under the turtle's shell. Could this have been the Schildkroete design?

This design calls for the use of ram-jets but turbojets could have also been used. Fuel tanks are located in the rotating wing and so fuel is fed to the jet engines by centrifugal force. The two small wings have adjustable angles as do the jet engines themselves. Thus, the method of vertical flight is similar to the Schriever-Habermohl saucers.

The horizontal maneuvering is unique and warrants discussion. We have all heard reports of flying saucers in flight making seemingly non-aerodynamic turns instantaneously. In this article, Mr. Zollikofer proposes a simple method to accomplish this. It involves angular momentum. We all remember seeing a child's top spinning on a smooth floor. Perhaps the reader will recall that when the top nears a piece of furniture and hits it, the top shoots off instantly in the opposite direction. This happens because contact with the furniture caused a change in the top's angular momentum. The top's momentum was braked on one side. A sudden slow down on one side caused an imbalance whose force drove the top to the opposite direction.

In this same way the intentional slowing of one engine (on one side) on this saucer design would cause the rapidly spinning saucer to instantaneously change course, shooting to the other side. Several of these course changes would resemble insect-like flight to the observer. The rapidity of the course changes is tied to the degree of slow-down or breaking of the saucer's angular momentum and to the degree (revolutions per minute) of that momentum. Even when stationary, increased spinning would serve as a "bank" of angular momentum to be drawn upon at a moment's notice.

Top: Italian designed "Turboproietti" an anti-aircraft design which used left-over fuel as its warhead. Bottom: Saucer design, 2/3/55, "Neue Zuercher Zeitung". 1. Hub of the rotating winged-wheel. 2. Adjustable wings 3. Non-rotating cabin. 4. Lookout for the pilots. 5. Ram-jets 6. Air intake. 7. Exhaust, direction changeable. 8. Angle of variation of the exhaust rudder. 9. Variable adjustment angle of the wings. Was this a Schildkroete? Kugelblitz?

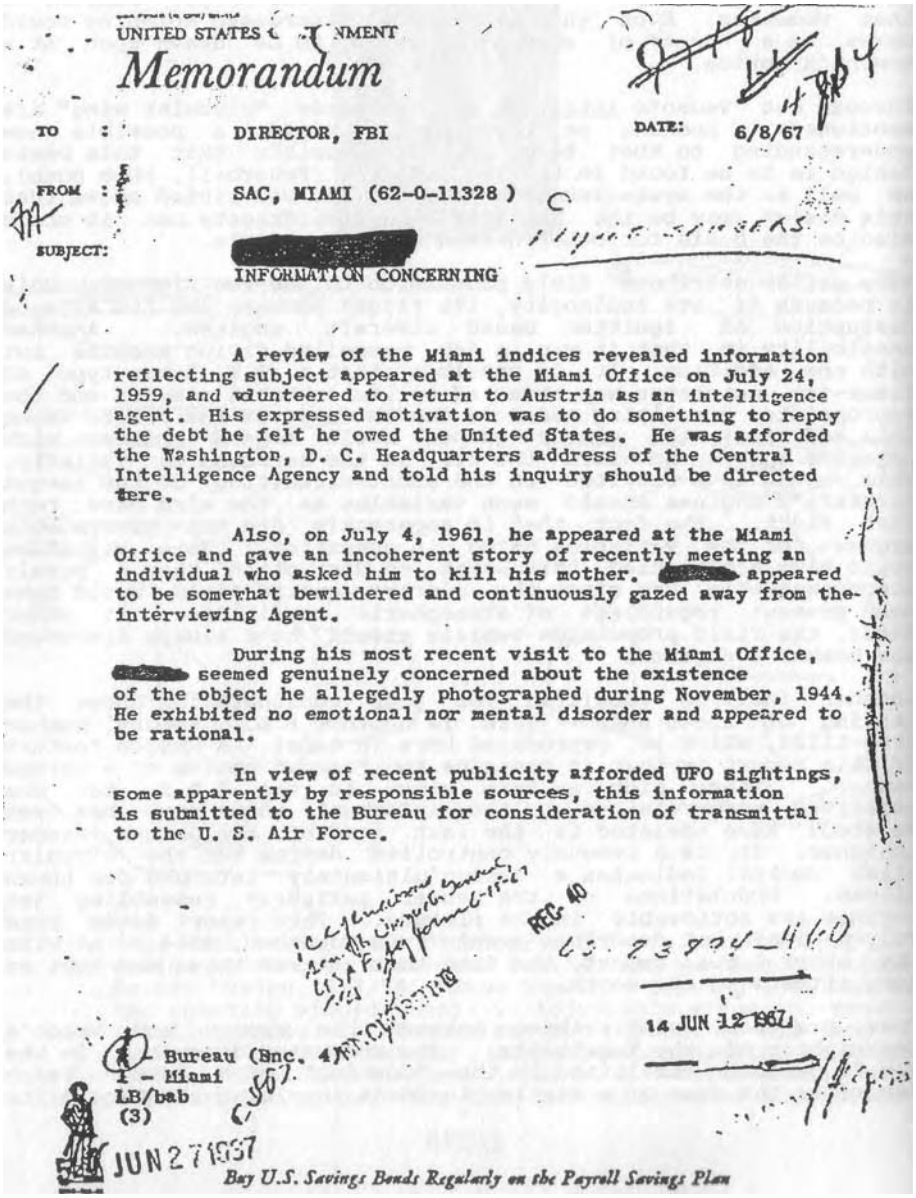
Through out Vecso's Intercept UFO the words "circular wing" are mentioned. Looking at this design yields a possible new understanding to that term. It is possible that this basic design is to be found in the foo fighter, (Feuerball, Phoo Bomb), as well as the mysterious Kugelblitz. It was hinted above that this design may be the basis of the Schildkroete but it could also be the basis for other German saucer projects.

Many writer attribute field propulsion to the foo fighter. This is because of its luminosity, its flight pattern and its alleged disruption of ignition based aircraft engines. Another possibility is that it was a jet propelled flying machine but with one addition. It is possible that a T.T. Brown-type of flame-jet generator was attached to its exhaust nozzles and the appropriate insulation added on the surface of the craft. With this addition, the exhaust gasses would become enriched with negative ions. So would the air in the surrounding vicinity. This would have resulted in the short-circuiting of the target aircraft's engines should such variables as the wind have been just right. The fact that it apparently did not always work argues for the variables being in operation. More variables would have accompanied this means of disruption than a purely electromagnetic one since the electromagnetic field would have been present regardless of atmospheric conditions. It other words, the field propulsion vehicle should have always disrupted the bomber's engines.

Another item is submitted for your consideration under the heading of "loose ends". This is another F.B.I. report, Number 62-0-11328, which is reproduced here in total. A unique feature of this report is that it contains two "xerox" copies of a German saucer. These pictures were given to the F.B.I. but the negatives were retained by the informant whose name has been deleted. Also deleted is the last name of the German saucer designer. It is a remotely controlled device but the circular glass cockpit indicates a design ultimately intended for human pilots. Undulations on the saucer periphery resembling jet engines are noticeable in the picture. This report dates from July 8, 1967 but describes events from November, 1944. As with the other F.B.I. report, the fact that it was taken and kept so long attests to its worth.

There are some similarities between this report and Vesco's description of the Kugelblitz. The encounter described in the F.B.I. report resulting in the "downing" of a B-26. Vesco describes the same or a similar incident involving the Kugelblitz

A Second F.B.I. Report on German Flying Discs
(Three pages and best possible picture)



UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Memorandum

TO : DIRECTOR, FBI DATE: 6/8/67

FROM : SAC, MIAMI (62-0-11328)

SUBJECT: [redacted]
INFORMATION CONCERNING

Flying Saucers

A review of the Miami indices revealed information reflecting subject appeared at the Miami Office on July 24, 1959, and volunteered to return to Austria as an intelligence agent. His expressed motivation was to do something to repay the debt he felt he owed the United States. He was afforded the Washington, D. C. Headquarters address of the Central Intelligence Agency and told his inquiry should be directed there.

Also, on July 4, 1961, he appeared at the Miami Office and gave an incoherent story of recently meeting an individual who asked him to kill his mother. [redacted] appeared to be somewhat bewildered and continuously gazed away from the interviewing Agent.

During his most recent visit to the Miami Office, [redacted] seemed genuinely concerned about the existence of the object he allegedly photographed during November, 1944. He exhibited no emotional nor mental disorder and appeared to be rational.

In view of recent publicity afforded UFO sightings, some apparently by responsible sources, this information is submitted to the Bureau for consideration of transmittal to the U. S. Air Force.

[illegible] USAF [illegible] 6-15-67

REC 40

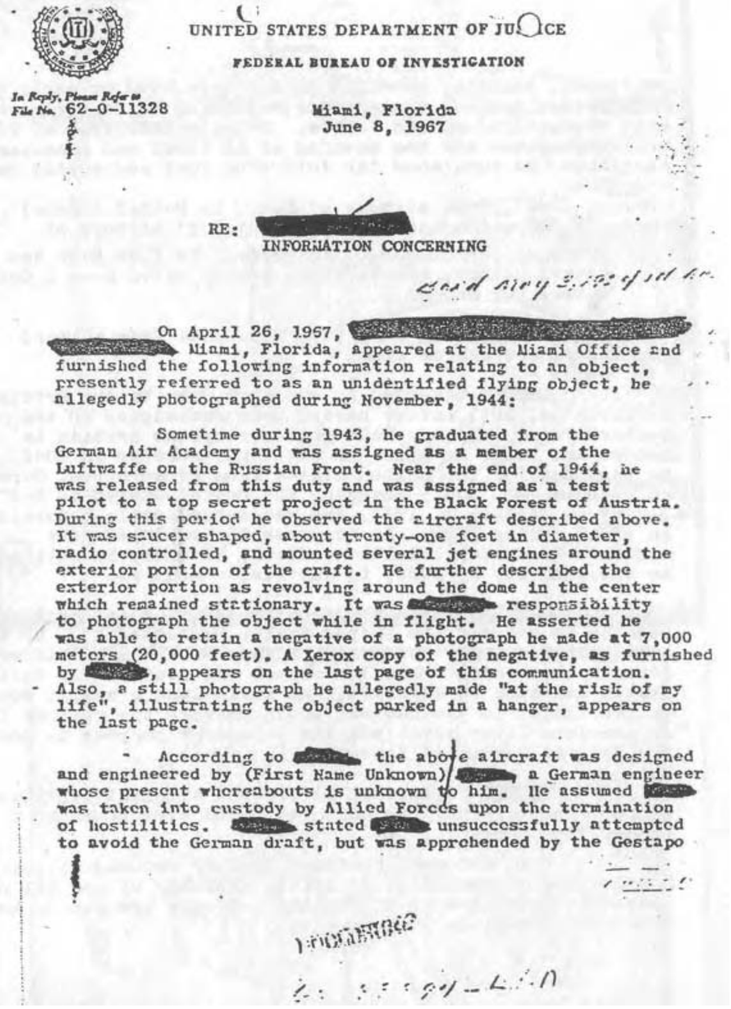
62-83894-460

14 JUN 12 1967

2 - Bureau (Enc. 4)
1 - Miami
LB/bab
(3)

JUN 27 1967

Buy U.S. Savings Bonds Regularly on the Payroll Savings Plan



UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

In Reply, Please Refer to
File No. 62-0-11328

Miami, Florida
June 8, 1967

RE: [redacted]
INFORMATION CONCERNING

[illegible]

On April 26, 1967, [redacted] Miami, Florida, appeared at the Miami Office and furnished the following information relating to an object, presently referred to as an unidentified flying object, he allegedly photographed during November, 1944:

Sometime during 1943, he graduated from the German Air Academy and was assigned as a member of the Luftwaffe on the Russian Front. Near the end of 1944, he was released from this duty and was assigned as a test pilot to a top secret project in the Black Forest of Austria. During this period he observed the aircraft described above. It was saucer shaped, about twenty-one feet in diameter, radio controlled, and mounted several jet engines around the exterior portion of the craft. He further described the exterior portion as revolving around the dome in the center which remained stationary. It was [redacted] responsibility to photograph the object while in flight. He asserted he was able to retain a negative of a photograph he made at 7,000 meters (20,000 feet). A Xerox copy of the negative, as furnished by [redacted], appears on the last page of this communication. Also, a still photograph he allegedly made "at the risk of my life", illustrating the object parked in a hanger, appears on the last page.

According to [redacted] the above aircraft was designed and engineered by (First Name Unknown) [redacted] a German engineer whose present whereabouts is unknown to him. He assumed [redacted] was taken into custody by Allied Forces upon the termination of hostilities. [redacted] stated [redacted] unsuccessfully attempted to avoid the German draft, but was apprehended by the Gestapo in Vienna, Austria, sometime during late 1943 or early 1944. [redacted] also assumed the secrets pertaining to this aircraft were captured by Allied Forces. He said this type of aircraft was responsible for the downing of at least one American B-26 airplane. He furnished the following fuel and engine data:

[illegible]

> "....Fuel mixture of N_2H_4O in Methyl Alcohol (CH_3OH) rather than 'oxygen-holding' mixture of hydrogen peroxide H_2O_2 in water. 7m 1,3m high two rocket motors; smooth flow, rotary drive over 2,000 meters per second...."

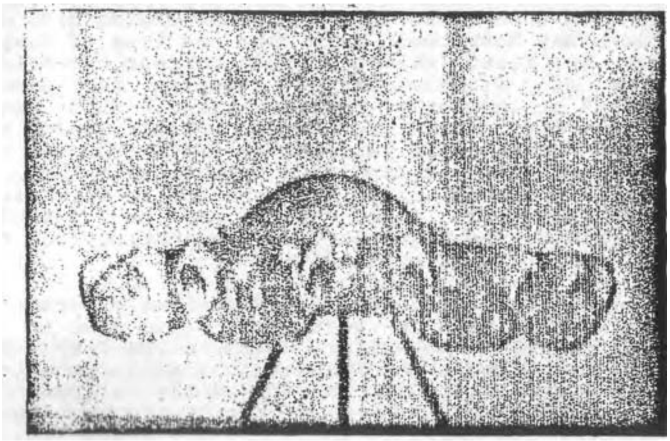
[redacted] said he copied this data from a board located in the hanger area.

[redacted] asserted he was shot down by the British on March 14, 1945, after having been reassigned to the Western Front. He was held prisoner by the British in London and later in Brussels until his release in 1946. He departed for the United States from Bremerhaven, Germany, on December 26, 1951; entering the United States in New Jersey on January 7, 1952, and was subsequently naturalized in Miami during 1958. He is presently employed as a mechanic at Eastern Airlines, Miami, Florida. He related he was born May 3, 1924, in Austria.

[redacted] stated he has withheld this information because he assumed the United States possessed it. He has become increasingly concerned because of the unconfirmed reports concerning a similar object and denials the United States has such an aircraft. He feels such a weapon would be beneficial in Vietnam and would prevent the further loss of American lives which was his paramount purpose in contacting the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

[redacted] reiterated he has the original negatives of both photographs. He said the shots were taken at a thirty second time exposure.

This document contains neither recommendations nor conclusions of the FBI. It is the property of the FBI and is loaned to your agency; it and its contents are not to be distributed outside your agency.



and an American "Liberator" (17). Both saucers are surprisingly identical in description. In the F.B.I. report this secret project was set in the "Black Forest of Austria". The Schwarzwald, the Black Forest, is in Southern Germany. Vesco says that toward the end of the war the Germans dispersed their remaining aircraft to improved air field hidden in thick pine forests (18).

Vesco specifically mentions the Schwaebischerwald and the BubesheimerwaId (19). Vesco goes on to say:

> "It was from one of these improved fields that the first Kugelblitz fighter took off on its fantastic flight" (20).

The general description of the airfield hidden in a forest does seem to correspond with what Vesco described. Finally, the fuel used on this saucer was unlike that of the Me-163 or any other fuel known. Is this a variant of the exotic fuels Vesco says were considered for German saucers? (21).

Is this report confirmation of Vesco? Is the informant in the F.B.I. report describing a Kugelblitz? Is this fuzzy "xerox" copy really a picture of the Kugelblitz? It is not proof positive, but it is intriguing.

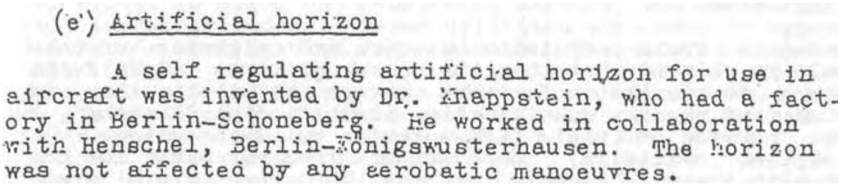
A request was made to the F.B.I. for a clear picture. The Bureau responded on March 22, 2001 saying that the Miami Field Office may have had a clearer picture but that the file was destroyed.

Here we have a real X-File, yet nobody saved the picture? Fox Mulder, where are you when we need you most? The F.B.I. did provide a somewhat clearer picture which is reproduced here.

Sometimes blind luck in needed when dealing with the government. This has proven to be the case regarding a very special compass developed by the Germans to use in their flying disc program. Actually, there may have been more than one type of compass for this purpose. The first inkling of this compass comes to us from the writings of Wilhelm Landig wherein he describes a "Himmelskompass" or heavenly compass (22). This device was mounted upon a flying disc and could orient itself using the position of the sun even in twilight or if the sun was below the horizon. The method given for its operation is that sunlight striking the earth is polarized and that this direction has a stronger electromagnetic field which can be detected with instruments (ibid). The magnetic fields emanating from the north and south poles are a similar situation.

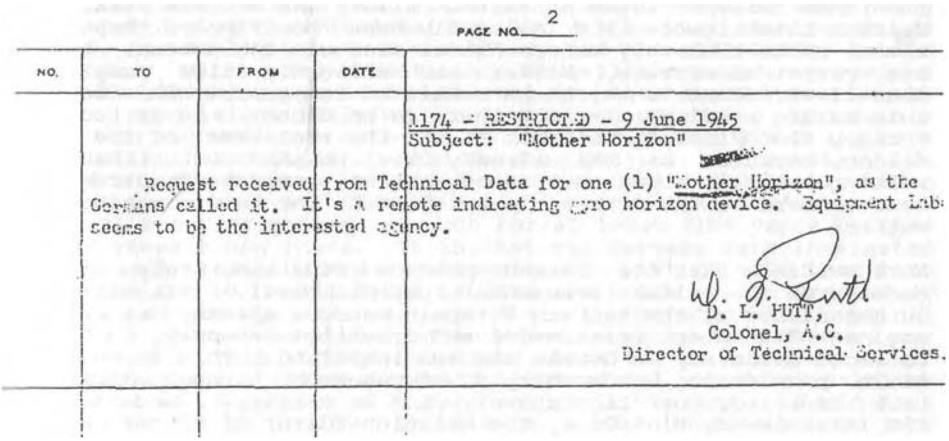
William Lyne discloses, pictures and describes a German compass which he states was used on a German flying disc in his book Pentagon Aliens, the first edition which circa 1990. He bought the device as junk from a New Mexican junk dealer who got it on an Air Force base after it had apparently slipped though a security check.

"Mother Horizon"



(e) Artificial horizon

A self regulating artificial horizon for use in aircraft was invented by Dr. Knappstein, who had a factory in Berlin-Schoneberg. He worked in collaboration with Henschel, Berlin-Königswusterhausen. The horizon was not affected by any aerobatic manoeuvres.



PAGE NO. 2

NO. TO FROM DATE

1174 - RESTRICTED - 9 June 1945
Subject: "Mother Horizon"

Request received from Technical Data for one (1) "Mother Horizon", as the Germans called it. It's a remote indicating gyro horizon device. Equipment Lab seems to be the interested agency.

D. L. PUTT,
Colonel, A.C.
Director of Technical Services.

"Mother Horizon" was possibly a device used on a German flying disc. Top: "Information Obtaind From Targets Of Opportunity In The Sonthofen Area" BIOS Report # 142. Bottom: Entry in microfilm obtained via FOIA.

Recently, mention of a German compass was encountered while searching for something else in a Freedom Of Information Act response. Called a "Mother Horizon", the device recalls and may confirm the device first described by Landig. On the other hand, it may simply be a device showing the pilot the attitude of the aircraft in relation to that of the horizon. Whether or not this is the same device in the possession of William Lyne is not known at this time.

Turning to field propulsion saucers and pictures of them, it should be pointed out that the saucer pictures of Ralf Ettl and Norbert Juergen-Ratthofer are unique to them, that is, no pictures of saucers specifically identified as "Haunebu", "Vril" exist outside of their presentation to my knowledge. As if preempting criticism, these writers counter with the proposal that all Adamski saucers are really German field propulsion saucers or originated from German wartime designs. Adamski saucers were photographed and witnessed world-wide in the early 1950s. In fairness, it should be pointed out that there also exists at least one source of confirmation of their thesis.

Confirmation of sorts comes from a new book by a conspiracy writer, George Piccard, who cites similar information to that of Ettl and Juergen-Ratthofer as coming from his informant, a man calling himself "Kilder" (24). Piccard states that he believed the name "Kilder" to be an alias. Kilder was a clerk working in British intelligence and allegedly came to Piccard through a mutual contact shortly before Kilder died of lung cancer. During his years of service, Kilder had allegedly filed away many classified documents which he committed to memory. This book is interesting reading, of that there is no doubt. It is too bad, though, that Piccard could not elicit the real name of the dying Kilder, because, as has already been pointed out, there is nothing reliable about an unnamed, secret government source and, hence, there is no reason to spill much ink in discussing the matter.

More evidence that the Germans produced something truly strange comes from the Polish researcher Igor Witkowski. Mr. Witkowski is considered by the Eastern European sources already cited, the engineer Mr. Robert Leiakiewicz and Dr. Milos Jesensky, to be the foremost authority on German saucers in Poland. This is no small title considering the mountains of research through which they have tunneled, both figuratively and in reality. According to his interviewer, Nick Cook, the Aviation Editor of "Janes Defense Weekly", Mr. Witkowski was shown classified Russian documents through an unnamed contact. In them it described German research on a device called "die Glocke" (the bell). This device was tested underground, at Der Riese, at the Wenceslas mine near Ludwigsdorf(25) under the German code-names of "Laternentraeger" ("lantern carrier") and "Chronos" which obviously refers to time. This was done under the auspices of a heretofore unknown SS organization, the Forschungen, Entwicklungen and Patente (Research, Development and Patents) or FEP. This was Kammler's group according to Mr. Witkowski (26). Could this be the true name of what has been referred to up until now simply as the "Kammler Group"? Mr. Witkowski maintains that this group was independent of the Reichsforschungsrat, the Reich Research Council, which is significant. Heading the research on the Bell was none other than Professor Walther Gerlach (27) who was among the very top tier of German nuclear scientists. A metallic liquid, violet in color and resembling mercury, was stored within the bell in two cylinders. These cylinders were spun in opposite directions for test lasting for a minute. The effects included.a pale blue light emitted from the bell, electrical equipment failures, as well as deleterious effects on animals and people (28). To his credit, Mr. Witkowski did not try make more out of this than is in evidence. He is of the opinion, however, that the bell was a very powerful engine (29). Of course, we all can jump ahead of the facts slightly and wonder if this engine was not to be used on a very large German atomic saucer or field propulsion saucer, the very kind described by Mr. Norbert Juergen-Ratthofer.

Weighing into the German field propulsion controversy is Dr. Axel Stoll. Dr. Stoll is a Geophysicist, that is, a real scientist. Dr. Stoll names no sources in his book but states that they exist and must be protected for the common need as opposed to that of serving an individual purpose as a citation (25). Dr. Stoll supports the assertion that field propulsion vehicles were being developed during the Third Reich. But unlike what has transpired before. Dr. Stoll gives us the theory and the mathematics behind the theory, citing and translating Maxwell and Bearden. Besides the mathematical support for his thesis that the Germans built field propulsion vehicles, he states something about his suspicion concerning a spin-off of this technology which may have been further developed by the Germans (26). It is what was stated by Mr. Juergen-Ratthofer over ten years ago in his video films. It is what was indicated by circumstantial evidence at Jonastal and recognized as such for at least five years by some of the researchers there. It is that the Germans were interested in the manipulation space and time itself. It is said that time and space can be manipulated or time and space can be created or obliterated through the use of am electromagnetic longitudinal wave (32). Normal electromagnetic waves, such as light waves, are transverse. This brings us right back to the production of quadropolar waves (transverse and longitudinal waves in cycle) as discussed in connection with the Schappeller device. Could this lost technology provide us with a window into time or into another dimension? Would our scientists of today be able to unlock this technology given their restricted scientific outlook? Has the reconstruction and piecing together of this puzzle occupied our scientists since the end of the Second World War?

Turning aside for a moment, as stated, this book was written as a guide to German flying discs. As such, the reader should be cautioned about at least one pitfall. This pitfall consists of a series of technical diagrams of alleged German field propulsion saucers, prominently displaying a date of November, 1944. In some of these drawings mention is made of a "Thule-Tachyonator". This word "Tachyonator" obviously has its origins in the word tachyon. This word bothered me for years but I loved those "old" drawings so much that my nagging doubts were put aside. What bothered me was the fact that this word never arose in my introductory physics course in the 1960s. This ate at me until I called the Physics Department at the University of California at Los Angeles for their opinion as to the origin of this word. An old physicist said from his memory the word was not even coined until the mid-1960s, thus casting doubt on the technical drawings. He gave me a reference and his memory proved correct. The word "tachyon" was coined by Dr. Gerald Feinberg in 1966 (33). This means that there was no word "Tachyonator" in 1944. Unless better evidence surfaces, the veracity of these documents must be questioned. It hurts to admit that I count myself as one of the people taken in by this deception.

CHAPTER FIVE

Lore And Loose Ends: A Discussion of German Saucers Sources

Sources and References

1. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 158
2. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 137, 156-157
3. United states Strategic Air Forces In Europe, Office Of The Director Of Intelligence, 1944, "An Evaluation Of German Capabilities In 1945"
4. Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice File Number 65-57183, "Patent Verwertungs Gesellschaft Espionage", American Embassy, London
5. Hogg, I. V., 1970, page 48, German Secret Weapons Of World War 2, Arco Publishing Company, Inc., New York
6. Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice, File Number 65-57193, "Patent Verwertungs Gesellschaft Espionage", American Embassy, London
7. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 156-157
8. Vesco, Renato, 1976, pages 134-135
9. ibid
10. Moore, W. L., date unknown, page number not specified in publication, " #4510 Research File Project "y" and the 'Avro' Flying Disc", W. L. Moore Publications, Burbank, California

11. Campagna, Palmiro, 2000, pages 74 and 75, "Nazi UFO? Released documents increase speculation that Nazis did research disc technology", Article from UFO Magazine, United Kingdom

12. Luftfahrt International, 1975, page 1366, "Deutsche Flugkreisel Gab's die?

13. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 145

14. Lyne, William R., 1999, pages 206-207, Space Aliens, Creatopia Productions, Lamy, New Mexico

15. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 157

16. Zollikofer, Otto, February 3, 1955,"Die Fliegenden Teller Ein Deutungsversuch", an article appearing in the Neue Zuercher Zeitung

17. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 134

18. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 158

19. ibid

20. ibid

21. Vesco, Renato, 1976, page 145

22. Landig, Wilhelm, 1971, page 27, Goetzen Gegen Thule, Volksturm Wilhelm Landig, Vienna, Austria

23. ibid

24. Piccard, George, 1999, Liquid Conspiracy JFK, LSD. The CIA, Area 51. And UFOs. Adventures Unlimited Press, Kempton, Illinois

25. Cook, Nick, 2001, page 188, The Hunt For Zero Point One Man's Journey To Discover The Biggest Secret Since The Invention Of The Atom Bomb. The Random House Group Limited, 20 Vauxhall Bridge Road, London, SW1V 2SA

26. Cook, Nick, 2001, page 195

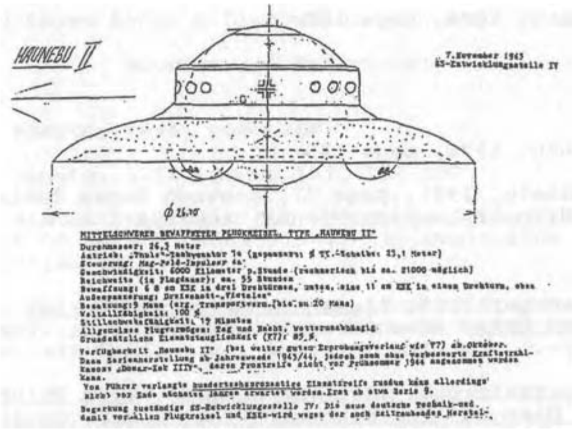
27. Cook, Nick, 2001, page 194

28. Cook, Nick, 2001, page 192

29. Cook, Nick, 2001, page 198

30. Stoll, Axel Ph.D., 2001, page 12, Hochtechnologie Im Dritten Reich Reichsdeutsche Entwicklungen und die vermutlich wahre Herkunft der "UFOs" . Amun-Verlag, Schleusesiedlung 2, D-98553

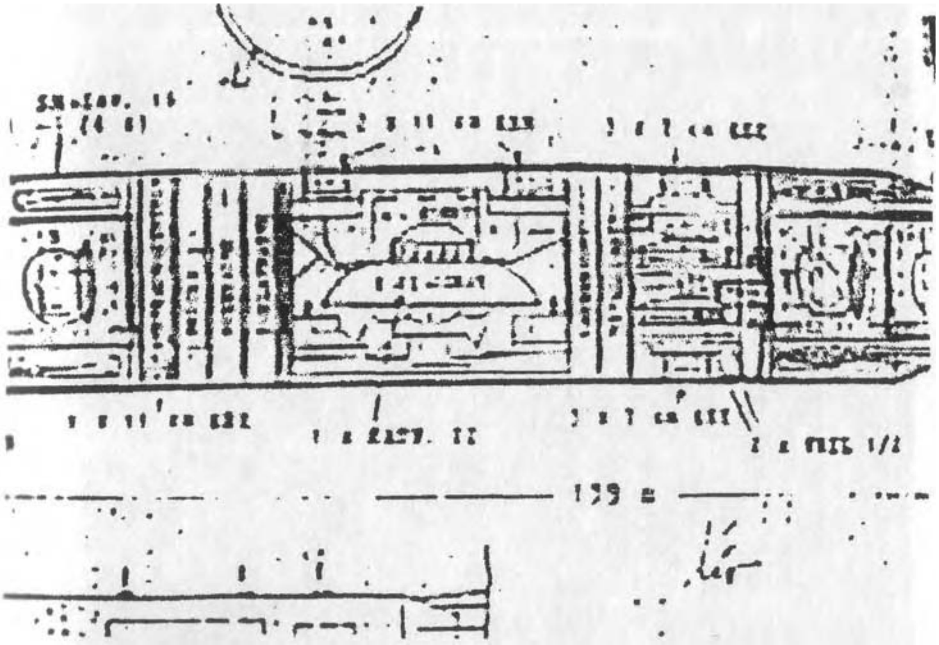
31. Stoll, Axe., Ph.D., 2001, pages 106 and 107.
32. ibid
33. Feinberg, Gerald, 1977, What Is The World Made Of?. Anchor Press/Doubleday, Garden City, New York



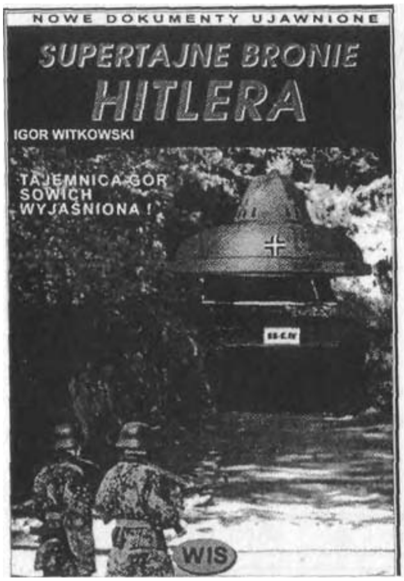
HAUNEBU II
7. November 1943
SS-Entwicklungsstelle IV
ϕ 25,10

Alleged photocopy of SS plans for a Haunebu II being designed in 1943. From the German book Die Dunkle Seite Des Mondes (The Dark Side of the Moon) by Brad Harris (1996, Pandora Books, Germany).

SS-Grupenfuhrer Hans Kammler circa 1944. He was alledgedly in charge of the Polish saucer bases.

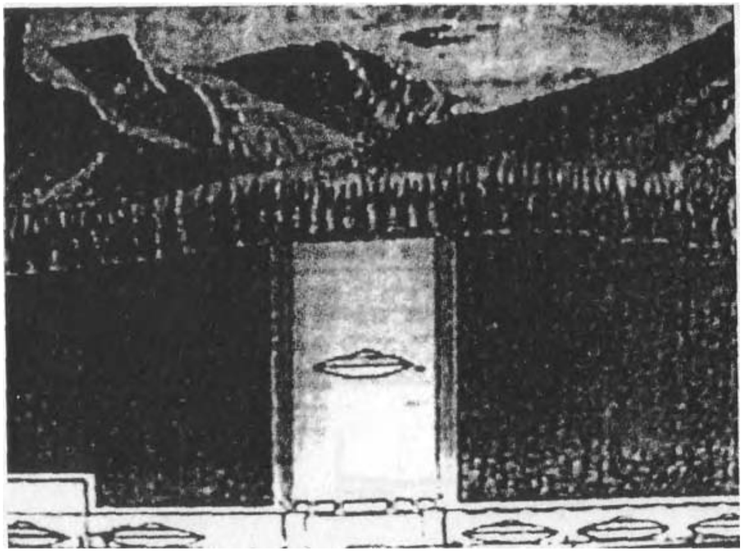


Internal plans for a "mothership" craft called "Andromeda," according to Polish historian Igor Witkowski.

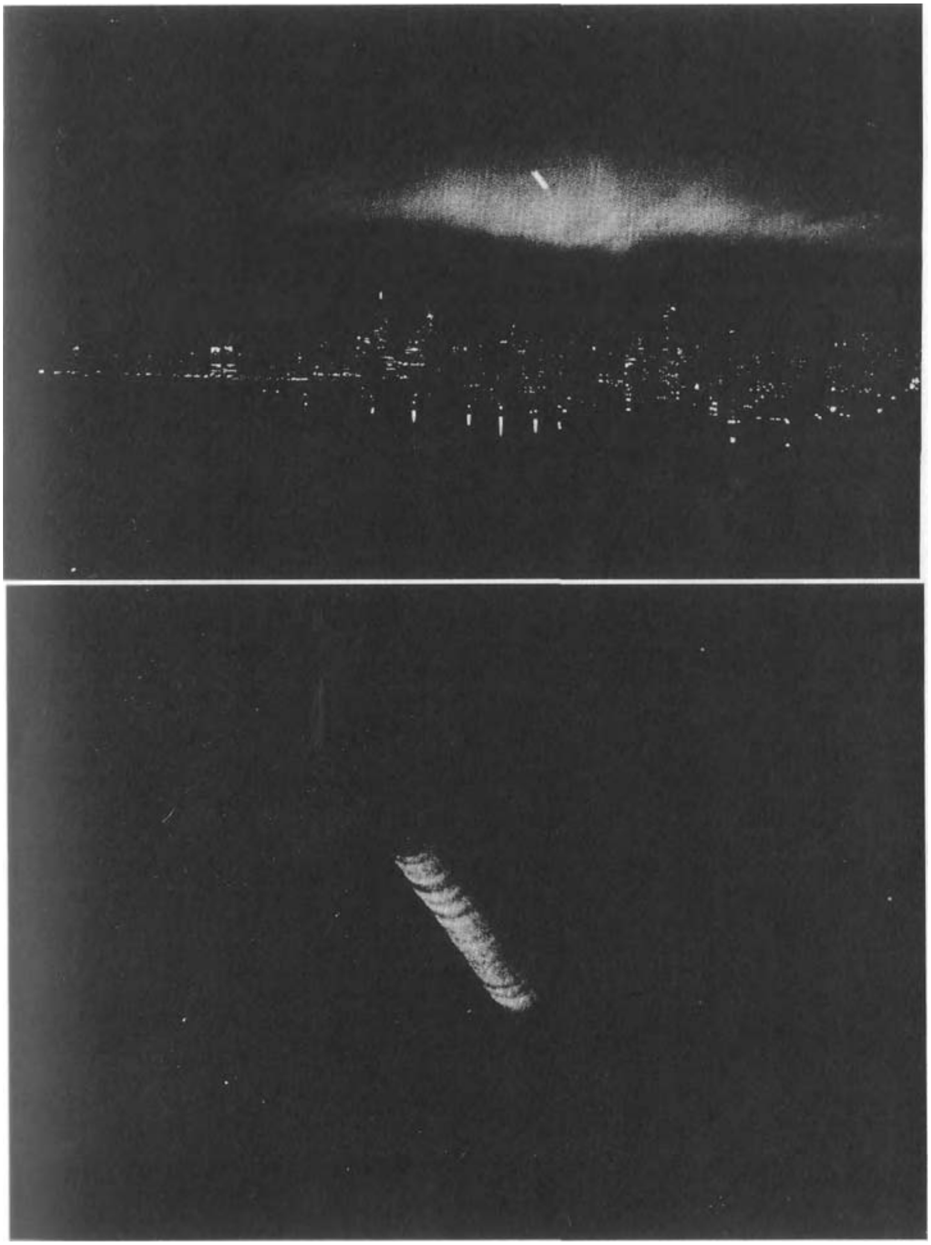


NOWE DOKUMENTY UJAWNIONE
SUPERTAJNE BRONIE
HITLERA
IGOR WITKOWSKI
TAJEMNICA GÓR SOWICH WYJAŚNIONA !
WIS

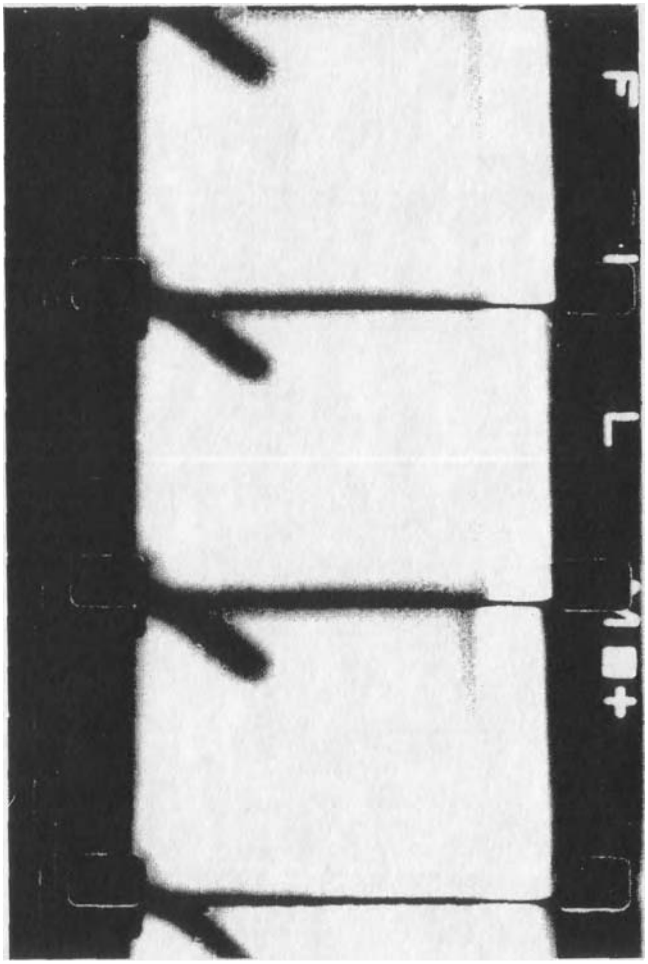
One of the books on "Hitler's Super Weapons" by Polish military historian Igor Witkowski.



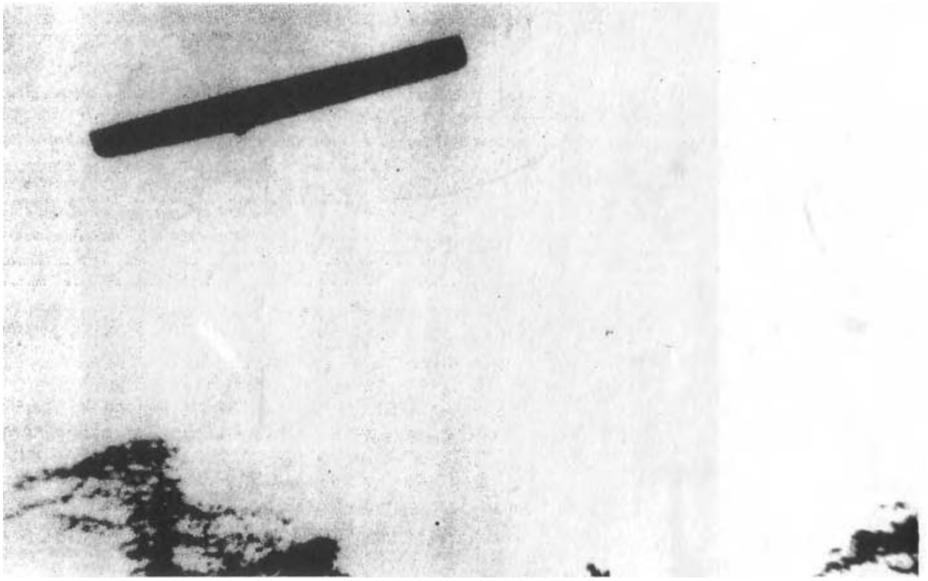
German plans for an underground saucer base, according to Polish historian Igor Witkowski.



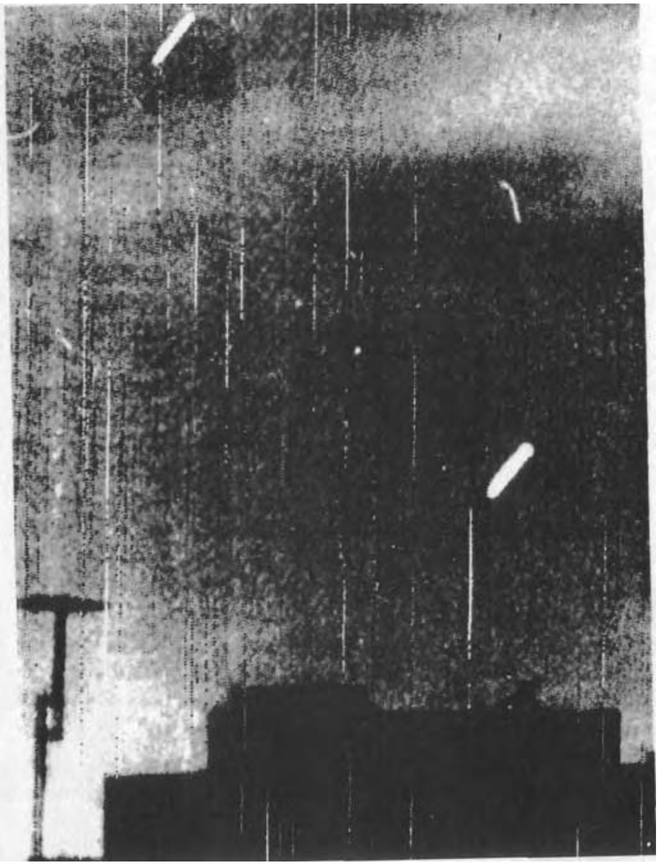
Above: Photos from the Project Blue Book files of a cylindrical UFO that hovered over New York City on March 20, 1950. The military suggested that it was possibly "the Moon." The photographer's name was deleted from the Project's files, as were most of the names when the material was finally declassified and released. These are some of the best photographs of a cylindrical UFO, thought to be a "Mothership" that would launch flying saucers.



Above: Project Blue Book examined this gun-camera film footage from Victorville, California taken on February 2, 1953. It apparently shows a cylindrical "Mothership" in flight.



A classic cigar-shaped UFO allegedly seen by Joe Ferriere near Woonsocket, Rhode Island in the early 1950s. Ferriere claimed that a dome-shaped object, which he also photographed, emerged from the creaft. Observers have pointed out that craft is remarkable for its ability to absorb light, being almost completely non-reflective.



Above: Two cylindrical objects were photographed in a one-minute exposure hovering over Buenos Aires, Argentina in 1965. They remained stationary over the city for 10 minutes and then departed at very high speed according to witnesses.

CHAPTER SIX:

"SONDERBUERO"

CHAPTER SIX

"Sonderbuero"

A topic worthy of discussion is the alleged German agency called "Sonderbuero" or Special Bureau. Sonderbuero is sometimes also referenced by a sub-bureau working within it called "Operation Uranus" or "U-13". In the past, debate has centered around the reality of Sonderbuero. Discussion of Sonderbuero or Sonderbuero-13 have been made recently by Juergen-Ratthofer (1), and Zunneck (2).

There is no real record of Sonderbuero in official sources. Searches have been made in Germany as well as in the U.S.A. under provisions of the Freedom Of Information Act. All inquiries came back with negative results. This, however, may not be the final word on the subject. German sources may be classified or buried within another designation. The American Freedom Of Information Act is something less than advertised as anyone ever attempting to use these provisions knows full well.

Rather than get "official" about Sonderbuero, please let me relate what is said about it, its relation to this story and to the history of UFOs as a whole. With this information the reader can make up his or her own mind about the subject.

It is said that in Germany during the war there was a quest to make Germany independent of outside energy sources. An organization was formed to investigate things we would now call "alternative energy". This included, among other things, the making of synthetic fuel and lubricants out of coal using a special process which was perfected by the Germans during the war. But it may have, and probably did, included other, more exotic, research encompassing into such topics as nuclear energy and possibly even "free energy" or "new energy".

A spin off of this research was said by Juergen-Ratthofer to have yielded field propulsion. Research toward this end was said to have been conducted by Sonderbuero. About this time strange things were taking to the skies in Germany. To keep a lid on publicity, the following scenario is cited by Juergen-Ratthofer to have been employed (3).

Germany was surrounded by enemies and their agents permeated much of the German war effort. The Germans needed to get control over what was accidently seen by spies. To do this they enlisted the help of an unwitting German civilian population. An attempt was consciously made by Sonderbuero to "spin" reports of these sightings as they came in from civilian sources. A sub-department was set up within Special Bureau which sent out orders, countrywide, that all sightings of unusual flying craft be reported directly to that office and not discussed or publicized.

So while a German governmental agency is doing research and testing on unconventional aircraft, at this same time the same agency is gathering reports from the citizenry on sightings of unconventional aircraft. In order to confuse and disguise real testing from the Allies or their agents in Germany, a spin could be put on those sightings describing them as something other than what they were. Of course, all this time, the German civilians are believing the point is to observe and report Allied secret spy aircraft or other Allied secret weaponry. The Allied intelligence agencies may have even bought into this ruse. Remember, this was a German operation to fool its own people and so envelope Allied intelligence gathering organizations in this deception. This was done very subtly and very cleverly.

But what evidence do we really have that this actually occurred? After all, there is no official mention on Sonderbuero. Perhaps there is an overall picture. Let us see if we can find a pattern. After cessation of hostilities the Allies, especially the Americans, seized every piece of German technology they could lay their hands on. They also seized every scientist, manager, and technician having anything to do with the German scientific community, military, or intelligence service. The hardware was analyzed and the personnel interviewed. In some cases both were taken to America for further study.

The technology was reconstructed and further developed. In America the latest German jet technology made its appearance five years later in the Korean War. America got its hands on the V-l which was further developed into the cruise missile. America got the v-2 which was further developed into intercontinental ballistic missiles and into our space program culminating in our landing on the moon. America got the V-3, the high pressure cannon, further developed by Dr. Gerald Bull into Iraq's super cannon, which, after being pointed at Israel was the real trigger for the Gulf War. And America got at least part of the German saucer program, the outcome of which was the Silver Bug Program, the Lenticular Reentry Vehicle project recently disclosed under pressure of the Freedom Of Information Act, and the UFO activity reported at Area 51. There are probably other examples which are, as of yet, undisclosed. Many other examples of technology transfer exist but the point need not be belabored.

America received more than just technical assistance from the Germans. For example, they received the services of General Reinhard Gehlen, former intelligence chief of the German Army General Staff on the eastern front. Gehlen turned over to the Americans his entire spy apparatus, giving a then blinded America an eye into Soviet military objectives. Further, he set up and modernized our intelligence apparatus, culminating in the C.I.A., as a means to counter the Soviet threat. This spy effort was massive but please keep it in mind as we turn our attention to something smaller and seemingly less significant.

As mentioned, in the 1950s the United States Air Force was busy developing and testing flying saucers derived from captured German technology. Of course, the Air Force wanted it to remain a secret project, after all, we were involved in a Cold War. Given this problem might the Americans have asked the question as they always did: How did the Germans do this? If they did they would have formed, as an adjunct to the secret saucer programs, a program to gather material on all civilian sightings of strange unidentified flying objects, under the cover of national security, as if an external threat existed. This agency would have then been in a position to "explain" or spin the data so as not to alarm the populace while still maintaining secrecy concerning its own projects.

As the reader may have surmised by now, this is exactly what the united States Air Force did so successfully in the form of Project Blue Book and its predecessors. The Air Force experimented on flying saucers on one hand while gathering reported sightings from civilians on the other hand, spinning and manipulating the information according to dictates of their agenda.

When viewed in this perspective, the similarity between Sonderbuero and Project Blue Book is striking. Is not the greatest evidence for the existence of Sonderbuero the American pattern of imitation which infiltrated all post-war intelligence work? The only real guestion is whether the Germans originated the term "swamp gas" or if this was an American embellishment.

Although not central to our discussion, one might ask why, if it was successful, why was Project Blue Book suspended? Remember that the Americans tried to further develop German ideas. In this case the solution was so imaginative and uniquely American that the Pentagon must have resounded with the reverberation of back-slapping and belly laughs at its implementation.

Remember Mark Twain's tale of Tom Sawyer whitewashing the picket fence? Instead of being compelled to an afternoon of drudgery, Tom pretended to his friends that this work was play. Not only did he enlist them to do the painting, but his friends were so eanger to help paint that they paid Tom to do this work.

The United States Air Force followed this paradigm. They infiltrated an existing civilian intelligence gathering organization researching UFOs. They did this at no cost to the United States Air Force or any other governmental intelligence service. There were no official records, and no accounting trail. And best of all those doing the work and volunteering the intelligence would pay for the privilege in the form of dues to maintain the organization. If there is any question in the reader's mind as to whether MUFON (Mutual UFO Network) has been co-opted, ask yourself this question: would the intelligence services of the United States government allow the largest civilian intelligence gathering agency in the world to operate within its purview without at least monitoring it? Of course the answer is a resounding "no". This is one reason why MUFON is allowed to remain in operation within the USA without attempts to discredit it.

Given this sophisticated government intervention, would it not be a simple matter not only to manipulate the incoming sightings data, but to spin and confuse the debate concerning the origins of UFOs, even setting the agenda for the entire inquiry? Perhaps this is the reason MUFON has taken such a negative view of terrestrially originating UFOs and of the German origin of UFOs in particular. In the early 1990s, this writer was told via telephone from his home in Texas by the head man of MUFON himself that: "We investigated that a long time ago and found nothing to it". The "that" referred to was German saucers.

As an aside, he further went on to say that the idea of a German origin would for UFOs would not even be on the table for discussion if it were not for one, Vladimir Terziski, who, "is the guy pushing it", to directly quote this individual. Mr. Terziski has formed his own ideas about German saucers which he has never been afraid to share, and, to his undying credit, he stood up and lectured on this topic to the faces of MUFON in the very temples of the alien world, UFO conferences, worldwide. Mr. Terziski, almost alone, forced these facts into those conferences and subsequently forced all those UFO magazines to deal with the subject of German flying discs. And although he never got credit for it, he also supplied the technical assistance for a world famous Japanese television producer to bring an hour of this German saucer story to Japan in prime-time. Mr. Terziski, almost single-handedly, opened up two continents to this UFO reality.

MUFON's successful existence is tied to their implicit and explicit assumptions of UFOs as alien machines. The greatest appeal the extraterrestrial hypothesis has for the government is that this hypothesis is simply not testable. MUFON does not even try to test anything. Instead, they chase sightings. They train their followers to take meaningless celestial measurements accompanying these sightings and then analyze this "data" into gibberish. MUFON then lends itself to endless rambling speculation involving increasingly more exotic alien scenarios.

It is not MUFON's rank and file membership which is to blame. The individuals I have met are honest and sincere as are 99% of all the participants in the quest to understand these mysterious flying objects. Their methods may stimulate UFO interest and UFO enthusiasts but it utterly fails to advance our quest for knowledge about these devices. This is perfectly alright with the behind the scenes government manipulators, however, since this result is their real goal. It is unknown to what extent the Americans have succeeded in improving and further developing the original German saucers. The extent to which they have succeeded in further developing Sonderbuero, however, should be apparent to all.

CHAPTER SIX

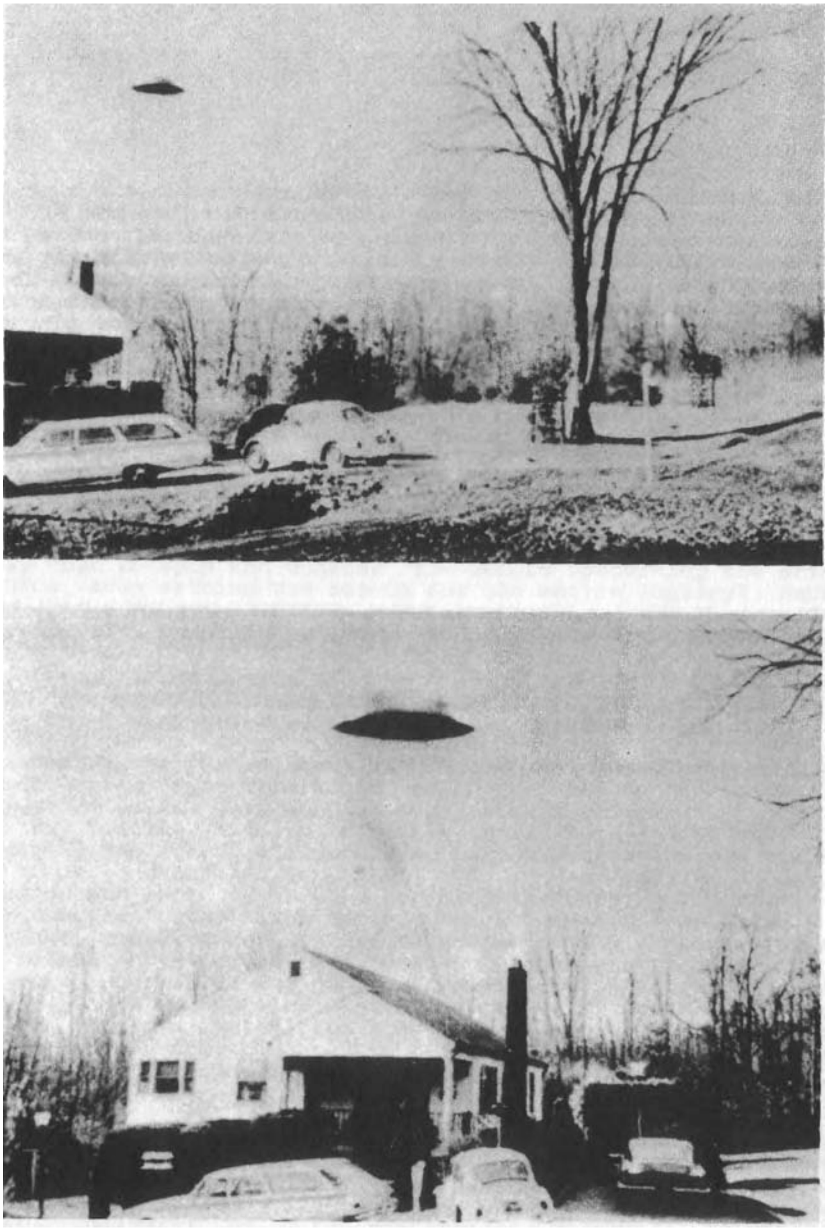
"Sonderbuero"

Sources and References

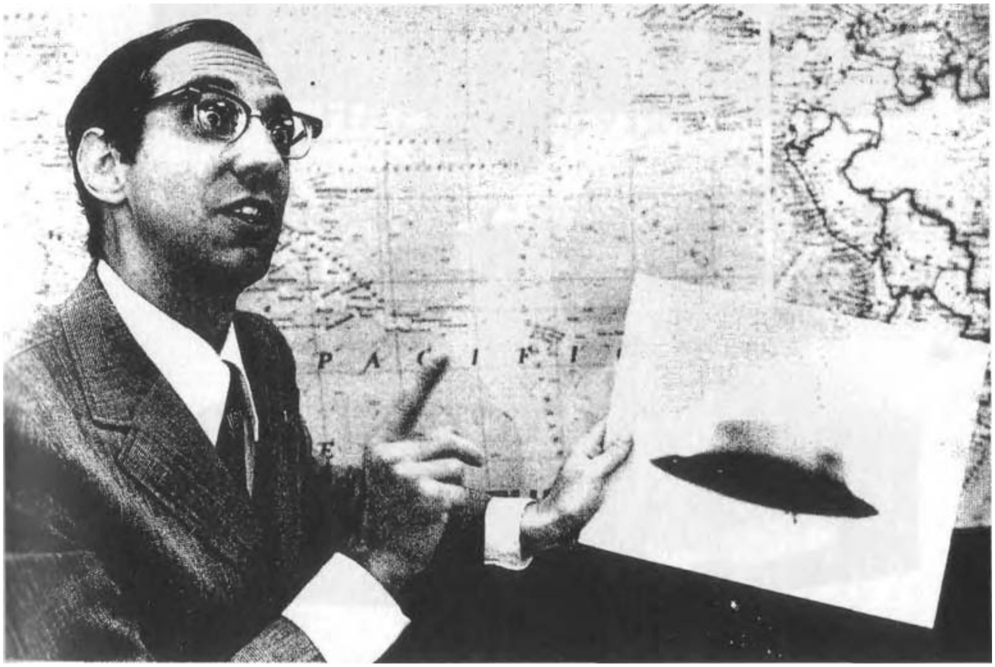
1. Juergen-Ratthofer, Norbert, 1993, page 63, Das Vril Proiekt, Dr. Michael Daemboeck Verlag, Ardaggr, Austria

2. Zunneck, Karl-Heinz, 1998, page 125, Geheimtechnologien, Wunderwaffen Und Irdischen Facetten Des UFO-Phaenomens, CTT-Verlag, Suhl, Germany

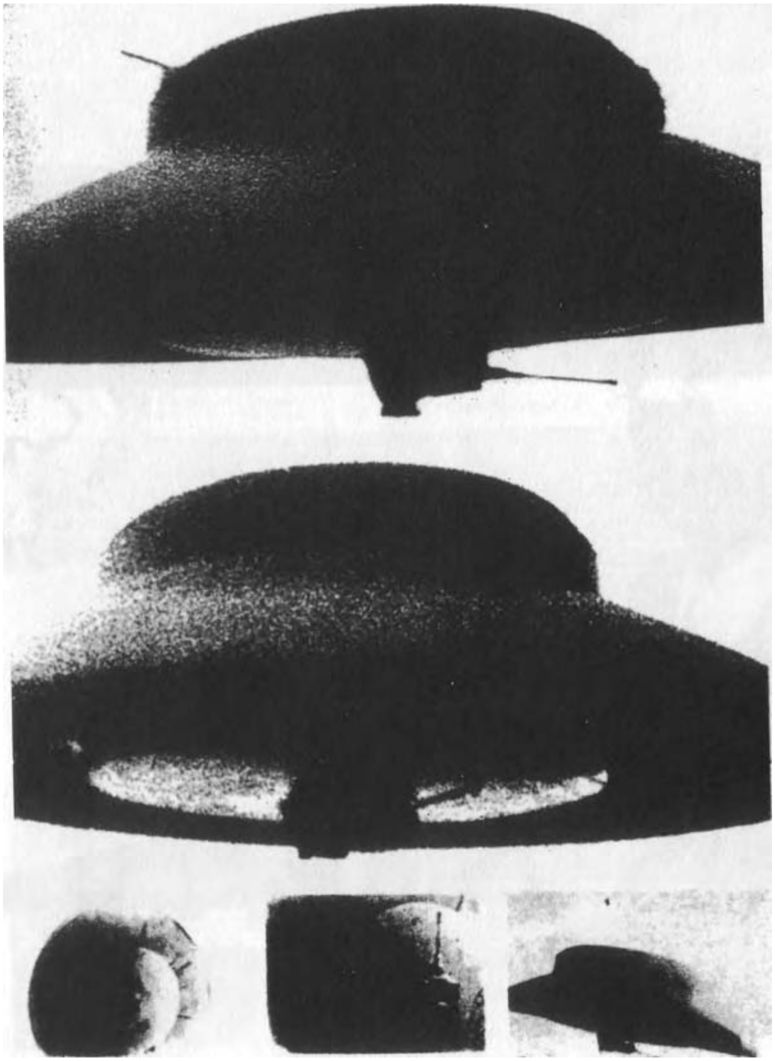
3. Juergen-Ratthofer, Norbert, 1993, page 63



Two photos taken by a barber named Ralph Ditter, in Zanesville, Ohio on November 13, 1966. Ditter was leaving home with his camera when he chanced to look back and saw the UFO over his house. He took two exposures within a short period of time of the helmet-like craft, with an apparent "canon" on the underside of the craft. Ditter did not seek publicity but put them in his shop window to stimulate business. Eventually a news service bought them and they were widely published. The object is similar to the "Heflin UFO" and is said to be an original German design with a Panzer Tank canon mounted beneath it. Such a craft at such a late date would tend to indicate that this was not a captured test craft but rather a "renegade craft" possibly from South America as late as 1966.



Above: Aerospace expert Stuart Nixon, executive director of the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP), which was founded in Washington, DC, in 1956 to conduct a civilian study of UFOs. Note the apparent "cannon barrel" beneath the craft.



Alleged photos from SS files of a Haunebu II in flight circa 1944. Note the Panzer tank canon mounted underneath the craft. From the German book Die Dunkle Seite Des Mondes (The Dark Side of the Moon) by Brad Harris (1996, Pandora Books, Germany).

CHAPTER SEVEN:

DISPOSITION OF GERMAN SAUCER TECHNOLOGY AFTER THE WAR

CHAPTER SEVEN

Disposition of German Saucer Technology After the War

The question arises as to what ever became of the saucer designs and saucer designers referred to in this discussion? For some there are easy answers. For others, there whereabouts after the war is more clouded.

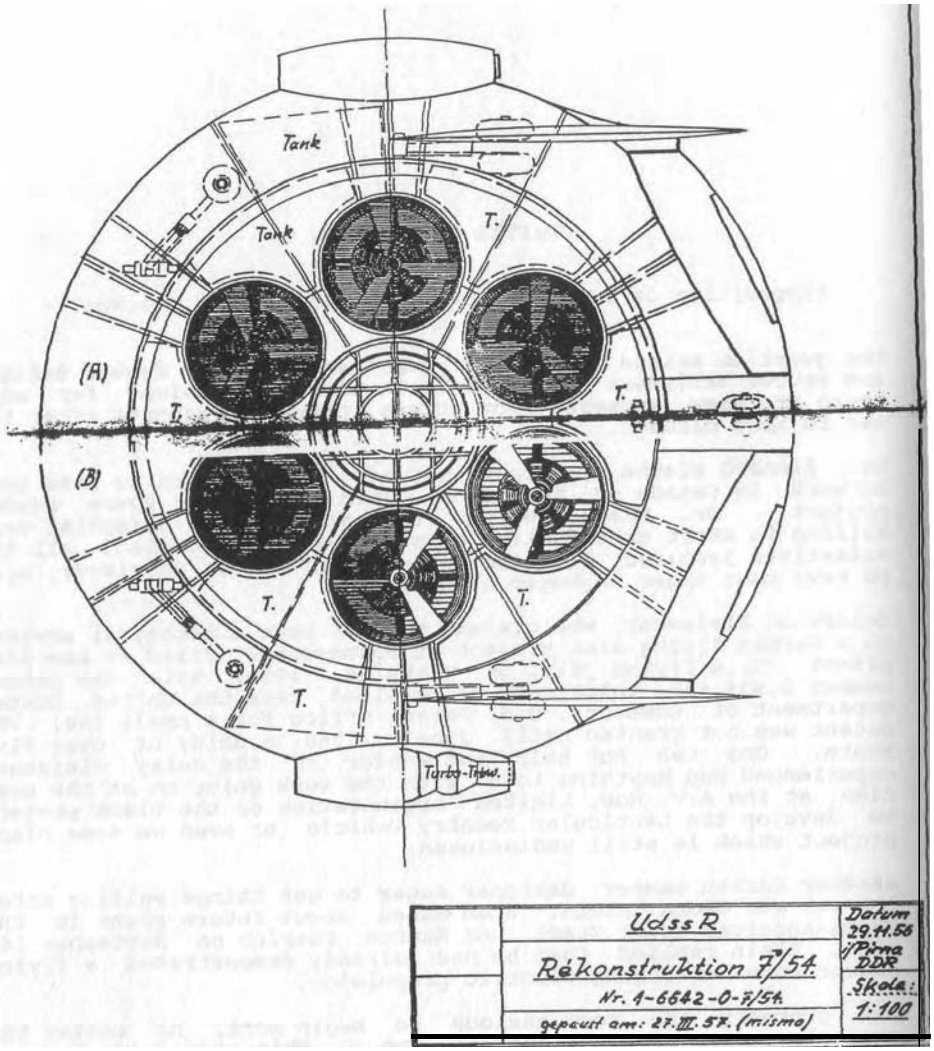
Dr. Richard Miethe, for instance, has been rumored to have gone to work in Canada on the joint Canadian-U.S. Air Force saucer project. Dr. Miethe is not the only German scientist very willing to start construction on a post-war flying disc. All the scientists involved, with the exception of Rudolf Schriever, seem to have been eager to begin at once.

Heinreich Fleissner, who claimed to have been a technical advisor on a German flying disc project at Peenemuende, filed an American patent for a flying disc on March 28, 1955. This was patent number 2,939,648 which can be obtained from the United States Department of Commerce, U.S. Patent Office for a small fee. The patent was not granted until June 7, 1960, a delay of over five years. One can not help but wonder if the delay Fleissner experienced had anything to do with the work going on at the same time at the A.V. Roe, Limited organization or the black project to develop the Lenticular Reentry Vehicle or even on some black project which is still undisclosed.

Another German saucer designer eager to get things rolling after the war was Georg Klein. When asked about future plans in the Tages-Anzeiger fuer Stadt und Kanton Zuerich on September 18, 1954, Klein replied that he had already demonstrated a flying saucer model utilizing electric propulsion.

But probably the most anxious to begin work, no matter the obstacles, was Joseph Andreas Epp. This is said because according to government files, which were first located by researcher Mark Kneipp, Epp went so far as to enlist in the Soviet flying saucer project which began immediately after the war in East Germany using former German scientists (1).

Post-War Soviet "German" Saucer



Tank
Tank
T.
T.
(A)
T.
(B)
T.
T.
T.
Turbo-Triebw.
UdssR
Rékonstruktion 7/54.
Nr. 4-6642-0-7/54.
gepaust am: 27.III.57. (mismo)
Datum
29.11.56
i/Pirna
DDR Skala:
1:100

After the war J. Andreas Epp worked briefly for the Soviets along with other German experts on a flying saucer. This is a drawing he made of the Soviet saucer. It was to be used in the polar regions.

According to this F.B.I. file which was secluded by the National Archives, Epp became disenchanted with the Soviets after working for them for about a year. He then defected to the West. Epp re-drew their designs from his seemingly photographic memory. He provided detailed test and technical specifications, including his apparent area of specialty, the steering linkage system. His comments were that the type of flying craft being built for the Soviets was especially designed for polar conditions.

After settling in Bavaria, Epp continued design work on flying discs himself. He designed the "Omega Disc" which is remarkably similar to the Soviet design. Epp was very interested in working for Bell Aircraft, builders of the X-l which broke the sound barrier in 1947. Epp sent me copies of correspondence with Dr. Walter Dornberger, at this time executive of Bell Aircraft, who, at one time was Dr. Wernher von Braun's boss at Peenemuende. Epp did mention the flying saucer in this correspondence. Nothing came of it, however. To his death in 1997, Andreas Epp was still trying to realize this dream of building a flying saucer.

These are the stories of saucer designers of which we know something. There were others of which we have completely lost track. Otto Habermohl is one of these. Habermohl was presumed captured by the Soviets. This presumption seems to be solely based on the fact that he disappeared after the capture of Prag.

What about the post-war disposition of the flying saucers themselves? We know, for instance, that examples were destroyed by the Germans so the advancing Allies would not benefit from them. This very thing happened to saucers designed by the Schrlever-Habermohl team at Prag. The scorched earth policy was a standing solution and ruthlessly imposed by the SS, especially concerning German high technology. Yet we all know flying saucers did not disappear after the collapse of Germany, as a matter of fact quite the contrary. Michael X. Barton tells us that their earliest appearance was not over the State of Washington in 1947 as usually given but in South America. In fact, there were many sightings of UFOs in South America during this post-war time frame. Latin American sightings continue to this day.

South America is a long way from the USA. Even if the Americans were experimenting with captured German technology at that time, the sightings from other parts of the world can not be explained as originating from the USA. There must be more at work here.

Could die-hard Nazis have exported this technology to a stronghold in the Antarctic or Andes as some often claim? Or did these craft appear from "Beaver Dam", a secret German base on the east coast of Greenland as disclosed by Dr. Jesensky and Mr. Lesniakiewicz (2). Was part of this technology appropriated by the British and further developed in Canada as stated by Renato Vesco? Or was this technology completely absorbed by the USA in a secret deal with Admiral Karl Doenitz after Hitler's death as stated by Bill Lyne (3)?

In the first of the aforementioned possibilities, these die-hard Nazis and their technology, including saucers, are sometimes called the "Third Power" by German writers on the subject. The Third Power is meant to signify a power besides the West (the First Power) or the East (the Second Power). The Third Power allegedly operates in secret as regards the general population of this planet but is very well known to the First and Second Powers. The sole reason the Third Power has survived is their high technology and high finance both of with resulted from picking clean the bones of the Third Reich. The story is as follows and at least some of it is factual.

It is known that the Germans made contingency plans for the war's loss. On August 10, 1944, nine months before the war in Europe ended, a meeting was called at the hotel Rotes Haus in Strassbourg. In attendance were representatives of all the major German industrial concerns including I.G. Farben, Thyssen, Siemens, Krupp, Daimler-Benz, Rheinmetall-Borsig, as well as representatives of the major German banks. Meeting with them were members of the SS. They were planning measures which would insure their survival after the coming German defeat (4).

Scientists, scientific plans, strategic materials, and money were to be taken from Germany and secured in secret hiding places. Long range cargo aircraft were to fly from Germany to Spain carrying the goods. From here items were to be loaded on to U-boats bound for South America. It is possible that other destinations were also planned such as Japan and the Antarctic base original established in 1938-1939 by the Ritcher Antarctic Expedition.

Surprisingly, the Ritcher Antarctic Expedition (1037-38) was set up and funded by Hermann Goering, head of the German Air Force. The ship Schwabenland, equipped with amphibious aircraft which could be launched via catapult explored, mapped and claimed a large portion of the Antarctic Continent for Germany during this expedition. Weighted metal flags were dropped from these aircraft clearly delineating the territory in which Germany was claiming. The territory included ice-free lakes which were naturally heated from below by geothermal means (5). Along the line of these lakes a huge fault line bisects "Neuschwabenland", as it was called, so presumably a permanent heat source was built into this new territory. One German writer has perused reports of Neuschwabenland and states that during the war repeated trips were made to this vicinity at which time a permanent base was established there (6). Another writer, Wilhelm Landig, in novel form, describes this and other secret post-war German bases in Antarctica, the Andes as well as a secret polar base near the North Pole (7). Mr. Landig recently died and it is now known that he was a Third Reich insider and knew of which he wrote. As mentioned earlier, it is now known that Landig was a member of the Waffen SS and at one time was responsible for security for the development of German saucers (8). He knew that of which he spoke. His books each bore the sub-title "Ein Roman voller Wirklichkeiten" or "a novel filled with realities" as this novel treatment was an easy avenue in avoiding post-war legal entanglements.

Through the descriptions of the writers mentioned and other records it is possible to pinpoint the location of these secret German bases in Antarctica as well as a large Andean base in Chile. Bill Lyne as well as Mr. Robert Lesniakiewicz and Dr. Milos Jesensky state that a mysterious polar base existed in Greenland (9) (10). The latter writers cite the coast of eastern Greenland and cite a code-name which translates into "Beaver Dam", complete with underwater U-boat entrances.

The Antarctic base was first attacked by forces of many nations, led by the United States, in a 1946 military action code-named "Operation High Jump". This operation involved a fleet of ships, including an aircraft carrier, submarines and support craft. It also involved aircraft and four thousand armed troops under the command of Admiral Richard Byrd. Immediately four aircraft were mysteriously lost and the whole operation, scheduled for six months duration, was canceled after less than six weeks (11) (12).

The Antarctic base, Landig's Point 211 (13), was in operation until the late 1950s when it became the subject of an American nuclear "test". In this test three bombs were detonated under cover of the International Geophysical Year 1957-58 (14). Landig claims the type of rockets used in the "test" to attack Point 211 were prototypes of the American Polaris missile, a solid-fuel rocket which was used later operationally, the final design being fired from submarines underwater (15). Detonation of these atomic weapons over the base generated electromagnetic shock waves which, it was hoped, would destroy apparatus in the base used for defensive purposes (16). Landig claims this tactic failed. The electromagnetic pulse attack was insufficient to destroy the improved apparatus (17). Both "High Jump" and this 1957-58 attack turned out not only to be a fiasco, but to be superfluous. The greater part of the German forces had already abandon the Antarctic base in favor of a base in the South American Andes.

Landig claims that the reason for its abandonment was the purity of the atmosphere in the Antarctic which is almost germ-free (18). It seems that the human immune system needs constant challenge to remain healthy even if this challenge does not always result in illness. Without a constant influx of visitors supplying this challenge, the staff on-hand lost almost all immunity to infection after a few years. The common cold became a serious matter.

As mentioned earlier, writers Dr. Milos Jesensky and Robert Lesniakiewicz see the origin of flying saucers over the USA during the late 1950s as coming from a forgotten German facility called "Beaver Dam" in Eastern Greenland. According to these writers, this base did not surrender with the fall of Germany but continued to function. It was from this base that flying saucers were directed to the USA on spy missions, especially toward our nuclear facilities in New Mexico. Additionally, one wonders if this base was the real origin of the ghost rockets seen moving south from Northwestern Europe immediately after the war. The status of this base today is unknown.

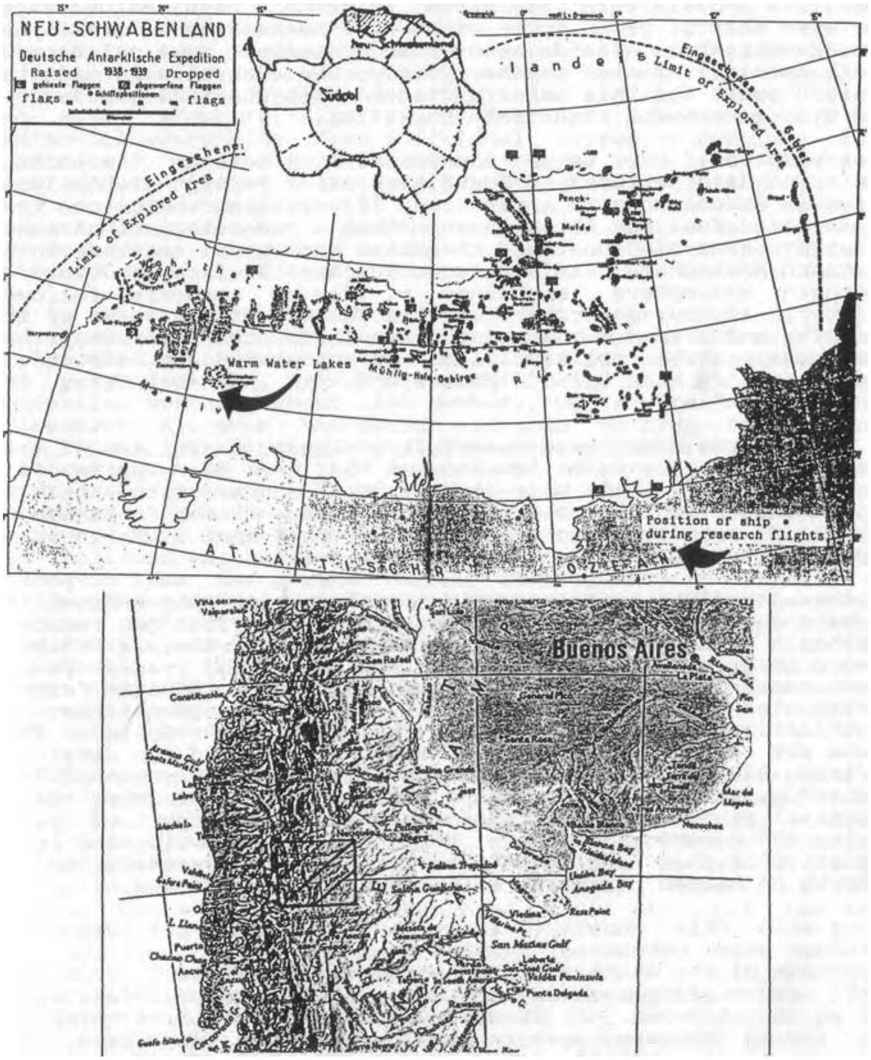
There is no doubt that the Germans had bases in the Arctic. German bases were located on Soviet soil, as well as the soil of Greenland which belonged to Denmark. Denmark had been overrun by the Germans early in the war. What is most surprising is that Landig's claim that the Germans maintained a base in the high Canadian arctic right under the noses of Canada and the USA (19).

Is this all fantasy? Is there any hard evidence for secret post-war German bases? Has a post-war German base ever been discovered? Yes, one has. New evidence for this exodus theory comes to us from the discovery of a German U-boat way-station in the Atlantic which had a hand in moving this clandestine cargo from Europe to the austral world well after the war, right into the 1950s. This information is revealed in an article in the July, 1984 issue of Nugget magazine titled "Der U-Boot Bunker von Fuerteventura" (20). Fuerteventura is the eastern most island of the Canary Island chain and lies just out of sight off the west coast of North Africa.

Geologically, the base was formed by an huge, ancient volcanic bubble around which the molten rock solidified in the center of the island. According to the article, the Germans brought in excavation equipment and bored out three tunnels for underwater access by U-boats. On top of the island, directly over the bubble and the military facility rested a villa with a stairway leading down to the base from the cellar. The villa was owed by a respectable German family, named Winter. This base functioned during the war as a secret U-boat base for the Germans. It continued this function after the war as a way-station for transport U-boats.

In our modern world of science and academic history this claim of lost islands and hidden bases sounds like something out of a Jules Verne fantasy. If such a base really existed, would we all not be aware of its existence above and beyond an obscure reference in a publication which mainly deals with treasure hunting?

Actually, most readers are already quite familiar with this particular base. This base was the truth behind the visual images of the German U-boat base situated in the volcanic island off the coast of Africa in the movie "Raiders of the Lost Ark". In fact, this aspect of the story was the only part of the movie which was factual.



NEU-SCHWABENLAND
Deutsche Antarktische Expedition
Raised 1938-1939 Dropped gehisste Flaggen
abgeworfene Flaggen Schiffspositionen flags
flags
Neu-Schwabenland
Südpol
Eingesehenes Gebiet
Limit of Explored Area
Eingesehenes Gebiet
Limit of Explored Area
Penck-
Mulde
Warm Water Lakes
Mühlig-Hofmann-Gebirge
Position of ship
during research flights
ATLANTISCHER OZEAN
Buenos Aires
Valparaiso
San Rafael
Constitución
La Plata
Santa Rosa
Salinas Grandes
Mar del Plata
Necochea
Neuquén
Bahía Blanca
Valdivia
Viedma
San Matías Gulf
Valdés Peninsula
Punta Delgada
Rawson
Puerto
Ancud

Top: Neuschwabenland (Antarctica). Bottom: "Colonia Dignedad" in Argentina near Chilean border comprising 25,000 quadratkilometers (over half as large as Switzerland)

The subterranean island base was actually visited by two eyewitnesses, according to the Nugget report. There, two derelict U-boats were discovered which had remained undetected for over thirty years. One of these U-boats was entered by the two adventurers. Inside they found detailed nautical maps of South America. To add to the mystery, the assertion is made that these U-boats and this base functioned with the full knowledge of the U.S. government right into the 1950s.

This base would have formed a physical link between the ports of Spain and destinations in South America. Perhaps even bridging bases in Greenland with Antarctica, if certain reports are true. It is also fuel for the argument that a technological transfer actually took place between the Third Reich and entities in the Southern Hemisphere. As surely as die-hard Nazis spread into the Southern Hemisphere sightings of flying saucers followed. Further, if the government of the United States knew of this transfer and these U-boat bases then there then there may have been some actual political link or understanding between the government of the United States and the post-war Nazis, the "Third Power".

If his words are read carefully, Landig's Point 211, the Antarctic base, can be located on the maps he supplies (21). Until, however, this base is visited and excavated and the evidence made public, this base along with the ones in Canada and Greenland constitute more speculation than fact. This is not true, however, in the South American situation.

In the immediate post-war world South America was a haven for Germans who could not stomach Occupied Germany for one reason or another. The political climate in these countries was favorable toward these refugees. Nazi gold and money was transferred to South America, particularly Argentina. Hunted Nazis found a market for their services in a variety of occupations. SS organizations set up shop as they had in Franco's Spain. These facts are hardly in dispute. They are covered in detail by Infield (22) as well as by Farago (23) a whole genre of "Nazi Hunter" writers. What is less often mentioned is that German technical people infused these countries with expertise gained during the Second World War. For instance, Argentina and Brazil had state-of-the- art jet fighters in the 1950s thanks to the efforts of German immigrant scientists and technicians.

Along with this monetary and technical transfer, large land holdings were purchased, secured and set aside with the full knowledge of the South American governments in power. From these vast secure areas members of these German organizations simply did as they pleased. It is not out of the question to think that the flying saucers seen in the late 1940s and 1950, both conventional and field propulsion, were built and flown from these bases. One of these Andean bases, referred to as "Colonia Dignidad" consisted a land area half the size of Switzerland (24). This is certainly more than enough room to develop hide anything.

The South American industrial base during these times was more than adequate to make these saucers. But even if this were not true, this is no argument against construction of flying saucers in South America. Parts could have been ordered from suppliers in other countries as are done by major aircraft firms today. Each major aircraft firm has a host of sub-contractors who manufacture everything from individual screws to complete sub-assemblies. Many if not most of these sub-contractors are accustomed to filling these orders without ever knowing what the final assembled product will be. This is part of the security system and unquestioned. Germans working in South America would have no trouble using this system. They could have even ordered parts and sub-assemblies from companies in Europe and the USA.

This is exactly what Dr. Gerald Bull did in Iraq when he built the largest of his high-pressure cannons for that country. This nearly mile long fixed gun was built resting on the slope of a hill pointed at Tel Aviv. It would have been able to shoot projectiles weighing about 1800 pounds. Parts were built by sub-contractors all over the world and sent to Iraq for assembly where it was nearly completed. The sub-contractors were lied to or otherwise kept in the dark as to the purpose of their components. It was only by chance that word of this project reached the hands of opposing intelligence services. The result was near panic in the intelligence services of these countries. What followed was the assassination of Dr. Gerald Bull and a diplomatic ruse which bated Saddam Hussein into an invasion of Kuwait. This invasion facilitated the entry of the Americans into the conflict. The high pressure cannon was destroyed immediately, even though it was pointed in the opposite direction from Kuwait. If this risky, bulky weapon's system could be almost completed using a system of unwitting sub-contractors world-wide, imagine how easily a one-off flying vehicle could be built using the same system.

Richard Ross, a UFO researcher based in Austin, Texas, reports to me that even today vast tracts of land in South America are avoided by airline pilots there because of UFO activity in these areas. He obtained this information by interviewing the South American airline pilots themselves. He goes on to make the point that Latin America is a hotbed of UFO activity. Reports of this activity for some reason never find their way into the main stream American news media.

There still remains one possible hiding place on European soil. There remains the possibility that German flying discs were flown to Switzerland during the last moments of the 3rd Reich and hidden there in the vast system of caves built there for defensive purposes by the Swiss. This would imply a limited partnership with the Swiss concerning a technology that neither country wanted to loose. In modern times we have witnessed something similar when Iraq flew its jet aircraft to Iran for safe keeping during the Gulf War. Iraq and Iran had been bitter enemies only a few years before but put these differences aside in order to save technology. If they could do it certainly the Germans and Swiss could do it also. One eye witness claims that he saw an experimental aircraft crossing the German border into Switzerland on the morning of May 9, 1945, the day after the surrender of the 3rd Reich (25). This same procedure could have taken place with even more exotic flying craft.

One of our most trusted sources, Renato Vesco believes that Canada was strongly involved in further developing captured German saucer technology. Vesco's belief seems to be that the British kept this information to themselves. That is, they did not share it with the United States. They did this in response to the latter's refusal to share atomic secrets with Great Britain. The British hid this research in the Canadian forests where they spent time and money developing it into the flying saucers of the 1950s. Somewhat related to this idea, the German researcher Klaus-Peter Rothkugel also believes post-war saucer research was the product of a massive and still-secret Anglo-American effort. Jim Wilson adds fuel to this fire in that there was apparently joint British-American-Australian involvement in the Lenticular Reentry Vehicle project (26).

Bill Lyne has another opinion. He believes all German saucer data was transferred to the government of the United States in a deal done with Admiral Karl Doenitz who was acting head of Germany for the week or so between the time Hitler shot himself in the bunker and Germany surrendered. Recently, Mark Kneipp has found some very interesting evidence which seems to support Mr. Lyne's sequence of events in this deal with Admiral Doenitz. This is one surprise I do not want to spoil so it will be left to Mr. Kneipp to reveal his research.

One real mystery remains absolutely untouched. This concerns the man who did know everything about Germany's saucer development and all its V-weaponry and other high technology for that matter. This was SS General and Doctor of Engineering Hans Kammler. Kammler first came to prominence because of his expertise in building extensive underground installations. Soon his high intelligence and "can do" attitude were recognized, resulting in a meteoric rise in rank and influence within the Third Reich. Kammler assembled the best of the best as far as weaponry was concerned and kept it close to him in the form of the Kammler Group, based at the Skoda industrial complexes near Prag. By war's end he was among the top five most powerful people in Germany. He had the entire SS technical organization to do his bidding. He was in charge of Peenemuende, "Der Riese" in modern Poland, Kordhausen, Kahla, the many facilities at the Jonas Valley in Thuringia, as well as the huge underground facility he built for himself in Austria. The Kammler Group was everywhere on the cutting edge of the cutting edge of applied technology. For instance it was the Kammler Group which was in the process of applying nuclear energy toward missile and aircraft propulsion (27).

What happened to Kammler? This was the most knowledgeable of all the German technical people. Even Albert Speer, German Minister of Munitions, admitted under Allied interrogation, that Kammler was the expert in the area of V-weapons development. This was no small admission for Speer. With the cessation of hostilities in Europe, Kammler simply waltzed off the pages of history, never to be seen or heard from again. Why, then, was there no post-war manhunt for Kammler? What are we missing here?

Tom Agoston recounts the stories of Kammler's death (28). There are five in all. They all read like pulp fiction. None are even remotely believable. As proof of this, no serious investigation was ever done into any of these stories by any of the Allied Powers. But equally shocking is the fact that Kammler was ignored by the "Nazi Hunter" aficionados. A quick call to the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles revealed that they were not looking for Kammler and have never looked for Kammler even though they fully agreed that the stories of his death stretched credulity. This, in spite of the fact that it was Kammler who was responsible for the many slave-labor camps, including Dora and S-3, where many inmates died working for the SS.

There is a sixth possible story for Kammler's demise. Could not the answer to this enigma be found in a practice commonly given to criminals in the USA, that of the "witness protection program"? Was Kammler given a new identity in exchange for his knowledge and knowledge of where the treasure-trove of SS technical information was stored? Actually, any country in the world at the time would have made Kammler this deal in a second. He was simply too technologically valuable to loose or to involve in a showcase criminal trial. A new identity was the best way out of his problems.

One thing is striking concerning the technological history of the Twentieth Century. The preponderance of that century's technology has its roots in the 1940s. The technology we use and take for granted today was invented or developed to the utilitarian degree during this time frame. These technological roots sink most deeply into Nazi Germany. In support of this argument, there is a laundry list too long to fully recount. It ranges from synthetic materials such as plastics and artificial rubber to metallurgy. It included the host of technologies which gave us the jet engine, rockets and so access to space travel. It includes atomic power. It also includes early semi-conductor research upon which our modern computer-based research, economy and communications are built. Technically speaking, we are still living off the Caracas of the Third Reich. Yet, still, to this day, much of that German technology remains veiled. Counted among this still-veiled technology are the German flying discs.

Disposition of German Saucer Technology After The War

Sources and References

1. Dossier/Joseph Andreas Epp, U.S. Army Intelligence, Record Group 319, The National Archives at College Park, College Park, Maryland.
2. Jesensky, Milos, Ph.D. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, page 143, "Wunderland" Mimozemske Technologie Treti Rise. Aos Publishing
3. Lyne, William R., 1999, page 48, Pentagon Aliens, Creatopia Publishing, Lamy, New Mexico
4. Infield, Brian, 1981, page 179, Skorzenv Hitler's Commando, St. Martin's Press, New York
5. Mattern, W., date unknown, page 79, UFO's Unbekanntes Flugobiekt? Letzte Geheimwaffe des Dritten Reiches?, Samisdat Publishing, Toronto, Canada
6. Bergmann, 0., 1988, page 14, 1 Deutsche Flugscheiben und U-Boote Ueberwachen Die Weltmeere. Hugin Gesellschaft Fuer Politisch-Philosophische Studiern E.V., Wetter/Ruhr
7. Landig, Wilhelm, 1971, Goetzen Gegen Thule Ein Roman voller Wirklichkeiten, Hans Pfeiffer Verlag GmbH. Hannover
8. Informationsdienst gegen Rechtexremismus, URL address: http://www.idgr.de/texte-1/esoterik/landig.htm
9. Lyne, William R., 1999, page 97
10. Jesensky, Milos, Ph.D. and Robert Lesniakiewicz, 1998, page 143
11. Buechner, Howard A. Col. and Bernhart, Wilhelm Capt., 1989, Hitler's Ashes, pages 229-232, Thunderbird Press, Inc., Metarie, Louisiana
12. Landig, Wilhelm, 1991, page 571, Rebellen Fuer Thule Das Erbe Von Atlantis, Voldstum-Verlag, Wien
13. ibid
14. ibid
15. Landig, Wilhelm, 1991, page 572
16. ibid
17. ibid

18. ibid

19. Landig, Wilhelm, 1971, pages 109-142

20. Nugget, July and August editions 1984, "Der U-Boot Bunker von Fuerteventura"

21. Landig, Wilhelm, 1980, pages 486-489, Wolfzeit Um Thule, Volksturm-Verlag Wilhelm Alndig, Wein

22. Infield, Glenn B., 1981, Skorzeny Hitler's Commando. St. Martin's Press, New York

23. Farago, Ladislas, 1974, Aftermath Martin Bormann and the Fourth Reich. Simon and Schuster, New York

24. Wilson, Harvey, 1994, "Hitlers Fluchtweg nach Argentinen", in Zeiten Schrift, Sept-Nov. 1994, Number 4, Berneck, Switzerland

25. Heppner, Siegfried, 1997, page 11, "Geheimnisse...dem Deutschen Volke", self-published, A-9142, Globasnich-Podjuna, Austria

26. Wilson, Jim, November 2000, page 71, "America's Nuclear Flying Saucer", Popular Mechanics

27. Agoston, Tom, 1985, pages 13, 83-84, 87, 129, Blunder How the U.S. Gave Away Nazi Supersecrets to Russia, Dodd Mead Company, Inc., New York

28. Agoston, Tom, 1985, pages 102-109

EYES ONLY

COPY ONE OF ONE.

SUBJECT: OPERATION MAJESTIC-12 PRELIMINARY BRIEFING FOR PRESIDENT-ELECT EISENHOWER.

DOCUMENT PREPARED 18 NOVEMBER, 1952.

BRIEFING OFFICER: ADM. ROSCOE H. HILLENKOETTER (MJ-1)

NOTE: This document has been prepared as a preliminary briefing only. It should be regarded as introductory to a full operations briefing intended to follow.

• • • • • •

OPERATION MAJESTIC-12 is a TOP SECRET Research and Development/Intelligence operation responsible directly and only to the President of the United States. Operations of the project are carried out under control of the Majestic-12 (Majic-12) Group which was established by special classified executive order of President Truman on 24 September, 1947, upon recommendation by Dr. Vannevar Bush and Secretary James Forrestal. (See Attachment "A".) Members of the Majestic-12 Group were designated as follows:

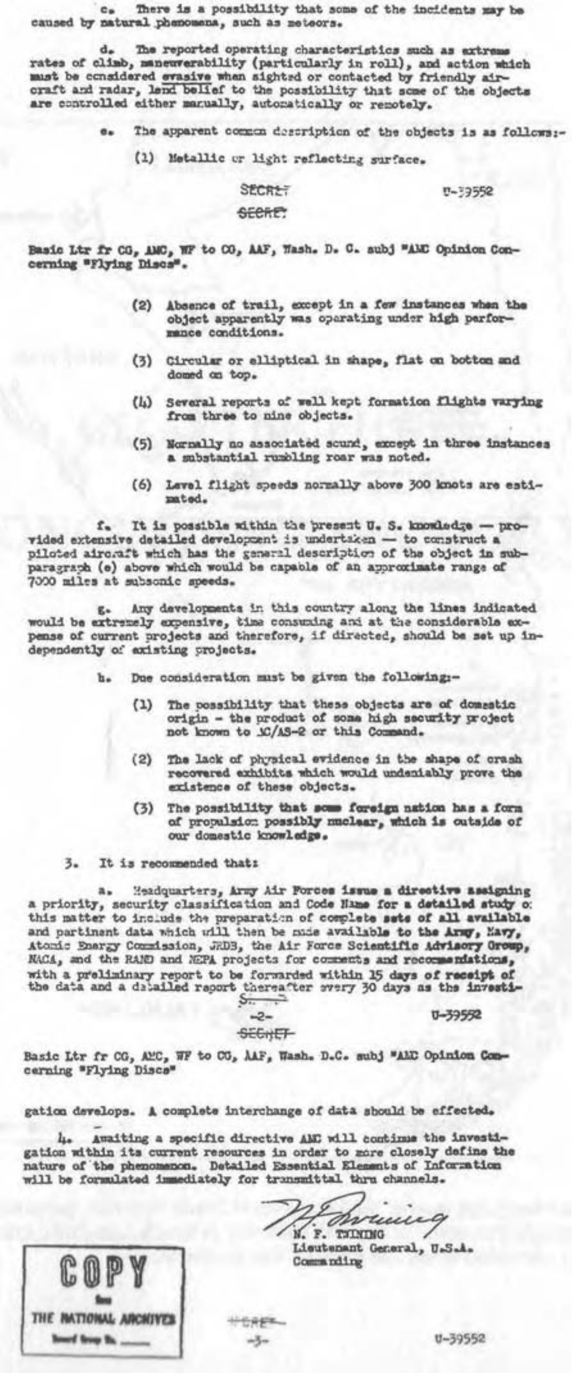
Adm. Roscoe H. Hillenkoetter
Dr. Vannevar Bush
Secy. James V. Forrestal*
Gen. Nathan F. Twining
Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg
Dr. Detlev Bronk
Dr. Jerome Hunsaker
Mr. Sidney W. Souers
Mr. Gordon Gray
Dr. Donald Menzel
Gen. Robert M. Montague
Dr. Lloyd V. Berkner

The death of Secretary Forrestal on 22 May, 1949, created a vacancy which remained unfilled until 01 August, 1950, upon which date Gen. Walter B. Smith was designated as permanent replacement.

On 24 June, 1947, a civilian pilot flying over the Cascade Mountains in the State of Washington observed nine flying disc-shaped aircraft traveling in formation at a high rate of speed. Although this was not the first known sighting of such objects, it was the first to gain widespread attention in the public media. Hundreds of reports of sightings of similar objects followed. Many of these came from highly credible military and civilian sources. These reports resulted in independent efforts by several different elements of the military to ascertain the nature and purpose of these objects in the interests of national defense. A number of witnesses were interviewed and there were several unsuccessful attempts to utilize aircraft in efforts to pursue reported discs in flight. Public reaction bordered on near hysteria at times.

In spite of these efforts, little of substance was learned about the objects until a local rancher reported that one had crashed in a remote region of New Mexico located approximately seventy-five miles northwest of Roswell Army Air Base (now Walker Field).

On 07 July, 1947, a secret operation was begun to assure recovery of the wreckage of this object for scientific study. During the course of this operation, aerial reconnaissance discovered that four small human-like beings had apparently ejected from the craft at some point before it exploded. These had fallen to earth about two miles east of the wreckage site. All four were dead and badly decomposed due to action by predators and exposure to the elements during the approximately one week time period which had elapsed before their discovery. A special scientific team took charge of removing these bodies for study. (See Attachment "C".) The wreckage of the craft was also removed to several different locations. (See Attachment "B".) Civilian and military witnesses in the area were debriefed, and news reporters were given the effective cover story that the object had been a misguided weather research balloon.



c. There is a possibility that some of the incidents may be caused by natural phenomena, such as meteors.

d. The reported operating characteristics such as extreme rates of climb, maneuverability (particularly in roll), and action which must be considered evasive when sighted or contacted by friendly aircraft and radar, lend belief to the possibility that some of the objects are controlled either manually, automatically or remotely.

e. The apparent common description of the objects is as follows:-

(1) Metallic or light reflecting surface.

(2) Absence of trail, except in a few instances when the object apparently was operating under high performance conditions.

(3) Circular or elliptical in shape, flat on bottom and domed on top.

(4) Several reports of well kept formation flights varying from three to nine objects.

(5) Normally no associated sound, except in three instances a substantial rumbling roar was noted.

(6) Level flight speeds normally above 300 knots are estimated.

f. It is possible within the present U. S. knowledge — provided extensive detailed development is undertaken — to construct a piloted aircraft which has the general description of the object in subparagraph (e) above which would be capable of an approximate range of 7000 miles at subsonic speeds.

g. Any developments in this country along the lines indicated would be extremely expensive, time consuming and at the considerable expense of current projects and therefore, if directed, should be set up independently of existing projects.

h. Due consideration must be given the following:-

(1) The possibility that these objects are of domestic origin - the product of some high security project not known to AC/AS-2 or this Command.

(2) The lack of physical evidence in the shape of crash recovered exhibits which would undeniably prove the existence of these objects.

(3) The possibility that some foreign nation has a form of propulsion possibly nuclear, which is outside of our domestic knowledge.

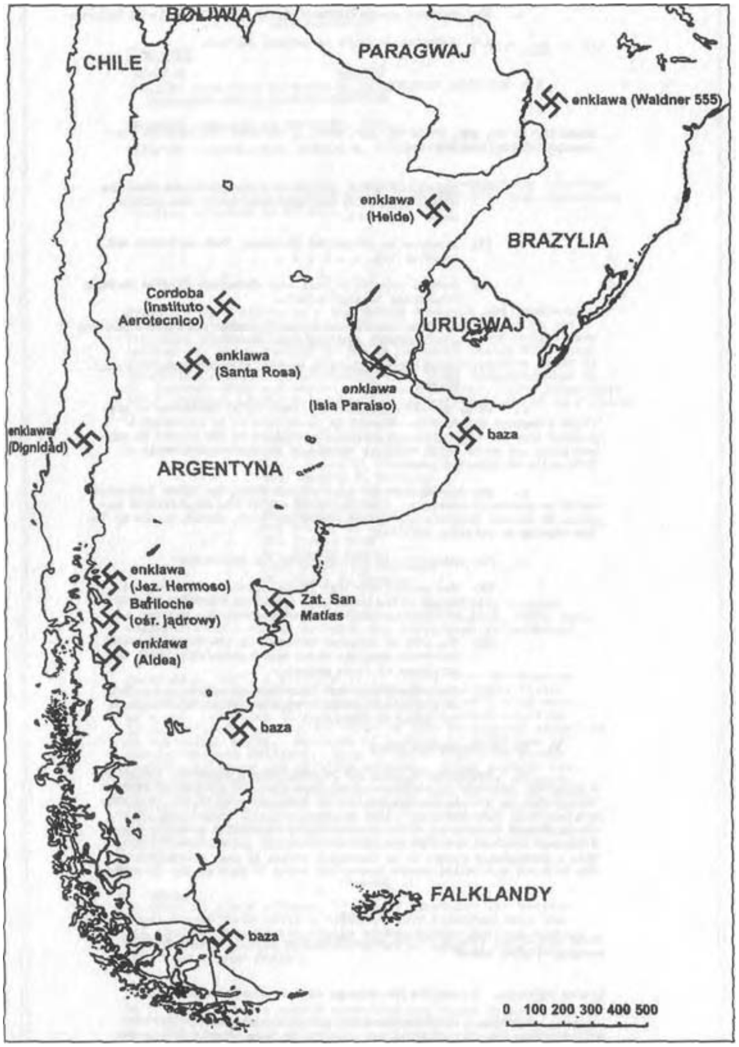
3. It is recommended that:

a. Headquarters, Army Air Forces issue a directive assigning a priority, security classification and Code Name for a detailed study of this matter to include the preparation of complete sets of all available and partinent data which will then be made available to the Army, Navy, Atomic Energy Commission, JRDB, the Air Force Scientific Advisory Group, NACA, and the RAND and NEPA projects for comments and recommendations, with a preliminary report to be forwarded within 15 days of receipt of the data and a detailed report thereafter every 30 days as the investigation develops. A complete interchange of data should be effected.

4. Awaiting a specific directive AMC will continue the investigation within its current resources in order to more closely define the nature of the phenomenon. Detailed Essential Elements of Information will be formulated immediately for transmittal thru channels.

N F Twining
N. F. TWINING
Lieutenant General, U.S.A.
Commanding

COPY
from
THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES
Record Group No. ______



BOLIWIA
CHILE PARAGWAJ
enklawa (Waldner 555)
enklawa
(Heide) BRAZYLIA
Cordoba (instituto Aerotecnico)
URUGWAJ
enklawa
(Santa Rosa)
enklawa
(Isla Paraiso)
enklawa
(Dignidad) baza
ARGENTYNA
enklawa
(Jez. Hermoso)
Bariloche
(ośr. jądrowy)
enklawa
(Aldea)
Zat. San Matias
baza
FALKLANDY
baza
0 100 200 300 400 500

A Polish-language map of Nazi enclaves in South America, particularly Argentina. It is thought that some of the UFO activity in South America came from German saucers relocated to remote parts of that continent.

CHAPTER EIGHT:

CONCLUDING THOUGHTS

CHAPTER EIGHT

Concluding Thoughts

What can be concluded from this glimpse into the world of German flying discs? Certainly, it can be said that some of these projects were realized. This being true, it can be said that these were the first "flying saucers". It is also certainly true that German flying discs were re-created and perhaps further developed by countries comprising the former Allied Powers. It can be said that in all probability, Germans immigrated to places outside Europe after the war and also built these flying craft. It is also a certainty that the exact nature and real history of these flying devices has remained a closely guarded secret in all these countries. Not only has a secret been kept but an active effort, a conspiracy, has been made to keep it that way. This means that their exists an effort to keep the exact knowledge of these devices from the general populace for the foreseeable future. This effort extends back into time, into the origins of these projects in Germany and extends into the present. The victors wrote history. The victors omitted German flying discs and the victors are keeping quite now.

The exact methods of propulsion of the exotic versions of these discs still remains a mystery. Jet and rocket engines were used but there is still debate as to which models used which engine at what time. There is no doubt in my mind that field propulsion techniques were at least experimented upon during the 3rd Reich. This is established in my mind, if for no other reason, by the series of F.B.I. reports dealing with the witness who saw such a device while a prisoner of war near Gut Alte Gossen. The F.B.I. took these reports seriously enough to take them and save them all these years. Maybe we should also.

One overriding question concerning UFOs is why are they so, so secret? Dr. Milos Jesensky and engineer Robert Lesmakiewicz propose an atomic saucer in their book "Wunderland" Mimozemske Technoloaie Treti Rise. This conclusion is seconded by Klaus-Peter Rothkugel and Jim Wilson. This assertion should be taken very seriously.

The UFO-atomic connection fits the historical facts concerning both atomic energy and UFOs. UFOs have always been and are today associated with atomic energy facilities. Los Alamos, Hanford and Area 51 are examples of nuclear facilities at which or very near to which UFOs are or were regularly seen. If we suppose atomic energy as a power source it might explain this association. But that can not be all there is to this matter. Methods of propulsion involving atomic energy seem to be known to us. Indeed, some were reviewed in this book. Why the extreme secrecy then? Might it be that there is some other arrangement involving nuclear energy of which we know nothing? Might the Germans have stumbled on to something really exciting during those war years, perhaps coupling field propulsion with atomic energy ? If this is so then not only would the association of UFO activity over and near nuclear facilities be explained but some of the extreme secrecy and conspiracy to cover-up the matter might also be explained.

At this point the reader may smiling and shaking his or her head in disbelief, perhaps even making comments involving the words "fantasy" or "science fiction". The German watch-word of those times was "nothing is impossible" and it is clear that within the Reich scientists took this saying to heart. Those scientists were not surprised by breakthroughs, they expected them. Please let me remind the reader that the alternative explanation is the real science fiction or fantasy. In this origin of UFOs a multitude of alien beings seemingly travel to earth from intergalactic space not to exchange ideas, exploit earth's resources or conquer the planet, but to abduct and inseminate our females. And above all, if we buy into this reasoning, these aliens seem particularly attracted to American women.

The story goes on from here to describe genetic experiments, mixing the DNA of humans and aliens to produce a hybrid human-alien. Anybody who entertains such nonsense has absolutely no understanding of the species concept in biology. Unfortunately, many individuals subscribing to the alien hypothesis fall into this category, even some with advanced degrees. Only one of two possibilities are within reason. The first is that these hominids are manifiested in the minds of the witnesses as the result of some black mind control project sponsored by the government. The second possibility is that they are the result of experimentation by the government involving human, hominoid or hominid genes. Either option is possible but both options are beyond the scope of this book. Both discussions are superfluous, however, since the topic of this book is UFOs, not aliens. "Aliens" have been used by the media and the government long enough to misdirect the inquiry into UFOs. Aliens are the ultimate "red herring".

In trying to crystallize these thoughts on the origin of UFOs, we are presented with two mutually exclusive hypotheses for the origin of flying saucers. The first is that they are a man-made technology. The second is that they are a non-man-made technology. In view of the fact that we now know the first senecio is true, why are we even considering holding on to the second hypothesis? There is no reason for a duplicity of theory. If a failure to explain the facts is ever encountered in the "UFOs are man-made theory", then and only then are we justified in moving to another hypothesis.

Before signing off it is felt that an obligation exists to discuss another reason for the suppression of the German connection in the history of UFOs. English speakers sometimes recognize this as an unuttered truth once it is out in the open but many German speakers and others are usually well ahead of the curve on this one. Unfortunately, this is not going to be pleasant.

In some circles, the flying discs built by the Germans during the war are called "Nazi UFOs". Some may do this as a way to quickly name a concept but some others do this for an entirely different reason. The point that is being made is that technology usually does not adopt a political name. The atomic bomb dropped on the Japanese by the Americans was not called the "Democrat Bomb", for example, even though a Democrat was in power in the United States at the time. The Nazis are a special case, however, and this is a central problem and roadblock we encounter in researching their innovations.

The Nazis were defeated militarily by the Allies. Yet some in the media elite continue to fight this war. Of course, the Allies always win but that is not the purpose of their fight. The purpose is the nature of the Nazis themselves. The Nazis were not just a military machine. Hitler and his supporters brought other ideas with them into power. These ideas were historical, social, artistic, economic and scientific. In other words, the Nazis brought a completely new culture into prominence almost overnight and with at least the passive acceptance of most of the general populace.

It is sometimes said by these media people in question that America defines itself as what the Nazis were not. The fascination that the mass media, especially in Hollywood, has for the Nazis is evidenced in their ongoing campaign to insure that these cultural ideas are as thoroughly defeated as the Nazi military. In defeating the Nazis militarily on the silver screen they believe they also defeat the cultural ideas associated with the Nazis. They take every opportunity to do this. The media fight this propaganda war over and over again, as if the war was still going on, while attempting to link the military defeat of the Nazis with the cultural defeat of their ideas.

For a moment I want to digress in order to illustrate an example of exactly what I am talking about. This example is both germane to our discussion of UFOs as well as cutting to the very heart of this cultural conflict. It has to do with Hitler's myrmidons, the SS.

Historians tell us that the abbreviation "SS" stands for "Schutzstaffel". "Schutzstaffel" could be thought of as "bodyguard" and in the early days of the Nazi movement members of this order dressed in black and were Hitler's personal bodyguard. As it developed, this order changed into many things.

Portrayal of the SS in the media has degenerated simply into a negative caricature to which we are all supposed to respond immediately with a politically correct, knee-jerk type of condemnation formula. As far as the media is concerned, this is all the SS was. Their point is that we now know enough about the SS and are supposed to drop further inquiry. This first unwritten law has already been violated in this book. In this discussion we have focussed on the SS as the organizational and in some cases the research and development framework behind German super-weapon's technology. But the SS was more than this. To insiders, initiates within the 3rd Reich, the abbreviation "SS" did not stand for "Schutzstaffel" at all but for the words "Schwarze Sonne".

"Schwarze Sonne" means "Black Sun" in English. The Black Sun to these initiated individuals was a physical body like our visible sun except that the Black Sun was not visible to the naked eye. This Black Sun radiated light which was invisible to the human eye. The concept of the Black Sun seems to have bordered upon the religious. It was said to be located at the center of our galaxy. The earth along with every other cellestial body in the gallaxy rotate around this Black Sun.

The Black Sun is sometimes represented symbolically as a black sphere out of which eight arms extend. Such is its most famous rendition on the mosaic floor at Wewelsburg Castle which served as the spiritual home of the SS. The number of arms are unimportant. There could be eight or six or only four. The more astute reader will recognize at this point that the swastika, the very icon of the Nazi Party, was itself is a Black Sun symbol.

The point is that concept of the Black Sun is not just Nazi mumbo-jumbo. The Black Sun is in reality a cold, collapsing implosive vortex as described by Viktor Schauberger or Karl Schappeller. It gathers and densities yet is as cold as interstellar space. It does generate unseen radiation in the form of cosmic, gamma and x-ray radiation. This is possible because in spite of what was said about those crazy "Nazi madmen", the Black Sun is very real. In fact, the Black Sun is the most powerful force yet observed in our universe.

Forty or so years after the demise of the SS, scientists, in this case astronomers, have located the Black Sun at the very center of our galaxy. In fact, we are all familiar with it by another name. Today, we call it a "black hole". It is the center of a great spiral vortex of stars which draws in matter and energy and generates the aforementioned radiations near it periphery. The Black Sun is, in reality, a huge system or perhaps it could even be called a huge machine. We and our entire galaxy are all part of this machine whirling through space. All the matter it contains, the stars, planets, asteroids, comets, meteors and so forth, are all bound in a context of energy. Our galaxy, with the Black Sun as its heart, operates as a vast machine using all the matter and energy contained therein and using every law of physics at once in its operation. Its counterpart, the centrifugal vortex which remains unseen, may even be a doorway into another dimension into which this matter and energy from our dimension spew forth like a fountain. It is the same kind of implosive vortex from which the Germans were about to build a "new science" based upon creative, living energy as we have discussed. It may have been the same force which was to propel their flying discs.

Yet who in the media would dare give credit to those associated with the 3rd Reich for making these connections so long ago? In fact, who in the media would even point out this connection today? None. As far as they are concerned, one is politically incorrect to ever say or imply that the Nazis thought of or developed anything of value. To do so would be to commit professional suicide. To do so would mean the end of one's carrier whether in the business or the academic world. Even if one wanted to make this connection in print or film form, no politically correct publisher or producer would touch it, at least in English.

Not only does the media fail to give credit where credit is due, or to even mention or explain this concept, but anyone seeking to look into such concepts runs the real risk of being branded a neo-Nazi. This threat clearly extends into the UFO world. As a result, this threat has had a chilling effect on real UFO inquiry for over fifty years.

How should the media be treated in this case? How are we going to handle institutions within our culture which actively seek to stymie knowledge? Regardless of one's personal opinion of the Nazis, should we and are we going to allow these " open-minded champions of truth" the right to omit the history of UFOs, let alone the new science of this force of nature, simply because "they" find its origin politically offensive?

Returning from this example to our broader discussion of the media, in American culture it is sometimes said that the media's power rivals or exceeds that of the three branches of American government. With power such as this, the media believes itself up to any propaganda challenge. They are correct in this belief. As any thoughtful person realizes, the mass media's power has been used frequently in the last forty years to radically alter the course of those three branches of government.

In addition to the above referenced dilemma regarding media bias, we face a second obstacle in any effort to arrive at the truth. It is a culture of secrecy within the government itself. Vesco recognized this immediately. According to this "Vesco Doctrine" no German secret was acknowledged publicly unless that secret fell into the hands of more than one of the four occupying powers, (USA, Soviet Union, Great Britain, France). He says:

> "In fact, of the numerous revolutionary "new weapons" that the Germans developed in that period, we know only those-fortunately, they comprise the majority-that fell into the hands of all, or at least more than one, of the four occupying powers"(1).

These governments seem to keep secrets for the sake of keeping secrets. In any event, they operate on a "need to know" basis in dispensing these secrets. We simply have no need to know in their eyes.

The differences between the media and the government itself are becoming more and more blurred. Politicians rely of instant polls, conducted the night before by the media, to plot today's public policy. The results of these polls are whatever the media says they are. In the meantime, the media itself is doing everything it can through "news", through entertainment and through movies to influence the results of those polls. The media and the government are so closely intertwined that for all practical purposes they can be considered as one. The C.I.A. spends a large portion of its budget in an effort to frame public discussion on issues it deems sensitive. The point here is that "truth" is not the goal of the government and in accomplishing their ends they use the methods of the mass media if they are not in partnership with the mass media itself.

For almost sixty years this government/media has been telling us through their propaganda machine, "Hollywood", that all the ideas of the Nazis were meritless, if not dangerous. "The Nazis never had a good idea" seems to be their simplistic mantra. Of course government, at some level, know what you now know about the origins of UFOs. In fact, they know that there is much more to this still-secret high technology than just UFOs. In the past, they have no trouble using captured German scientists when it is in their interest to do so, but they hate to admit it. The problem they face is that they have boxed themselves in a corner. They can not admit the origins of UFO technology without a re-appraisal of other ideas which they have succeeded in putting to bed. If they were to admit one good "Nazi" idea, the question might arise as to if there is another good idea. The elite media has already preempted this question rhetorically, calling any re-appraisal of the Second World War "Revisionism". They use this word disparagingly. Using a sort of "new-speak" they have kept the genie bottled up for almost sixty years.

What does this all mean to the researcher or truth seeker? With enough evidence could this information ever be acknowledged officially? With what level of proof could this elite media/government power axis acknowledge the fact that Germans working for Hitler built experimental flying craft that we could not even touch? The simple answer is that they can not do so, period. Not with "all the proof in the world". Why should they? What is the upside for them? There are no good Nazi ideas. There is no need to know. There is perhaps a technological breakthrough behind the mystery. This is a loose-loose-loose situation for them by any reckoning.

Perhaps we can crystalize this nightmare for the power elite in an image. Suppose that tomorrow a highly technically advanced flying saucer landed on the White House steps in front of full, live, media coverage. Their nightmare would not be a little grey alien emerging from the saucer saying: "Take me to your leader". Their nightmare would be a former SS scientist emerging from the flying saucer saying: "I have an appointment".

The implications are obvious. For over forty years the UFO community has been saying that we are on the verge of full government UFO disclosure. For the reasons outlined above, we are not now nor will we ever be on the verge of full UFO disclosure by the government.

This means that it is up to us to do the "disclosure". Anyone interested in doing research along these lines will be encouraged to know that there is plenty of room in this field. It is not necessary to be a scientist. It is not necessary to live in Europe. It is not necessary to read German. The most important ingredient in this research is interest. If you are interested, there are mountains of government files which remain unexplored. The censors did not edit-out everything. They made mistakes which can be caught and pieced together. If each researcher could contribute just one fact to this growing body of knowledge, our trouble would be over quickly. In short, "Disclosure" isn't going to happen unless we make it happen.

These scientists and technicians who built these early flying sauces may have been the very best and brightest of their time but they got up each rooming and put their pants on just like the rest of us. In fact, they are us. Now that we know that we earthlings are capable of manufacturing objects we call UFOs, should we not use these facts we possess in explaining this phenomena rather than ignoring this information altogether? Should we not cease creating a new and superfluous mythology, if not an outright religion, to explain this phenomena which is completely devoid of a factual basis? Real truth is usually quite simple. In this case the real truth is that the origin of UFOs and many more technological secrets are resting in the grave of Nazi Germany, simply awaiting our re-discovery.

This has not been "The Complete Book of UFOs" or even "The Complete Book of German Flying Discs". Within each topic touched upon in this book lie worlds within worlds of details and additional information. It is for the reader to use the references cited as a starting point to root out what is of interest. This book was designed to get you started. It was only a guide.

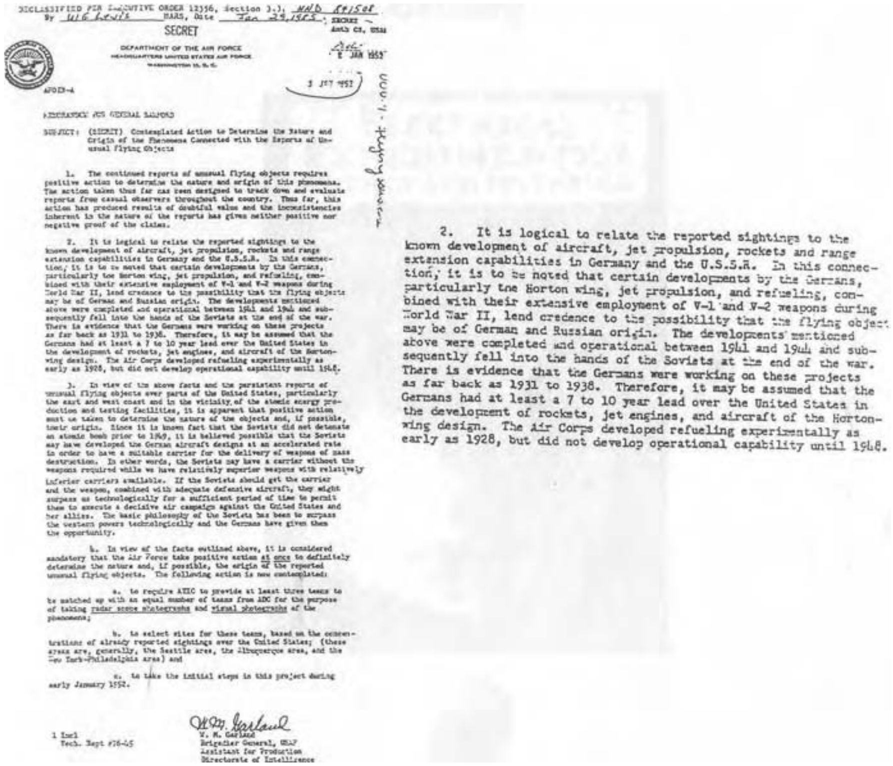
Concluding Thoughts-References

Vesco, Renato, 1976, Intercept UFO, page 96, Pinnacle Books, New York, NY.

THANKS

Most everyone who has ever looked in to the matter of German flying discs has come to the conclusion that there is at least some truth to it. Still, opinions and interpretations within this group differ with the individual doing the research. Nobody can know or find everything. This certainly is true of the study of German flying discs. Many researchers in this field have set up a circle of correspondence or exchange with others interested in this topic. Even the brightest, most hard working individuals have benefitted from an exchange of information.

I have written up this book by doing some research and receiving a great deal of help, input and information sent to me by my friends. My deepest thanks and appreciation" go out to those individuals who have shared their findings with me, explained their research to me and/or shared the counsel of their wisdom. This is true even in cases of disagreement or in cases of differing interpretations. In all cases, they have gone much beyond their published material. These include: Michael Blaeser, Rainer Daehnhardt, the late Joseph Andreas Epp, Dr. Gordon Freeman, Heiner Gehring, Friedrich Georg, Dr. Milos Jesensky, Kadmon, Mark Kneipp, Robert Lesniakiewicz, William Lyne, Thomas Mehner, Theo Paymans, Richard Ross, Klaus-Peter Rothkugel, Horst Schuppmann, Vladimir Terziski, Milos Vnenk and Michael Watson. I would also like to thank my daughter, Lisa Stevens, for her work in proof reading and editing this text.



DECLASSIFIED PER EXECUTIVE ORDER 12356, Section 3.3, NND 841508
By WG Lewis NARS, Date Jan 29,1985

SECRET

SECRET - Auth CG, USAF

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE
HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES AIR FORCE
WASHINGTON 25, D. C.

Ack.
8 JAN 1952

AFOIN-A

3 JAN 1952

000.1 - flying saucers

MEMORANDUM FOR GENERAL SAMFORD

SUBJECT: (SECRET) Contemplated Action to Determine the Nature and Origin of the Phenomena Connected with the Reports of Unusual Flying Objects

1. The continued reports of unusual flying objects requires positive action to determine the nature and origin of this phenomena. The action taken thus far has been designed to track down and evaluate reports from casual observers throughout the country. Thus far, this action has produced results of doubtful value and the inconsistencies inherent in the nature of the reports has given neither positive nor negative proof of the claims.

2. It is logical to relate the reported sightings to the known development of aircraft, jet propulsion, rockets and range extension capabilities in Germany and the U.S.S.R. In this connection, it is to be noted that certain developments by the Germans, particularly the Horton wing, jet propulsion, and refueling, combined with their extensive employment of V-1 and V-2 weapons during World War II, lend credence to the possibility that the flying objects may be of German and Russian origin. The developments mentioned above were completed and operational between 1941 and 1944 and subsequently fell into the hands of the Soviets at the end of the war. There is evidence that the Germans were working on these projects as far back as 1931 to 1938. Therefore, it may be assumed that the Germans had at least a 7 to 10 year lead over the United States in the development of rockets, jet engines, and aircraft of the Horton-wing design. The Air Corps developed refueling experimentally as early as 1928, but did not develop operational capability until 1948.

3. In view of the above facts and the persistent reports of unusual flying objects over parts of the United States, particularly the east and west coast and in the vicinity of the atomic energy production and testing facilities, it is apparent that positive action must be taken to determine the nature of the objects and, if possible, their origin. Since it is known fact that the Soviets did not detonate an atomic bomb prior to 1949, it is believed possible that the Soviets may have developed the German aircraft designs at an accelerated rate in order to have a suitable carrier for the delivery of weapons of mass destruction. In other words, the Soviets may have a carrier without the weapons required while we have relatively superior weapons with relatively inferior carriers available. If the Soviets should get the carrier and the weapon, combined with adequate defensive aircraft, they might surpass us technologically for a sufficient period of time to permit them to execute a decisive air campaign against the United States and her allies. The basic philosophy of the Soviets has been to surpass the western powers technologically and the Germans have given them the opportunity.

4. In view of the facts outlined above, it is considered mandatory that the Air Force take positive action at once to definitely determine the nature and, if possible, the origin of the reported unusual flying objects. The following action is now contemplated:

a. to require ATIC to provide at least three teams to be matched up with an equal number of teams from ADC for the purpose of taking radar scope photographs and visual photographs of the phenomena;

b. to select sites for these teams, based on the concentrations of already reported sightings over the United States; (these areas are, generally, the Seattle area, the Albuquerque area, and the New York-Philadelphia area) and

c. to take the initial steps in this project during early January 1952.

W. M. Garland

1 Incl
Tech. Rept #76-45

W. M. Garland
Brigadier General, USAF
Assistant for Production Directorate of Intelligence

2. It is logical to relate the reported sightings to the known development of aircraft, jet propulsion, rockets and range extension capabilities in Germany and the U.S.S.R. In this connection, it is to be noted that certain developments by the Germans, particularly the Horton wing, jet propulsion, and refueling, combined with their extensive employment of V-1 and V-2 weapons during World War II, lend credence to the possibility that the flying objec may be of German and Russian origin. The developments mentioned above were completed and operational between 1941 and 1944 and subsequently fell into the hands of the Soviets at the end of the war. There is evidence that the Germans were working on these projects as far back as 1931 to 1938. Therefore, it may be assumed that the Germans had at least a 7 to 10 year lead over the United States in the development of rockets, jet engines, and aircraft of the Horton-wing design. The Air Corps developed refueling experimentally as early as 1928, but did not develop operational capability until 1948.

Left, U.S. Air Force document, Jan. 3, 1952
Right, blowup of the second paragraph

Hitler

WAS A BRITISH AGENT

GREG HALLETT AND THE SPYMASTER

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Hitler
WAS A BRITISH AGENT

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

GREG HALLETT

AND THE

SPYMASTER

Books by Greg Hallett

ARE YOU MY FATHER?
The Family Court and Other Experiments 2002

HITLER WAS A BRITISH AGENT 2005, 2006

HOW TO TAKE OVER THE WORLD
A Right Royal Con 2007, 2008, 2009

STALIN'S BRITISH TRAINING
Breeding Concubines Paedophiles At War 2007, 2008, 2010

GIFTING THE UNITED NATIONS TO STALIN 2007, 2008, 2009

NEW ZEALAND
A Blackmailer's Guide 2007, 2008

The Sex Collectors – How the World is Run on Shame – series

THE SEX COLLECTORS– STITCH-UPS 2009

THE SEX COLLECTORS – MURDERS 2010

THE SEX COLLECTORS – HEROIN TICKET 2010

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Further details

Purchases
www.greghallett.com

Orders and distribution
FNZ Inc.
PO Box 109 624, Newmarket, Auckland, New Zealand

Contact the author
greg@greghallett.com

Hitler
WAS A BRITISH AGENT

GREG HALLETT

AND THE

SPYMASTER

FNZ Inc.
LONDON AUCKLAND FRANKFURT TORONTO

Dedication

To those who have walked the walk and talked the talk.

To James Bond III,
the Spymaster,
and Walter Mitty,
who is omnipresent in all of us.

To the living libraries and talking dictionaries, who for some reason chose to talk to me.

Spying is the Great Game.
Information is a commodity subject to the forces of the marketplace as much as any other. It has one advantage in that it can be sold more than once.
Books are its least profitable way to do this.
Nevertheless, history is best written to influence the present.

Published by FNZ Inc.
Auckland, New Zealand
www.greghallett.com

First Edition:	15 September 2005
Second Edition:	1 October 2006

Copyright © Greg Hallett, 2005, 2006, 2010
ISBN 978-0-473-11478-7

The images in this book are used under fair use. They are historically significant photos of famous individuals. They are a lower resolution than the originals and any copies will be of inferior quality. The photos are only used for informational purposes and their inclusion adds significantly to the knowledge gained as it depicts the subject with historical accuracy. Incorporating restricted material is fair use under United States copyright law and any challenges will be met with commercial and liberal parody.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Introduction

Spymaster: "One of the tricks of Intelligence is to deny everything. They routinely promote lies, tricks and deceptions and always promote some pederast to a high place who has nothing to do with it. He is the public face of ignorance. Anyone who attacks this person is vilified by the entire system of government. In reality, the people who have gone out and risked life and limb are routinely cast as fantasists and liars. Such are the rewards of intelligence."

At 8.30 am on 14 August 2003 I opened my back door to a Security Intelligence Service vehicle masking as Matrix Security. I looked up to see a police helicopter between me and the museum. Both were monitoring me. An hour later an intelligence officer arrived at my door with two coffees and a newspaper. He had a problem with history and nominated himself as my chauffeur.

Thereafter I sat in the back of my car getting briefed and recording history. He proved himself by giving me the news ahead of time over the next year. I became convinced that the Spymaster had access to information worthy of recording and organising. This formed the basis of this book and the foundation of others to follow.

I was given sixty books, about four at a time, some magazines, and a host of documentaries to watch. In each one I looked for purposeful mistakes and in each one I found them.

Most of these books were written by secret service agents who had witnessed events above their station, and their mistakes screamed loudly to whomever had the detailed knowledge to pursue them. The devil is in the details and it seemed that the devil was everywhere. Fortunately I had access to 'living libraries' and their detailed knowledge opened the Pandora's box and a new history was formed – the history of the world according to the secret service. This was history beyond the cover-ups. It was history from the secret service with the intelligence angle behind it. This knowledge then gave leverage for more information elsewhere and was detailed enough and broad enough to act as protection. As soon as the information was interpreted, it was disseminated and exists in disk form, in mattresses all over the world.

War began the keeping of records and the falsifying of records. Thus two records of history were always kept. The public got one, while the true record was held under secrecy for 30, 50, 100 years or more. Conspiracy writers scratch the surface and get halfway, occasionally getting it right. To get it right, you have to understand movements and motivation and have insiders in every aspect of war, politics and the bedroom. As a result, in 95% of history books, two-thirds of the information is false.

The history the public receive and abide by is bunkum.

Members of the secret service who were allowed to survive are known as ‘living libraries’. These are the ‘human dictionaries’ that know the fluff from the stuff. They cut to the chase and have a pleasant habit of talking in sentences of ten words or less. Their stories have a ring of truth about them and, when pieced together, they fit like cogs in a wheel. As you listen to their stories you are watching history turn, one cog intertwined with another, and a new history is formed.

The purpose of studying history is to shift out of first gear and, ultimately, make it possible to influence history. Once a cog has been identified, the next one needs attention, and the next one after that. A cog only comes to attention when the previous cog has been illuminated. In this way, intelligence becomes an addictive jigsaw – hard to compromise convincingly, unless the first story is befuddled. Official history is loaded with such befuddlements.

When enough interconnected cogs are illuminated, a new history is formed. This makes the present easier to explain and the future easier to understand, if not predict.

The historian’s job is to decipher and impart information in a way that the public can understand. Some of the world’s dumbest people are historians lecturing in what amounts to history propaganda and some of the world’s most intelligent historians are painting houses. This is the problem with history.

In the process of writing this book, I collected information from intelligence agents around the world. I then gave each agent information from the other, which they checked. Any other leads I had, I’d check through the service and they’d tell me how accurate I was. They usually checked the stories through the foreign intelligence network based in the listening post that is New Zealand. As the mutual exchange checked out, respect developed and the ‘bullshit’ factor was eliminated. I did this for some twenty-two years and in the last three years I’ve been briefed up to four times a week, making me one of the boys, but still a boy.

When the information proved to be correct, as it invariably did – bar minor details which were corrected using all media – I came up with a scenario and illustrated the agents’ part in it, and then a theory on the ‘how and why’ of intrigues, assassinations, wars and social policy. In this way I gathered a body of data that is a virtual rewrite of the last hundred years of history. As this information was ordered a new and more accurate history formed.

Occasionally it was tense, especially towards the end, when we had a ‘property’ that was worth protecting and capable of toppling. Most often these treffs (spy meetings) were done face to face, sometimes through a proxy and other times through proxies on both sides. Many of the people I recruited information from, I was never allowed to meet. Money never changed hands and the most expensive information came with the price of a takeaway meal. No one had any pretensions and no one wore a trenchcoat, but we had a lot of laughs, tea and crackers.

The meetings are backed up by notes, diaries, tape recordings, transcripts, treaties and disks secured off-site. Many writers end their preface with “I hope this . . .” but I have no illusions. Much will be made of nothing and nothing will be made of much.

C’est la vie and such is war.

Greg Hallett

From the recently toppled Anglican Archives, 8 August 2005

Espavo Sezo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

Tavistock Military Psych-Ops War School training line
"In wartime,
the truth is so precious
we surround it with a bodyguard of lies."

Hitler
"In wartime,
we provide truth with a bodyguard of lies because it is so precious."

Churchill
"In wartime,
the truth is so precious that she should always be attended by a bodyguard of lies."

History rarely remembers an honest political figure.
This is the nature of the occult.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

CONTENTS

1 Living Libraries 1
2 Adolf Hitler – The Incestuous Catholic Jew 5
3 Adolf Hitler in Britain 21
4 Hitler's Sexuality 63
5 Hitler's Psychiatric Condition 79
6 Hitler's Deconstruction 87
7 Body Doubles 103
8 Hess and Hess Fly to Britain 125
9 Crashing the Duke of Kent 159
10 Dunkirk 229
11 James Bond 235
12 Pearl Harbor 241
13 Dieppe 251
14 Anthony Blunt 255
15 Wallis Simpson and King Edward VIII 261
16 Operation JAMES BOND 279
17 Operation WINNIE THE POOH 305
18 Lost Leaders 361
19 Churchill, Hitler and Stalin Work Together 397
Afterword 415
Appendices 443
Bibliography 517
Index 527
Biographies 547

APPENDICIES

1 Information and Inventions 443

2 The Fluoride Con 461

3 Not Without American Help 463

4 Spreading the Blame 465

5 Doppelgänger Hess's Murder 467

6 The Bank of England Heist 471

7 Smersh 473

8 Hugh Trevor-Roper 475

9 Unlikely Heroes 479

10 James Bond – Sir Sean Connery 481

11 Hitler's Host for Hitler's Ghost 485

12 The Origins of *Animal Farm 497

13 Was Wallis Simpson a Man 509

Espavo [illegible] - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

The Rules of War

Amory Bradford's letter regarding Clare Boothe Luce's idea for the assassination of Hitler (June 16th) reminded me of an ingenious plan devised by my father, Sir Douglas Jardine, when he was the British governor of Sierra Leone, in 1941.

The Germans were gaining ground in North Africa, and he was secretly approached by the German High Command with a proposal that he move his troops in Sierra Leone to the wrong border when the German Army invaded the country. For this help, my father was to receive "clement treatment" in the event of a German victory.

My father wrote to Whitehall suggesting that he should agree to go to Berlin to discuss the moves he might make. In his pocket he would have a box of Swan Vesta matches with yellow-fever germs sealed inside. My father had been vaccinated against yellow-fever, a fatal disease, so while talking to Hitler he would be able to light his pipe or cigarette and crush the box of matches.

Whitehall replied that on no account was he to do any such foolish thing: it would not be cricket to murder Hitler.

Penelope Jardine
S. Giovanni in Oliveto, Italy
The New Yorker, 28 July 1997, p. 6.

All wars are fake wars.
Some are short and some are long,
but all wars are ‘created’.

Every war is a war of secrets.
Wars with the greatest number of secrets take the longest.
A war without secrets is ‘a bashing, a mugging, or a trial run’.

Every war is a social experiment whose end is always ‘new ways of controlling the masses’.
All wars are a front for creating social change.

Wars are designed, like a car, to fulfil a purpose – to carry a certain weight, fragility and number of packages over a certain distance, at a certain speed, towards a certain end, for a certain group.

The designers of war usually own the latest ‘vehicle’, the most ‘vehicles’, and are usually after a secret or a resource held by those less fortunately packaged – from the secrets of King Solomon’s Tomb to oil.

The Second World War tried to improve on everything the First World War had achieved and the Third World War will do the same. World Wars are an attempt to set up One World Order social structures, so that everything and absolutely everything complies with that Order.

The practice of deconstructing foreign politicians has developed over the past five hundred years and is now a favourite method of taking over countries since the success of Hitler and Stalin.

Intelligence Historian, 15 September 2004:
“We have a window of opportunity to the end of next year. The Germans are on to it. They have recently found evidence that Hitler was a British agent in the Stasi archives.”

History is blind for one reason:
“Blessed are the war-makers.”

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Her Majesty
Queen Elizabeth II
Buckingham Palace
London SW1A 1AA
England

Dear Your Majesty The Queen,

My Spymaster once swore an oath of loyalty to you. He now believes you have been badly, if not criminally, advised. The Spymaster feels obligated to point this out. As such, we are sending you a copy of this book.

Yours sincerely,

Greg Hallett

Historian Henry Makow, Ph.D., United States
Greg Hallett offers persuasive circumstantial evidence that Hitler was a British Agent. As Hitler was in Britain 1912–13 other historians are guilty of sanitizing Hitler, giving him more credibility that he had. Hitler was a British Agent is a useful paradigm that clarifies many improbable events . . .

Why the Nazi war machine was financed and built by the Bank of England.
Why Hitler was able to expand into the Rhineland without fear of retaliation.
Why Hitler let 335,000 Allied soldiers escape at Dunkirk.
Why Hitler attacked Russia before England was invaded or conquered.
Why the Nazis never figured out their communications were compromised.
Why Hitler never sealed the Mediterranean at Gibraltar.
Why the Spanish dictator Franco remained neutral.
Why Hitler didn't conquer the oil fields of Russia and the Middle East.
Why Hitler gave his racial policies priority over actually winning the war.
Why I.G. Farben was never bombed, and became the CIA headquarters in Frankfurt after WWII.

The biggest improbability of traditional history is that an Austrian tramp, street cleaner and gay prostitute could become the Chancellor of Germany. Hitler joins a long list of obscure blackmailable figures catapulted into world prominence by the unseen hand.

Implications . . . History is unfolding according to the Illuminati's long-term plan. Wars are plotted decades in advance and orchestrated to achieve the destruction of nations and natural elites, depopulation, demoralization, and of course power and profit . . . The Illuminati sponsor 'enemies' in order to ferment conflict . . . The super rich have organized themselves to prey on mankind and establish permanent hegemony . . . Greg Hallett deserves our thanks for advancing a history more plausible than what supposedly transpired.

Ole Gerstrøm, Former Member of Parliament, Denmark
I read your book. It is magnificent. That Hitler was a stooge has been my working hypothesis for many years. We know from Anthony Sutton, that the Nazis were financed by Rockefeller and the like. You mention a total of 10 volumes. I would like to read them.

Robert Schwartz, Texas
A credible and well-documented study. The Ian Fleming information was stunning, and very valuable.

Espavo 3020 - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

Lenny Bloom, political scientist at Cloak & Dagger, Canada
It's a tremendous book, a terrific compilation of the war . . . wonderfully documented, well-footnoted . . . It shows the real machinations going on backstage in the Global Theatre and certainly explains a lot . . . I think readers are going to be very surprised as to what really happened with Adolf Hitler. It shows the greater underground, the under-bush . . . the plans of the monarchies and oligarchs go very, very deep. They plan these things decades in advance. An excellent book, I recommend it highly. It's a must read for everybody.

Charles Andersen, Oklahoma
Hitler Was A British Agent is a seminal work with a wealth of information from an insider's view of the real history of the twentieth century. The insider being one [or more] "spymasters". It's a great read full of 'incidental' information, that is in itself, both informative and entertaining. The authors posit that both Hitler and Stalin were British agents trained at Tavistock . . . Charlie Chaplin and Peter Sellers both British agents . . . Chaplin's socialist/communist politics an intelligence gathering front . . . Peter Sellers' Being There a parody of Hitler in his post-war years . . . the real James Bond, his real name, how he came to be a spy and his more notable operations . . . the end-of-war operations to get the real Hitler out of Germany – Operation JAMES BOND and Operation WINNIE THE POOH . . . the Beatles an MI-6 front. 'Their' Yellow Submarine song a parody of Hitler's escape out of Berlin . . . Fascinating stuff that predicts the future: Saddam Hussein, war, Freemasonry etc . . . Enjoyable read.

Ole Jensen, Denmark
I love your book. It's a brick-load of information! You've got all the dirty deeds lined up and you're hitting them right on the head. There is a missing period in Hitler's life, around 1912–13, which no previous historian has accounted for. From my own knowledge, I found no major flaws . . . Lots of neat little details, like Sir CC and Chaplin's "Double Cross" symbolism. I understand your book. No big surprises for me. Keep me on the customer list and I hope not to end up on someone's hit list :-)

Zeph Daniel, Channel Z, New Mexico
Excellent book, excellent work. Thanks for all you do.

British woman, Head of an area Government Department, New Zealand
"You have no idea what you have done. It's just like Vera Briton's book."

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Living Libraries

At the start of a mission, life expectancy is very low. When six operatives are on a mission, they tell one or two stories of what really went down. After all, there is nothing to lose. A couple of the agents die and four are left with eight stories. After a decade or two the stories start to repeat, but those startled, surprised survivors have the history of the world pierced through their thick skin and rubbed into the arms of their worn-out chairs. As they talk oblivious of their surroundings, they reveal their secrets and a whole new world opens up.

The problem with agents is that they played a role but were denied the overall picture. Each had a piece of evidence to impart and it is only through collecting their different stories that an entire picture emerges. When an ordinary Joe interviews more than one of them and shows their collective part in history, their friendship is immediate, protective and concerned. Their advice is always right. After all, they are the survivors of various governments' ideologies and the bizarre cravings of power.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

When these stories unfurl and are put in perspective, the nature of the secret service opens up. With five decades of stories from more than one player, their stories overlap in the thousands and a history is born. As much as I show you here, much more is left out. As soldiers, authors and historians die off, their records often go with them.

Most of history is created from manufactured records, yet the true history provides us with the rich understanding of 'humanity's bizarre strivings for wealth and power', the destruction of each other, the desire for mass murder and the cover-ups that follow. Heroism is wasted in war – you may win the battle, but lose the war; while treason is rewarded with entire countries and all your groceries paid for . . . but your life is not your own.

Secret societies have long had access to the actual events in history. This is the history that the secret service have passed down through centuries and made available for the elite to access. This is the knowledge of power. There are four methods to get this 'knowledge of power'. The first is to do exhaustive research from scratch. The second, if you can access them, is to interview 'living libraries' – old secret agents who have that smart, distrustful, questioning look in their eyes (that belies too much action and a complete surprise at being alive). The third is to be an active historian changing history with the straw that broke the camel's back. The fourth is to belong to a secret society and work your way up through the ranks, at which point you can't reveal the information . . . this makes books like this one, so very rare.

I have access to three of these methods and can name thirty others so ordinary and bizarre as to be commonly held the work of fiction and fantasy – but they work, some only as a starting point and others as detail without the overall picture.

I was asked recently, "How the hell did you get past a hundred security guards into President Bill Clinton's dinner speech without a ticket?" Quite simply I used a technique so ordinary and bizarre as to be considered the work of fiction, a technique I had invented eighteen hours prior. Fortune favours the brave and history is entrusted to those who pass the integrity test for the longest.

The acid test, as with history, is 'whatever works'. This history does not limit itself to being from a British angle.

History repeats every sixty years plus or minus two years. To study the present day, the most effective starting point is to go back sixty years from the present historical figures and examine the training of their predecessors.

In each war there are double agents that go right to the top. The more effective they are, the more compromised they are, and the more they are secretly protected afterwards, right through the ages.

Wars are always created through double agents and compromised principles. Wars are always based on profit. Those who profit ignore the deaths. Those who suffer never get past the deaths. In this way it takes an unencumbered generation to illuminate the hoax of war.

To create a war, you first have to invent a fictitious enemy and then go out and kill them – without killing your own double agent. In most instances you have to grow the double agent and the enemy yourself. This has been common practice for over a century.

Stalin began his British training in 1907 and Hitler began his British training in 1912. In both cases these double agents ended up as Heads of State running foreign countries given to them by their trainers. Stalin was from Georgia and was given Russia; Hitler was from Austria and given Germany.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

To illustrate this, it is necessary to break down war into its component parts and resulting social control. Although the deaths are very real, much of war is smoke and mirrors, cover-ups and lies carried out by organised societies continuously performing magician's tricks – a succession of great switcheroos.

To expose what really happened, you have to understand how these tricks were performed. Secret societies have 'a memory, vengeance, purpose and resources beyond generations', and this is what makes them so powerful.

"Those who wish to become our leaders choose the ordeal of war to prove themselves worthy of the privilege."
"What if we're at peace?"
"There are always wars to be fought."[1]

When the British Freemasons want to create war, the American Skulls prepare to supply them with munitions across the Atlantic and vice versa. When either the Freemasons or the Skulls need a war for profit, they use MI-6 and the CIA to create it.

Other countries' intelligence agencies are also involved. They become involved based on protecting any minority sexual practices of their leaders. The divergent sexual practices of countries' leaders is the major reason for the miscalculation of war.

With monogamous heterosexual leaders, wars halve in frequency. As a result, leaders with nothing to hide tend to be eliminated, either frustrated before they get into power, or killed once in power. This is the nature of war. Deaths do not count, not even the deaths of their leaders.

Straight after WWII the OSS (Office of Strategic Services) was replaced by the CIA Central Intelligence Agency (1946). The CIA became an ambitious, high-level, ruthless self-sovereign organisaton – effectively a marauding country on the move, a roving conqueror.

The Skulls drew on the CIA for their new members, the most prominent of which was George Herbert Walker Bush (Bush senior) in 1948, followed by George W. Bush in 1968 (the current American President). The Skulls was founded at Yale University in 1832 for the elite children of

---

[1] The Skulls, 1999.

Wall Street bankers. They were linked to the Illuminati (founded 1 May 1776) and through them had access to the Freemasons and the Mercers. They take in 15 new members each year.

In 2003, just prior to his inauguration as Governor of California, Arnold Schwarzenneger became a 16th member of the Skulls. This doesn't happen too often.

America, the spiteful, youthful, vengeful bitch did its best to profit from the managed wars of WWI (1914–18) and WWII (1939–45). These were European Civil Wars and Masonic wars – in retaliation for the American Civil War (1861–65) that the British had arranged some fifty years earlier . . . and so history is formed.

The devil is in the details and the details are rarely revealed.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Adolf Hitler

The Incestuous Catholic Jew

> "How incomplete, how absent, how fragmentary > our knowledge of Hitler's past and what made him tick is."[1]

If you want to create a revolution, introduce new expectations and rules to live by. If you want to make a revolutionary, create someone out of their time – and ensure they are disgruntled about it. This is simply done by training them in an ideology different from their time or what is currently being expressed. Many are trained and most fall away. The one who survives to lead will be a revolutionary for a variety of reasons. The harder time they have, the more changes they will make. This is called 'creating potential in the revolutionary'.

Most movements created are exported overseas for subversive reasons. Movements and ideologies have become the new war. With a movement or ideology it is possible to destroy an opposing country without firing a weapon. Political Correctness is a prime example – invented in Russia, it was exported to the West to destroy the family and fun . . . and to stop progress.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Hitler's family history is a near perfect example of how to create a criminal. Sadly, his personal history has been taken as an exemplary family pattern and is being repeated as closely as possible by nearly every government department involved with children across the Western world . . . but I've taken the stage here to outline Hitler's origins and expose his training. His initial nature was kind, caring and gentle. He was a typical beaten boy from a family that had plenty to hide.

Catholic Incest

Officially Hitler had incestuous parents in Alois and Klara. His father's grandparents and his mother's great-grandparents were the same two people, making their marriage second- and third-degree incest – the wife (25) being the niece of the husband (48) who was also her uncle. This was no doubt known to Hitler and confused the family tree and the head that studied it.

---

[1] Ron Rosebaum, Explaining Hitler.

Nevertheless, Alois and Klara’s marriage was approved by the Catholic Church and they married in 1885. Adolf Hitler was born thirteen years later, on 20 April 1889 in Braunau, officially dying at 56 on the 30th of April 1945 in Berlin. In his life he tried to change the world, but the ‘powers that be’ changed it back – a little, and only for the time being. Nevertheless, in the back of darker boardrooms Hitler had become a model for ruling the world. Socialism was the outward goal and fascism was the method.

> Hitler was an enormous success, an enormous failure and an even greater mystery. His life was a battle with confused beginnings.

Hitler tried to clean up his act and “His creed of Aryan superiority meant that he should be able to prove his pedigree, and that there should be no skeletons in the closet. Adolf desperately wanted to eradicate any type of family roots or origins in order to promote the impression that he was God-sent to the German people. He wanted to be seen as a divine figure.”[2]

Adolf was desperate to eradicate any record of relatives, their misdeeds, their propensity for incest and his Jewish connection, as the German racial test required proof of Aryan descent back to 1750.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Both sides of Hitler’s family were from Walterschlag, Spital, Strones and Gross Wolfgers in lower Austria. Hitler’s father grew up in Strones, but it was too small to be a parish, so he was registered in the small farming village Döllerscheim.

As soon as Adolf came to power he ordered the residents hastily removed and the Wehrmacht use it for artillery practise (March 1938). Likewise in 1942 when a plaque was installed in Strones as Adolf’s hometown, he threw a tantrum and ordered it destroyed soon after the concrete had set.

Adolf didn’t have anything to do with his father’s side of the family. None of his siblings knew who their father’s father was, but they liked the mother’s side of the family. They also practiced second-degree incest. This was common at the time and has largely been cured by common use of the motorcar.

---

[2] Hitler.

> Paula Hitler, 101st Airborne Division interview, 12 July 1945: “The Schmieds and the Koppensteins are our dear relatives, especially a cousin Schmieds who married a Koppenstein. I know of no one of my father’s family. My sister Angela and I often said: ‘Father must have some relatives, but we don’t even know them.’”

Incest was very common amongst the Germans and Austrians, and after WWI, blowing up one’s graveyards and burning down registries were the most common methods of tidying up one’s family tree. British Intelligence officers were accustomed to walking at night, but they were advised not to walk too close to the German cemeteries as they had a tendency to explode around midnight.

Spymaster: “Most world leaders are keen to turn their ordinary origins into a showpiece of reflected glory. Who among world leaders today would get away with such an obvious ploy of destroying or rewriting their family history? Sending tanks to shell and destroy a perfectly good town, in what was once a foreign country, is extreme, even amongst world leaders who are renowned for their extremities.”

The name Hutter became Hiedler and then Hitler. Hitler was a spelling error and spelling errors have dominated history, the most important being ‘the children of Israel’, versus ‘the children of Ishmael’ (the Christians and Jews versus Islam); and ‘Oradour-sur-Glane’ versus ‘Oradour-sur-Vayres’ where 642 people were massacred in the wrong French village during WWII. The least important was the rugby team who “played like All Blacks” [sic] and the spelling error carried on to name the team.

Spelling errors have more to answer for than any other facet of history. Language is made up of different dialects and spelling mistakes find commonality with wider and faster transport, and become the norm. Those who stay put speak with strong accents, develop more phonetic spelling and tend to make fewer historical errors.

‘Crack’ in Ireland is a case in point. In one area it means ‘conversation’ as in ‘good crack’, and in another area you don’t know what you’re going to get.

Jewish Origins

Adolf Hitler received a letter from his half-brother Alois hinting at "very odd circumstances in our family history"[3] and it is odd indeed. This referred to the conception of their father Alois Hitler.

Adolf Hitler's grandfather was not part of an incestuous Catholic tree, but one of the leading financiers of Europe. To understand who Adolf Hitler's grandfather was (Alois Hitler's father) you have to understand what Europe was like then.

Werner Sombart, in his book The Jews and Modern Capitalism said that from 1820 on, it was the "Age of the Rothschild". He concluded there was "only one power in Europe, and that is Rothschild".

After the patriarch Mayer Rothschild died on 19 September 1812, his will set out specific guidelines for his descendants:

> 'The family was to intermarry with their own first and second cousins, so their fortune could be kept within the family, and to maintain the appearance of a united financial empire.'

As a result, 16 of the 18 marriages by Mayer Amschel Rothschild's grandchildren were between first cousins. Even his son James (Jacob) Mayer married the daughter of his brother, Salomon Mayer. This created an incestuous culture (although it is legal to marry your cousin) and also meant that the five Rothschild sons couldn't have legitimate children outside the family. To compensate for this, they had illegitimate children, often with their servants.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March

According to Walter Langer, a psychoanalyst who wrote The Mind of Adolf Hitler, Adolf Hitler was a satanic German leader who was the grandson of a Rothschild. It was generally supposed that the father of Alois Hitler was Johann Georg Hiedler, but:

> "There are some people who seriously doubt that Johann Georg Hiedler was the father of Alois . . . [an Austrian document was supposedly prepared] that proved Maria Anna Schicklgruber [Hitler's grandmother] was living in Vienna at the time she conceived [31 August 1836] . . . At that time she was employed as a servant in the home of a Baron Rothschild. As soon as the family discovered her pregnancy she was sent back to her home [House No. 13, Strones, Austria] . . . where Alois [snr.] was born."

---

[3] Hitler, p. 15.

In response, Hitler attacked the Austrian town of Döllerscheim and destroyed the graveyards, using them for tank practise. This destroyed his father's birth records, which would have revealed his Jewish ancestry.

Hitler also closed the Rothschild's bank, S. M. Rothschild and Sons in Vienna in 1938. It had belonged to Salomon Rothschild, one of his probable grandfathers.

The Nazi leadership hid their Jewish family histories with grenades. Even Heydrich's admission to the SS was delayed until his family headstones were blown up. Heydrich was a quarter Jew from his mother's mother and was responsible for almost all of the Jewish terror and repression of the Nazi rule. He was dispassionate and had a marked characteristic of inhumanity.

The Rothschilds were all Illuminati, an independent organisation that began in 1776 and infused itself with the existing Freemasons, eventually drawing out their elite. Their goal was worldwide dominance and control. By 1836, the Rothschilds were the most influential family in Europe. They had created the American Revolution and, as is typical of banks, they funded both sides.

The Rothschilds illegitimate children had two purposes. One was to create allies and the other was to create enemies. The 'allies' were used by the Rothschilds to front for their financial deals and the 'enemies' were used to create war. The Rothschilds funded both sides of the wars and profited enormously from the financial deals the wars created. Because the Rothschilds owned everything, they had no fear of retaliation from the courts.

Occult Origins

Since 1776 the '31st of August' has been set aside as a satanic night, a time when the Rothschilds sowed their seeds to create the children of war. It is an important day for conceiving an 'agent for war' under their private occult coven, the 'Golden Dawn'. Such occult acts are planned to occur between 1.30 am and 3.10 am (13s). This was the equivalent of Guy Fawkes for illegitimate children, with the Rothschilds dressed for Halloween.

The 31st of August is the last day of the Northern Hemisphere summer and the night when the authorities turn a blind eye to pagan rituals. This is similar to the Southern Hemisphere's 27/28/29 February when beach party madness reigns.

On the 31st of August, the Rothschilds' goal was to scare the bejabbers (Jesus) out of the women and for the women to conceive in absolute fear, believing that they were mating with the devil. It was pack rape, with three Rothschilds involved in each hit, one raping, one in the room ensuring dominance and confusion, with another outside, then changing roles.

The German ranks of peerage went from King, Prince, Duke, Markgraf (Count) and Baron, to Ritter. Ritter was equivalent to Knight and carried the surname 'von Ritter'. This was the hierarchy of Germany. Whoever wanted to marry needed authorisation from the Duke and/or Markgraf (equivalent to Viscount). The Markgraf was responsible for the area and had the right to sex with the wife on the wedding night. This was called prima nocte. It was the same in England, Scotland and all over Europe at the time.

The history of 'prima nocte', 'jus primae noctis' (law of the first night), or 'droit du seigneur' (lord's right, hunting, taxation, farming and sex with bridal-virgins) is full of denial, like "deflowering a virgin was considered a greater responsibility than a commoner bridegroom could bear . . . reflecting nothing but credit on the ruler . . . so praised for his sheer courage."[4]

The custom was especially popular in France and Italy but when French knights emigrated to England they abandoned prima nocte as the British touted their female farm workers as bigger than they were.

In Nineteen Eighty-Four, George Orwell updated prima nocte as "The law by which every capitalist had the right to sleep with any woman working in one of his factories".

> This 'night right' was grabbed randomly by those given the title 'Baron', which all the Rothschilds had, some changing their surnames to Baron de Rothschild. Prima nocte created generations of illegitimate children and illegitimate Rothschild children but the Rothschilds were officially banned from this practice by Mayer Rothschild (d. 19 September 1812).
>
> To compensate for this, the Rothschilds would have illegitimate children while dressed in masks and costumes to hide their identity.

---

[4] Claude Jordan, Voyages Historiques de L'Europe, Volume IV, pp. 140–141; Alain Boureau, The Lord's First Night; Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th Edition, Volume 10, p. 610.

Due to the commoners' rebellion against prima nocte, it was easy enough to get into the bedrooms of breeding-age girls. Austria and Germany at the time were practising 'windowing', essentially young men climbing up girls' drainpipes and trelliswork in the wee hours to get them pregnant before marriage.

Their fathers didn't entirely object and often viewed the adventurous young men as potential farm help. When she got pregnant, the two would get married. It was a farming-based community and children were needed to help on the family farm. To this day, there is still a strong culture in Germany of marrying the pregnant girl.

> If a girl of breeding age heard someone climbing up the drainpipe, rather than be scared, she would get herself prepared – a quick scrub of the teeth with a badger hair toothbrush followed by a natural sponge. Late summer especially was a time of roving bonking, and often the girls would not limit themselves to one partner, especially those in poverty – and half of the Catholic girls. After all, there was 'the father, the son and the holy ghost' to consider.

In order to simplify matters, the super wealthy Rothschilds had servant girls. Having illegitimate children with servant girls was so common, one of the Rothschilds had twenty and acknowledged them all, eventually living with his mistress and shunning his unresponsive wife – his kissing cousin.

At the beginning of August a lot of the servants were given leave for the hot summer month and temporary replacements would come in. These temps were often chosen with the 31st of August in mind, when the agents of war would be conceived after a month of familiarity between master and servant.

Hitler's grandmother, Maria Anna Schicklgruber, was a none-too-bright Catholic girl who was invited to work at the Rothschilds in Vienna in the summer of 1836.

Her surname 'Schicklgruber' translates as 'Reaper' and refers to the grim reaper, or death. As Mary Anne Reaper, her initials spell MAR, one of the words for 'death', and with her given initials M.A.S., 'MAS MAR' becomes 'mass death'. She was perfect fodder for a staged 'Agent of War' Rothschild terror rape.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 20

The Rothschilds told their servant they were going out and to retire early. Three of the Rothschilds returned quietly around 11.30 pm on 30 August 1836, put on their devil costumes, completed a midnight Golden Dawn coven ritual and began terrorising Maria Anna Schicklgruber in a pressure-cooker scenario. Closing doors, rustling leaves, foot steps running away, all that Scary Movie stuff that has been ingrained in us for so long it has now become laughable with over exposure.

> This was designed to create sustained fear, to flood her bloodstream with adrenalin, and to alter her physiological and psychological condition to one of absolute terror.

At 1.30 am the three Rothschilds appeared in her room as three devils. Not only was she financially helpless, but also physically helpless. Her screams were not heard as all the Rothschilds were supposedly out. She was raped, seduced by all three, or about to join the Rothschild family, depending on her perception. Each Rothschild had a three-in-one chance of conceiving a child with her and they took pleasure scaring the living life out of Maria Anna Schicklgruber for a multitude of reasons.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

Totally financially strapped, in a very expensive city, Maria stayed on as a servant, but by late November her pregnancy had become apparent to the rest of the family and she was sent back to her home at House No. 13 in Strones – mission accomplished.

The most likely perpetrators were Salomon Mayer Rothschild (1774–1855); his younger brother, but head of the family, Nathan Meyer, Baron de Rothschild (1777–1836) who officially died five weeks earlier; and his son Lionel Nathan Rothschild (1808–79).

Salomon Mayer Rothschild (1774–1855) ran the S. M. Rothschild and Sons bank in Vienna. He allowed his daughter to marry his brother Karl (14 years younger than himself), who was based in Naples – an uncle marrying a niece.

Salomon was a Freemason and a member of the Illuminati whose leader Adam Weishaupt spent much time deciphering and bringing together all the occult practices.

Since the Rothschilds were synonymous with the Illuminati, they were also synonymous with occult practices. The founder of the Illuminati, Adam Weishaupt created their private occult coven, 'Golden Dawn', specifically for them. These were hard men for whom the saying 'morality is for the masses' was a given. They were the earliest practitioners of the Golden Dawn Effective coven.

Nathan Meyer Rothschild (1777–1836) founded N. M. Rothschild and Sons bank in London in 1805, at 2 New Court, St. Swithin's Lane, near the Bank of England and the Stock Exchange. Although the third son, he was the patriarch of his generation after his father's death in 1812. Ten years later he became the Austrian Consul-General in England (1822) but never carried the title of baron presented to him by Austria. His loans to France, Russia, and South America were popular with British investors because they required repayment in sterling.

> At a party at his mansion Nathan Meyer Rothschild said:
> "I care not what puppet is placed upon the throne of England.
> The man that controls Britain's money supply controls the > British Empire, and I control the British money supply."

Here was a man who could buy the law and for whom morality required a public outcry, which was easily quelled with silence, misinformation and control of the press . . . but it was his son Lionel Nathan Rothschild who actually fathered the child Alois Hitler.

Lionel Nathan Rothschild (1808–79) and his illegitimate son Alois Hitler.

Confusing the Birth Lineage of Historical Catholic Jews

The other possible fathers, all of whom claimed to be Alos' father, were Johann Georg Trummelschlager, Johann Nepomuk Hüttler and his brother Johann Georg Hiedler. But when Hitler's father was baptised 'Alois', in the Döllersheim parish, the space for the father's name was left blank. Perhaps even the mother wasn't sure.

According to Hans Frank, Hitler's personal lawyer,[5] Maria was living and working in the house of Mr Frankenberger when she became pregnant. "The lack of hard evidence, however, makes this thesis appear exceedingly dubious."[6]

From birth to 14, it was Frankenberger (a Jew) who paid money in support of Alois, while steadfastly denying he was the father. It appeared that he was paying child support on behalf of another and another who was most likely to also be a Jew.

> Hans Frank's theory was a ruse to put historians off the scent of the Rothschilds' illegitimate children. Presenting 'ruse histories' was standard practice for the Rothschilds, and since they were history, any big event that occurred was most likely theirs. At any one time there was and always is at least one illegitimate Rothschild playing a major role in history.
>
> Hans Frank later blackmailed Adolf Hitler and survived an SS plot solely due to the protection he engendered with the real knowledge of Adolf Hitler's Jewish Rothschild ancestry.

Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

So was Hitler Jewish? He was at least a quarter Jewish. Did Hitler have any Jewish uncles and aunts? You bet, and they pretty much ran the world. His grandfather was Lionel Nathan Rothschild (1808–1879), his uncle was the First Baron Rothschild (1840–1915) and his cousin was the Second Baron Rothschild (1868–1937) making Hitler something of an uncle to the Third Baron Rothschild (1910–90).

As a result of this, despite the outward chaos, Hitler lived an extremely pre-organised life dominated by occult practices from two generations earlier. Hitler definitely got the money wheels spinning for the Rothschilds and they made a fortune out of WWII alone.

Hitler's father (Alois Hitler) was conceived on the 31st of August 1836 (the same day and time Lady Di was killed in 1997) and was born on 7 June 1837 (madness day, its all 6s and 7s).

> Alois Hitler's conception was a pre-planned satanic sport fuck – a ritualistic rape, a gang-bang designed to 'conceive in fear' and 'conceive fear'.

Adolf Hitler was a quarter Rothschild and a quarter Jew from semi-incestuous Catholic parentage. He was an illegitimate Rothschild bred as an agent of war. He was the Rothschilds' physical enemy and financial ally with unlimited financial and political support.

Adolf Hitler was an illegitimate Rothschild playing the major role in the history of his times. His status was well recognised by the secret society financial elite. As such he was given complete assistance to achieve their goals. In his time, Adolf Hitler was recognised as 'Hitler-Rothschild, the satanic Catholic-Jew'.

Hitler's father Alois was certainly angry enough to be the product of rape and during the 1800s Jews were known to be prolific rooters of their servants. Intelligence Officers with a 'living library' and 'talking dictionary' knowledge of history are certain Hitler was the grandchild of a Rothschild and all the other stories are a ruse. Usually they can be influenced by research, but in this case, "No, Hitler was the grandchild of a Rothschild".

Adolf's Parents

It is common practice for secret societies to choose their days when influencing history. Certainly a rape of a single woman on the last day of summer, on 31 August 1836, who lived at House No. 13, was an ominous day for conceiving the angry grandfather of war. In the secret code of the Golden Dawn coven, dates are written with the numbers reversed, with the 31st written as '13' and the 8 written '∞'. The 31st of August was the day for creating children of war – '13∞'.

Alois left home when he was 13 and worked as a cobbler in Vienna. At 18 he joined the Imperial Customs Service, where his mad bullying presence made him a renowned tax collector and lifetime employee.

---

[5] For his services Hans Frank became the President of the Academy of German Law, leader of the National Lawyers Association, member of the Reichstag, and Governor-General of Poland. During the Nuremberg Trials he was known as 'the Butcher of Poland'.

[6] Hitler, p. 15.

In 1864, at the age of 27, he married Anna Glass, the daughter of a workmate. She was unable to have children and died nineteen years later in 1883. The same year he married Franziska Matzelberger and they had two children, Alois junior and Angela. His wife Franziska died of tuberculosis in 1885 within two years of their marriage.

Being the single father of two and having such a bad run with women and reproduction, Alois then employed his niece Klara Põlzl as a housemaid and attempted to marry her. He said she was his cousin, when she was his niece.

Alois and Klara made a plea to the Bishop of Linz on the 27th of October 1884, which read, "They are prevented by the canonical impediment of collateral affinity in the third degree touching the second. They therefore make the humble request that the Most Reverend Episcopate will graciously secure them a dispensation on the following grounds . . . he is a father of two minors, a boy of 2½ years (Alois) and a girl of 1 year and 2 months (Angela) . . . he is a customs official away from home all day and often at night." Klara was described as his "home help [and] a woman without means", meaning she did not have money or prospects enough to marry. She was quite boyish-looking.

The Bishop of Linz cared about incest and refused to marry them, so they appealed to Rome for special dispensation. The Vatican was only concerned about the size of their bribe and soon granted them the right to marry.

Alois and Klara were incestuously married and therefore prone to genetic defects becoming dominant. They had five children together, but only Adolf and his younger sister Paula survived childhood. Gustav and Ida died from diphtheria as children in 1885 and 1886 respectively. Hitler was the third child, born in 1889. His brother Edmund was born in 1894 and died in 1896, the same year his sister Paula was born. At the time of Adolf's birth (1889), his father Alois was 51 and his mother Klara was 28. After Alois (b. 1882) and Gustav (d. 1885), Adolf was the third son.

It is rumoured that Adolf Hitler was born with only one testicle and another story that it was bitten off while urinating on a goat at Leondig in Linz, creating the Freemasons' favourite limerick. The goat story is true enough. The person who told it was killed soon after the telling. From eight years old the young Adolf Hitler had only one testicle.

"Hitler had only one big ball.
Rommel had two but they were small.
Himmler was slightly similar,
but poor old Goebbels had no balls at all."

As an adult, Hitler's doctor (Dr Morell 1937–45) treated him with Orchikrin for genital hypoplasia, the excessive smallness of a sexual organ; with Prostakrinum for sex hormone deficiency; and with Testosterone to restore his manliness. Hitler had one small testicle and one small penis. By the age of fifty he was starting to look like a woman.

None of Hitler's doctors saw him naked. The only person to do so was his manservant, Emil Maurice, who spent some time in a prison cell with Dr Morell after the war. Emil Maurice kept dropping hints to Dr Morell that Hitler's sexual organs were not all intact.

Hitler was born in the little village of Branau near the German and Austrian border and remained an Austrian until the 1930s. He considered Linz his hometown and the world considered Bavaria the cradle of Nazism. Even today when someone makes a Jewish joke on the trains, the whole carriage laughs. Like other groupings, the Germanic and the Jewish peoples being the prime example, racial hatred is passed down through the generations. It's in their blood and surpasses all other aspects of culturisation.

Alois senior was mad-looking and 'sanpaku'. This is a severe 'yin' condition in which the lower portion of the whites of the eyes can be seen. This is often a sign of a person who plays a part in history, yet has no control over the part they play, they just have to play it. Lady Diana, Princess of Wales, had the same condition as she set in motion the end of the British Monarchy, having children, who like Hitler, failed their university entrance and paternal examinations.

> Alois was bald, with a handlebar moustache. He was deeply psychotic and obstructive. He was a "hard, conscientious customs official, punctilious to a fault, with a difficult temper that flared with no apparent provocation. Adolf bore the brunt of this".[7]

---

[7] The Memoirs of Bridget Hitler, p. 24.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Adolf Hitler's half-brother (from the second of three marriages) was also called Alois. He was 'a ruffian, a thief, and a failure'. His mother had died and his father had married his housemaid and niece – what do you expect. Alois junior left home at 18 in 1900 (when Adolf was 11) and spent some time in jail. This made the young Adolf the oldest surviving sibling in the house. His sister Paula was 4 and their mother was also their second cousin.

As a result of Alois junior's rebellion and marked failures, both Alois senior and Klara placed all their hopes on Adolf who was encouraged in the arts, especially reading and painting: ". . . her favourite, Adolf, whom she kept at home. He hid behind her skirts, never doing a day's work."[8] Hitler was raised as a momma's boy.

Alois senior was a severely borderline personality and strict father who beat Adolf savagely whenever he came home late, which was always, and "Klara was a kind and gentle woman who tended to overcompensate and spoil her son", killing him with kindness. As a result, Hitler loved cops and robbers, was a dreamer, got poor grades, hated maths, and escaped into Wagner's music.

Hitler was an escapist who learnt to love, serve and rely on women, while holding an intense dislike and distrust for male authority figures. These patterns ruled his life and were exacerbated by his inbreeding and the dominant madness that ran through his father's veins.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

Alois Hitler (senior) died from internal chest bleeding (pleural haemorrhage) at the age of 65 (7 June 1837–3 January 1903) when Hitler was 13. His mother Klara Põlzl died of cancer five years later at the age of 47 (12 August 1860–21 December 1907) when Hitler was 18. Adolf never returned home after his mother's funeral.

---

[8] Ibid (Same source as above).

Lionel Nathan Rothschild (left).

Alois Hitler Senior (Adolf's father).

Klara Hitler née Põlzl (below).
(Adolf's mother/second cousin).

Alois Hitler Junior (lower left).
(Adolf's half-brother).

Adolf Hitler (lower right).

"HITLER'S HOME"

Bombed Döllerscheim – where Adolf's father's birth records were kept.

Adolf Hitler in Britain

Adolf was christened Adolfus and called Adi by his family. He had been accustomed to a comparatively easy life, but when his mother died of cancer, he (18) took his sister Paula (11) to Vienna, along with his most cherished possession, a photograph of Klara (his mother and second cousin). "His existence had now become a pitiless struggle against poverty and he swept streets in order to buy food for himself and his sister."[1]

From 1908 to 1921 Adolf never saw his younger sister Paula. He became an art student in Vienna but failed miserably. "At the end of 1910 and the beginning of 1911 Hitler appears to have received a considerable sum of money from his aunt, Johanna Pölzl . . . He drifted aimlessly [yet] still pretended that he was a student painter, or writer."[2]

The money ran out by the time he was 19. He slept on park benches and in doorways, ate in soup kitchens, and stayed in the Asyl für Obdachlose shelter for men until 1910, where he developed an appetite for change. Formerly of the snobbish middle class, he was now a tramp.

Two years and four months later, on 24 May 1913, Hitler left Vienna and moved to Munich.[3] The most authoritative book on Hitler has no knowledge of Hitler's activities during the two years and four months from January 1911 to 24 May 1913.

Meanwhile, Alois Hitler (27), Adolf's half-brother, became a waiter in the Shelbourne Hotel in Dublin where he met Brigid Elisabeth Dowling (17, b. 3 July 1891) in the first half of 1909 (her first ever date) and they eloped from Ireland to Liverpool, evading her father William Dowling. She became a Liverpudlian hairdresser and they married and had a child, William Patrick Hitler, on 12 March 1911.

Intelligentsia in doss-houses were the perfect feeding ground for the foreign secret service who are always in search of disaffected nationals prepared to destroy their own society in order to make change. The intelligence community still meet in the boarding houses of old men today. It is good cover and anything overheard is either quickly forgotten, misinterpreted or simply disbelieved and followed up with more medication.

---

[1] Prelude to Terror.

[2] The very authoritative Hitler, p. 57.

[3] Hitler, p. 57.

Officially Hitler stayed in Vienna for the next three years (1910–13) and painted well-known Viennese buildings where he referred to himself as an 'intellectual' rather than a 'transient'. He is also credited with an incredibly elaborate mother-and-child in a landscape which would have taken months to complete. This oil on canvas ("Mother Mary with the Holy Child Jesus Christ", dated 1913) was in a completely different style and medium. It comes complete with right-angle tear as is common amongst works of forged authenticity.

This forgery has been continued on to this day and in July 2006: "Twenty-one watercolours and sketches thought to be by Adolf Hitler are to be sold in Britain in September. The collection was apparently produced between 1916 and 1918. Jefferys in Lostwithiel, southwest England, will auction the collection which is expected to fetch up to $9107."[4]

The 1910–13 paintings were sold by his friend Hanisch (registered in the men's shelter at MA12, Haus Meldemannstrasse as 'Fritz Walter') until August 1910 and then by Neumann (a Jew) for a short period (whom Hitler sued), after which Hitler sold the paintings himself. Hitler believed that his failure in the Viennese art world was due to its Jewish control. When Hitler's inheritance came through, he neither painted nor sold his paintings.

Bridget Hitler née
Brigid Elisabeth Dowling.

However, Brigid Hitler's My Brother in Law Hitler says otherwise.[5] When William Patrick was 1, Brigid met Adolf Hitler at the Lime Street Train Station in Liverpool in November 1912. "He was a shabby youth who always wore a trilby hat . . . came and stayed with us at Upper Stanhow Street [102 Upper Stanhope Street, Princess Road, Toxteth, Liverpool] for two months . . . was a damned nuisance, slept all the time, but was very nice to the baby."

Adolf was a snob and spent his days walking up and down the Mersey. At that time there was a strong German community in Liverpool, running bars, cafés and restaurants. Adolf spent six months on and off with Alois and Brigid during which time Alois and Adolf spent a lot of time travelling around England. The whereabouts of Adolf Hitler during the preceding twenty-two months (January 1911 to November 1912) are something of a mystery. He was 21 to 23 years old at the time.

---

[4] New Zealand Weekend Herald, 29 July 2006, B11.

[5] She used 'Bridget Hitler' as her author name.

treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

This is supposedly the missing year in Hitler's life. Hitler wrote of his own history in Mein Kampf stating that from September 1908 he was living in various doss-houses in Vienna amongst tramps and homeless people. He describes this as the lowest point in his life. However, "The only witnesses were fellow tramps and their memories were unreliable and incomplete. The eyewitness accounts of Hitler in Vienna are dubious."[6] In Mein Kampf he states that in 1912 he was a failed art student living in Vienna.

On 24 May 1913, Hitler left Vienna and moved to Munich.[7] The most authoritative book on Hitler, all 844 pages, 681 footnotes and 13 pages of bibliography has no knowledge or photographs of Hitler from January 1911 to May 1913.

> The truth of the period January 1911 to 24 May 1913, was that Hitler spent 1911 working through his inheritance. He then spent nine months (February to November 1912) training in the British Military 'Psych-Ops War School' at Tavistock in England and Ireland. The six months after this (November 1912 to May 1913) Hitler spent in Liverpool with his half-brother and sister-in-law recuperating and studying his Psych-Ops pamphlets with 'tourist' trips to London and British ports.

Adolf Hitler was trained as a British agent, became a German agent, then a British double agent, and then the German Reichchancellor (Prime Minister) as a warring British double agent. His Jewish grandfather of the banking Rothschild family made huge profit from this – or more accurately, his descendants, Hitler's Jewish cousins.

Hitler evaded military service in Austria. "In order to evade capture he registered at the Vienna municipal lodging [a house for homeless men] in 1909 (aged 20) under the name of his younger brother Edmund who was born five years after Adolf and died at the age of two. By using Edmund's birth certificate Adolf managed to identify himself as his younger and dead brother. He dodged military service by living under the name Edmund Hitler, while the Viennese police searched high and low for Adolf Hitler."[8]

---

[6] Prelude to Terror.

[7] Hitler, p. 57.

Spymaster: "The German Police finally captured Adolf Hitler in Munich, after his return from Britain, and charged him with draft-dodging. He evaded military service by producing medical certificates to the effect that he was malnourished and ill. Ironically, when war came, he volunteered. British Intelligence did not interfere with this because they always had a seconder. If Hitler failed there would be another and war experience was necessary for Hitler's record.

"British Intelligence did rescue Hitler on two occasions during WWI.

"During his period in Britain, Hitler was trained as a public speaker. They taught him to gesture with his hands to emphasise points. He then developed his own style which was non-Germanic and incredibly effective. MI-6 also used an elocution teacher from Dublin's Trinity College to give him voice lessons and teach him how to raise and lower his voice for emphasis.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

"Much of an agent's training is along sexual lines. Agents are given drugs, alcohol, subjected to hypnotism, given access to other agents, and the instructors step out and watch what develops. Adolf gave indications of bisexuality, which is not unusual in an MI-6 training setting, and later went on to develop more complicated perversions that sickened many of the other would-be agents – notably coprophilia. The more extreme his sexual perversions, the more easily manipulated he was and the Mandarins of Whitehall were delighted with his progress. Some predicted the sky was the limit for Hitler.

"'All he lacks is experience' ran one of his confidential evaluations of 1912. The MI-6 overlords decided to return him to Germany in time to see that he would get all the experience he needed in the new grande coup, WWI, which was to open to packed houses just in time for the post-harvest festivities in Germany (1914).

"Unfortunately it came early. As Robbie Burns once put it: 'The best laid plans of mice and men gang aft aglae' – Gaelic for 'fuck up'."[9]

---

[8] The Memoirs of Bridget Hitler, p. 27–8.

[9] Hitler's visit to England is also described in Beryl Bainbridge's Young Adolf.

Alien regulations for entry into Britain prior to 1914 virtually did not exist. Even the Home Office officials agree that the 1905 Act would have been easily contravened. This is the only period in Hitler's life when he was not photographed by the bulky camera. The lack of certainty in the official stories was enough to cover for him. He had either an alibi or a doppelgänger painting romantic city scenes for him in Vienna. By the 1930s there were at least five Hitler lookalikes working for the Third Reich.[10]

Hitler's half-brother Alois Hitler: "Don't be ridiculous. Artist! He is nothing but a cheap dauber. They wouldn't even accept him as a student in the Kunstakademie. And what kind of an artist is a man who copies pictures and signs them with his own name."[11]

Hitler's lost two years and four months run from January 1911 to 24 May 1913.

1. Hitler spent 1911 working through his inheritance in the Vienna doss-houses.
2. From February to November 1912 he spent nine months training in the England's Tavistock Psych-Ops War School and another Psych-Ops War School Ireland.
3. From November 1912 to April 1913 he was based in Liverpool with his half-brother. From here he viewed strategic British structures including the Tower Bridge, ships and ports, as did many German tourist spies at that time.
4. In April 1913 Adolf Hitler went to Vienna.
5. On 24 May 1913 Hitler moved to Munich.

Hitler's Double Agent Training

At Tavistock, and in an unnamed Irish 'Psych-Ops War School' which closed down after WWII, Hitler learnt the following: "Once a speaker has mastered the psychological principles of mass persuasion, he can convince the masses of anything he likes. 'Nothing is so absurd that it will not be believed if it is presented with enough conviction'."

He would [later] write, unconsciously echoing a saying of Marcus Tullius Cicero's centuries before, 'Nothing is so difficult to believe that oratory cannot make it acceptable . . .'

---

[10] Hitler's Maid.

[11] The Memoirs of Bridget Hitler, p. 27.

"Hitler followed what he called 'the very sound principle' that a big lie is always more credible than a little one. In 'the primitive simplicity of their souls', he said, people are more easily victimised by the big lie 'since they themselves lie in small matters, but would be ashamed to lie on too big a scale'. They cannot conceive that anyone would venture a truly monstrous falsehood, and will therefore be inclined to believe that there must be some truth in such a statement. Thus, said Hitler, 'something of even the most shameless prevarication will find lodging, and stick . . .'"[12]

> Even Bonaparte's brother was trained by the British military schools. (All the brothers were Freemasons.) His grandfather John Bone was a Scotsman who fled Scotland after a failed revolt in 1746. The name Buonaparte (Bonaparte) comes from 'Bone parte' – the Bone party. The British claimed that their training camps kicked off the British and American revolutions. With their proven record, they were also used to kick off WWI and WWII, both being British Freemason wars designed to capture France and destroy Germany. Both wars heavily advantaged secret societies and paedophiles. Radical doubt was also cast on the American Revolution because of the 'Founding Fathers'' involvement in Freemasonry crime and war creation.

Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

When Alois Hitler sent a letter and travel expenses inviting his sister and brother-in-law to visit, the British intercepted the mail and used it as the out for Hitler. It was also to be his first post-training kill. His British trainers then altered history to show that Leo Raubal died in either 1910 or 1911 and Bridget Hitler's memoirs of Leo Raubal and Angela Hitler née Raubal being invited to England in 1912 couldn't possibly be true. Such is the way history is manipulated. In intelligence it is more than commonplace, it is common practise.

To kick off this cover-up Brigid Hitler's house was destroyed by the last stick of bombs on Liverpool in 1918. The enemy aircraft were never sighted. What was sighted on the day were British aircraft.

Alois and Bridget Hitler were expecting to see Leo Raubal and Angela Hitler née Raubal at the Lime Street Station in November 1912. Instead they were met by Adolf Hitler. This gave Hitler a place for R & R with relatives while recuperating in the safety of British territory and under British monitoring.

---

[12] Mein Kampf, cited in Prelude to Terror, p. 251.

As a Catholic, Angela Hitler née Raubal would just as likely say that her husband was dead if he was an embarrassment, had cheated on her, left her for another, or was in a bigamous marriage. "He [Leo Raubal] spent his time in the pub, drank and smoked, gambled his money away, and on top of that he was a civil servant."[13]

In May 1914, Alois Hitler was so keen to leave Bridget he faked his own death and then remarried.

The Memoirs of Bridget Hitler was written in America during WWII and was known to American Intelligence. It was first leaked to historians in the early 1970s amongst a collection of papers from the late Dr Edmund Pauker who was a European-born theatrical agent. They were first published in 1979. The manuscript ends with a comma in 1937.

In all the documents searched there is no mention of the cause of Leo Raubal's death. Jennifer Roseberg (Jewish) mentions on her website that Leo Raubal was born on 11 June 1879 and died on 10 August 1910 with the overriding note: "My fellow researchers disagree with the dates".

Other sources say Leo was born on 11 June 1879 or in 1880, married Angela Hitler (20) on 14 September 1902 or the same day in 1903 and died aged 31, on 10 August 1910 or 1911 and had a son of the same name whose death date is also confused between 1942 and 1979.

After this, Angela Raubal (28 July 1883–30 October 1949) is supposed to have remarried an architect in Dresden (The Young Hitler I Knew) or moved to Vienna after 1918 (Office of Strategic Services Profile), from where she and her daughter Geli moved to Obersalzberg and later Berchtesgaden where she was her half-brother's housekeeper from 1925. His name was Adolf Hitler.

Other histories show that Hitler kicked Angela Raubal out of Berchtesgaden in 1936 and she moved to Dresden and married Professor Hamitsch who was killed in WWII during a Russian offensive.

Because Adolf Hitler was a double agent historical figure, his family history was purposefully confused. Like many political figures, Adolf Hitler was killing his way to the top.

---

[13] The Young Hitler I Knew, 1954.

"Hitler asked his widowed half-sister, Angela Raubal, to be his housekeeper. She was accompanied by her seventeen-year-old daughter Geli [4 January 1908–18 September 1931]."[14]

There is also no history of what Leo Raubal died from, whether he was killed from gambling debts, alcohol or cheated on his wife and was 'dead to her' as was the Catholic way amongst stoic cuckolded hens. Such confusion around Leo Raubal amounts to a cover-up.

It is tradition amongst those trained at Tavistock to do a kill during or soon after getting out, and to kill someone close. This shows their minders that they are prepared to go to any lengths to achieve their minders political goals.

Since Adolf 'Edmund' Hitler left Tavistock in late 1912, turning up in Liverpool in November 1912 in place of Leo and Angela Raubal and since Leo's birth, marriage and death dates are confused, it is quite possible that Leo Raubal was Hitler's first kill. His Jewish name and marriage to his half-sister was enough motivation. The dates were confused to protect Adolf Hitler's hand and also to discredit The Memoirs of Bridget Hitler.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Leo and Angela Raubal's meeting with Alois and Brigid Hitler at Liverpool was quite openly planned in November 1912. Their 'no show' meant that Angela had to fall back on excuses. Angela was proud, and Leo's gambling, alcoholism and womanising was enough to convince the public.

As far as Angela was concerned, her husband Leo may have simply gone missing and her pride took over. Her pride became Adolf's alibi. Miraculously Adolf took Leo and Angela's place in Liverpool and as it turned out, he was to kill another Raubal two decades later. Angela Hitler née Raubal was to remained silent about this as well.

The first interview with Paula Hitler (Hitler's sister, Angela's half-sister) dated 12 July 1945 by U.S. Army 101st Airborne was produced on a low-quality typewriter with many lines out of alignment and variable print quality (old ribbon). It makes no mention of Leo Raubal.

Paula was asked to bring all of her possessions to this interview which were carried in trunks, chests and boxes in a truck the following day. Everything was stolen except for the overnight bag she had carried with her. Thus all her hardcopy relationship with her brother Adolf were removed from public analysis on 13 July 1945.

The second interview with Paula Hitler was on 5 June 1946 and is recorded by Records of Army Staff (G2). Record Group 319 IRR XE575580 mentions Leo Raubal as having died in 1910. According to Paula Hitler, her half-sister Angela Hitler [1883–1949] married the Austrian Revenue Officer Leo Raubal in 1903 and he died in 1910.

Much of the content of this second interview is suspect. It ends with 600 words of pro-Allied propaganda from the interviewer ". . . get her away from publicity". The original German record is not available and the English version consists of barely legible handwriting with the dates Anglicised.

Both interviews show interference and wishful thinking on the part of the interviewer. No Allied Powers wanted it known that Hitler was in Britain and wished to discredit all affidavits and memoirs that supported this.

> When there is intergenerational confusion there are often larger powers at work manipulating history.

When engineering history, witnesses are regularly intimidated and taken back to 'zero'. The essential elements of Paula Hitler's files were confused or removed. She was intimidated and left in poverty – 'zero possession'. The only thing left was her life – so what does the truth matter?

> In this way, crucial links in history are usually constructed of propaganda attached to slim slivers of truth. As usual, the only clear answer is that the winner of the war gets to tell their story first and it usually takes up the first four layers of truth. Beyond that, it's dogged research and experience that counts.

Adolf's Deconstruction

Bridget Hitler: "Looking back now, it would be very satisfying to say that my Irish second sight, or even my woman's intuition had helped me recognise unusual qualities which might explain why the young man [Adolf Hitler] we met would become one of the most notorious figures in history, but there was certainly nothing about the pale, unsteady-eyed youth who began agitatedly whispering to Alois that distinguished him from thousands of others.

---

[14] Hitler, p. 236.

"One would have expected that for such a long journey he would have come fairly well-dressed . . . wearing such a worn-out suit . . . Adolf was completely exhausted. His pallor and lassitude were so pronounced that I feared he was ill, and immediately after dinner he retired.

"My brother in law Adolf remained with us from November 1912 until April 1913, and a less interesting or prepossessing house guest I cannot imagine. At first he remained in his room, sleeping or lying on the sofa he used as a bed most of the time. I had an idea he was ill, his colour was so bad and his eyes were so peculiar. I felt rather sorry for him . . . unappreciative and difficult. Adolf took everything we did for granted and I'm sure would have remained indefinitely if he had had the slightest encouragement.

"I found him only weak and spineless . . . Usually he wouldn't say much, but just sit. Sometimes he would speak of the future.

"They were always as much alike as two peas in a pod. Alois had maps of every country and was always studying them. When Adolf was with us I had to go through the same thing all over again. He would spread them out on tables, or even on the floor, and pore over them for hours, and he would never hesitate to interrupt my housework to explain how Germany was going to take its rightful position in the world. First would come France, then England. Naturally I didn't find this kind of talk very interesting, but whenever I tried to get away he would begin to shout, although I rarely troubled to contradict him. I put it down partly to the pleasure he took in hearing his own voice – another trick he had in common with my husband.

"As a matter of fact, I didn't pay a great deal of attention to his ravings . . . Once I couldn't stand Adolf for another minute and burst out: 'You have a fine nerve coming here as you have and saying such things. You will never see the day England will be destroyed by Germany. If it ever comes to a fight, it's just as likely that the opposite will happen. Anyway, why do you take such an interest? You and all of us too are Austrians, not Germans.'

"[Hitler] stared at me as though I had struck him in the face. For a while he had nothing to say, but his bewilderment soon passed off, to be displaced by what I can only describe as a kind of sly pleasure in the fact that he had made a Britisher lose her temper.

"When Alois had time, he took off – to London. Adolf was enchanted by Tower Bridge, and they bribed their way into the engine room to see the immense machinery in motion. Alois had a regular passion for machinery and was pleased to have a companion on his jaunts. He showed Adolf power plants, dynamos, river cranes and the inside of ships. When they came home there would be endless discussions of what they had seen.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

"They both had an intense interest in anything English and were always sightseeing . . . they were the forerunners of the tourists who later streamed out of Nazi Germany in all directions and brought home the odd bits of information which, patched together, formed a complete pattern.

"As soon as Adolf knew his way around he began disappearing by himself, not returning until late in the evening. Adolf was always reading – not books, little pamphlets printed in German. These were Adolf's books. I didn't know what was in them, nor exactly where they came from, so I presume he must have got them from the Germans he met around the city."[15]

Secret Service: "These were 'briefing documents' from Tavistock . . . everything Hitler looked like and did, all his physiological symptoms, outward appearance and actions showed him to be integrating after deconstruction. The practice of deconstructing foreign politicians has been developing over the past five hundred years and has become the favourite way of taking over countries."

When Hitler arrived, he was dressed for a short trip, not a long trip. He had come from Tavistock, not Vienna. Everyone from Vienna was in their Sunday best whereas Hitler was dishevelled as though he had been living in the same clothes for the previous nine months – which he had.

Hitler whispered in an agitated manner and was completely exhausted. He had a pale and sickly skin colour. He was weary, looked ill, had unsteady and peculiar eyes – all symptoms of deconstruction.

> Essentially Hitler had just had his first twenty years of ideology removed and replaced with that of the warring secret societies, the Freemasons and the Illuminati. When reintegrating after deconstruction it is not uncommon for the eyes to change colour, even from blue to brown and back again.

---

[15] The Memoirs of Bridget Hitler, pp. 22, 24, 29, 30, 32, 35. Author's emphasis.

After dinner Hitler retired immediately to his room, spent his days sleeping on the sofa and was in bed most of the time. Deconstructed people need to sleep a lot to reset their subconscious – essentially to dream the new future they have been set to achieve. Sometimes they sleep right through the day and the following night.

Adolf Hitler remained disinterested, unappreciative and difficult. He was completely impractical, weak and spineless and took everything his hosts did for granted. He was the ideological boss and all others were servants to be humbled.

He was egocentric and singularly concerned with bringing his own remote goals into the present, drawing them ever closer. This took all his willpower and left him practically useless to the world. He became immersed in his own future and evaded his present condition, which he did his best to deny. He became heavily self-involved in his new impregnated heroic self-image.

Adolf studied maps of every country, spread on the table and on the floor. He would speak of the future, but not of the present. He revealed his programming and the future by explaining how Germany was going to take its rightful position in the world, first taking over France and then England. He did this and said all of this in 1913 and it was all very predictive. He was not a 'lone wolf' but someone who was heavily backed and trained in creating a definitively circumscribed future.

> Deconstruction is a very powerful tool. To alter someone's subconscious is to set their life on a completely different track, and so it was with Adolf Hitler.
>
> To deconstruct someone according to the ideology of another nation is to have them in complete service of that nation. Their outward thoughts and actions may be nationalistic, but their final results are always for the benefit of the country that supplied the deconstruction.
>
> Whenever anyone ignored Hitler, he would shout his message at them. He took pleasure in hearing his own voice as his own voice had been used to access his subconscious during deconstruction. So whenever Hitler spoke, he believed what he was saying.

During typical deconstruction a voice recording, or pulse thereof, is placed on the temples, while other music is played in the background. In Hitler's case it was most likely his political and musical idol Wagner, who he had studied since childhood. (Hitler learnt piano.) The music distracts the conscious and unconscious minds, letting the message sink straight into the subconscious with the same amount of pleasure that the music brings. When the music is played again it brings forth the implanted message by association. This music is called an 'anchor'.

When challenged, Hitler reacted as though he had been physically assaulted and then took pleasure in humbling anything British – his new subconscious enemy. The ideas he had learnt had been fully absorbed and he had a very physical reaction to any threat of mission failure.

Hitler sought out British sites of interest for destruction later, including Tower Bridge, power plants, dynamos, river cranes and the inside of ships. He began disappearing by himself, not returning until late in the evening. With his half-brother Alois, he was a spy tourist for four months gathering whatever patchy information they could to form a complete picture.

They had endless debriefings and Alois, his half-brother, was Hitler's seconder. If Adolf Hitler failed, Alois Hitler was to take his place. But Adolf didn't fail. From the war-makers point of view, he was a huge success.

Although Alois trained before him, he did not have the common look that Adolf had. Alois was endlessly prone to getting attached whereas Adolf wasn't. Alois was a heterosexual sex addict, whereas Adolf was a sexually bent loner. Adolf was a coprophiliac which made him easily controlled and all the more useful.

> According to the British, Hitler was a near-perfect puppet of war and the proof is in the pudding. Adolf was always reading Psych-Ops training material in German (the language of his subconscious). He kept this material to himself and pored over it endlessly. He was becoming what the British wanted – a perfect weapon of war, a German nationalist, a socialist – a Nazi.

When Dr Morell, Hitler's doctor from 1937, first examined Hitler he noted that "His psychic state was very complex".

treasurer@platinumparty.org

Hitler in WWI – the Freemasons' Great War

War was expected. British Military Intelligence Officers expected war in late 1914 after the harvest, but it came early prior to the harvest.

Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria was killed by a Bosnian Serb nationalist in Sarajevo on 28 June 1914 and this resulted in Austria declaring war on Serbia. The assassin himself said that the War had been planned for over a year. It was widely believed amongst German Intelligence Officers that the British controlled Serbian Intelligence – the Black Hand – and supplied the guns, explosives, money and anything else they needed. So much for the British explanation that World War I began by accident.

WWI resulted in the collapse of the German, Austro-Hungarian, Russian and Ottoman empires with 10 million dead and another 50 million dying in the final few months from the Spanish Flu. The British Empire remained intact. The British planned the Great War, which was later known as WWI. At the time there was little that happened that the British did not plan.

War broke out 20 months after Hitler finished his British Psych-Ops training and a year after he left England. In WWI, Hitler was a Private First Class in the Bavarian Regiment acting as a runner on the Western Front – a position often taken up by double agents. At one time, Winston Churchill (43) was fighting within 2 km of Hitler (28). Both had volunteered, and since both were protected Psych-Ops trained British agents, they may well have met under protected circumstances. Certainly they were both protected from death by Intelligence.

Secret Service: "On 20 November 1917, at Cambrai, in Northern France, 150 km from the English Channel and 50 km from Belgium, Hitler was captured in the trenches along with other Germans. The British troops, part of the Royal Green Jacket Regiment, were on orders to take no prisoners and they began slaughtering. Hitler was about to be terminated when a British Intelligence Officer ran up and said, 'Oh no, not that man', and Hitler was allowed to return to his own lines.

"Twice during WWI Hitler was saved on orders of a British Intelligence Officer. At the time of the unnecessary, unwarranted and humiliating German surrender, Hitler was lying in hospital temporarily blinded by gas (11 November 1918).

"[Twenty-one years later], in September 1938, when the British Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain (69) met with Hitler (49) in Munich, he came back with two pieces of paper. One said "Peace for our Time" and Hitler had signed it, and the other was a letter addressed to the Lance Corporal of the Green Jacket Regiment thanking him for saving his life. The letter named the Lance Corporal.

"I sighted the letter at the Green Jacket Regiment Officer's mess in 1974 in the City of Winchester in Hampshire, 40km south-west of central London. The City of Winchester is the old capital of England (1000AD). It is a cathedral city and the centuries-old home of the Royal Green Jacket Brigade. When I went back to see the letter much later, it had gone missing."

The Aldershot military training centre is 30 minutes' drive north-east of Winchester on the way to London. Winchester was not bombed much at all during WWII.

Spymaster: "The Lance Corporal in the Royal Green Jacket Regiment who saved Hitler's life at Cambrai ended up in the Liverpool Police. He spent the first six months of the WWII blitz wandering around Liverpool saying, 'To think I could have stopped this' until Special Branch paid him a visit and told him to 'Shut the fuck up'."

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Hitler – the British Under Cover Agent

In 1911, Hitler steadfastly opposed joining the Austrian Army and claimed to be an invalid, but after being prosecuted in 1913, he rushed to volunteer in 1914. In late 1918, Hitler was assigned to intelligence duties. He became something of an agent provocateur talking revolution in barracks and then identifying those who agreed with him.

Hitler, like other deconstructed personalities, was bisexual, bordering on paedophilic. His controller, Captain Roehm, was the same. In 1919, Hitler went on to more sophisticated duties as a plain clothed undercover for Army Intelligence. While under Roehm, Hitler discovered the printing presses of the Volkischer Beobachter were for sale.

He rushed straight back to his boss Captain Roehm to tell him that he must buy the press, but Roehm was away on a boy-rooting expedition and, rather than wait, he took the unprecedented step of ringing 'God'. He put in a collect call through to Colonel General von Seeckt, the Chief of the Reichswehr, telling him about this unbelievable bargain. Colonel General von Seeckt said the price seemed reasonable, but he lacked the funds, so he offered to ring the 'cousins'. The 'cousins' were the British and the next day Corporal Hitler got his newspaper. The German High Command had bought the people's printing press for Hitler with British financing.

Hitler and the German High Command had undeniable links to Britain and they had been in bed together before, during and after WWI . . . and as it turned out, during WWII as well.

Hitler loved the British and repaid the favour by letting the British and French Expeditionary Forces escape from Dunkirk (26–28 May 1940).

> "The Führer's decision to halt the Panzers on the Aa Canal in Belgium allowed the remnants of the British Expeditionary Force to escape from Dunkirk."[16]
> "225,000 British and 110,000 French troops were evacuated from the French port of Dunkirk on the English Channel between 27 May and 2 June 1940."[17]

Likewise, when Britain installed easy targets like the groups of four tall radar towers which allowed the British to spot German planes at night (well before they arrived), Hitler never targeted them. Hermann Goering, the head of the Luftwaffe prevented their bombing and even the British covered for him, blaming this on a German misinterpretation of what Goering said.

Part of the agreed object of the war was to inform each other of their positions and intentions and the radar, although primitive, did this automatically. WWII was a war that developed all forms of communication including spies, double agents, radar, radio, codes and shared inventions. (See Information and Inventions, Appendix 1)

> This showed complete British control over Hitler and WWII. The deaths of 335,000 fighting soldiers would certainly have ended the war after only nine months (June 1940), with Germany winning and taking over England, but it was far too soon to end the war. The social structure of the new world was not yet in place and all the profits were yet to be made.

Secret Service: "Britain started to organise WWII in 1919, before all the chickens came home to roost. Britain knew Germany would rise from the ashes and they ran Hitler as their agent, ensuring that Germany had a leader who was their puppet. War machines need war and the

---

[16] To Catch a King, p. 51.
[17] The Oxford English Reference Dictionary.

treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

funded, trained, and supported double agents to be their patsies, their puppets and their puppet enemy."

Germany Between the Wars

From 1919–29, Berlin was the most sexually explicit city in the world. "Transvestites were having sex with men dressed as women in the Mikado Café and the patrons were joining in, creating orgies for spectators and participants. There were clubs for sadists, exhibitionists, and masochists. Naked dancing at 'The White Mouse Club' became the vogue . . . women could choose between male and female prostitutes . . . Hawkers offered porn, dope, and snow (cocaine) . . . wife swapping was prevalent in high society and lesbianism was acknowledged as a contributing cause of the skyrocketing divorce statistics [just as it is in America today] . . . Little girls of ten and eleven, rouged, and wearing short baby dresses, promenaded the gully from midnight to dawn in competition with lush blondes swathed in furs."[18] Black jazz musicians proliferated on the banjo and saxophone, and everybody shimmied.

Right through Germany, nudism became a form of protest. It was not uncommon for people to walk up and down the streets naked, protesting against the deathly 1914–18 war and partly against the ridiculous ruling class. There were no controls on Berlin's lifestyle and no thought of its effects. Even when Berlin was in battle, it was a parade that never stopped.

When Hitler arrived, Berlin was considered the most sexually explicit city in the world where the universal dance was shaking off the shackles of war. Hitler denounced moral laxity and attacked "the universal madness for pleasure".

Even the 'Hangman' Reinhard Heydrich (1904–42), Director-General of the SS and the SD, the secret department and inner sanctum of the SS, said of Berlin: "You have no idea what this town was like. There was the Ring Club which only allowed membership to those who'd served at least three years in jail. The Silhouette, the Always Faithful and the Paradise which was filled with the most glorious transvestites in gorgeous dresses, with high heels and lipstick."[19] Transvestites are partly a product of the pressures of war, as is appreciating them.

In the 1919 play, Vatemord, Arnolt Bronnen exposed the break in the family between the father's and the son's generations. In very graphic detail, the play showed the son rebuking his father, having sex with another man, and then incest with his mother. The graphically intense play provided an impetus for sexual stability and Hitler climbed onto the bandwagon of 'sexual conservatism'.

---

[18] Prelude to Terror, p. 234.
[19] To Catch a King, p. 52.

Spymaster: "I ran a ring of spies in Berlin and I had one who was some kind of drug addict, morphine I think. I would receive messages from his friends asking me to pick him up from different addresses in Berlin. Some of them were rich, some of them were seedy tenements in Moabit. One I remember was a room in a block of flats given over mainly to prostitutes. His companions of the evening were two men both heavily rouged. One had been completely run through with a 1907 Lee Enfield bayonet. My agent came when called and said on the way out, 'I suppose you think I'm a queer?'

I replied in the affirmative.

"'No I'm not,' he said. 'They both had tits.'

"'Well that's just wonderful,' and no more was said."

Berlin was in its "delirium of desperation" and being run by a group of ridiculous soap queens. A homosexual clique hung around the Kaiser, the world's most ridiculous man, with his pudding-bowl helmet, complete with protruding wooden spoon. A sausage dog followed in the same outfit, but in miniature.

treasurer@platinumparty.org

Just prior to the outbreak of WWI, one of the German Chiefs of General Staff suffered a fatal heart attack in the Kaiser's presence while dressed as a woman. Ernst Toller, a left-wing poet, became a general, later committing suicide in New York, and Kurt Eisner was a drama critic who later became the Prime Minister. He opened all political meetings with an orchestra. Germany was run by the grandiose and the camp.

This was Hitler's political competition. They were a basket case, but so was Berlin, Germany, and much of Hitler's history. As soon as the Germans had paid their WWI war debt, the Americans changed the standard from silver to gold thus recreating Germany's war debt from scratch. In 1923 the currency devalued radically and the German paper mark devalued 4 million million to the gold mark with one loaf of bread costing 1 billion marks. It was inevitable that things would go from loose to civil war.

Germany in the 1920s was in a state of meltdown. The only fibre in the entire country was the Freikorps (the Freedom Corps) who were controlled by the Officer Korps. These bands of freewheeling ex-soldiers were not short of ammunition or weapons. They murdered communists and unionists and anyone else deemed to be an enemy of Germany.

Reich means "Kingdom, Realm or State" and the Third Reich was a fiction established by assuming history. The Nazis' assumed the First Reich was the Holy Roman Empire (962–1806), the Second Reich was the German Empire (1871–1918) and the Third Reich was the Nazi Regime (1933–1945).

The Germans had a mania for secreting away military weapons as a reaction to the 1919 Treaty of Versailles. Rather than create peace, the Treaty of Versailles led to the planning for WWII. For over two decades British Intelligence HQ routinely ignored the warnings of their British Officers stationed in Germany.

Hitler retained the explicit sexuality of the Germans although in a more public form. As the soldiers marched under the Brandenburg Gate with shovels instead of rifles over their shoulders, women on top of the gate in short shorts did aerobics bending over backwards, which was quite explicit. Initially the soldiers marched with shovels as the rifles were all buried in parks and under schools and warehouses. Armaments were not allowed under the useless Treaty of Versailles, so armaments were hidden.

Spymaster: "I ploughed through a file of these reports emanating from Germany between the wars. They contain cogent accounts by experienced Intelligence Officers who noticed all manner of military preparations within the Reichswehr. One of the most astute copied notices from barracks noticeboards. Another reported violations connected with arms in clear violation of the Treaty of Versailles. All were ignored by Whitehall who took the attitude, 'They're only Germans and Germans will be Germans'. This was before Hitler came to power. Now we know why – WWII was being created."

Commander William Guy Carr R.C.N.: "Under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles in 1919 the international bankers obtained control over Germany's military rearmament and her economic recovery. This accomplished, they entered into the Abmachungen (agreements) with the German High Command. They agreed to have the Soviets secretly supply the German generals with all the arms and munitions they required for a modern-day army of several million. They also undertook to have the Soviet dictator place complete training facilities at the disposal of the Germans to enable them to train the number of commissioned and non-commissioned officers they would require to officer the new army they planned to bring into being when they considered the time was ripe.

"The vast building projects required to put the terms of the Abmachungen into effect were financed by the international bankers. They thus enabled both the Communist and the Fascist countries to build up their economy and war potentials. The international bankers enabled the German High Command to evade all the military restrictions placed upon them by the Treaty of Versailles.

"The vast Krupp Munitions and Armaments Plants built in the Soviets behind the Ural Mountains were named 'Manych'. The German armament firms were granted every concession they asked for. International intrigue on such a lavish scale could only mean one thing. Those involved were preparing for World War II. The governments of the so-called Allied nations were kept fully informed regarding what was going on behind the scenes, as I found out when I visited London during the conference on naval disarmament in 1930 . . . Disraeli spoke the truth when he said, 'The governments elected do not govern' . . . From 1920 to 1934 . . . the leaders of . . . Communism in Russia were working hand in glove with the leaders of . . . Naziism in Germany."[20]

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March

Germany had a history of rebuilding and rearming itself after the days of Frederick the Great. It was essential not to lose the key components of your strength. If you lose the war, it is essential that you preserve the skeleton of your army (the officers and the NCO corps – non-commissioned officers) and to save your arms and munitions industries. Prussia did this in 1806 and came back to help destroy Napoleon only a few years later. Napoleon believed he had destroyed Prussia at the Battle of Auerstadt and Jena but the Prussians drafted an army of 10-and 11-year-old children and trained them to fight, making musket changes so they were child-friendly.

German women were furnished with medals for producing children and mothers received Motherhood Crosses in bronze, silver and gold for the size of their brood. This reached the ultimate perversion under the Nazi's breeding programme.

After WWI, Germany saved its strength by digging obsolete guns out of parks and assembling inferior weapons. This was also done with aircraft. The Germans even exported Fokker D7 fighters to Norway but were caught and the fighters with Norwegian markings were photographed being broken up. The Germans were full of schemes promoting their war effort and if one scheme came unstuck there were several more to take its place. This subterfuge was spotted by veteran Allied officers but their warnings were ignored.

Germany sent most of its latest manufacturing plant to Switzerland, Holland, Scandinavia and Russia to manufacture under licence. This kept the design process alive and the Western world was amazed with their improvements. The continued production of modern weapons allowed the General Staff to plan WWII when WWI had only just finished.

> Secret Service: "German soldiers had been practising making war in Russia under secret provisions of the Rapallo Pact from 1919. This contract enabled the German Army Intelligence (the Abwehr), under Admiral Canaris, to sell Stalin on the idea that his Soviet Officer Corps were ready to act against him. There are irrefutable indications that both Canaris and his deputy Hans Oster were under British control and they are likely to have designed the coup story, or at least conveyed it to Stalin, thus encouraging him to act brutally against his own soldiers (1937–39). This weakened the Russians just before the German invasion. It created a propaganda myth that allowed Hitler to invade Russia over the objections of the Army."

Hitler's Early Revolutions

On 9 November 1923, Hitler attempted a beer-cellar revolution in Munich (the Munich Putsch) with Rudolf Hess and Herman Goering. Goering was shot in the groin with an 8 mm bullet from a Mauser 98G and was in terrific pain. He became a morphine addict and his rich wife Carin smuggled him to her parents in Sweden.

Hitler and Hess received nine months in the Landsberg Fortress. Anyone else would have got eight years. While in prison Hitler revealed his British Psych-Ops training to Rudolf Hess who wrote it up as Mein [20] Pawns in the Game, p. 107.

Kampf with Hitler as the author. Berlin was a city without morals and after his release in 1924, Hitler stood halfway between conservatism and radicalism, pro-heterosexual, but with a history of inbreeding (second- and third-degree incest) and homosexuality.

Hitler's toothbrush moustache had become a world joke, reminding millions of Charlie Chaplin. With his receding hairline, flop fringe, wide hips, narrow shoulders, and ridiculous moustache, essentially there to hide his unfeasibly large nostrils, he had an utterly mediocre appearance. Hitler had a great deal of difficulty selling racial superiority, so he relied on his orating skills, kept his distance, and never mingled with the crowd. Beer-table politics was a powerful force in fascist Bavaria, but he took no part in it. It was his orating skills and his book (My Struggle) that carried him through. Jail was the perfect preparation for Hitler.

Intelligence Historian: "Mein Kampf is a work probably ghost written by someone more educated in German grammar than Hitler, who plays down his education. As Hess was locked up in Landsberg Prison with Hitler and had got a degree after WWI, Hess was the scribe and partial contributor.

"It is probable that Hitler made suggestions and dictated parts of the work to Hess, while Hess obviously struggled to make sense of it all. It is a chaotic work that carries all the hallmarks of agent deconstruction. Don't look for logic in Mein Kampf. It doesn't exist in its normal form. It was written in a colloquial style, with a lot of slang and vernacular language and has been described as 'a comic without pictures'.

"Mein Kampf sets out to be all things to all men and its chapters on Jews and the future are of interest. It virtually declares Poland, France and Czechoslovakia are enemies but refrains from mentioning Britain in this way. Clearly it states the Nazi dream of lebensraum (living space) in the East. It also declares the old German dream of a place in the sun but refrains from hostile designs on Britain.

"We now read it with hindsight. If we were reading it today for the first time, it would probably be dismissed as the pipe dreams of some would-be revolutionary.

"Hitler's money did not come from Mein Kampf but from British Intelligence. Mein Kampf was a terrible book promoted by Intelligence as cover for the British funding of Hitler. To this end, it completely achieved its aim."

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

The German–British–American War Alliance

Under King George V's control, British spy information of the German breach of military build-up under the Treaty of Versailles was purposely ignored to give their 'cousins' in Germany a head start. In 1934 Churchill used private sources to assemble his own intelligence survey of German military rearmament. He then warned Parliament that Germany had "created a military air force which is now nearly two-thirds as strong as our present home defence air force [and] by 1936 Germany was due to exceed British air power".[21]

During the war Churchill preferred a daily selection of uninterpreted intelligence data from Major Desmond Morton rather than reports and conclusions from Britain's Joint Intelligence Committee, which had British Monarchy and therefore pro-German influences. This staved off sabotage and he trusted Morton as his friend and confidant. Morton went ahead and created 'M' who later became famous in the James Bond movies.

When the Nazis came to power, Goering returned to Germany and founded the Gestapo 'for racial and religious cleaning'. He built a house in honour of his wife and called it Carinhall where the German High Command met and where they, in turn, met with their international guests. By the time Goering was finishing Carinhall, his partner Emmy Sonnermann was six weeks' pregnant and he was running out of money.

The British were aware of this and sent the British spy, Group Captain Fred Winterbotham, to Carinhall. Winterbotham was working for British Air Intelligence and was one of Churchill's chief intelligence officers.[22] He briefed Churchill daily.

Goering was into 'positions that paid money' more than he was into war and was financially vulnerable at the time. He attended the coronation of King George VI in December 1936. This was largely kept out of the media, but he was well received in British high circles, especially MI-6.[23]

Goering was such a clown it was said about him that he wore special rubber medals in the bath. German comedians used to make jokes about him during WWII . . .

---

[21] Winston Churchill, Hansard, Parliament record, 1934.

[22] Winterbotham was a prolific rooter and would wear women out in a couple of days. When he went to Nazi Germany they always provided him with women.

[23] F. W. Winterbotham was Churchill's personal liaison officer at Bletchley Park where the German signals were deciphered. He wrote The Ultra Secret (1975), The Nazi Connection (1978) and The Ultra Spy (1991).

WWI pilot and charmer; “Fatty”, “Daddy”, “The Elephant” Goering charms Hitler.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7

Carinhall, highly bugged by the British, including the crypt where secretive conversations were held.

> “Goering went to a circus and sat down at the front row. The elephant came out and went up to him and said ‘Daddy, Daddy, Daddy’.”

The SS would report these jokes back to Goering who loved attention beyond all else and tolerated them. The uneducated thought he had the common touch and was all right, but educated Germans didn’t respect him and mistook him for a buffoon.

One of the top British spies saw Goering coming toward them and said “Here comes fatty” and the British spy chief admonished him saying, “Don’t say that. He’s the most dangerous charming man in the whole of Germany.”

Goering controlled the listening service. At breakfast every morning, he received the brownsheets and read them for an hour to a background of soft music. Any gossip, anybody speaking out against him and any state security issues were on these brownsheets – just as all the related telephone calls were recorded on wax disc.

Once Goering took over these brownsheets, the Luftwaffe lost any interest in them and Goering would disappear them to the British. This left the Luftwaffe out of the loop and British Air Intelligence in control of another area of Germany’s intelligence.

treasurer@platinumparty.org

Goering was overrun with British spies. These were magicians, actors, circus performers, acrobats, slaves, peasants and the lockkeepers on the Kiel Canal through which the German submarines had to pass.

Submarine crews had a ritual where they would have a beer with the lockkeeper and his wife before they went on patrol. The British Royal Navy then received a message that another German sub had left and it would be sunk on this basis. The Germans looked at everything conceivable for their submarine losses and finally came upon the lockkeeper and his wife who were then executed in late 1943.

Goering sold the numbers and the totals of German aircraft to be built in return for the British paying to finish Carinhall, which they thoroughly bugged in the process. Goering held so many important Luftwaffe meetings here that this scenario literally changed the course of the air war.

The British cross-checked Goering’s aircraft numbers with a spy they had making aileron control cables for the planes. Divided up, they showed how many aircraft were being built. The same information was supplied by the same spy to the Russians. The British then built shadow factories that enabled the Allied forces to compete with the Luftwaffe and win the war.

The Germans took an expeditious view of American industry especially with aircraft. They had spies everywhere and they would find a design for a component such as an undercarriage or an engine that suited their needs and would then go and steal the blueprints. The Luftwaffe were stealing all of their aircraft technology from the Americans with America’s knowledge.

German aircraft were essentially American aircraft cobbled together. All the Germans had to do was design the airframe. This is the real secret of how the Luftwaffe was built so quickly. The Germans did not design their own subcomponents, they simply stole them. The spies joked, “The build quality is so good, pistons can be exchanged between American and German engines, no problem”.

On one occasion one of their best spies was caught by American Customs with a violin case full of aircraft plans trying to leave the US. When the customs official dropped the case the plans flew out. With amazing savoir faire, the German spy said, “I have to smuggle them past my wife because she thinks I’m feeding my son’s addiction to aircraft. It’s the only way I can get my son the aircraft plans he desires. His mother hates flying. I have to smuggle them otherwise she will go mental at me.”

The US customs official’s empathy for men afflicted by difficult women created an immediate rapport and he allowed him to pass with the American aircraft plans quickly stuffed back into the violin case.

> America was feeding Germany its technology, its finances and its oil. Many of the high-finance Americans were of German descent and were on Germany’s side. These included Henry Ford (Freemason), Walt Disney (Freemason), Prescott Bush (Skull and the Presidents Bushes father and grandfather), the Rothschilds, ICI Faben, now ICI and Dulux paints, etc.

The 1929 Wall Street crash brought chaos to Germany and without it, Hitler would never have risen to power. Democracy was not working – perhaps Fascism was the solution. In the US there was industrial unrest and the middle class were breaking into bakeries and stealing bread – Germany seemed to be marginally more in control of its labour. Henry Ford brought in troops with machine guns to suppress striking workers in the 1930s. There were strike lockouts, unemployment and 20,000 people in anti-Jewish rallies in New York. Ford supported Hitler as both were anti-Semitic and anti-union. Hitler was Ford's wind-up toy that Ford was keen to see at work in the model factory that was to become Nazi Germany.

> In the mid-1930s, almost all of the political leaders of the world expressed their admiration for the astonishing achievements of Adolf Hitler. No one contemplated the human cost until 1945 when the Concentration Camps were revealed in their magnitude.
>
> Walt Disney gave most of the proceeds of the Wizard of Oz to the Nazis; Henry Ford paid for Hitler's staff vehicles, and President Bush's grandfather sold munitions to Germany thus contravening the Treaty of Versailles. Hitler wanted Fords but Henry Ford considered the PR implications and paid for Hitler's Mercedes.
>
> Walt Disney and other investors financed Goering's train. Goering named it 'America'. When the British tried to strafe it, the American Air Force sent aircraft to shoot down the British aircraft.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

Britain also had possession of a few types of German aircraft purchased before WWII. The most combat-capable were the Junkers JU86 which were used as transports. Britain kept more tight-lipped about the use of German aircraft than the Germans did about their British KG200 battle squadron. The British-purchased German aircraft went to South Africa as a commercial venture, but whoever bought these planes went tits-up and the planes were then impressed into the South African Air Force under British control. Thus Britain had control of German planes which could then be used to drop British agents in Germany. Britain later acquired a Folke Wolf 200 Condor plane from a Danish Airline. 'Officially' it was destroyed in 1942.

Carinhall was finished in October 1937 and Goering's child was born on 2 June 1938. Goering was a well-known Anglophile and his support for Hitler was questioned at the time. But by February 1938, with subtle British influence within the German High Command, Goering became the Field Marshal of the Luftwaffe.[24] It was a bent world where double agents profited the most.

---

[24] Hermann Göring, p. 165.

> The Luftwaffe Air Force had been created in America (largely by German-Americans), stolen by German-American spies within the American aviation industry, and sold to Germany, who then passed the numbers on to the British. Now all sides had a relatively equal Air Force. Two-thirds of America's Air Force engineers in Long Island were Germans, and from 1900 there were so many Germans living in New York it was possible to pick up the German language off the streets.

Seasoned Spymaster, Dr Eric Pheiffer: "During WWII the US was 'in a pincer of spies' and Germany had effected the most elaborate and effective penetration of a major power in the entire history of espionage. The United States cannot plan a warship, design an airplane, develop a new device that we do not know of at once . . . We have spy outlets in Montreal, Newport Mews, Boston, Buffalo, Bristol, Philadelphia, San Diego, Seattle, and Bath, Maine . . . We even have spies in President Roosevelt's inner circle[25] and at the Chemical Centre in Bel Air Maryland . . . We even had the plans for American anti-aircraft guns from the Army Signals Laboratories at Fort Monmouth before they reached Washington. We had all the plans for the US destroyers from 1932–1936, courtesy of Gustav Guellich, including all the high-altitude rockets and rocket-propelled missiles."[26]

"Otto Voss started working on Ireland Aircraft and became an American citizen, working in Baltimore developing an experimental seaplane at the Sikorsky plant in Farmingdale, Long Island. He sent all the plans back to Germany in 1934, including those for the super-secret light Bomber SB-C2, the Boeing Bomber, the FG-2 plans, the SBU-1 scout bomber, tactical air exercises at Mitchell Field Long Island, US Army Classified Maps and plans for the destroyers DD-397, DD-398, DD-399 and their propellers.

"Two-thirds of all US aircraft engineers were German, so the German spies did not stand out. From 1934–1941, five months before Pearl Harbor, the Germans had stolen every plan of American aircraft using microphotographic 10% film. Information was cheap and the German agents were paid less than US$300 in 1937 for the year's work. This allowed both sides to be bribed. The highest price ever paid was US$1500 in one lump sum."[27]

---

[25] Roosevelt's wife was a rug-muncher.

[26] The Game of Foxes, p. 36.

[27] Ibid. p. 28, paraphrased.

In New York, the German spies stayed at the Taft Hotel, north of Times Square, and the Russians stayed at the Hotel Manhattan. The designations for German spies were ‘F’– Scout or Courier; ‘R’– Travelling Agent; ‘A’– Producing Information; and ‘V’– German Agent, referred to as a ‘V-Mann’ number.

The Last of the Hitlers

Meanwhile, Adolf’s half-brother, Alois Hitler, had remarried bigamously. “In May 1914 Alois left his wife and child [William Patrick Hitler] in Liverpool and set off for Germany to establish a safety-razor business. World War I broke out shortly after his departure and detained him on the continent for four years. After the war he arranged to have a false report of his death delivered to Brigid and [he re]married bigamously. The German authorities eventually found out and prosecuted him. Brigid [Catholic] intervened on his behalf and he was virtually acquitted. Nothing about the affair became public at the time.”[28]

By 1929, their son, William Patrick Hitler, was 18 and full of chutzpah and went to see his uncle, first sighting him at a Nuremberg Rally. When Hitler found out that his half-brother Alois (convicted criminal, ruffian and waiter) had left Brigid, he pretended he wasn’t related. He sent his nephew back to England saying Alois was an orphan.

“William Patrick stayed with Alois and his new family during his early trips to Germany [1929]. During the period of Hitler’s rule, Alois ran a restaurant in Berlin. He managed to keep it open for the duration of World War II. He was captured by the British at the end of the war but released because it was clear that he had led ‘a perfectly blameless existence’.”[29]

> An MI-6 officer who denies ever being trained:
> “In view of Alois’ first-hand knowledge of Adolf’s training and backing, this is perfectly understandable. After all, 99% of Intelligence is deny everything, even if it means denying night follows day.”

Hitler escaped to his ‘Eagle’s Nest’ mountain retreat on the German-Austrian border to get away from his work and family, but his nephew and his sister-in-law tracked him down and tried to blackmail him, saying that they would go back to England and sell their story to the papers unless they got some money. Adolf was surprisingly lenient considering his timetable – killing Germans in Germany, before starting on the Poles, Gipsies, Slavs, and then the Jews. He was most scared that his missing years would not stack up and he did not want to draw attention to his sketchy past.

These family requests and embarrassments began to encroach on his publicly purist lifestyle, and at the time, he was very busy promoting himself and building up Germany’s warring infrastructure. Hitler gave his nephew William Patrick Hitler a series of low administration jobs in the Third Reich Government and William became a Berlin socialite, living off the Führer’s name.

Hitler put pressure on him to relinquish his British citizenship, but instead William Patrick scarpered back to England in 1938 with the assistance of Mr Fenton of Her Majesty’s Secret Service (MI-6) and another secret agent operating as a magician under the name Bunny Aldon[30] (probably Jasper Maskelyne) who provided him with the escape vehicle, the Storm Troopers in hot pursuit.

MI-6 agent: “The number of British spies chased out of Germany in this way, was only exceeded by the number flooding in.”

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

MI-6 started just before WWI. The security intelligence service was looking for well-connected people, the upper crust, from the British establishment. They offered them fraternity, adventure, danger, espionage and excitement with unlimited potential for sodomy. They were to be a secret guard. Hitler had been similarly scouted.

> It was not uncommon for the Secret Service to fabricate plots with character names and occupations so fictional, that anyone telling the story would feel ridiculous, and anyone listening would write it off merely on the basis of the names. It was, however, common practice for members of the Secret Service to be in the entertainment industry and for entertainers to be seconded into the Secret Service.

Patrick Hitler became very anti-Hitler and anti-German. He wrote his story and tried to sell it to the British papers but they wouldn’t have a bar of it! The Hurst papers wrote it up in America as ‘I Hate My Uncle Adolf’ (Look magazine, January 1939), with the subtitle ‘To Hell With Hitler’, and the French papers published the story under ‘Mon Uncle Adolfe’ (Paris-Soir, August 1939).

---

[28] Irish Roots, Issue No. 1, 1992, First Quarter, Hitler: His Irish Relatives, Tony McCarthy.

[29] Ibid.

[30] Brigid Dowling relates this in The Memoirs of Bridget Hitler.

According to The Oxford English Reference Dictionary 'Führer' means "a leader, especially a tyrannical one". Hitler assumed this title in 1934, five years before TIME magazine named him 'Man of the Year' (2 January 1939), sneaking in just before Look magazine hit the newsstands.

With Brigid Hitler taking in boarders, running dancing lessons at Highgate and behind on her rates (£9 13s 10d), she and Patrick scarpered to America together, arriving on 30 March 1939. The Hurst papers paid for the journey and William Patrick Hitler toured America from 1939–44 giving talks in public halls billed as 'What the German People are Thinking' with the subtitle 'Of the Real Germany Hidden Behind Nazi Fiction'. This brought him to the attention of the FBI and the OSS (the CIA from 1946).

William Patrick Hitler, 6'1", also known as William Patrick Dowling, Patrick Dowling, and Carter Stevens, served as a first-class seaman in the US Navy (1944–46), in the medical corps, and as an intelligence officer. Ironically he was sworn in by one Hess, an American having the same name as Hitler's deputy and Mein Kampf scribe.

William Patrick Hitler then wrote a book using an FBI ghost writer (a great piece of intelligence gathering) which is listed on the web by the Office of Strategic Services under the single page "Hitler Source Book" as Adolf Hitler, written by Alois Hitler and published by New York American on 30 November 1930. It was Adolf Hitler dictated to the FBI by William Patrick Hitler and published in 1946.

Confusion is the name of the game, especially the war game.

William Patrick's mother, Brigid Hitler, converted to British Intelligence and worked for British War Relief in New York, opposite Tiffany's.

After WWII William Patrick Hitler lived in the New York Metropolitan area, where, fearful for his life, he changed his name to William Hiller (1946–77) and worked as a urologist in Manhattan (taking the piss out of Jews in America). He then became a phlebotomist (bleeding Americans) working from his home in Yaphank, Long Island, a suburb renowned for its Nazi sympathisers. In 1977 he married a German woman and changed his surname to that of Hitler's favourite anti-Semitic author, Wagner. By that time Yaphank had become a bedroom community for New York.

treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March, 2013

Wagner was incredibly anti-Semitic and suggested that the best the Jews could do for culture would be to burn themselves at the stake. He too came from unconfirmed parentage. Hitler was a frequent visitor to the Wagner household. Wagner's children called Adolf Hitler 'Uncle Wolf'. At one point he was going to marry one of Wagner's widowed daughters.

Wagner (1813–83) was Hitler's favourite author (Opera and Drama). Count Gobineau (1816–82) wrote the Essay on the Inequality of Human Races. Gobineau was the intellectual parent of the incestuous Nietzsche (1844–1900) who tried to give his age new values and wrote The Birth of Tragedy, which he dedicated to his friend Wagner. Since Wagner was the oldest, considered the father of the three authors, and had the most Westernised name, drawing the least attention in Long Island, the surname 'Wagner' was chosen by William Patrick to replace 'Hitler' and 'Hiller'.

William Hiller had four sons born between 1949 and 1965 who all eventually lived under different surnames. He named his eldest son Alex Adolf Hiller. His second son Howard married in 1989 but before he could impregnate his wife, he had a car accident arranged by the FBI.[31]

The FBI usually gave assignments of this nature to 'The Squad' manned by Mafia hit men. The top Mafioso sodomised J. Edgar Hoover on at least a weekly basis. In exchange, Hoover (Freemason) would deny that Mafia ever existed and: 'If it doesn't exist you can't arrest it'. This is why the Mafia hits were successful and they got away with murder for so long.

The remaining three sons, Hitler's grandnephews, then made a survival pact to never have children. They now each have different names and run a small landscape gardening business in Long Island where they receive sympathetic cover from the locals. Hitler's nephew William Patrick Wagner died anonymously on 14 July 1987.[32]

---

[31] Irish Roots, Issue No. 1, 1992, First Quarter, Hitler: His Irish Relatives, Tony McCarthy.

[32] Last of the Hitlers, 2002.

The pseudo-documentary, Last of the Hitlers shows that William Patrick Hitler changed his name to Houston Stewart Chamberlain and in the next sentence to William Patrick Stewart-Houston without differentiating when they were used, whether they were used interchangeably or what name he was buried under. This is called 'well-presented disinformation' and is designed to obscure. Brigid Dowling, Alois Hitler's first wife, was buried in a cemetery in Long Island under her own name.

Until 1950, Long Island was a series of potato farms and aircraft manufacturers. Nazi sympathisers used to send radio transmissions and light signals to the German submarines coming into New York Harbor during WWII. Some were captured and made prisoners of war. Yaphank, then a population of 10,000, remained a community of Nazi sympathisers even after the war and Levittown was built here.

The Hitler family were a family of authors and did very well considering their father Alois was such a nutter (Hutter). Adolf, his sister Paula Hitler and his nephew William Patrick Hitler all wrote their way into history, but it is Hitler's book, Mein Kampf (My Struggle) with its revealing Psych-Ops training, developed over the last five centuries, that has remained a best-seller, amassing some £15 million in unclaimed royalties.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Hitler the Anglophile

Hitler was an Anglophile. He loved England, the British, and its aristocracy. After all, his sister-in-law was Irish, he had stayed in Liverpool, and he was trained in Britain as a British puppet of war. He was a British double agent and Britain was about to fund his media campaign.

Hitler gained further comfort from the fact that the Kaiser had abdicated and was held under protective custody in Harlem, in British-controlled Holland. The British did everything in their power to give Hitler Germany. Britain needed war to maintain its class structure and without another war their aristocracy would fall.

The British monarchy were cousins of the deposed German monarchs and therefore friends with Germany's aristocracy. Britain's King George V died on 20 January 1936 and Hitler played on the monarchy's vanity by sending a message of sympathy and throwing an elaborate synchronous memorial service on 28 January 1936 with his full cabinet in attendance.

Hitler the Anglophile.

As a result of this comforting display from Hitler to the British Royals, after investigating Germany's build-up to war and receiving assertions from Hitler, Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain returned to Britain saying, "Go home and get a nice quiet sleep".

Chamberlain completely failed to appreciate the threat of Germany's 1919–39 military build-up, especially the last ten years.

This suited the Saxe-Coburg Gothas – King Edward VIII and King George VI – perfectly. They were the head of British Freemasonry, who, along with the German Freemasons, were in a battle against the French Freemasons with a value system most would not understand, and for reasons that have lasted beyond generations, but primarily based on 'want of knowledge' and 'envy of style'.

Every war is a war of secrets and wars with the greatest number of secrets take the longest.

For the last three reigns, the commonwealth should have been singing "God Save the Queen". All their British monarchs have had sex with men. In this way, secrets were traded. The Freemasons kept the monarch's sexual practices secret and in exchange the Monarch kept the warring Freemasons' plans secret, even helping them to create a more equitable war so that it is not 'a bashing, a mugging, or a trial run', but a serious depopulation exercise . . . enough to shift boundaries, social policy and the social make-up of populations. "Dead Dad" is a prime example of such history influencing language.

> All the British male monarchs since King George IV (1820) have been Freemasons and all have been sexually compromised. Sexually compromising the monarch and/or their partner is the first step to taking over that country and controlling its military. Through WWI and WWII the British monarchs were all bisexual males with low IQs.

Because of Chamberlain's non-acceptance and denial of the impending war with Germany, he was made Prime Minister from 28 May 1937 to 10 May 1940. This gave Germany a head start in its war preparations.

Winston Churchill, Secretary of State for War (1919–21) was so disturbed by this denial that he built a private intelligence centre in his home (1929), which remained in full operation until 1939. It was this decade of pre-emptive intelligence gathering and training that saved England from Germany and allowed him to bypass all the pro-German, pro-fascist propaganda filtering through the British royal press and intelligence machine.

It was Winston Churchill's private intelligence centre that ensured the English language and culture dominated . . . but he was still a major player in the war, in all its machinations.

Czechoslovakia was invaded by Hitler on 1 October 1938 and again on 15 March 1939. Chamberlain, still in full denial, "advocated appeasement with Italy and Germany. Criticism of his war leadership and military reverses led to his resignation as Prime Minister in May 1940 and his appointment as Lord President of the Council."[33] Chamberlain was given a face-saving position, Churchill became Prime Minister (10 May 1940), and then Chamberlain was assassinated by in-house liquidation six months later on 9 November 1940.

Essentially Chamberlain acted as a delivery boy for the British-trained Hitler (a double agent of 27 years), and both acted for the British war machine. Chamberlain allowed Hitler to come to power unchallenged and even colluded with Hitler by guaranteeing Britain would not interfere with Germany's takeover of Czechoslovakia.

The under-prepared Chamberlain was replaced with the over-prepared Churchill (Freemason) who declared war on Germany on 3 September 1939. Eight months later he was Prime Minister.

Churchill was, however, pipped at the post by several others. The Luftwaffe bombed Warsaw airfields at 4.15 am Saturday 1 September 1939 and Poland declared war on Germany the same day. But even this was superseded, as illustrated in Ladislas Farago's A Game of Foxes.

The Germans invaded Poland six days before this at 0.01 am on 26 August 1939 when the German K Group (attack group) went into Poland's Beskid Mountains 6 days, 4 hours and 44 minutes before the formal start of WWII.

German Leutnant Herzner staged a raid on Jablunkov Pass, killed Poles, took prisoners and received the surrender of the senior Polish officer who pointed out that Poland was not at war. Leutnant Herzner tried to ignore this, but became convinced when there were no other sounds of action.

---

[33] The Cambridge Biographical Encyclopaedia.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March

Leutnant Herzner eventually asked the Polish officer how he could verify the fact that the war had not begun and the Polish officer suggested he ring his own base. Leutnant Herzner didn't believe it, but in desperation rang his own base at Zilinia in Slovakia. He got hold of his Intelligence Officer who confirmed that the German operation had been postponed. Leutnant Herzner was advised to let the Polish prisoners go, render medical attention and get back across the border as if nothing had happened. He did this quaking in his boots that he had cocked up the whole of WWII.

After he came back to Czechoslovakia he was paranoid with fear but was eventually comforted a few days later by Admiral Canaris, Chief of the Abwehr, who congratulated him on his performance. No one knows where and how Leutnant Herzner died and his name is not recorded in any further Abwehr records. This would tend to indicate that he suffered at the hands of the SS.

> Leutnant Herzner of K Group truly was the first German soldier to begin WWII – 0.01 am on 26 August 1939.

The fact that this event received no press attention anywhere in the world reinforces the belief that WWII was a planned occurrence. This German–Polish action equates with the British–American actions against Japanese units in December 1941, where the Allies were unable to seek assistance or notify command due to blocked signals. This sort of skullduggery within Allied Forces should be a cause for instant investigation by Allied Intelligence Services even now (unless they were all involved?). Such an investigation would only be 66 years too late.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Several events also occurred in the colonies, especially New Zealand, a centre for unrecorded WWII activity.

> Churchill was beaten to the declaration of war a second time by a combination of alcohol and cancer. New Zealand's Prime Minister, Michael Savage, was ill and dying of cancer and Peter Fraser essentially ran New Zealand at the time. Peter Fraser had been charged with sedition and jailed for burning and jumping all over the British flag in 1923. He was known as 'Pisshouse Peter' because he was always in the toilet when there was work to be done.

Churchill had briefed Peter Fraser to declare war on Germany on 9 September 1939 but Fraser was a teetotaller, except when he had the flu and drank gin as a cure. Fraser decided he had the flu on 9 September 1939 and drank two bottles of gin and then declared war on Germany without taking the timeline into account.

New Zealand declared war on Germany 12 hours before Britain.

Hitler's response was: "Where is New Zealand?"[34]

New Zealand's response was to write ditties about the error of the era.

New Zealand ex-naval officer and poet, Denis Glover (DSC, Normandy) told another story where New Zealand fired the first Allied shots of WWII:

"A dilapidated Indian sailing ship had been at sea for months and months and sailed towards Fort Dorset in Wellington Harbour. It was covered in barnacles and weeds and its sails were old and patched. A good blow would have ripped them all to shreds. The ship was owned by a British outfit and had been virtually sailing itself for months and months.

"Due to the drink, the Pommy Captain and First Officer had gone down the ladder and all they were fit to be employed on were Indian ships. It was obvious from the state of the ship that they were both under the weather.

" The army on shore at Fort Dorset had the list of colours of the day and these were circulated each month and had to be displayed by all ships entering the harbour. Due to the long voyage and drunk Pommy Captain and First Officer, the British-owned Indian-run ship either didn't know anything about the list of colours or couldn't be bothered.

"When the Indian crew were challenged by heliograph signal to show the flag colours of the day it should have circled round and around until this was sorted out, but because the Indian crew were in control they carried on straight ahead. The drunk Pommy Captain and First Officer went on deck as the Fort Dorset Army Gunners fired 4" and 6" guns overhead. They were desperately keen to try out their guns on anything and were upset they didn't get the chance to put one through the mast. The Master and First Officer were then fined in the local Magistrates Court."

This is not to be confused with the 1941 story, where, in preparation for WWII the Coastal Artillery had mounted guns all around Wellington Harbour. An old Italian fishing family (Barnao) from Island Bay had been whalers, but when the ease and frequency of the big fish dropped away, they turned to a smaller catch. They were returning into Wellington Harbour one night, hadn't turned on their lights and were talking excitedly about a horse race on the radio and their big catch of hoki.

---

[34] Whermacht officers in Germany were frantically trying to find maps of New Zealand.

The Army heard the enemy language of Italian, thought it was an attack and shot up the boat with casemented 4" and disappearing 6" guns that rose out of the tops of hills. When the 6" guns fired, the muzzles were still below the surface of the ground. The 4" gun was used to suck the enemy in close whereupon the 6" gun would take them out.

The Barnao fishing boat was shelled, bullet-ridden and sunk. Some died, but both Barnao fishermen survived by dog-paddling to shore. The Coastal Artillery got it wrong and the government paid out discretely without it ever making the media.

There are many such Home Guard stories and one wonders whether they should be taken as the first shots of WWII. Isolated New Zealanders were keen for war as it offered them a chance to travel and excused them from the boredom of milking cows. As a result, former Waikato dairy farmers became none-too-bright cannon fodder and were butchered with as much indifference as their cows at home.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

After Dunkirk (June 1940) all the plotting tables and the range-finding gear was sent to Britain to make up for what was lost at Dunkirk, and the New Zealand Home Guard reverted to using German equipment that had been souvenired from WWI.

A New Zealand padre who had fought in WWI as a stretcher bearer tried to get into the WWII army as a chaplain but nobody wanted to know until he told them he had a German range-finder at home. He donated the range-finder to the army in exchange for joining 2NZEF (Expeditionary Force) overseas. His range-finder stayed in New Zealand as did the 4" and 6" guns.

A lot of the WWI veterans stayed in New Zealand as did those with foot and stomach problems. The WWI veterans took care of German and Italian POWs on Soames Island and all got on reasonably well. Some of the New Zealand WWI vets spent much of WWII in uniform fishing Wellington Harbour to feed the POWs. The highest point of the Island still contains Italian and German graves looking out to sea.

Churchill announced Germany's unconditional surrender on 7 May 1945 (for 0.01 am 8 May 1945) only after French Freemasonry had been destroyed, all the ammunition spent, the profits had been made by the correct parties, and a world vulnerable to social reorganisation had been created. Life would become a socialistic struggle for survival for the next 20 years.

To Churchill's surprise he was defeated in an election two months after WWII in July 1945.

This was possibly due to his order of the mass murder of 600,000 people in 13 hours on 13/14 February 1945 – a mixture of 600,000 refugees who had been in Dresden for less than a day and the unfortunate locals who received them . . . or it could have been as the result of his mass murder of 150,000 Russian Jews in Holland while emigrating to England – just after the war had ended. But why did this not make it into the history books?

At the end of WWII, only the southern half of Holland was freed. The northern half was left occupied by the Germans and they were still in the Channel Islands on the last day of the war. There was an extreme food shortage in the last year of the war and the German Army ate the Dutch out of house and home. As a result, over a million Dutch citizens died of starvation in 1944–5.

The death of 150,000 emigrating Russian Jews passed unnoticed and its record was easily omitted from history by the embedded historians that Churchill controlled.

All three of these events occurred with German complicity.

Hitler and Hess in Landsberg Prison with admirers and enough leisure time to reflect and focus on ideology – like writing Mein Kampf.

Hitler's Sexuality

Hitler's close boyhood friend from Linz, August Kubizek, wrote Adolf Hitler, Mein Jugendfreund (My Youth Friend), "Adolf did not engage in love affairs or flirtations. He always rejected the coquettish advances of girls or women. Women and girls took an interest in him but he always evaded their endeavours."

Later August Kubizek set up house with Hitler in Vienna a year after he had been rejected by Vienna's Academy of Fine Arts (Akadamie De Bildenden Kūnste). The two used to go for long walks in the woods, and when it rained took shelter in a shed and rolled naked in tarpaulins.[1]

During deconstruction, it is customary that the person is sexually abused in the manner which is most embarrassing to that person. In Hitler's case, he was sodomised, creating a submissive distant respect for homosexuals like his bodyguards and some of his highest-placed leaders. His natural bent was developed into coprophilia (being shat on). The colloquialism for this is 'scat'.[2]

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

With each deconstruction an embarrassing addiction is developed and filmed. With Hitler it was sadomasochism, coprophilia and homosexuality. That is, he liked to be verbally abused and slapped around, to have his head urinated on, his chest shat on, and to have sex with men. This made him vulnerable to ridicule by his partners, and mention of it was a coded access to his subconscious, making him vulnerable to cross-purpose.

The British had been deconstructing people for some time and the Red Army began training spies using sexual deconstruction from the very beginning of the Soviet State. The very first semester started at Frunze in 1920 and ended in gang-bangs every night. It was a classic British Intelligence technique but without the homosexuality. Most of the instructors were ex-British Intelligence.

On 24 May 1913 Hitler left Vienna and moved to the bohemian gay neighbourhood of Munich. The men's shelter at MA12, Haus Meldemannstrasse in Munich was described by a wealthy well-connected homosexual, Ernst Hanfstaengl, who later became Hitler's close friend: "It was a place where elderly men went in search of young men for homosexual pleasure. It is probable that these types of old roués and young gigolos became familiar to young Adolf at this time."[3]

---

[1] Was Hitler Gay?

[2] This trait was continued by his doctor (Dr Morell) who spooned out Hitler's faeces.

Once Hitler got into power, all the police documents and records were destroyed regarding whether or not Hitler was a male prostitute at that time.

On 2 August 1914, Germany mobilised for war and Hitler cheered. "He delighted in the homoerotic life of the trenches. There he quickly became inseparable from yet another young man, his fellow soldier and closest wartime friend, Ernst Schmidt."[4]

Hans Mend: "In 1915 we were billeted in a brewery and slept in the hay. Hitler was bedded down at night with Schmidtl, his male whore. We heard a rustling in the hay. Then someone switched on his electric flashlight and growled 'look at those two faggots'."[5]

The gay Erich Ebermayer, one of Germany's most successful poets and a contemporary of Hitler's, states in his diaries that in Hitler's military files it stipulates that Hitler was not promoted because he was a homosexual. After the 1918 German defeat, Hitler returned to Europe and entered politics.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March

When Hitler was an unknown plain-clothed army intelligence agent he met the plain-clothed Army Intelligence officer Ernst Roehm (1919). Soon after, Roehm became the flamboyant gay Army Captain and leader of the Freikorps, the right wing's shadow army, but not without British help.

---

[3] Was Hitler Gay?

[4] Lothar Machton, author of The Hidden Hitler, in the documentary Was Hitler Gay?

[5] Those with the sexual history of prime ministers are often continually attacked until they can be written off as 'one of life's losers'. For his efforts, Hans Mend became one of life's losers.

"Roehm immediately recognised how talented Hitler was, so they built a very close relationship at that time."[6] Roehm had access to Hitler's WWI files and knew of Hitler's sexual history. In this way Roehm had control of Hitler and became his minder.

Hitler was a sexual deviant who would do anything to hide his sexual proclivities from the public. This made him a puppet to any foreign country or ideology with the knowledge on him. This is known as "the wood" on a person and anyone with 'the wood' has control over that person.

Many of the highest-placed leaders in the Nazi party, including Hitler, Roehm, Förster, von Schirach and almost all of his bodyguards were gay. Hitler surrounded himself with homosexuals and even retrieved Roehm from Bolivia, making him Deputy Führer. This knowledge enabled outside countries like Britain and ideologies like the Freemasons to control Hitler, his high command and his bodyguards. Hitler and his band of merry bandits became puppets with wooden strings.

> In this way, any foreign society can be destroyed with a leader hiding their sexuality. Hitler, Roehm, Förster and von Schirach took part in destroying their own societies while enjoying the power it gave them.[7] Hitler was a double agent prime minister. He worked for a foreign country (Britain) and a foreign ideology (the Freemasons). The formula proved so effective it is still used today, in politics and the media, especially with TV personalities, radio announcers, prime ministers and presidents, both male and female.

One of Germany's more influential record keepers of Hitler's homosexuality was General Otto von Lassow, who was then the military Commander of Munich. He was a very strong man in Europe in the early 1920s, had access to every record, and a bitter enemy of Hitler. After dinner one night, he invited friends to his study and read secret letters from the Munich Beard Vice Squad to some of his dinner guests ('Beard' is German slang for 'homosexual'). These dealt with Hitler in the early 1920s, searching for young men, occasionally paying them, and taking them to his room and spending the night together.[8] Some of Hitler's close friends gave testimonies that he was gay.

---

[6] Lothar Machton, author of The Hidden Hitler, in the documentary Was Hitler Gay?

[7] Baldur von Schirach (1904–74) was a homosexual paedophile who founded the Hitler Youth. Roehm despised him for his paedophilia. He was released from Spandau in 1966.

"I, Franz, an apprentice, made the acquaintance of a gentleman who invited me to spend the night with him, and I accepted. The gentleman's name was Adolf Hitler." The originals have never been found.

General Otto von Lassow claimed they were his insurance policy should his enemy Hitler ever come to power. Lassow was the only one of Hitler's enemies who was not killed in the Night of the Long Knives (30 June 1934), which gives much credence to these files.

Hitler and Hess shared a cell at Landsberg Prison after the Munich Putsch in 1923. Hess was always regarded as a homosexual by the enemies of the Nazi Party and by the Nazi Party themselves, who nicknamed him "Frauline Anna". Ernst Hanfstaengl later testified that Hitler and Hess were prison lovers. "Hitler's strange wavering sexuality [bisexual] was activated in Landsberg in the company of Hess. That he had a liaison with Hess is beyond doubt."[9]

treasurer@platinumparty.org

Rudolf Hess had the upbringing of a bisexual. He was born and raised in a foreign country under foreign rule (British rule) until he was 12. During his emerging sexuality (12–14) he was home-schooled by his parents in Germany and spent his time alone in a garden paradise. He became passionate and introverted, was a typically Victorian child (seen but not heard) and was nicknamed "the Egyptian" for his oily skin and black hair. He loved his mother very much but was very distant from his father. He was sent to a boarding school at 14 (Evangelische Padagogium in Bad Godesberg-am-Rhein) and then to a superior school in a foreign country (the Ecole Superieure du Commerce in Neuchatel, Switzerland). He spent his life apart from other children, separate from his biological parents and separate from the country of his culture. He was an outsider who had an isolated psyche with a vicious inner dialogue that kept him alive and foreigners dead. On his return to Germany he learnt to hate the Jews with an introverted passion.

---

[8] Was Hitler Gay?

[9] Ibid.

Rudolf Hess, the Vice Führer, was a married bisexual. Hess adored Hitler and was queer for him. There was a homoerotic sense throughout the Nazi Party, which in part stemmed from Hess.

In the struggle for financial strength that is the family-centred society, Hitler battled against sexual extremes like paedophilia, child-sex abuse, homosexuality, cross-dressing and transsexuality. Correspondingly, the currency devalued and the interest rates skyrocketed.

Hitler liked to drive around Germany in fast cars and maintained a warm relationship with his new chauffeur, Julius Schrek. Once they were invited to the family home of Wagner, Hitler's favourite composer and philosopher, but Hitler disappeared with his chauffeur to a hotel with no other guests. Winifred Wagner tracked them down and there was a scandal but it was suppressed by the media that Hitler so fervently controlled.

"The Führer's libido increased proportionately with the events of the war, almost as a reaction to the intense levels of work . . . These women were almost always endowed with a large bosom"[10] but they were often a cover for his homosexuality.

Among these women were Mimi Reiter (a 16-year-old who attempted suicide?); Unity Walkrie Mitford (an English woman who attempted suicide?); Rene Muller (an actress who committed suicide?); Geli Raubal (his niece who committed suicide?); Eva Braun (a small-breasted woman who vied for attention with two show-suicides); and Carola Hoffman, Gertrud von Seidlitz, Helene Bechstein, Stephanie van Hohenlohe, Viktoria van Dirksen, and Leni Riefenstahl who made his propaganda movies and denies any sexual involvement, but describes an orgasm when listening to him speak at the Nuremberg rallies.

Free from prison in 1924, Hitler (35) was encouraged by his colleagues to marry. Under their pressure he finally took an interest in Mimi Reiter, a 16-year-old shop girl. Their affair went sour during a disastrous walk in the woods in 1925. "He hugged me really tightly around the neck. He kissed me. He didn't know what to do. I could feel how he clenched his fists. I could see how he was fighting with himself."[11] Unable to consummate the relationship, Hitler escaped by claiming that he had to think of the mission in Germany. Hitler broke up with Mimi and she reportedly tried to commit suicide from disappointment. This is unlikely as she was sixteen and he was thirty-five. It was more likely organised propaganda, or another attempted murder made to look like a suicide.

Unity Walkrie Mitford (20) stalked Hitler until she finally met him at the Osteria Bavaria restaurant. After the affair, she shot herself with a pearl-handled revolver, dying eight years later.

Hitler showed Rene Muller a photo of her kissing another man and then gave her a letter saying that she would never work in German cinema again. Within two hours she was dead, having landed on the courtyard outside her window.[12]

When Hitler became busy with power, he invited his half-sister Angela and her two daughters to come and stay and keep house at his rented villa at Obersalzberg in 1928. Repeating his father's pattern of 'incest with his housekeeper', the archetypal loner (39) quickly fell in love with his half-sister's daughter, Geli Raubal (17). She became his constant companion in Europe during his political rise to fame from 1929–31.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Hitler had a propensity for incest and having his face and chest defecated on, to which his niece, Geli, objected. It became necessary to silence Geli about Adolf's homosexuality, his coprophilia and his incest. If this got out, the Third Reich would have lost the 'race' card. There would be no 'master race' to aspire to and the armies would have lost their motivation for war and even rebelled. The official story is an alibi for what really happened.

Hitler was very possessive and after Geli had sex with his chauffeur and was officially pregnant to yet another man, her music teacher's piano player,[13] Hitler became smothering and restrictive. Officially Geli (20) protested against Adolf's possessiveness and shot herself dead in his apartment on 18 September 1931.

Official historians note Hitler (42) was away in Hamburg at the time and devastated and distraught at the news of her death. Official history omits to note Geli broke her nose during her 'suicide' . . . the real story is closer to murderous incest.

---

[10] Very Illustrious Patients, p. 96.

[11] Was Hitler Gay?

[12] The Memoirs of Bridget Hitler, p. 178.

[13] Geli Raubal was not pregnant.

Adolf Hitler had taken his niece Geli to a private first floor room in the Bratwurstglöckl Restaurant on the night of her death and ordered beer, which was rare. Even one glass made him tipsy.[14] Hitler and Geli left around 1 am and returned to his nearby apartment on Prinzregentenstrasse. Hitler made sexual advances towards Geli, she refused and a scuffle broke out. Hitler broke Geli's nose and then shot her with his service revolver, the only gun stored in the apartment.

Having lost her husband and daughter to her half-brother, Angela Raubal did not want to be without the comforts Hitler could provide. Hitler had delayed his meeting in Hamburg and his half-sister Angela supported this alibi, just as she had remained quiet about the disappearance of her husband Leo Raubal.

The affidavit of the police captain who visited Hitler's apartment, the story told by his housekeeper Josephine Bauer, the circumstances surrounding the funeral and Adolf's history of brandishing the revolver, all supported Hitler's murder of his lover and niece, Geli Raubal.

A suicide would have resulted in no Catholic rights, but Geli was given full Catholic rights, wherever they could be found. They were not granted in Munich, so Geli was buried in Vienna. Even the Catholic priest Pater Paunt, gave this explanation to Geli's brother Leo: "My poor friend, if your sister had committed suicide, I could not have performed the ceremony. You must be content with this. More I cannot tell you."[15]

treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

Leo Raubal had now lost a father and a daughter to uncle Adolf. Leo contacted Fritz Gerlich, founder of Der Gerade (The Right Way weekly). In a pamphlet Gerlich exposed Hitler's murder of Geli and for his efforts was arrested, held, and then killed in the Night of the Long Knives on 30 June 1934, as were many of Hitler's enemies.

---

[14] This was confirmed in the affidavit of Herr Senter, the proprietor of the Bratwurstglöckl Restaurant.

[15] The Memoirs of Bridget Hitler, pp. 103–3.

After this meeting Leo met his cousin Patrick Hitler at his father's bar in Berlin. They flatted together and after some time Leo spoke about Geli's murder adding that Adolf had threatened him with his revolver at Berchtesgaden when he was talking to Geli about his pregnant girlfriend.

> Leo Raubal (junior): "I am sure my mother knows what happened. She was really Adolf's accomplice, because she tolerated his making love to Geli. She knew; yet she did nothing. Was she afraid? Possibly. Or was it only that she did not want to give up her comfortable life? When Geli was shot I suppose Mother felt it was useless to quarrel with Adolf over it. Geli was irrevocably lost to her: why should she lose Adolf too?"[16]

The alternative may have been as drastic as changing the leader of Germany and postponing WWII. The British helped to cover up Hitler's murder of Geli and for this they used their agent Hermann Goering. A month later his own wife Carin died, officially from a cold she caught on the border during a crossing. This stopped both men from settling into domestic bliss. It kept them focused on their mission with renewed aggravation.

Hitler was becoming the perfect weapon for radical social change and the destruction of existing military infrastructures, which he carried out with exemplary effect over the next decade. Those in the know feared Hitler even more, but the official propaganda from Hitler and Geli reads: "In many ways he was a very sweet and caring man."

When Hitler became Chancellor he transferred Geli's body to Berchtesgaden and placed it in a magnificent sarcophagus that never bore her name. Hitler placed flowers under Geli's photograph and always remembered the anniversary of her murder, but there were costs. Hitler developed a stomach ailment, became a vegetarian, invented the vegetarian steak and as it turned out, the vegetarian marriage.

Hitler was into being defecated on by women and average women felt disgusted and reacted strongly. As a result there was quite a strong urge for them to kill themselves. Geli's replacement, Eva Braun, was "a pretty, empty-headed blonde receptionist with a round face and blue eyes," who faked suicide twice (1932, 1935) in order to get Hitler's attention away from Geli. Hitler attended her but was not so much in love with her. She [16] Ibid, p. 106.

---

At the Olympic Games in Garmisch, Berlin, in 1936, Hitler requested his sister Paula change her name, and to maintain the strictest incognito. She changed her name to 'Wolf', which was Hitler's nickname and one of their towns of origin, 'Gross Wolfgers'. She changed her title from 'Ms' to 'Mrs', changing from Ms Paula Hitler to Mrs Paula Wolf.

Mrs Paula Wolf was arrested as Hitler's sister by US Intelligence on 12 July 1945 and again on 5 June 1946. She was deeply affected by Hitler's announced death. She was released and worked in an arts and crafts shop in Vienna (toiling for mental health) and wrote He Was Still My Brother. She moved into a humble two-bedroom flat in Berchtesgaden on 1 December 1952, very close to Hitler's mountain retreat, Eagle's Nest, in southern Bavaria, near the German/Austrian border. She lived in seclusion and died seven and a half years later on 1 June 1960. Ms Paula Hitler (alias Mrs Paula Wolf) never married and had no children.[30]

In 1997, I interviewed a woman who attended one of the Nuremberg Rallies: "I found it positively orgasmic, as did so many other women at the time". Despite his many and various shortcomings, Hitler had a way with the ladies. "Women went slack at the mouth and breathed heavily, as if in the grip of sexual excitement." Hitler was able to tap into their sexuality en masse, and Germany's women responded by backing Hitler and also influencing their men to do so.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

> "It seemed as if the Earth's surface were spreading out in front of me, like a hemisphere that suddenly splits in the middle, spewing out an enormous jet of water, so powerful that it touched the sky and shook the earth. I felt quite paralysed."[31] An orgasm perhaps.

> "Many were fascinated by his hypnotic power, and there are well-attested accounts of the hysteria which affected women at his meetings. Hitler himself attached great importance to the women's vote, and this was one of the reasons which he gave for not marrying. He liked to have beautiful women in his company."[32]

Hitler knew his material with a passion and orated rather than read, relying on the magical power of the spoken word. He studied under the Munich comedian Weiss Ferdl and was taught to make only a few points, repeating them endlessly. The comedian reinforced his belief that "A big lie is always more credible than a little one".

Deconstructed people have a great deal of difficulty forming long-term relationships, as do those who surround them. They tend to know how to bond quickly and un-bond just as quick. This is a product of compartmentalisation that occurs during deconstruction and the late in life 'altering of a subconscious'. "A curious effect the upper-rank Nazis had on those who joined them. They very often broke up their marriages, no matter how happy they might have been before."[33]

Deconstructed people cannot form intimate relationships like marriage, as they are, for the most part, not themselves. They are essentially a machine for someone else's purpose. As a result, their sexual relations fill a void rather than establish a relationship and their boundaries tend to be as intransigent as their goals. Hitler was primarily a vehicle for someone else's purpose. As a result, he remained single and unable to marry.

Hitler's relationship with his parents was conflict ridden. Hitler's primary love was his housekeeper, who was also his niece (Geli Raubal). He was incestuous, prone to homosexuality in the trenches, and had no children. Hitler lacked trust and his boundary was jealousy which resulted in the convenient murder/suicides of several of his partners.

> "During his final few hours in the bunker, loyal followers raced to burn all remaining documents that might shred light on the Führer. Hitler married Eva Braun [at midnight] on 29 April 1945 as a further measure to cover up his homosexuality. Hitler died as he lived, lying and covering up."[34]

Hitler was 'a multiplicitous sadomasochistic coprophilic homosexual Anglophile'.

> "It remained for the younger generation to complete the break, to cut the ties to the past and achieve freedom from sentiment, prejudices and memories. Paradoxically, in doing so, in a sense it actually completed Hitler's revolution . . . All comparisons between recent and the earlier movements break on the one reef."[35]

---

[30] The Dwight D. Eisenhower Library.

[31] Leni Riefenstahl's Memoirs, New Zealand Herald, 13–14 September 2003, A27.

[32] Prelude to Terror, p. 419.

[33] The Amiable Prussian, p. 70.

[34] Narrator Dennis Lawson, Was Hitler Gay?

[35] Hitler, pp. 762–763.

Hitler's Psychiatric Condition

Neurotics have the ability to harm themselves. Psychotics have the ability to harm others. Hitler did both, but as a British military agent, he was trained to harm others en masse and to harm himself with a cocktail of drugs and perverse sexuality.

In 1911, the Swiss psychiatrist Eugen Bleuler invented the term 'Schizophrenia' for the condition of having a split mind. The following year Hitler began his British Military Psych-Ops training (February–November 1912). Hitler had defensive and self-important postures because he was living a fantasy given to him by others in order to change the times.

Hitler was part neurotic, psychotic, paranoid and schizophrenic. This was the basis of his deconstruction, which although developed, was always in the experimental phase. That is, it was always being tested and improved upon.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

This work continues in Tavistock today. It includes the deconstruction of all age groups within Britain, including pre-school, school children, teenagers, young adults, working adults, and the elderly. It works the media, education and politics towards a predetermined plan. In the centre is the main military deconstruction building. It is surrounded by buildings, which specialise in more publicly acceptable forms of deconstruction with names like the 'Tavistock Institute for Human Relations'.

For total control over a person, the record of an embarrassing sexual history is essential. From this, neurosis, psychosis, paranoia and schizophrenia are developed and continually built upon. The avoidance of shame becomes a personal motivation.

A sense of persecution and self-importance are characteristic of paranoiacs – the ability to harm oneself. When the war schools look for their new protagonists they always look for paranoiacs with a personal history of persecution and self-importance. This gives the maximum gap in the subconscious for deconstruction to take place – the gap between persecution and self-importance.

